START

Microfilmed By:

NORTHEAST DOCUMENT
CONSERVATION CENTER
Andover, MA 01810

August 1994

Camera Operator:
Kathy Wilder

MASTER NEGATIVE NUMBER:
BSO-56-072

MICROFILMED
August 1993 - April 1994

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOK MICROFILMING PROJECT

Funded in part by

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES

Grant No. PS-20709-93

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MICROFILMING PROJECT

A Cooperative Project Between the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives and the Boston Public Library (August 1993 - April 1994)

The Microfilming Project incorporates two collections of scrapbooks housed in two separate repositories. The first set of scrapbooks (80 volumes) resides within the Allen A. Brown Collection of the Boston Public Library (BPL) Music Department. Their call number is M.125.5. The second set of scrapbooks (132 volumes) resides within the Press Clippings collection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) Archives. They have the designation Pres 56.

The BPL scrapbooks begin with the founding of the BSO in 1881 and continue, through 79 seasons, to 1960. Articles consist mainly of reviews and feature stories from Boston and New York newspapers. Occasionally, magazine articles and press releases are also included. The scrapbooks cover most aspects of the BSO.

The BSO scrapbooks run from 1889, the Orchestra's 9th season, to 1973. In addition to local reviews and features, the volumes contain articles culled from national and international publications. The scrapbooks document, in detail, all aspects of the BSO: The Symphony Orchestra (including subscription concerts, tours, and trips), the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Festival, the Tanglewood Music Center, and Symphony Hall.

The two sets of scrapbooks have been filmed as two separate entities. Researchers wanting to look at specific seasons or subjects must examine both sets of films to ensure full coverage.

The scrapbooks do not represent the complete holdings of either location on the subject of the BSO.

Requests for positive microfilm copies of individual rolls, or of film sets, should be directed to the respective repository:

Music Department
Boston Public Library
Post Office Box 286
Boston, MA 02117

Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives
Symphony Hall
Boston, MA 02115

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOKS

1889 - 1973

132 VOLUMES

Source: Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives

FINDING AID

Boston Symphony Orchestra Scrapbooks (Series 56, Sub-Series 1)

Source: Press Office (Office of the Public Relations Director)

The BSO scrapbooks comprise part of one series in the BSO Archives. Series 56, Press Clippings, is divided by format into 3 sub-series: 1) Scrapbooks, 1889-1973 (132 volumes); 2) Loose Clippings, 1931-1991 (9 record cartons); and 3) Oversize Newspapers and Journals, 1919-1979 (1 oversize box). Each sub-series is arranged chronologically.

The scrapbooks contain concert notices and reviews, record reviews, and feature articles. Early scrapbooks may also contain programs, tickets, and subscription orders. Materials are organized by concert season into the following categories: BSO (including tours); Kneisel Quartet (and later Boston Symphony Chamber Players); Boston Pops (referred to in early years as Promenade concerts); and Tanglewood (including the Tanglewood Music Center, the Tanglewood Festival, Tanglewood-on-Parade, and the Fromm Festival of Contemporary Music).

Reviews and articles cover a wide range of subjects: Founder H.L. Higginson; BSO conductors, players, trustees, and other personnel; guest artists and composers; BSO and Pops performances and recordings; U.S. and overseas tours; BSO/Cecilia Society joint performances; open rehearsals; and special events connected to anniversary celebrations and fundraising.

Feature stories document changes in the size, composition, and location of the orchestra. Topics include the hiring of women and minorities; the unionization of players; controversies (such as the internment of conductor Karl Muck during World War II); the sale of the old Music Hall; and the construction of Symphony Hall and other structures (such as the Koussevitsky Music Shed at Tanglewood).

Reproductions of the materials in the collection may not be made without permission from the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives.

GUIDE TO CONTENTS

Institution: BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Series Name: PRESS CLIPPINGS
Series Number: 56
Series Dates: 1889-1991

Sub-series Name: SCRAPBOOKS
Sub-series Number: 1
Sub-series Dates: 1889-1973

VOLUME LISTING

VOL	TITLE	DATES
1	BSO	1889-1890
2	BSO
	Kneisel Quartet	1890-1891
3	BSO	1891-1892
4	Promenade (Pops)	1892
5	BSO
	Kneisel Quartet	1892-1893
6	BSO
	Kneisel Quartet	1893-1894
7	BSO
	Kneisel Quartet	1894-1895
8	BSO	1895-1896
9	Promenade (Pops)	1895-1896
10	BSO	1896-1897
11	BSO	1897-1898
12	Promenade (Pops)	1897-1898
13	BSO	1898-1899
14	BSO	1899-1900
15	Pops	1899-1900
16	BSO	1900-1901
17	BSO	1901-1902
18	Pops	1901-1903
19	BSO	1902-1903
20	BSO	1903-1904
21	BSO	1904-1905
22	Pops	1904-1905
23	BSO	1905-1906
24	BSO	1906-1907
25	BSO	1907-1908
26	BSO	1908-1909
27	BSO
	Pops	1909-1910
28	BSO
	Pops	1910-1911
29	BSO Advertisements	1910-1911
30	BSO
	Pops	1911-1912
31	BSO
	Pops	1912-1913
32	BSO
	Pops	1913-1914
33	BSO
	Pops	1914-1915
34	BSO
	Pops	1915-1916
35	BSO
	Pops	1916-1917
36	BSO
	Pops	1917-1918
37	Karl Muck	1918
38	BSO
	Pops	1918-1919
39	BSO
	Pops	1919-1920
40	BSO Advertisements	1919-1920
41	BSO
	Pops	1920-1921
42	BSO
	Pops	1921-1922
43	BSO
	BSO Advertisements
	Pops Advertisements	1922-1923
44	BSO
	Pops	1922-1924
45	BSO
	Pops	1924
46	BSO
	BSO Advertisements
	Pops Advertisements	1924-1926
47	BSO
	Pops	1925-1926
48	BSO Advertisements
	Pops Advertisements	1926-1927
49	BSO
	Pops	1926-1928
50	BSO	1928
51	BSO
	Pops	1928-1929
52	BSO
	Pops
	U.S. Tour	1929-1930
53	BSO	1930-1931
54	BSO
	Pops	1931-1932
55	BSO
	Pops	1932-1933
56	BSO	1933-1934
57	BSO	1934-1935
58	BSO	1935-1936
59	BSO	1936-1937

VOL	TITLE	DATES
60	Pops
	Tanglewood	1936-1937
61	BSO	1937
62	BSO	1937-1938
63	Pops
	Tanglewood	1938
64	BSO	1938-1939
65	Pops
	Tanglewood	1939
66	BSO	1939-1940
67	Tanglewood	1939-1941
68	BSO
	Pops	1940
69	BSO	1940-1941
70	Tanglewood	1940-1944
71	BSO	1941-1942
72	BSO	1942-1943
73	BSO	1943-1944
74	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1944-1945
75	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1945-1946
76	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1946-1947
77	Tanglewood	1947-1948
78	BSO	1947-1949
79	Tanglewood	1949-1950
80	BSO	1949-1951
81	Tanglewood	1950-1951
82	BSO
	Pops	1951-1952
83	BSO
	Pops	1952-1953
84	Tanglewood	1952-1953
85	BSO	1953-1955
86	Tanglewood	1953-1954
87	Tanglewood	1954-1955
88	BSO
	Pops	1955-1956
89	Tanglewood	1955-1956
90	Tanglewood	1955-1956
91	European Tour	1956
92	European Tour	1956-1957
93	BSO
	Pops	1956-1957
94	Tanglewood	1957
95	BSO	1957-1958
96	BSO
	Pops	1958-1959

VOL	TITLE	DATES
97	BSO	1958-1959
98	Tanglewood	1958-1959
99	Tanglewood	1959
100	BSO
	Pops	1959-1960
101	Tanglewood	1959-1960
102	Far Eastern Tour	1959-1960
103	BSO
	Pops	1960-1961
104	Tanglewood	1961
105	BSO
	Pops	1961-1962
106	Tanglewood	1962
107	BSO
	Pops	1962-1963
108	Tanglewood	1963
109	BSO
	Pops	1963-1964
110	Tanglewood	1963-1964
111	BSO
	Pops	1964-1966
112	Tanglewood	1965
113	BSO 85th Anniversary	1965
114	BSO
	Pops	1965-1966
115	Tanglewood	1966
116	BSO
	Pops	1966-1967
117	Tanglewood	1967
118	BSO
	Pops	1967-1968
119	Tanglewood	1968-1969
120	BSO
	Pops	1968-1969
121	Tanglewood	1969
122	BSO
	Pops	1969-1970
123	Tanglewood	1970
124	BSO
	Pops	1970-1971
125	Tanglewood	1971
126	BSO
	Pops	1971-1972
127	European Tour	1970-1971
128	European Tour	1971
129	Tanglewood	1972
130	BSO
	Pops	1972-1973
131	Tanglewood	1973
132	BSO
	Pops	1973-1974

MATERIALS NOT FILMED

SUB-SERIES NUMBER	SUB-SERIES NAME	SUB-SERIES DATES
2	Loose Clippings	1931-1991
3	Oversize Newspapers and Journals	1919-1979

COPYRIGHT STATEMENT

The copyright law of the Unites States - Title 17, United States Code - concerns the making of photocopies or other reproductions of copyrighted material.

Under certain conditions specified in the law, libraries and archives are authorized to furnish a photocopy or other reproduction. One of these specified conditions is that the photocopy or other reproduction is not to be "used for any purpose other than private study, scholarship, or research." If a user makes a request for, or later uses, a photocopy or reproduction for purposes in excess of "fair use," that user may be liable for copyright infringement.

This institution reserves the right to refuse to accept a copy order if, in its judgment, fulfillment of the order would involve violation of the copy-right law.

TECHNICAL DATA

IMAGE PLACEMENT: IA IB IIA IIB

REDUCTION RATIO: 16:1

FILM STOCK:

Reel 72

Volumes 120-122

BSO, Pops, Tanglewood

1968-1970

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

A3

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION[SM] RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

MULTIPLE EXPOSURES DUE TO COLOR VARIATIONS

VOLUME 120

BSO
Pops

1968 - 1969

Boston Is—

Boston is the largest city and capital of Massachusetts.

Boston is the Hub.

Boston is where the action is.

Boston is the site of the 105th annual meeting of the American Veterinary Medical Association, July 21–25, 1968.

Boston's finest hotel, the Sheraton-Boston, is the headquarter's hotel for the convention.

Boston's War Memorial Auditorium is where most of the events of the convention will take place and where you can view the exhibitors' displays.

Boston is the home of Jordan Marsh, Filene's, R. H. Stearns, Gilchrists, and many other fine shops and stores where you or your wife can shop for anything you might want—including a genuine, New England baked bean pot.

Boston is where it all began—The Freedom Trail will take you past the Boston Common, America's oldest park; the "new" State House, designed by Bulfinch, the Park Street Church, built in 1809 and called the "most interesting mass of brick and motar in America," by Henry James; the Old Granary Graveyard, where rest Sam Adams, Paul Revere, and many others of the Revolutionary Period; King's Chapel, the favored church of the Royal Governors; site of the first public school; the Old Corner Bookstore, where gathered most of America's 19th century literary greats; the Old South Meeting House, where they planned the Boston Tea Party; the birthplace of Benjamin Franklin; the Old State House, in front of which took place the Boston Massacre; Faneuil Hall, the famed "Cradle of Liberty"; Paul Revere's House, Boston's oldest, and the Old North Church, from the steeple of which swung the lanterns signaling the beginning of the Republic.

Boston is where Beacon Hill is—the synonyn for aristorcracy in America.

Boston is Louisburg Square with its fine houses reminding us of another and more gentle day.

Boston is Boston University and Harvard University and Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Boston is the "Athens of America."

Boston is the Back Bay and Boylston Street and Newbury Street and Charles Street, all of which are lined with the history of the burgeoning Republic.

Boston is the Boston Museum of Fine Arts, world renowned for its collection and second only to New York's Metropolitan in importance.

Boston is the Isabella Stewart Museum, once the palace of a millionaire, now the exquisite repository of some of the world's finest art.

Boston is the 50-story Prudential Tower and Prudential Plaza, signaling the rebirth and renaissance of America's oldest city.

Boston is Copley Square and the fine old Sheraton-Plaza Hotel and the elegantly continental Ritz-Carlton.

Boston is the Union Oyster House and the Durgin Park Restaurant, both unembellished second-floor dining places where the food is good and plentiful, the décor sparse and utilitarian.

Boston is "Old Ironsides" now resting in the Boston Navy Yard after its glorious career.

Boston is the Public Garden with its swan boats and greensward called the Common.

Boston is the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the world-renowned Boston "Pops" and its summer promenade concerts.

Boston is theater where most Broadway-bound shows go to find out if they can make on the Main Stem.

Boston is the waterfront and lobster, shrimp, schrod, and clams—all fresh from the Atlantic Ocean.

JRNL OF THE AMER. VETERINARY MEDICAL ASSN.
CHICAGO, ILLINOIS
SEMI-MONTHLY 22,000

JUN 1 1968

105th annual meeting in Boston, Mass., July 21–25, 1968

[A]

LOVING COUPLE

Globe

MAY 11, 1969 · Sunday · WITH TV WEEK

CONTENTS

I. Pre-Season ..... i-iv

II. Program Reviews:.....Page 1

A. Boston Symphony in Symphony Hall — Page 1
(date and series directory opposite page 1)

B. Boston Symphony Away — Page 53
(dates and series directory opposite page 53)

C. Boston Symphony Chamber Ensembles — Page 81
(concert series directory opposite page 81)

III. Radio, Television and Recordings:.....Page 85

A. Radio and television announcements — Page 85

B. Recordings - disc and tape — Page 89
Leinsdorf and the BSO .....p. 89-102 & 104
Leinsdorf without BSO.....p.101
BSO re-releases.....p.102

C. Chamber music recordings — Page 103

IV. Personnel.....Page 105

A. The Musicians of the Boston Symphony:
Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director
Philosophy, via press interviews....page 105
Evaluation & associated articles....page 111
Future plans.....page 113
Re-marriage press releases.....page 116
Charles Wilson, Assistant Conductor.....page116

Members of the Orchestra
Press reports of interviews and solo concerts.....page 117
Boston and Tokyo musican exchange....page 118
Richard Burgin leads Philharmonia...page 119
The ladies of the Orchestra.....page 120

B. The Management and Associated Personnel:
Banks succeeds Cabot as President.....page 121
Board of Overseers & Trustee Announcements " 122
Articles by Mr. Hatch.....page 124
Marvin Schofer, Public Relations.....page 125
David Rockefeller, Development Coordinator " 126
William Pierce, BSO's radio & TV voice...page 127
Martin Bookspan, the voice for BSO on channel 7 news....page 128

V. "SYMPHONY WORLD IS UNDERGOING CHANGES".....Page 129

A. Music, Musicians & Music-lovers
The conductor crises.....page 129
Conductors speak of future of symphonic music.....page 136
String player shortage.....pp.136 & 138
Black musicians.....page 137

B. Music-lovers, Music & Money
Audience decline.....page 139
Survival linked to "purpose"
Obscurity of "modern" music.....page140
Influence of Jazz etc.....page 141
← FRIENDS of the BSO.....page 143
← Sears, Roebuck & Co. grant .....page 148

C. Music-lovers & Musicians
Margaret Ruthven Lang.....page 149
Edward Kennedy Party in Washington.....page 151

D. Music & Money
Friday Afternoon at the Symphony.....page 150
"Managing Orchestras Is a Fine Art Too".page 155
Associated articles about orchestras and money.....page 157
BSO money problems.....page 162
Universality of the problem.....page 165

E. Musicians & Money
Pay & Policy among orchestras.....page 167
Horblit Award.....page 168
Contract for BSO players.....page 169

VI. The Death of Charles Munch.....Page 172

VII. The Coming Season
A. William Steinberg, Music Director .....Page 185
B. Michael Tilson Thomas, Assistant Conductor.....Page 193

[c]

PRE-SEASON

Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1968-69 Season Highlights

BOSTON — The opening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 88th season, 1968-69, will take place on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Sept. 27 and 28, in Symphony Hall, Boston, with a program comprising Mozart's Symphony in E Flat, K. 543, Beethoven's concert aria Ah, Perfido, and excerpts from Wagner's Die Gotterdammerung. Marilyn Horne will be soloist in the Beethoven and Wagner works.

Season Highlights

Highlights of the season's repertoire in addition to the Wagner excerpts include major works, two seldom-heard Prokofieff pieces, choral and vocal and a concerto last heard by Boston Symphony Orchestra audiences 55 years ago.

Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the first Boston and New York performances of the original version of Strauss' Ariadne Auf Naxos on Jan. 3, 4 and 7, 1969 in Symphony Hall and Jan. 18 in Carnegie Hall. Claire Watson and Beverly Sills, sopranos, and Robert Nagy, tenor, will be featured soloists. Debussy's The Martyrdom of St. Sebastien will be conducted by the orchestra's former music director Charles Munch.

The seldom-heard Prokofieff pieces, both to be conducted by Erich Leinsdorf are the Fourth Symphony, which was given its first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky in November, 1930, and the Fifth Piano Concerto, in which John Browning will be soloist. On the program with the Prokofieff symphony will be Robert Schumann's Fourth Symphony, to be heard in its original version. Another Debussy work to be played is the infrequently programmed Rhapsody for Saxophone and Orchestra. The soloist will be Felix Viscuglia.

Point of Interest

A point of interest of the Rhapsody is that it was commissioned (in 1901) by Elise Coolidge Hall, a Boston lady who played the saxophone. It was once performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the saxophone part played by Louis Speyer on the English horn.

The season will end on April 18 and 19, 1969 with Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. These concerts will be his last winter season concerts as music director; he will retire as music director at the end of the 1969 Berkshire Festival, although he will return to the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a guest conductor during each of the following five years.

Other Guest Conductors

Guest conductors, in addition to Charles Munch, include: Georg Semkow, the Polish conductor, making his American debut in Boston; Georges Pretre, and Pierre Boulez, both making their Boston Symphony Orchestra debuts, Colin Davis, and Charles/ Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. One other guest conductor will be announced later.

Soloists include pianists Clifford Curzon, Andre Watts, Eugene Istomin, Claude Frank, and Jorge Bolet in addition to John Browning and Earl Wild; violinists Arthur Grumiaux and Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; and singers Herman Prey, Sherill Milnes, and Sarmae Endich, in addition to Marilyn Horne, Claire Watson, Beverly Sills, and Robert Nagy. Choruses and other soloists will be announced later.

The annual Pension Fund concert will be Dec. 15, 1968. Joan Sutherland will sing; Richard Bonynge will conduct.

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 115,950

JUN 16 1968 New England Newsclip

SUNDAY STANDARD TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 60,150

JUN 16 1968 New England Newsclip

...oying. There can b... progress in a society which believes ...e gun is the solution to our pressing problems or that the gangster has all the right answers.

Boston Symphony Plans for Next Season

Next season, as everyone knows, will be Erich Leindorf's final complete one as conductor of the Boston Symphony, although for the next five years he will serve frequently as guest conductor. Mr. Leinsdorf has now announced plans for his final season.

The Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall will begin on Sept. 27, with a program comprising Mozart's "Symphony in E Flat, K. 543," Beethoven's concert aria, "Ah, Perfido," and excerpts from Wagner's "Die Gotterdammerung," with Marilyn Horne as soloist.

Highlights of the season's repertoire will be the following: The first Boston performance of the original version of Strauss' "Ariadne auf Naxos;" two seldom-heard Prokofieff pieces, "Symphony No. 4" and "Piano Concerto No. 5," with John Browning as soloist; Schumann's "Symphony No. 4" in its original version; Debussy's "Rhapsody for Saxophone anl Orchestra," with Felix Viscuglia as soloist; and the first performance in Boston since 1913 of Scharwenka's "First Piano Concerto," with Earl Wild as soloist. The season will end on April 18 and 19 with a performance of Beethoven's "Symphony No. 9."

Guest conductors appearing during the season will include Charles Munch, Georg Semkow (of Poland), Georges Pretre, Pierre Boulez, Colin Davis, and Charles Wilson. Soloists, aside from those already mentioned, will be pianists Clifford Curzon, Andre Watts, Eugene Istomin, Claude Frank, and Jorge Bolet; violinists Arthur Grumiaux and Joseph Silverstein; and vocalists Herman Prey, Sherill Milnes, Sarmae Endich, Claire Watson, Beverly Sills, and Robert Nagy. Joan Sutherand will be soloist for the annual Pension Fund Concert on Dec. 15.

HERE AND THERE — Actor John Wayne was awarded an honorary degree at the University of Southern California commencement . . . A Hebrew version of "Hello, Dolly" will be produced in Tel Aviv in September . . . Tony Bennett has signed a new longterm contract with Columbia Records . . . Patricia Medina comes out of retirement to play a role in the film version of "The Killing of Sister George" . . . Liza Minelli has the female lead in Paramount's "The Sterile Cuckoo."

Sills To Sing With The Boston Symphony

By Alfred Burke

LOWELL—Beverly Sills, who ranks high among American lyric sopranos, will appear in the first Boston performance of Strauss' "Ariadne Auf Naxos" in the original version during the 1968-69 Boston Symphony Orchestra season and conducting will be the Orchestra's musical director, Erich Leinsdorf.

Beverly Sills

Also during the organization's annual New York concerts the Strauss work will be repeated. Claire Watson, soprano and Robert Nagay, tenor, have also been invited to sing in these performances.

Opening concerts will be on Friday and Saturday, September 27-28 and the announced program will include Mozart's Symphony in E Flat, K. 543; Beethoven's Concert aria, "Ah, Perfido", and excerpts from Wagner's "Die Gotterdammerung". Marilyn Horne will be soloist in the Beethoven and Wagner pieces.

DeBussy's "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastien" will be offered during the season and conducting will be the former musical director of the Boston Symphony, Charles Munch. The seldom heard Prokofieff pieces, both to be conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf, are the Fourth Symphony, which was given its first performance by the Boston Symphony orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky in November, 1930, and the Fifth Piano Concerto, in which John Browning will be soloist. On the program with the Prokofieff symphony will be Robert Schumann's Fourth Symphony, to be heard in its original form.

Lawrence Richmond, president of the Provincetown Symphony Society has announced plans for the second Provincetown Music Festival to be held this summer. Eight events will comprise the season which will be held in both the town hall and Provincetown Art association, and will begin on July 2 and end on August 31. Listed to be performed will be programs featuring chamber music, orchestral, folk music, early music, recitals (both instrumental and vocal), and dance.

The Provincetown Symphony will observe its 14th season and for the major event of the season, will present a Festival Concert on Sunday, August 4. Joseph Hawthorne who is the orchestra's regular musical director will conduct and he has invited the internationally famous oboist, Ronald Roseman as soloist. For his appearance with the orchestra, the soloist has selected the Handel G Minor Concerto and the Mozart Divertimento No. 11 in D Major.

Desmund Tay from Ghana will direct the study of African music at the New England Conservatory of Music Institute at Tanglewood this summer. One of the world's leading African drummers, he will be making his first visit to the United States. He plans to bring his important and complete collection of African drums to Lenox.

Also invited to participate as a member of the Institute's summer faculty will be Ali Akbar Kahn, a leading member of the Ravi Shankar troupe and director of his own school of Indian Music in California, who will assist Mr. Shankar during the one week study of Indian music and will be present for entire week.

Margaret Harshaw, internationally known Wagnerian soprano formerly of the Metropolitan Opera, will join the voice faculty of the New England Conservatory of Music, it has been announced by president Gunther Schuller. Miss Harshaw comes to Boston from the School of Music of Indiana University where she has been a faculty member since 1962. Previous to her teaching career she was a member of the Metropolitan Opera company, and during her 23 years with the company sang the great roles from the German school with such artistry that she was termed the American Brunhilde.

A guest soprano with the leading opera companies of the world, Miss Harshaw also gained the distinction of being a recitalist of the first rank. She has appeared with the Boston, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Chicago and Cleveland symphonies, and at such famous festival centers as the Hollywood Bowl and the Berkshire. She studied at the Julliard school in New York under the late Mme. Schoen-Rene.

SUN (e)
LOWELL, MASS.
CIRC. 46,350

JUN 15 1968 New England Newsclip

Marilyn Horne Soloist at Boston Symphony Opening

BOSTON—Soprano Marilyn Horne will be the soloist for the Sept. 27 and 28 opening concerts of the 1968-1969 Boston Symphony season. Erich Leinsdorf, music director, also will conduct the first Boston performances of the original version of Richard Strauss' "Ariadne auf Naxos" on Jan 3, 4 and 7 and the first New York performance of the version on Jan. 18. Sopranos Claire Watson and Beverly Sills, and tenor Robert Nagy will be featured.

The season also will include Prokofiev's "Piano Concerto No. 5" with John Browning, and Prokofiev's "Symphony No. 4," both conducted by Leinsdorf, and Debussy's "The Martydom of St. Sebastian," conducted by Charles Munch. Earl Wild will be the soloist in Scharwenka's "Piano Concerto No. 1."

Other conductors will be Georg Semkow, Georges Pretre, Pierre Boulez, Colin Davis, and Charles Wilson, the Boston's assistant conductor. Piano soloists, in addition to Browning and Wild, will be Clifford Curzon, Andre Watts, Eugene Istomin, Claude Frank, and Jorge Bolet. Other soloists will be violinists Arthur Grumiaux and Joseph Silverstein; soprano Saramae Endich; and baritones Herman Prey and Sherrill Milnes. Richard Bonynge will conduct the annual Pension Fund Concert on Dec. 15 with soprano Joan Southerland as soloist.

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000

JUN 22 1968

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 88th season of concerts, Sept. 27-28, with Mozart's "Symphony in E Flat," Beethoven's concerto aria "Ah, Perfido" and excerpts from Wagner's "Die Gotterdammerung." Marilyn Horne will be soloist and Erich Leinsdorf conducts.

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000

JUN 29 1968

PRE-SEASON

Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1968-69 Season Highlights

BOSTON — The opening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 88th season, 1968-69, will take place on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Sept. 27 and 28, in Symphony Hall, Boston, with a program comprising Mozart's Symphony in E Flat, K. 543, Beethoven's concert aria Ah, Perfido, and excerpts from Wagner's Die Gotterdammerung. Marilyn Horne will be soloist in the Beethoven and Wagner works.

Season Highlights

Highlights of the season's repertoire in addition to the Wagner excerpts include major works, two seldom-heard Prokofieff pieces, choral and vocal and a concerto last heard by Boston Symphony Orchestra audiences 55 years ago.

Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the first Boston and New York performances of the original version of Strauss' Ariadne Auf Naxos on Jan. 3, 4 and 7, 1969 in Symphony Hall and Jan. 18 in Carnegie Hall. Claire Watson and Beverly Sills, sopranos, and Robert Nagy, tenor, will be featured soloists. Debussy's The Martyrdom of St. Sebastien will be conducted by the orchestra's former music director Charles Munch.

The seldom-heard Prokofieff pieces, both to be conducted by Erich Leinsdorf are the Fourth Symphony, which was given its first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky in November, 1930, and the Fifth Piano Concerto, in which John Browning will be soloist. On the program with the Prokofieff symphony will be Robert Schumann's Fourth Symphony, to be heard in its original version. Another Debussy work to be played is the infrequently programmed Rhapsody for Saxophone and Orchestra. The soloist will be Felix Viscuglia.

Point of Interest

A point of interest of the Rhapsody is that it was commissioned (in 1901) by Elise Coolidge Hall, a Boston lady who played the saxophone. It was once performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the saxophone part played by Louis Speyer on the English horn.

The season will end on April 18 and 19, 1969 with Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. These concerts will be his last winter season concerts as music director; he will retire as music director at the end of the 1969 Berkshire Festival, although he will return to the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a guest conductor during each of the following five years.

Other Guest Conductors

Guest conductors, in addition to Charles Munch, include: Georg Semkow, the Polish conductor, making his American debut in Boston; Georges Pretre, and Pierre Boulez, both making their Boston Symphony Orchestra debuts, Colin Davis, and Charles/ Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. One other guest conductor will be announced later.

Soloists include pianists Clifford Curzon, Andre Watts, Eugene Istomin, Claude Frank, and Jorge Bolet in addition to John Browning and Earl Wild; violinists Arthur Grumiaux and Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; and singers Herman Prey, Sherill Milnes, and Sarmae Endich, in addition to Marilyn Horne, Claire Watson, Beverly Sills, and Robert Nagy. Choruses and other soloists will be announced later.

The annual Pension Fund concert will be Dec. 15, 1968. Joan Sutherland will sing; Richard Bonynge will conduct.

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 115,950
JUN 16 1968
New England Newsclip

SUNDAY STANDARD TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 60,150
JUN 16 1968
New England Newsclip

...oying. There can b... progress in a society which believes ...e gun is the solution to our pressing problems or that the gangster has all the right answers.

Boston Symphony Plans for Next Season

Next season, as everyone knows, will be Erich Leindorf's final complete one as conductor of the Boston Symphony, although for the next five years he will ~~serve frequently~~ as guest conductor. Mr. Leinsdorf has now announced plans for his final season.

The Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall will begin on Sept. 27, with a program comprising Mozart's "Symphony in E Flat, K. 543," Beethoven's concert aria, "Ah, Perfido," and excerpts from Wagner's "Die Gotterdammerung," with Marilyn Horne as soloist.

Highlights of the season's repertoire will be the following: The first Boston performance of the original version of Strauss' "Ariadne auf Naxos;" two seldom-heard Prokofieff pieces, "Symphony No. 4" and "Piano Concerto No. 5," with John Browning as soloist; Schumann's "Symphony No. 4" in its original version; Debussy's "Rhapsody for Saxophone anl Orchestra," with Felix Viscuglia as soloist; and the first performance in Boston since 1913 of Scharwenka's "First Piano Concerto," with Earl Wild as soloist. The season will end on April 18 and 19 with a performance of Beethoven's "Symphony No. 9."

Guest conductors appearing during the season will include Charles Munch, Georg Semkow (of Poland), Georges Pretre, Pierre Boulez, Colin Davis, and Charles Wilson. Soloists, aside from those already mentioned, will be pianists Clifford Curzon, Andre Watts, Eugene Istomin, Claude Frank, and Jorge Bolet; violinists Arthur Grumiaux and Joseph Silverstein; and vocalists Herman Prey, Sherill Milnes, Sarmae Endich, Claire Watson, Beverly Sills, and Robert Nagy. Joan Sutherand will be soloist for the annual Pension Fund Concert on Dec. 15.

HERE AND THERE — Actor John Wayne was awarded an honorary degree at the University of Southern California commencement . . . A Hebrew version of "Hello, Dolly" will be produced in Tel Aviv in September . . . Tony Bennett has signed a new longterm contract with Columbia Records . . . Patricia Medina comes out of retirement to play a role in the film version of "The Killing of Sister George" . . . Liza Minelli has the female lead in Paramount's "The Sterile Cuckoo."

Sills To Sing With The Boston Symphony

By Alfred Burke

LOWELL—Beverly Sills, who ranks high among American lyric sopranos, will appear in the first Boston performance of Strauss' "Ariadne Auf Naxos" in the original version during the 1968-69 Boston Symphony Orchestra season and conducting will be the Orchestra's musical director, Erich Leinsdorf.

Beverly Sills

Also during the organization's annual New York concerts the Strauss work will be repeated. Claire Watson, soprano and Robert Nagay, tenor, have also been invited to sing in these performances.

Opening concerts will be on Friday and Saturday, September 27-28 and the announced program will include Mozart's Symphony in E Flat, K. 543; Beethoven's Concert aria, "Ah, Perfido", ahd excerpts from Wagner's "Die Gotterdammerung". Marilyn Horne will be soloist in the Beethoven and Wagner pieces.

DeBussy's "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastien" will be offered during the season and conducting will be the former musical director of the Boston Symphony, Charles Munch. The seldom heard Prokofieff pieces, both to be conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf, are the Fourth Symphony, which was given its first performance by the Boston Symphony orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky in November, 1930, and the Fifth Piano Concerto, in which John Browning will be soloist. On the program with the Prokofieff symphony will be Robert Schumann's Fourth Symphony, to be heard in its original form.

Lawrence Richmond, president of the Provincetown Symphony Society has announced plans for the second Provincetown Music Festival to be held this summer. Eight events will comprise the season which will be held in both the town hall and Provincetown Art association, and will begin on July 2 and end on August 31. Listed to be performed will be programs featuring chamber music, orchestral, folk music, early music, recitals (both instrumental and vocal), and dance.

The Provincetown Symphony will observe its 14th season and for the major event of the season, will present a Festival Concert on Sunday, August 4. Joseph Hawthorne who is the orchestra's regular musical director will conduct and he has invited the internationally famous oboist, Ronald Roseman as soloist. For his appearance with the orchestra, the soloist has selected the Handel G Minor Concerto and the Mozart Divertimento No. 11 in D Major.

Desmund Tay from Ghana will direct the study of African music at the New England Conservatory of Music Institute at Tanglewood this summer. One of the world's leading African drummers, he will be making his first visit to the United States. He plans to bring his important and complete collection of African drums to Lenox.

Also invited to participate as a member of the Institute's summer faculty will be Ali Akbar Kahn, a leading member of the Ravi Shankar troupe and director of his own school of Indian Music in California, who will assist Mr. Shankar during the one week study of Indian music and will be present for entire week.

Margaret Harshaw, internationally known Wagnerian soprano formerly of the Metropolitan Opera, will join the voice faculty of the New England Conservatory of Music, it has been announced by president Gunther Schuller. Miss Harshaw comes to Boston from the School of Music of Indiana University where she has been a faculty member since 1962. Previous to her teaching career she was a member of the Metropolitan Opera company, and during her 23 years with the company sang the great roles from the German school with such artistry that she was termed the American Brunhilde.

A guest soprano with the leading opera companies of the world, Miss Harshaw also gained the distinction of being a recitalist of the first rank. She has appeared with the Boston, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Chicago and Cleveland symphonies, and at such famous festival centers as the Hollywood Bowl and the Berkshire. She studied at the Juilliard school in New York under the late Mme. Schoen-Rene.

SUN (e)
LOWELL, MASS.
CIRC. 46,350
JUN 15 1968
New England Newsclip

Marilyn Horne Soloist at Boston Symphony Opening

BOSTON—Soprano Marilyn Horne will be the soloist for the Sept. 27 and 28 opening concerts of the 1968-1969 Boston Symphony season. Erich Leinsdorf, music director, also will conduct the first Boston performances of the original version of Richard Strauss' "Ariadne auf Naxos" on Jan 3, 4 and 7 and the first New York performance of the version on Jan. 18. Sopranos Claire Watson and Beverly Sills, and tenor Robert Nagy will be featured.

The season also will include Prokofiev's "Piano Concerto No. 5" with John Browning, and Prokofiev's "Symphony No. 4," both conducted by Leinsdorf, and Debussy's "The Martydom of St. Sebastian," conducted by Charles Munch. Earl Wild will be the soloist in Scharwenka's "Piano Concerto No. 1."

Other conductors will be Georg Semkow, Georges Pretre, Pierre Boulez, Colin Davis, and Charles Wilson, the Boston's assistant conductor. Piano soloists, in addition to Browning and Wild, will be Clifford Curzon, Andre Watts, Eugene Istomin, Claude Frank, and Jorge Bolet. Other soloists will be violinists Arthur Grumiaux and Joseph Silverstein; soprano Saramae Endich; and baritones Herman Prey and Sherrill Milnes. Richard Bonynge will conduct the annual Pension Fund Concert on Dec. 15 with soprano Joan Southerland as soloist.

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000
JUN 22 1968

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000
JUN 29 1968

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 88th season of concerts, Sept. 27-28, with Mozart's "Symphony in E Flat," Beethoven's concerto aria "Ah, Perfido" and excerpts from Wagner's "Die Gotterdammerung." Marilyn Horne will be soloist and Erich Leinsdorf conducts.

VILLAGE POST
MIAMI, FLA.
MONTHLY - CIRC. N.AVAIL
JUN 1968

Charles Munch, Conductor with Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston Symphony "DEBUT"

by JULIAN H. KREEGER

The highlight of next season's Community Concert Series will be the first Miami appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Erich Leinsdorf's direction. Founded in 1881 by Major Henry Lee Higginson who single-handedly paid all of its debts for nearly forty years, the Boston Symphony now operates on an annual budget in excess of $3,000,000. Last year alone, the orchestra played over two hundred concerts, including fifty-four by the Boston Pops which is composed of about ninety of the 106 musicians who regularly play in the Boston Symphony. Over the years, more than thirty-one million Boston Symphony Orchestra recordings have been sold.

The Orchestra, universally acknowledged as one of the world's very great orchestras, is steeped in the traditions of some of its illustrious conductors. Serge Koussevitzky, a teacher of Leonard Bernstein, conducted the Orchestra from 1924-1949. His performances of the Russian repertoire, Sibelius, and the nineteenth century literature have become legendary. The composer and pianist Lukas Foss wrote of him,

"What was unique about Koussevitzky was not his foresight but his interest, zeal, love. It was this love which made him a great conductor, a great teacher . . . Through this love he managed to imbue a Tchaikovsky symphony again and again with an intensity, a spontaneity which our more blase interpreters lose somewhere between the second and twenty-second performances. With Koussevitzky one heard the great nineteenth century literature as if for the first time."

The Koussevitzky recordings of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, the Rachmaninoff Vacalise, and Brahms' Fourth Symphony have recently been Reissued by R.C.A.

Under Charles Munch, Koussevitzky's successor from 1949-1962, the Boston Symphony Orchestra became preeminent in the French repertoire or Berlioz, Saint-Saens, Debussy and Ravel. The Orchestra's sound acquired a brilliant sheen but Munch was subjected to criticism for being erratic in his performances and allowing some surprisingly undisciplined playing from an orchestra of this caliber. At his best, however, Munch's performances were infused with a vitality and excitement that made them memorable. His recordings of Berlioz' Symphonie Fantastique and Romeo et Juliette, Chausson's Symphony in B-flat, Saint-Saens' "Organ" Symphony, and Ravel's Daphnis et Chloe (all R.C.A.) are representative of Munch's finest work.

The orchestral discipline improved markedly under Erich Leinsdorf's direction, but to his critics this was at the sacrifice of some of the vitality of Munch's best performances. Leinsdorf broadened the Boston Symphony Orchestra's repertoire in enterprising fashion, including a project to perform and record the major orchestral works of Prokofiev. Recent Leinsdorf-Boston Symphony Orchestra recordings run the gamut between new works such as the Elliott Carter Piano Concerto, a highly complex but ultimately rewarding work (Jacob Lateiner is soloist), and the Ginastera Piano Concerto (Joao Carlo Martins is soloist), to such standard fare as Wagner Overtures, the Beethoven Fourth Symphony, Brahms' Fourth Symphony, and the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto with the brilliant young violinist Itzhak Perlman (all R.C.A.). Of these, this listener is particularly partial to Perlman's Tchaikovsky Concerto (coupled with the Dvorak Romance) and the Piano Concerto by Ginastera, the Argentinian composer whose opera Bomarzo has been most enthusiastically received recently in New York. The orchestral playing is uniformly superb.

From July 5 through August 31, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will again play at Tanglewood. Highlights of this summer's series include appearances by Gina Bachauer, who will play with the Greater Miami Philharmonic next February, Jorge Bolet, Malcolm Frager, and Charles Munch, who will conduct Berlioz' Romeo et Juliette. Further information may be obtained by writing: Festival Ticket Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. 01240.

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,543
SEP 5 1968
New England Newsclip

214 Concerts

Boston Symphony Announces Plans

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has listed its plans for the 1968-1969 season and the amount of music-making is stunning, measured by any yardstick. It helps to make more rational the increased salaries under the new contract just negotiated with the players.

The coming season will include at least 214 concerts. There were 212 in the season just ended. This means a year-round average of four concerts a week.

Spring and summer concerts in 1969 will begin with "Pops" at Symphony Hall six nights a week (no Sundays) from April 28 to June 28. Two weeks of free, open-air concerts will follow in early July, at the Charles River Esplanade.

The 24 major concerts of the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood will begin July 4 and end Aug. 24.

These are good dates to jot down, even this early.

Winter concerts at Symphony Hall and on tour are more complex. They will total at least 122, perhaps more. These are divided: At Symphony Hall, starting Sept. 27, 1968 and ending April 19, 1969, 24 Friday afternoons, 24 Saturday evenings, 22 Tuesday evenings, 9 Thursday evenings, and 7 Thursday open rehearsals. A Pension Fund concert on Dec. 15 will have Joan Sutherland as soloist, Richard Bonynge conducting.

Away from home, the orchestra will play five Wednesdays and five Fridays at New York's Philharmonic Hall, three Thursdays in Brooklyn and five in Providence. Also, five concerts in Carnegie Hall and singles at Northampton, Springfield, New Haven, New Brunswick, Hartford, Philadelphia, Raleigh, Atlanta, St. Petersburg, Fort Lauderdale, Miami Beach and Washington.

Tours

During "Pops" months, the first-desk players who make up the Boston Symphony Chamber Ensembles are free to undertake tours. Last spring it was the Virgin Islands, the project being co-sponsored by that government.

Again this year an exchange was made between the BSO and the Japan Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra. George Humphrey, viola, and Ronald Knudsen, second violin, went to Japan, while Akio Akaboshi and Toshiyuki Kikkawa took their places at Boston. Each year different players are exchanged.

Symphony Hall's season begins Sept. 27 and 28, with music of Mozart, Beethoven and Wagner, with Marilyn Horne as soloist.

Tanglewood

Erich Leinsdorf will conclude this conductorship at Boston on April 18 and 19, 1969, by directing the Beethoven Ninth Symphony. He will, however, conduct Tanglewood's 1969 programs, and will return to Boston as guest conductor at some time during each of the following five seasons.

William Steinberg, conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, will start a three-year term as Boston conductor in Sept., 1969, retaining his Pittsburgh post.

Leinsdorf Announces Highlights of Boston Symphony 1968-69 Season

The opening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's eighty-eighth season, 1968-69, will take place on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, September 27 and 28, in Symphony Hall, with a program comprising Mozart's Symphony in E Flat, K. 543, Beethoven's concert aria Ah, Perfido, and excerpts from Wagner's Die Gotterdammerung. Marilyn Horne will be soloist in the Beethoven and Wagner works.

Highlights of the season's repertoire, in addition to the Wagner excerpts, include major works, two seldom-heard Prokofieff pieces, choral and vocal and a concerto last heard by Boston Symphony Orchestra audiences 55 years ago. Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the first Boston and New York performances of the original version of Strauss's Ariadne Auf Naxos on January 3, 4 and 7, 1969 in Symphony Hall and January 18 in Carnegie Hall. Claire Watson and Beverly Sills, sopranos, and Robert Nagy, tenor, will be featured soloists. Debussy's The Martyrdom of St. Sebastien will be conducted by the Orchestra's former music director, Charles Munch.

The seldom-heard Prokofieff pieces, both to be conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, are Fourth Symphony, which was given its first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky in November, 1930, and the Fifth Piano Concerto, in which John Browning will be soloist. On the program with the Prokofieff symphony will be Robert Schumann's Fourth Symphony, to be heard in its original version. Another Debussy work to be played is the infrequently-programmed Rhapsody for Saxophone and Orchestra. The soloist will be Felix Viscuglia. A point of interest of the Rhapsody is that it was commissioned (in 1901) by Elise Coolidge Hall, a Boston lady who played the saxophone. It was once performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the saxophone part played by Louis Speyer on the English horn.

A novelty of the season will be the performance with Earl Wild as solosit, of Scharwenka's First Piano Concerto, in b flat minor.

The season will end on April 18 and 19, 1969 with Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. These concerts will be his last winter season concerts as music director; he will retire at the end of the 1969 Berkshire Festival, although he will return to the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a guest conductor during each of the following five years.

Guest conductors, in addition to Charles Munch, include Georg Semkow, the Polish conductor, making his American debut in Boston; Georges Pretre and Pierre Boulez, both making their Boston Symphony Orchestra debuts, Colin Davis, and Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. One other guest conductor will be announced later.

Soloists include pianists Clifford Curzon, Andre Watts, Eugene Istomin, Claude Frank and Jorge Bolet in addition to John Browning and Earl Wild; violinists Arthur Grumiaux and Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; and singers Herman Prey, Sherill Milnes and Sarmae Endich, in addition to Marilyn Horne, Claire Watson, Beverly Sills and Robert Nagy. Choruses and other soloists will be announced later.

The annual pension fund concert will be December 15. Joan Sutherland will sing; Richard Bonynge will conduct.

* * *

Having noted last week that Erich Leinsdorf's choice for a work to close his tenure as music director of the Boston Symphony in the spring of 1969 is Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, it is only fair to give equal time to an announcement of Leonard Bernstein's choice for similar purposes when he takes leave of his 10-year term as music director of the New York Philharmonic in May, 1969. It is the Third Symphony by Mahler, in which the vocal soloist will be Betty Allen. Along the way to this parting, Bernstein will direct Verdi's "Requiem" and Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis."

Staten Island Advance
STATEN ISLAND, N. Y.
D. 62,892 SUN. 56,019
JUL 7 1968

and or su...
she was invited to appe... fessionally during the orchestra's regular season.

Unusual Items

Among the unusual items on the Boston Symphony's winter season at Symphony Hall will be the Scharwenka Piano Concerto in B flat minor, with Earl Wild as soloist, Dec. 13 and 14.

Scharwenka played the same concerto at the Worcester Music Festival in 1892. He also conducted the orchestra in the first public performance of his "Vorspiel" from his opera "Matiswintha."

Naturally, after the concerto the audience wouldn't let him go until he had played his world-famous "Polish Dance."

The Rockefeller Foundation has awarded two-year fellowships ($5,000 a year) to four more young writers for training as music critics.

They are Anitra Earle and Linda Winer of Chicago, and Andrew A. Rink and Herbert J. Hiemenz Jr., of San Francisco.

Twenty men and women graduates of the project are now employed as music critics by some of the nation's leading newspapers and magazines.

The project was inaugurated at University of Southern California in 1964 with a Rockefeller Foundation grant.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,550
SEP 8 1968
New England Newsclip

VILLAGE POST
MIAMI, FLA.
MONTHLY - CIRC N AVAIL

JUN 1968

Charles Munch, Conductor with Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston Symphony "DEBUT"

by JULIAN H. KREEGER

The highlight of next season's Community Concert Series will be the first Miami appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Erich Leinsdorf's direction. Founded in 1881 by Major Henry Lee Higginson who single-handedly paid all of its debts for nearly forty years, the Boston Symphony now operates on an annual budget in excess of $3,000,000. Last year alone, the orchestra played over two hundred concerts, including fifty-four by the Boston Pops which is composed of about ninety of the 106 musicians who regularly play in the Boston Symphony. Over the years, more than thirty-one million Boston Symphony Orchestra recordings have been sold.

The Orchestra, universally acknowledged as one of the world's very great orchestras, is steeped in the traditions of some of its illustrious conductors. Serge Koussevitzky, a teacher of Leonard Bernstein, conducted the Orchestra from 1924-1949. His performances of the Russian repertoire, Sibelius, and the nineteenth century literature have become legendary. The composer and pianist Lukas Foss wrote of him,

"What was unique about Koussevitzky was not his foresight but his interest, zeal, love. It was this love which made him a great conductor, a great teacher . . . Through this love he managed to imbue a Tchaikovsky symphony again and again with an intensity, a spontaneity which our more blase interpreters lose somewhere between the second and twenty-second performances. With Koussevitzky one heard the great nineteenth century literature as if for the first time."

The Koussevitzky recordings of Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, the Rachmaninoff Vacalise, and Brahms' Fourth Symphony have recently been Reissued by R.C.A.

Under Charles Munch, Koussevitzky's successor from 1949-1962, the Boston Symphony Orchestra became preeminent in the French repertoire or Berlioz, Saint-Saens, Debussy and Ravel. The Orchestra's sound acquired a brilliant sheen but Munch was subjected to criticism for being erratic in his performances and allowing some surprisingly undisciplined playing from an orchestra of this caliber. At his best, however, Munch's performances were infused with a vitality and excitement that made them memorable. His recordings of Berlioz' Symphonie Fantastique and Romeo et Juliette, Chausson's Symphony in B-flat, Saint-Saens' "Organ" Symphony, and Ravel's Daphnis et Chloe (all R.C.A.) are representative of Munch's finest work.

The orchestral discipline improved markedly under Erich Leinsdorf's direction, but to his critics this was at the sacrifice of some of the vitality of Munch's best performances. Leinsdorf broadened the Boston Symphony Orchestra's repertoire in enterprising fashion, including a project to perform and record the major orchestral works of Prokofiev. Recent Leinsdorf-Boston Symphony Orchestra recordings run the gamut between new works such as the Elliott Carter Piano Concerto, a highly complex but ultimately rewarding work (Jacob Lateiner is soloist), and the Ginastera Piano Concerto (Joao Carlo Martins is soloist), to such standard fare as Wagner Overtures, the Beethoven Fourth Symphony, Brahms' Fourth Symphony, and the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto with the brilliant young violinist Itzhak Perlman (all R.C.A.). Of these, this listener is particularly partial to Perlman's Tchaikovsky Concerto (coupled with the Dvorak Romance) and the Piano Concerto by Ginastera, the Argentinian composer whose opera Bomarzo has been most enthusiastically received recently in New York. The orchestral playing is uniformly superb.

From July 5 through August 31, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will again play at Tanglewood. Highlights of this summer's series include appearances by Gina Bachauer, who will play with the Greater Miami Philharmonic next February, Jorge Bolet, Malcolm Frager, and Charles Munch, who will conduct Berlioz' Romeo et Juliette. Further information may be obtained by writing: Festival Ticket Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. 01240.

* * *

Having noted last week that Erich Leinsdorf's choice for a work to close his tenure as music director of the Boston Symphony in the spring of 1969 is Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, it is only fair to give equal time to an announcement of Leonard Bernstein's choice for similar purposes when he takes leave of his 10-year term as music director of the New York Philharmonic in May, 1969. It is the Third Symphony by Mahler, in which the vocal soloist will be Betty Allen. Along the way to this parting, Bernstein will direct Verdi's "Requiem" and Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis."

Staten Island Advance
STATEN ISLAND, N. Y.
D. 62,892 SUN. 56,019

JUL 7 1968

Leinsdorf Announces Highlights of Boston Symphony 1968-69 Season

The opening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's eighty-eighth season, 1968-69, will take place on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, September 27 and 28, in Symphony Hall, with a program comprising Mozart's Symphony in E Flat, K. 543, Beethoven's concert aria Ah, Perfido, and excerpts from Wagner's Die Gotterdammerung. Marilyn Horne will be soloist in the Beethoven and Wagner works.

Highlights of the season's repertoire, in addition to the Wagner excerpts, include major works, two seldom-heard Prokofieff pieces, choral and vocal and a concerto last heard by Boston Symphony Orchestra audiences 55 years ago. Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the first Boston and New York performances of the original version of Strauss's Ariadne Auf Naxos on January 3, 4 and 7, 1969 in Symphony Hall and January 18 in Carnegie Hall. Claire Watson and Beverly Sills, sopranos, and Robert Nagy, tenor, will be featured soloists. Debussy's The Martyrdom of St. Sebastien will be conducted by the Orchestra's former music director, Charles Munch.

The seldom-heard Prokofieff pieces, both to be conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, are Fourth Symphony, which was given its first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky in November, 1930, and the Fifth Piano Concerto, in which John Browning will be soloist. On the program with the Prokofieff symphony will be Robert Schumann's Fourth Symphony, to be heard in its original version. Another Debussy work to be played is the infrequently-programmed Rhapsody for Saxophone and Orchestra. The soloist will be Felix Viscuglia. A point of interest of the Rhapsody is that it was commissioned (in 1901) by Elise Coolidge Hall, a Boston lady who played the saxophone. It was once performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the saxophone part played by Louis Speyer on the English horn.

A novelty of the season will be the performance with Earl Wild as solosit, of Scharwenka's First Piano Concerto, in b flat minor.

The season will end on April 18 and 19, 1969 with Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. These concerts will be his last winter season concerts as music director; he will retire at the end of the 1969 Berkshire Festival, although he will return to the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a guest conductor during each of the following five years.

Guest conductors, in addition to Charles Munch, include: Georg Semkow, the Polish conductor, making his American debut in Boston; Georges Pretre and Pierre Boulez, both making their Boston Symphony Orchestra debuts, Colin Davis, and Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. One other guest conductor will be announced later.

Soloists include pianists Clifford Curzon, Andre Watts, Eugene Istomin, Claude Frank and Jorge Bolet in addition to John Browning and Earl Wild; violinists Arthur Grumiaux and Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; and singers Herman Prey, Sherill Milnes and Sarmae Endich, in addition to Marilyn Horne, Claire Watson, Beverly Sills and Robert Nagy. Choruses and other soloists will be announced later.

The annual pension fund concert will be December 15. Joan Sutherland will sing; Richard Bonynge will conduct.

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,543

SEP 5 1968 New England Newsclip

214 Concerts

Boston Symphony Announces Plans

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has listed its plans for the 1968-1969 season and the amount of music-making is stunning, measured by any yardstick. It helps to make more rational the increased salaries under the new contract just negotiated with the players.

The coming season will include at least 214 concerts. There were 212 in the season just ended. This means a year-round average of four concerts a week.

Spring and summer concerts in 1969 will begin with "Pops" at Symphony Hall six nights a week (no Sundays) from April 28 to June 28. Two weeks of free, open-air concerts will follow in early July, at the Charles River Esplanade.

The 24 major concerts of the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood will begin July 4 and end Aug. 24.

These are good dates to jot down, even this early.

Winter concerts at Symphony Hall and on tour are more complex. They will total at least 122, perhaps more. These are divided: At Symphony Hall, starting Sept. 27, 1968 and ending April 19, 1969, 24 Friday afternoons, 24 Saturday evenings, 22 Tuesday evenings, 9 Thursday evenings, and 7 Thursday open rehearsals. A Pension Fund concert on Dec. 15 will have Joan Sutherland as soloist, Richard Bonynge conducting.

Away from home, the orchestra will play five Wednesdays and five Fridays at New York's Philharmonic Hall, three Thursdays in Brooklyn and five in Providence. Also, five concerts in Carnegie Hall and singles at Northampton, Springfield, New Haven, New Brunswick, Hartford, Philadelphia, Raleigh, Atlanta, St. Petersburg, Fort Lauderdale, Miami Beach and Washington.

Tours

During "Pops" months, the first-desk players who make up the Boston Symphony Chamber Ensembles are free to undertake tours. Last spring it was the Virgin Islands, the project being co-sponsored by that government.

Again this year an exchange was made between the BSO and the Japan Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra. George Humphrey, viola, and Ronald Knudsen, second violin, went to Japan, while Akio Akaboshi and Toshiyuki Kikkawa took their places at Boston. Each year different players are exchanged.

Symphony Hall's season begins Sept. 27 and 28, with music of Mozart, Beethoven and Wagner, with Marilyn Horne as soloist.

Tanglewood

Erich Leinsdorf will conclude this conductorship at Boston on April 18 and 19, 1969, by directing the Beethoven Ninth Symphony. He will, however, conduct Tanglewood's 1969 programs, and will return to Boston as guest conductor at some time during each of the following five seasons.

William Steinberg, conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, will start a three-year term as Boston conductor in Sept., 1969, retaining his Pittsburgh post.

and or su... she was invited to appe... fessionally during the orchestra's regular season.

Unusual Items

Among the unusual items on the Boston Symphony's winter season at Symphony Hall will be the Scharwenka Piano Concerto in B flat minor, with Earl Wild as soloist, Dec. 13 and 14.

Scharwenka played the same concerto at the Worcester Music Festival in 1892. He also conducted the orchestra in the first public performance of his "Vorspiel" from his opera "Matiswintha."

Naturally, after the concerto the audience wouldn't let him go until he had played his world-famous "Polish Dance."

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,550

SEP 8 1968 New England Newsclip

The Rockefeller Foundation has awarded two-year fellowships ($5,000 a year) to four more young writers for training as music critics.

They are Anitra Earle and Linda Winer of Chicago, and Andrew A. Rink and Herbert J. Hiemenz Jr., of San Francisco.

Twenty men and women graduates of the project are now employed as music critics by some of the nation's leading newspapers and magazines.

The project was inaugurated at University of Southern California in 1964 with a Rockefeller Foundation grant.

It Looks Like a Great Concert Season

By McLAREN HARRIS

The last couple of weeks have brought program announcements from two of Boston's major musical organizations, the Boston Symphony—and the Handel and Haydn Society. Between them there is much to whet the artistic appetite.

In the case of the Symphony the program announcements come as a startling, albeit welcome, break with past tradition. Heretofore Symphony programs were revealed in weekly installments, two weeks in advance. There was always the temptation, upon arriving at Symphony Hall, for the listener to sneak a glance to the back of the program booklet before the concert began and discover what he was to hear two concerts hence. In a way it heightened the anticipation, say, as does opening one's birthday or Christmas gifts slowly, one at a time.

But there were also times of chagrin, when one would spot advertisements in New York newspapers, complete with programs, for the Symphony's out-of-town series. New Yorkers, Washingtonians and Rhode Islanders always knew what the orchestra was to play months before Bostonians were given an inkling.

NOW, HOWEVER, we have laid out before us the entire season's offerings (minus two: Charles Munch's concerts on Feb. 14-15, and the March 28-29 pair, with conductor and works to be announced). Facing such a slate can put one in a perplexing delirium—appalled or excited at the prospect of absorbing so much music in one season, inevitably impatient for some weeks to pass, and others to arrive.

Here is a brief overview of works in store: an all-Czech program (Smetana, Janacek, Dvorak) on Oct. 4-5; Colin Davis conducting Elgar's Symphony No. 1, plus Berlioz and Brahms, on Oct. 25-26; Brahms' Requiem on Nov. 1-2; George Semkow conducting Scriabin's Symphony No. 2, plus Rossini and Mozart, on Dec. 6-7 (Scriabin's Third was scheduled once before, then discarded); Earl Wild will play late-romantic Philipp Scharwenka's Piano Concerto No. 1 on Dec. 13-14 (Schoenberg's Variations, Op. 31, on the same program); Strauss' chamber opera, "Ariadne auf Naxos" (original version) on Jan. 3-4; and Erich Leinsdorf's final program on April 18-19, Schoenberg's "A Survivor From Warsaw," Op. 46, and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

SEVERAL SOLOISTS are worthy of note: soprano Marilyn Horne singing Beethoven's "Ah! perfido" and excerpts from Wagner's "Goetterdaemmerung" on Sept. 27-28; Arthur Grumiaux in Alban Berg's Violin Concerto on Oct. 11-12; Andre Watts with his initial success, the Liszt First Piano Concerto, on Jan. 10-11; and finally one to try my patience in waiting, baritone Hermann Prey singing Mahler—apparently the "Kindertotenlieder" on Feb. 28 and the "Songs of a Wayfarer" on March 1, a new twist (with Tchaikovsky's Fifth on the same program).

And yes, we are to hear another Berlioz Symphonie fantastique, but not with the conductor you expect. Georges Pretre will conduct this one on Jan. 31-Feb. 1.

IF ANYONE ever accuses Thomas Dunn of being simply another in the line of Handel and Haydn Society conductors he deserves a stiff rebuke. What imagination Dunn has squeezed into six programs planned for the season is incredible.

"The Messiah," with orchestration by the composer and using small chorus, will be given on Dec. 6 and 8. But before that the chorus (again small) will present a Baroque program on Oct. 19 and a romantic program (with large chorus) of Mendelssohn's "Walpurgisnacht" and works by Scriabin and Holst on Nov. 24. Later concerts will include Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms, Hindemith's "Apparebit Repentina Dies" for choir and brass and Heinrich Schuetz' "Musikalische Exequien" of 1636.

This year, moreover, the society is not quitting with choral programs. Each program will include at least one instrumental work and the Feb. 8 program will be all instrumental: Bach's Fifth Brandenburg Concerto and Arthur Honegger's incidental music to Paul Meral's "Le Dit des jeux du monde." Then there's Satie's "Entr'acte cinematographique," music for a silent French film (which will be shown) on March 16 and Stravinsky's "L'Histoire du Soldat" with members of the Boston Ballet on April 19.

I'm getting delirious again.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436

SEP 8 1968 New England

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

SEP 27 1968 New England

The Evening Gazette Worcester, Thurs., Sept. 5, 1968

214 Concerts

Boston Symphony Announces Plans

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has listed its plans for the 1968-1969 season and the amount of music-making is stunning, measured by any yardstick. It helps to make more rational the increased salaries under the new contract just negotiated with the players.

The coming season will include at least 214 concerts. There were 212 in the season just ended. This means a year-round average of four concerts a week.

Spring and summer concerts in 1969 will begin with "Pops" at Symphony Hall six nights a week (no Sundays) from April 28 to June 28. Two weeks of free, open-air concerts will follow in early July, at the Charles River Esplanade.

The 24 major concerts of the 1969 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood will begin July 4 and end Aug. 24.

These are good dates to jot down, even this early.

Winter concerts at Symphony Hall and on tour are more complex. They will total at least 122, perhaps more. These are divided: At Symphony Hall, starting Sept. 27, 1968 and ending April 19, 1969, 24 Friday afternoons, 24 Saturday evenings, 22 Tuesday evenings, 9 Thursday evenings, and 7 Thursday open rehearsals. A Pension Fund concert on Dec. 15 will have Joan Sutherland as soloist, Richard Bonynge conducting.

Away from home, the orchestra will play five Wednesdays and five Fridays at New York's Philharmonic Hall, three Thursdays in Brooklyn and five in Providence. Also, five concerts in Carnegie Hall and singles at Northampton, Springfield, New Haven, New Brunswick, Hartford, Philadelphia, Raleigh, Atlanta, St. Petersburg, Fort Lauderdale, Miami Beach and Washington.

Tours

During "Pops" months, the first-desk players who make up the Boston Symphony Chamber Ensembles are free to undertake tours. Last spring it was the Virgin Islands, the project being co-sponsored by that government.

Again this year an exchange was made between the BSO and the Japan Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra. George Humphrey, viola, and Ronald Knudsen, second violin, went to Japan, while Akio Akaboshi and Toshiyuki Kikkawa took their places at Boston. Each year different players are exchanged.

Symphony Hall's season begins Sept. 27 and 28, with music of Mozart, Beethoven and Wagner, with Marilyn Horne as soloist.

Tanglewood

Erich Leinsdorf will conclude this conductorship at Boston on April 18 and 19, 1969, by directing the Beethoven Ninth Symphony. He will, however, conduct Tanglewood's 1969 programs, and will return to Boston as guest conductor at some time during each of the following five seasons.

William Steinberg, conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, will start a three-year term as Boston conductor in Sept., 1969, retaining his Pittsburgh post.

Leinsdorf Readies BSO's 88th Session

Erich Leinsdorf opens the 88th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the first of the Friday and Saturday series concerts Sept. 27, at 2 p. m. and Sept. 28, at 8:30 p. m. Featured soloist witn the Orchestra is the brilliant soprano Marilyn Horne, who will sing Beethoven's concert aria Ah! perfido and the Immolation scene from Wagner's Die Gotterdammerung. Miss Horne scored a triumph at Tanglewood in the summer of 1967, singing the Wagner scene with the Orchestra under Mr. Leinsdorf's direction.

This is Erich Leinsdorf's final season as Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. During the six seasons since he assumed the post in the fall of 1962, the Orchestra has continued its full schedule of Boston and Tanglewood performances, broadened the scope of its educational activities, pursued an intensive RCA Red Seal recording schedule, including cycles of Beethoven and Brahms works and an unprecedented Prokofiex series.

Under his direction, the Orchestra recorded the piano concertos of Elliott Carter and Alberto Ginasfera, two demanding contemporary compositions whose Leinsdorf/BSO recording became immediate best-sellers. Mr. Leinsdorf leaves the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the 1969 Tanglewood season, although he returns as guest conductor in each of the following five seasons.

For 1968-69 season

The Symphony programs and Celebrity Series list

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced most of its programs, guest conductors and soloists for the 1968-69 season, which begins in Symphony Hall Friday afternoon, Sept. 27.

Below is a list of programs for the Friday-Saturday series. Repertory for the various Tuesday and Thursday series is for the most part drawn from the Friday-Saturday programs. Unless otherwise specified, Erich Leinsdorf conducts.

SYMPHONY
Continued on Page A-21

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905

SEP 8 1968

Symphony season through April 19

★ SYMPHONY

Continued from Page A-19

Sept. 27-28: Mozart: Symphony No. 39; Beethoven: "Ah! perfido;" Wagner: excerpts from "Goetterdaemmerung." Soloist: Marlyn Horne, soprano.

Oct. 4-5: Smetana: From Bohemia's Meadows and Forests; Janacek: Sinfonietta; Dvorak: Symphony No. 8.

Oct. 11-12: Haydn: Symphony No. 90; Berg: Violin Concerto; Stravinsky: Rite of Spring. Soloist: Arthur Grumiaux.

Oct. 25-26, Colin Davis conducting: Berlioz: Overture, "Les Francs Juges;" Brahms: Symphony No. 3; Elgar: Symphony No. 1

Nov. 1-2: Brahms: Requiem. The New England Conservatory Chorus, and Saramae Endich, soprano and Sherrill Milnes, baritone.

Nov. 8-9: Beethoven: Symphony No. 1; Rachmaninoff: Paganini Rhapsody; Weill: Kleine Dreigroschenmusik; Liszt: Hungarian Fantasy. Soloist: Jorge Bolet, piano.

Nov. 15-16, Charles Wilson conducting: Strauss: Don Juan; Britten: Sea Interludes from "Peter Grimes;" Sibelius: Symphony No. 2

Nov. 29-30: Brahms: Haydn Variations; Debussy: Saxophone Rhapsody; Mozart: Piano Concerto in B flat, K.595; Strauss: "Rosenkavalier" Suite. Soloists: Felix Viscuglia, saxophone, and Claude Frank, piano.

Dec. 6-7, George Semkow conducting: Rossini: Overture, "La Cenerentola;" Mozart: Jupiter Symphony; Skriabin: Symphony No. 2.

Dec. 13-14: Schoenberg: Variations for Orchestra, Op. 31; Scharwenka: Piano Concerto No. 1 in B flat minor; Schumann: Symphony No. 4 in D minor (original version). Soloist: Earl Wild.

Dec. 27-28, Wilson conducting: Copland: Symphony No. 5; Stravinsky: Card game; Mozart: Haffner Symphony.

Jan. 3-4: Strauss: "Ariadne auf Naxos" (original version), with Beverly Sills and Claire Watson, sopranos, and Robert Nagy, tenor.

Jan. 10-11: Piston: Prelude and Allegro for organ and strings; Beethoven: Pastoral Symphony; Franck: Symphonic Variations; Liszt: Piano Concerto No. 1 in E flat. Soloists: Charles Wilson, organ, and Andre Watts, piano.

Jan. 24-25, Georges Pretre conducting: Lalo: Overture, "Le Roi d'Ys;" Sibelius: Symphony No. 5; Messiaen: Chronochromie; Ravel: "La Valse."

Jan. 31-Feb. 1, Pretre conducting: Bizet: Symphony; Berlioz: Fantastic Symphony.

Feb. 7-8, Pierre Boulez conducting: Haydn: Sinfonia Concertante; Debussy: Jeux; Stravinsky: Symphonies of Winds and Etudes for Orchestra; Berg; Three Pieces, Op. 6.

Feb. 14-15, Charles Munch conducting (program to be announced).

Feb. 21-22: Beethoven: Egmont Overture, Piano Concerto No. 4, and Eroica Symphony. Soloist: Eugene Istomin.

Feb. 28-Mar. 1: Haydn: Symphony No. 46: Mahler: "Kindertotenlieder" and "Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen;" Tchaikovsky: Symphony No. 5. Soloist: Hermann Prey, baritone.

Mar. 7-8: Mendelssohn: Italian Symphony Varese: Deserts; Webern: Five Pieces for Orchestra, Op. 10; Strauss: Death and Transfiguration.

Mar. 28-29: Conductor and program to be announced. Solists: Clifford Curzon, piano.

Apr. 4-5: Sibelius: Symphony No. 4; Prokofiev: Piano Concerto No. 5; Wagner: excerpts from "Parsifal." Soloist: John Browning, piano.

Apr. 11-12: Schumann: Violin Concerto; Bruckner: Symphony No. 6 in A. Soloist: Joseph Silverstein.

Apr. 18-19: Schoenberg: A Survivor from Warsaw; Beethoven: Symphony No. 9. Chorus Pro Musica and The New England Conservatory Chorus with soloists Beverly Sills, soprano, Josephine Veasey, contralto, Placido Domingo, tenor, and Sherrill Milnes, bass.

BSO 88th Season Begins Sept. 27

The Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its 88th season on Friday, September 27, and WGBH radio (89.7 FM) will once again broadcast the concerts live from Symphony Hall.

The Friday afternoon and Tuesday evening programs will be in stereo, the Saturday night concerts in mono.

To inaugurate his final season with the orchestra, conductor Erich Leinsdorf has invited distinguished American soprano Marilyn Horne to be the soloist, Friday, September 27 at 2 p.m. and Saturday, September 28 at 8:30 p.m.

Miss Horne will be remembered by New Englanders for her outstanding performances with Sarah Caldwell's Boston Opera, and for the Channel 2 special "An Hour With Joan Sutherland" in which she also appeared.

For her Boston Symphony concert Miss Horne has chosen the taxing concert aria "Ah, perfido" by Beethoven. Also on the program will be Mozart's Symphony No. 39 in E Flat and excerpts from Wagner's opera "Gotterdammerung".

Preceding each Friday and Saturday concert, Harvard University's G. Wallace Woodworth once again analyzes the music, as he has for so many years on WGBH, displaying his own contagious enthusiasm and vast musical knowledge for the enjoyment of concertgoers all over New England. His first broadcast will be Thursday, September 26 at 5:30 p.m., with a repeat scheduled Saturday (Sept. 28) at 4:30 p.m.

As always, William Pierce will be the WGBH announcer, and Jordan M. Whitelaw the symphony producer.

CITIZEN ITEM
ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,600

SEP 19 1968 New England

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 8,450

SEP 19 1968 New England

LEDGER-TIMES

SEP 19 1968 New England Newsclip

BLANK PAGE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SYMPHONY HALL BOSTON MASSACHUSETTS

EIGHTY-EIGHTH SEASON 1968-1969

PROGRAMS

Bachrach

ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

CHARLES WILSON Assistant Conductor

GUEST CONDUCTORS

CHARLES MUNCH

PIERRE BOULEZ

COLIN DAVIS

GEORGES PRETRE

GEORG SEMKOW

CONCERT ANNOUNCEMENTS AND REVIEWS

Concerts in Symphony Hall

Concert Dates	Concert Series with page numbers where concert reviews may be found.
	Fri.-Sat	Tues. A	Tues. B	Cambridge	Thurs. A	Thurs. B
Sept.
27,28	1
Oct.
4,5	2
8		3
11,12	4
15			5
22		5
25,26	6
(Colin Davis)
29				8
(Colin Davis)
Nov.
1,2	9
5			10
7					10
8,9	11
12		12
15,16	13
26				14
29,30	14,15
Dec.
3,7		16
5					16
6,7	17,18
(Georg Semkow)
10			18
(Georg Semkow)
13,14	19,20
15	20,21,22
(PENSION FUND)
27,28	22,23
Jan.
3,4	25,26
7				27
9					27
10,11	27,28
14			29
21		29
24,25	30
(Georges Pretre)
28 "				31
30 "						31
31,Feb.1	32
(Georges Pretre
Feb. 4		33
(Georges Pretre)
6 "					33
7,8	33,34,35
(Pierre Boulez)
11 "			35
14,15	36
(Jorge Mester)
18		37
20 "					37
21,22	38,39
25		39
28,Mar.1	40,41
Mar.
4				42
6						42
7,8	43
25		44
28,29	45,56
(Henry Lewis)
Apr.
1			46
3						47
4,5	47,48
8				48
11,12	48
15		49
17					50
18,19	50,51

FIRST PROGRAM
Friday afternoon September 27 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening September 28 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

MOZART — Symphony no. 39 in E flat K. 543
Adagio – allegro
Andante con moto
Menuetto – trio
Finale: allegro

BEETHOVEN — Scena and aria 'Ah! perfido' op. 65
MARILYN HORNE

intermission

WAGNER — Die Götterdämmerung
Dawn — Siegfried's Rhine journey* — Interlude from Act one – Prelude to Act two – Siegfried's death – Brünnhilde's immolation* – conclusion of Act three MARILYN HORNE

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000
OCT 3 1968

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

BSO's OPENING PROGRAM

The bulk of the season's first program provided as suitable a commentary on the time as any. It consisted of portions of "Die Gotterdammerung," including the immolation scene. Marilyn Horne was the soprano soloist and Mr. Leinsdorf, commencing his own twilight here, conducted. Also performed were Mozart's Symphony No. 39 in E flat, K. 543 and Beethoven's concert area "Ah! Perfido".

Leading off was the Mozart Symphony and it would have been a pleasure to report an A grade on this initial offering for 1968-69. For the work itself is one of the most elegant and subduedly gay things ever written, and in terms of the shape of the phrasing, clarity and plasticity of line, Mr. Leinsdorf's reading did well enough by it. Enter our friends the clarinets, though, and yet again appeared that chronic and apparently insurable disease, faulty intonation. This took away a measure of verve for the listener and, I rather imagine, for the conductor. We'll have to settle for B minus.

The Beethoven concert aria that followed stirred things up more. This neo-Mozartean exercise contains within it such a beautifully expressive adagio that one almost forgets that the recitative and subsequent exposition failed to live up to the argument. Marilyn Horne, who now has one of the most formidable reputations of any extant dramatic soprano, seemed to have caught a little bit of the clarinets' malaise, for she added to some later flatting a certain edginess to her tone in the recitative. Her range, timbre and power are remarkable, however, and she gives an impression of unlimited reservoirs of power. Once she hit her stride she was magnificent and her orchestral support was faultless.

The "Die Gotterdammerung" excerpts consisted of the climactic orchestral portions that we had heard here several seasons ago, namely, the Dawn, Siegfried's Rhine Journey, the First Act Interlude and the second Act Prelude, Seigfried's Death and the third Act conclusion. To this pastiche was added that climax of all climaxes, Brunnhilde's immolation, which Eileen Farrell sang with Mr. Munch back in the fifties. Mr. Leinsdorf's commitment to Wagner is more than strong — it is fierce. Even in such a stitching array as this, the impact of the music under reasonably well played circumstances, as was the case here, can be very decided upon a listener willing to lend himself to it. The soprano, under these concert conditions, has her task cut out for her, too, and just to make herself heard Miss Horne was obliged to draw heavily on those immense reserves of power. Whether they were enough is arguable, for the heavy brass were having at it with a will. If the vocal results were not wholly satisfactory, the blame lies, I suggest, less in the logistics of Wagnerenian opera in concert version and more in what appeared to be a curious detachment by the singer in respect to her role. Something that transcends fine vocalizing is needed to project that awesome culmination of events whereof she sings. That something was missing.

This week's offerings, too, are no mean commentary on our contemporary world — an all Czech program. Scheduled to be heard are 'From Bohemia's Meadows and Forests" of Smetana, the first BSO performance of Janacek's Sinfonietta, and the Dvorak's Symphony No. 8 in G major (formerly No. 4). Mr. Leinsdorf again conducts.

On Glorious Note

88th Symphony Season Opens

By McLAREN HARRIS

The opening concert of the 88th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf presented, along with shorter works by Mozart and Beethoven, vocal and instrumental excerpts from Wagner's "Die Goetterdaemmerung," concluding portion of the four-part "Ring" cycle. It was a case of putting the end at the beginning, but for that the performance was no less glorious.

IT WAS AS GLORIOUS, let us say, as excerpts can be in representing the summary of an entire four-hour-plus music drama. Most of the instrumental sections take the form of interludes or preludes connecting the principal scenes of the drama—Dawn, Siegfried's Rhine Journey, an Act I Interlude after Siegfried has departed from Bruennhilde for new adventure, and the Prelude to the tragic turn of emotion of Act II. Siegfried's Death, frequently called the Funeral Music, fills an integral part of the action; Bruennhilde's Immolation, which equals the preceding for poignant emotion, is the lone excerpt in this concert version containing a vocal solo. The final excerpt, the conclusion of Act III, is like a sigh of realization and resignation.

In the concert version, of course, there is not the power of the original. It is difficult to build cumulative energy through a succession of disjointed excerpts, as the only continuity exists in the imagination. Yet there is a goodly measure of Wagnerian splendor which arises during Siegfried's Death and approaches near-incandescence in the emotional heat of the Immolation scene; the concluding music, far short of dispelling this energy, requires an audience to keep hold of it, to contain it. And this is as it should do, for such is the form of romantic art.

Soprano Marilyn Horne sang the demanding verses of the Immolation scene with full reserves of support and breath control. These, indeed, were her entire sucess, for Warner's vocal parts are cast in essentially linear dimensions, and without the strength and stamina to fill imposing dynamic curves and sustain them to the phrase-ends a singer is forever lost. The Immolation scene is a vocal feat in itself, and Miss Horne performed it stunningly, albeit with some dictional ambiguity (common in Wagnerian performances). It is yet strange to think of this singer as a Wagnerian soprano, perhaps because of her diminutive physical height; but the voice is proving her claim.

THE ORCHESTRA'S WORK was brilliant as well, the score's great dynamic being reaches realized as well as one can conceive them. The brass-percussion battery built cataclysms of volume without any taint of noise-making; the strings were silken and cohesive. Leinsdorf's tempos were intelligently chosen and he accomplished the various transitions smoothly. In spite of their inherent shortcomings as excerpts they constituted a magnificent exercise.

Miss Horne's work in "Goetterdaemmerung" was all the more appreciated after her relatively mediocre efforts in Beethoven's concert aria, "Ah! perfido." The opus is really not much special, consisting of a lengthy recitative and standard-form aria, and makes a poor showcase, if one is after such. The soprano's work lacked, in addition to clear diction, the firm support she reserved for Wagner; her tone inclined toward thinness and intonation sagged frequently.

Leinsdorf began the program with Mozart's Symphony No. 39 in E flat, which seems to be receiving frequent play by the orchestra. His tempos have gained liveliness, the melodic language increased vigor. It was a joyful and positive opener.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
SEP 28 1968 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Season to Open This Weekend

Erich Leinsdorf opens the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the first of the Friday/Saturday series concerts Sept. 27, at 2 p.m. and Sept. 28, at 8:30 p.m. Featured soloist is soprano Marilyn Horne, who will sing Beethoven's concert aria "Ah! perfido" and the Immolation scene from Wagner's Die Gotterdammerung.

The following week, following the first of the series of open rehearsals on Oct. 3, the Friday-Saturday program will include "From Bohemia's forests and meadows" from Smetana's cycle, "My Country," Janacek's Sinfonietta and Dvorak's Symphony No. 8 in G.

The music on this program was chosen by Mr. Leinsdorf to mark the fiftieth anniversary of the first Republic of Czechoslovakia. Program will be preceded by a performance of the Music of the Blessed Spirits in the Elysian Fields from "Orpheus and Euridice" in memory of the late Samuel Diamond, a violinist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra until his death this summer and one of only three men to be a member of the Orchestra for longer than fifty years.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000
SEP 26 1968 New England Newsclip

Leinsdorf Presents 'Ah Perfido' in Hub

By GEORGE GELLES
Music Critic

It's fine that Erich Leinsdorf didn't show the perverse enthusiasm in reintroducing to Boston Beethoven's "Ah Perfido" that the composer showed when he brought the work to Vienna; this was a marathon that included the Fourth Piano Concerto, Fifth and Sixth Symphonies, four movements from the C Major Mass, the Choral Fantasy, and for good measure, a piano solo. It's not so fine that Leinsdorf opened his in-town season at Symphony Hall with warmed-over Tanglewood, Mozart's 39th Symphony, unhappily done this summer and equally off the mark yesterday afternoon.

"Perfido," is, in a sense, more operatic than "Fidelio"; for while it has none of the warm, hominess of Beethoven's single opera, it is grandly conceived, with a text (both anonymous and terrible) broadly plotted and emphasized with gestures sweeping and bold.

About Marilyn Horne, the soprano soloist, I can tell little; from my corner of Symphoney both she and the violins sounded one room removed.

I could tell that intonation wasn't always sure and that, in the recitative, phrases endings were allowed to go excessively slack, and that she sang with a big, rich voice that greatly pleased the audience.

Miss Horne was heard too in Erich Leinsdorf's "Goetterdaemmerung," a patchwork of the instrumental sections of Wagner's opera ending with Bruennhilde's immolation. Putting pieces together like this doesn't really work, for each instrumental except is a moment of dramatic distillation, and piling them one after the other weakens each and makes a misshapen whole.

Still, the music is marvelously resilient, and except for the transition to the final section, well-pasted together. Playing, save unspeakable sounds from the clarinet section, was fine. If you know the opera, this is a novel though unsatisfactory way of hearing it; if you don't, you'll be buffeted about between moments of power and grandeur. In either case, goosebumps guaranteed.

Monitor & Globe Reviews on p. 121 as part of new management articles.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873
SEP 28 1968 New England

FIRST PROGRAM
Friday afternoon September 27 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening September 28 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

MOZART — Symphony no. 39 in E flat K. 543
Adagio – allegro
Andante con moto
Menuetto – trio
Finale: allegro

BEETHOVEN — Scena and aria 'Ah! perfido' op. 65
MARILYN HORNE

intermission

WAGNER — Die Götterdämmerung
Dawn — Siegfried's Rhine journey* — Interlude from Act one – Prelude to Act two – Siegfried's death – Brünnhilde's immolation* – conclusion of Act three MARILYN HORNE

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

OCT 3 1968

BSO's OPENING PROGRAM

The bulk of the season's first program provided as suitable a commentary on the time as any. It consisted of portions of "Die Gotterdammerung," including the immolation scene. Marilyn Horne was the soprano soloist and Mr. Leinsdorf, commencing his own twilight here, conducted. Also performed were Mozart's Symphony No. 39 in E flat, K. 543 and Beethoven's concert area "Ah! Perfido".

Leading off was the Mozart Symphony and it would have been a pleasure to report an A grade on this initial offering for 1968-69. For the work itself is one of the most elegant and subduedly gay things ever written, and in terms of the shape of the phrasing, clarity and plasticity of line, Mr. Leinsdorf's reading did well enough by it. Enter our friends the clarinets, though, and yet again appeared that chronic and apparently insurable disease, faulty intonation. This took away a measure of verve for the listener and, I rather imagine, for the conductor. We'll have to settle for B minus.

The Beethoven concert aria that followed stirred things up more. This neo-Mozartean exercise contains within it such a beautifully expressive adagio that one almost forgets that the recitative and subsequent exposition failed to live up to the argument. Marilyn Horne, who now has one of the most formidable reputations of any extant dramatic soprano, seemed to have caught a little bit of the clarinets' malaise, for she added to some later flatting a certain edginess to her tone in the recitative. Her range, timbre and power are remarkable, however, and she gives an impression of unlimited reservoirs of power. Once she hit her stride she was magnificent and her orchestral support was faultless.

The "Die Gotterdammerung" excerpts consisted of the climactic orchestral portions that we had heard here several seasons ago, namely, the Dawn, Siegfried's Rhine Journey, the First Act Interlude and the second Act Prelude, Seigfried's Death and the third Act conclusion. To this pastiche was added that climax of all climaxes, Brunnhilde's immolation, which Eileen Farrell sang with Mr. Munch back in the fifties. Mr. Leinsdorf's commitment to Wagner is more than strong — it is fierce. Even in such a stitching array as this, the impact of the music under reasonably well played circumstances, as was the case here, can be very decided upon a listener willing to lend himself to it. The soprano, under these concert conditions, has her task cut out for her, too, and just to make herself heard Miss Horne was obliged to draw heavily on those immense reserves of power. Whether they were enough is arguable, for the heavy brass were having at it with a will. If the vocal results were not wholly satisfactory, the blame lies, I suggest, less in the logistics of Wagnerenian opera in concert version and more in what appeared to be a curious detachment by the singer in respect to her role. Something that transcends fine vocalizing is needed to project that awesome culmination of events whereof she sings. That something was missing.

This week's offerings, too, are no mean commentary on our contemporary world — an all Czech program. Scheduled to be heard are "From Bohemia's Meadows and Forests" of Smetana, the first BSO performance of Janacek's Sinfonietta, and the Dvorak's Symphony No. 8 in G major (formerly No. 4). Mr. Leinsdorf again conducts.

On Glorious Note

88th Symphony Season Opens

By McLAREN HARRIS

The opening concert of the 88th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf presented, along with shorter works by Mozart and Beethoven, vocal and instrumental excerpts from Wagner's "Die Goetterdaemmerung," concluding portion of the four-part "Ring" cycle. It was a case of putting the end at the beginning, but for that the performance was no less glorious.

IT WAS AS GLORIOUS, let us say, as excerpts can be in representing the summary of an entire four-hour-plus music drama. Most of the instrumental sections take the form of interludes or preludes connecting the principal scenes of the drama—Dawn, Siegfried's Rhine Journey, an Act I Interlude after Siegfried has departed from Bruennhilde for new adventure, and the Prelude to the tragic turn of emotion of Act II. Siegfried's Death, frequently called the Funeral Music, fills an integral part of the action; Bruennhilde's Immolation, which equals the preceding for poignant emotion, is the lone excerpt in this concert version containing a vocal solo. The final excerpt, the conclusion of Act III, is like a sigh of realization and resignation.

In the concert version, of course, there is not the power of the original. It is difficult to build cumulative energy through a succession of disjointed excerpts, as the only continuity exists in the imagination. Yet there is a goodly measure of Wagnerian splendor which arises during Siegfried's Death and approaches near-incandescence in the emotional heat of the Immolation scene; the concluding music, far short of dispelling this energy, requires an audience to keep hold of it, to contain it. And this is as it should do, for such is the form of romantic art.

Soprano Marilyn Horne sang the demanding verses of the Immolation scene with full reserves of support and breath control. These, indeed, were her entire sucess, for Warner's vocal parts are cast in essentially linear dimensions, and without the strength and stamina to fill imposing dynamic curves and sustain them to the phrase-ends a singer is forever lost. The Immolation scene is a vocal feat in itself, and Miss Horne performed it stunningly, albeit with some dictional ambiguity (common in Wagnerian performances). It is yet strange to think of this singer as a Wagnerian soprano, perhaps because of her diminutive physical height; but the voice is proving her claim.

THE ORCHESTRA'S WORK was brilliant as well, the score's great dynamic being reaches realized as well as one can conceive them. The brass-percussion battery built cataclysms of volume without any taint of noise-making; the strings were silken and cohesive. Leinsdorf's tempos were intelligently chosen and he accomplished the various transitions smoothly. In spite of their inherent shortcomings as excerpts they constituted a magnificent exercise.

Miss Horne's work in "Goetterdaemmerung" was all the more appreciated after her relatively mediocre efforts in Beethoven's concert aria, "Ah! perfido." The opus is really not much special, consisting of a lengthy recitative and standard-form aria, and makes a poor showcase, if one is after such. The soprano's work lacked, in addition to clear diction, the firm support she reserved for Wagner; her tone inclined toward thinness and intonation sagged frequently.

Leinsdorf began the program with Mozart's Symphony No. 39 in E flat, which seems to be receiving frequent play by the orchestra. His tempos have gained liveliness, the melodic language increased vigor. It was a joyful and positive opener.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

SEP 28 1968 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Season to Open This Weekend

Erich Leinsdorf opens the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the first of the Friday/Saturday series concerts Sept. 27, at 2 p.m. and Sept. 28, at 8:30 p.m. Featured soloist is soprano Marilyn Horne, who will sing Beethoven's concert aria "Ah! perfido" and the Immolation scene from Wagner's Die Gotterdammerung.

The following week, following the first of the series of open rehearsals on Oct. 3, the Friday-Saturday program will include "From Bohemia's forests and meadows" from Smetana's cycle, "My Country," Janacek's Sinfonietta and Dvorak's Symphony No. 8 in G.

The music on this program was chosen by Mr. Leinsdorf to mark the fiftieth anniversary of the first Republic of Czechoslovakia. Program will be preceded by a performance of the Music of the Blessed Spirits in the Elysian Fields from "Orpheus and Euridice" in memory of the late Samuel Diamond, a violinist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra until his death this summer and one of only three men to be a member of the Orchestra for longer than fifty years.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
[illegible] 26,000

SEP 26 1968 New England Newsclip

Leinsdorf Presents 'Ah Perfido' in Hub

By GEORGE GELLES
Music Critic

It's fine that Erich Leinsdorf didn't show the perverse enthusiasm in reintroducing to Boston Beethoven's "Ah Perfido" that the composer showed when he brought the work to Vienna; this was a marathon that included the Fourth Piano Concerto, Fifth and Sixth Symphonies, four movements from the C Major Mass, the Choral Fantasy, and for good measure, a piano solo. It's not so fine that Leinsdorf opened his in-town season at Symphony Hall with warmed-over Tanglewood, Mozart's 39th Symphony, unhappily done this summer and equally off the mark yesterday afternoon.

"Perfido," is, in a sense, more operatic than "Fidelio"; for while it has none of the warm, hominess of Beethoven's single opera, it is grandly conceived, with a text (both anonymous and terrible) broadly plotted and emphasized with gestures sweeping and bold.

About Marilyn Horne, the soprano soloist, I can tell little; from my corner of Symphoney both she and the violins sounded one room removed.

I could tell that intonation wasn't always sure and that, in the recitative, phrases endings were allowed to go excessively slack, and that she sang with a big, rich voice that greatly pleased the audience.

Miss Horne was heard too in Erich Leinsdorf's "Goetterdaemmerung," a patchwork of the instrumental sections of Wagner's opera ending with Bruennhilde's immolation. Putting pieces together like this doesn't really work, for each instrumental except is a moment of dramatic distillation, and piling them one after the other weakens each and makes a misshapen whole.

Still, the music is marvelously resilient, and except for the transition to the final section, well-pasted together. Playing, save unspeakable sounds from the clarinet section, was fine. If you know the opera, this is a novel though unsatisfactory way of hearing it; if you don't, you'll be buffeted about between moments of power and grandeur. In either case, goosebumps guaranteed.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

SEP 28 1968 New England

Monitor & Globe Reviews on p. 121 as part of new management articles

2.

SECOND PROGRAM
Friday afternoon October 4 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening October 5 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

GLUCK — Music of the blessed spirits in the Elysian Fields from 'Orpheus and Euridice'
in memory of Samuel Diamond

SMETANA — From Bohemia's forests and meadows

JANÁČEK — Sinfonietta for orchestra op. 60
Allegretto
Andante – allegretto
Moderato
Allegretto
Andante con moto
first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

intermission

DVOŘÁK — Symphony no. 8 in G major op. 88*
Allegro con brio
Adagio
Allegretto grazioso
Finale: allegro ma non troppo

BSO: polished rusticity on Bohemian program

By Craig Stinson

Friday was Bohemian day at the symphony. Erich Leinsdorf, for his second program of the season, chose works by the three best known, and almost the only well-known, composers of what is now Czechoslovakia; Smetana, Dvořák, and Janáček. If the concert was thus somewhat short on variety, it nevertheless afforded an opportunity to observe the continuity in the music of these three men, as well as their more or less common roots in Slavonic and Moravian folk music.

It also included the Boston Symphony's first performance of the Janáček Sinfonietta, Op. 60, and its first performance since 1945 of Smetana's "From Bohemia's Forests and Meadows." The latter work seems to have been eased out of the repertory, along with the rest of Smetana's six-part cycle, "Má Vlast" (my country), excepting "Die Moldau." "Forests and Meadows," the fourth item in this cycle, is perhaps a less memorable piece than "Die Moldau"; but it has, unlike the latter, the cardinal virtue of not being overplayed.

The Sinfonietta was composed in 1926 for the Sokol festival of gymnastics and dedicated to the Czechoslovak armed forces. It is a fine show-off piece for the winds, especially the brass (9 C trumpets, 3 F trumpets, 2 bass trumpets, 4 trombones, 2 tenor tubas, bass tuba), and the fanfares that occur in strategic moments of all five movements are capable, in theory at least, of making quite a grand effect.

The last half of the concert was taken up by the familiar Symphony No. 8 in G of Dvořák (No. 4 by the old numbering system).

None of this music was Bohemian in the sociological sense of that word—the sense which implies anticonventionality. And its relation to a genuine folk culture was about as distant as that of a well-scrubbed and neatly dressed peasant.

Unfortunately it was performed in the same spirit of polished rusticity, with more than a trace of clumsiness under the surface gloss. Mr. Leinsdorf, who has played a good deal of Dvořák during his BSO tenure, is capable of more sympathetic and interesting performances — to say nothing about matters of balance, intonation, and accuracy of note-reading.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150
SEP 7 1968 New England Newsclip

Symphony Looks at Czech Spirit

Bohemian Melody Bright

By McLAREN HARRIS

When the program for this weekend's Symphony concerts was planned last spring to celebrate the 50th anniversary of the first Republic of Czechoslovakia there was no indication that events were to transpire during the summer which would keep the sovereignty of the Czech people in dark eclipse.

Outside armed and political forces have asserted their might in Czechoslovakia, but culture dies very, very hard; nationalistic music by Smetana, Dvorak and Janacek has outlasted a chain of tyrannies and breathes yet more robustly than many who would rob its people of their voice.

THIS HOLDS TRUE even as the first among these on the Symphony program, Smetana's "From Bohemia's Forests and Meadows," is by no means the strongest product of either country or composer. Smetana found an irrepressible musical lyricism in the folk art of rural Bohemia.

He felt, correctly, that a national musical language must gather its inspiration from the grassroots of the populace, not be codified for them at higher levels of society, which in Bohemia of that period were heavily infused with German tradition. Thus folk-flavored melody and dance-forms of the Bohemian countryside make frequent appearances in his works, and nowhere are they more in evidence than in "My Country," Smetana's cycle of six tone poems, of which "Forests" is the fourth.

The present example brims with bright melody, tone-paintings of rural scenery and an atmosphere of general cheer. Its failing is that it has just the one sentiment, the one message, slipping from one pastoral setting into another with little moment like a bland travelogue through green farmlands. It sounds like a pleasant pastime for a Friday afternoon, but its artistic impulse hardly fires human imagination.

There is much, too, that is nationalistic in inspiration and romantic in color about the Sinfonietta, Op. 60, of Leos Janacek. But here, unlike with Smetana, one finds an edge of modernism to the harmonies, vitality in rhythm, diverse moods and, perhaps above all, brilliant orchestration.

The Sinfonietta, as this program, found its inspiration in the establishment of the first Republic; its movements refer to landmarks in the city of Brno, Janacek's birthplace, and the original dedication was to the Czech army. Its orchestra is bolstered with many brass, yet in the three middle movements (the first and last are fanfares) they are treated with judicious taste, always with an ear for clear textures. The light motion of the second movement, the rich lyricism of the third and the martial flair of the remainder have given the Sinfonietta a respectable popularity which undoubtedly, and deservedly, will increase.

THE WORK of the orchestra an dErich Leinsdorf approached its most rewarding moments during the Janacek. The instrumental responses were neatly pointed, rhythmically accurate and the brass mustered many a resonant thrust.

More's the pity that they could not sustain the same energy for Dvorak's Symphony in G, Op. 88. Here is Dvorak at his melodic finest; the Allegretto may be counted among the most expressive and elegantly-phrased of the Scherzo genre. But the orchestra seemed inexplicably bored by the prospect of playing Op. 88 for what must be for them the zillionth time. Rhythms were flaccid, notable inaccuracies and stuttering entrances cropped up in the wind accompaniments, flaws in intonation showed up in clarinets and horns.

It doesn't take much shabbiness to steal the impetus from a performance; after a while it became a simple matter of providing volume at the right times, and that won't suffice for Dvorak or anyone else.

The Dance of the Blessed Spirits from Gluck's "Orfeo ed Euridice" opened the program as a memorial to a late BSO violinist, Samuel Diamond.

Next week Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Haydn's Symphony No. 90 in C, Alban Berg's Violin Concerto with Arthur Grumiaux as soloist and Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring."

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
OCT 5 1968 New England Newsclip

Symphony offers 'limp' tribute

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

Oct. 28 will mark the 50th anniversary of the founding of the first Czechoslovak Republic and the liberation of its people from centuries of Hapsburg domination.

Just five days ago, we had the 30th anniversary of the Republic's destruction by the signatories of the Munich agreement. Because the shock and the outrage of the Russian invasion of Czechoslovakia in August are still so fresh, we are, no doubt, more aware of the first two dates than we would otherwise have been.

It was presumably the cumulative effect of these events that led Erich Leinsdorf to plan Friday's Boston Symphony program as a musical tribute to Czechoslovakia. It was an appropriate gesture: the music was not imaginatively chosen, though, and the performances tended to make what should have been a moving occasion go limp.

Leinsdorf's one departure from the obvious was in his programming of the Janacek Sinfonietta, which the Boston Symphony had never played. Written in 1926 for a gymnastic festival, it begins with fanfares for brass (including nine trumpets!) and kettledrums. The fanfare style, declamatory, static, with many repetitions of short phrases, dominates the whole five-movement work.

The cumulative or additive, but non-developmental way of building, is not so much peculiar to the Sinfonietta as it is characteristic of Janacek's mature style in general.

The Sinfonietta is, however, a piece in which Janacek used the method with singular success. The catchiness of the tiny snatches of tune themselves, the odd and delightful stimulation in the inventively jerky play with shifting meters and speeds, and, most obviously perhaps, the brilliant sonorities, make the Sinfonietta one of the freshest and most spirited 20th century contributions to the repertory.

Its effect can be electrifying, but on Friday the piece fell almost as flat as possible. Rhythms were uncertain and tempi inadequately contrasted. All those trumpets made a splendid sound, but there was a lot of sloppy and unclear work elsewhere in the orchestra. The artistic and technical insufficiencies of the clarinet playing were especially shocking.

Without, as I have already said, troubling himself to be very imaginative about it, Leinsdorf filled out the rest of the program agreeably with Smetana's "From Bohemia's Forests and Meadows" (woods and fields, or what have you) and the Dvorak G. major Symphony, No. 8, the one that used to be known as No. 4. The Dvorak's third and fourth movements went more convincingly than the first two, though even their effect was a bit tense and hurried; the Smetana performance was perfunctory and rather much of the playing was sheer disaster.

Before the program proper, Leinsdorf led the Music of the Blessed Spirits from Gluck's "Orpheum," in memory of Samuel Diamond, who died in August, aged 75, a few days before completing his 50th season as a violinist with the Boston Symphony.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, — conducting Smetana: "From Bohemia's Forests and Meadows;" Janacek: Sinfonietta; Dvorak: Symphony No. 8 in G major. Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
OCT 5 1968 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony To Offer Second Program Oct. 4, 5

An all-orchestral program will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of its music director, Erich Leinsdorf, as the second program of the current season. The Friday-Saturday pair of concerts is Oct. 4 at 2 p. m. and Oct. 5 at 8.30 p. m.

The program opens with From Bohemia's Forests and Meadows from Smetana's cycle, My Country, music written in celebration of his native Bohemia. Leinsdorf will then conduct Janacek's Sinfonietta and Dvorak's Symphony No. 8 in G, op. 88 (old no. 4).

The music on this program was chosen by Leinsdorf to mark the 15th anniversary of the first Republic of Czechoslovakia. The program will be preceded by a performance of the Music of the Blessed Spirits in the Elysian Fields from 'Orpheus and Euridice' in memory of the late Samuel Diamond. Diamond, a violinist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra until his death this summer, was one of only three men to be a member of the orchestra for longer than 50 years.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905
SEP 29 1968 New England Newsclip

B.S.O. to honor Czechoslovakia and Diamond

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's second program of the season Friday at 2 and Saturday at 8:30 will commemorate the 50th anniversary of the first Republic of Czechoslovakia.

As its selections, especially chosen by conductor Erich Leinsdorf, the orchestra will play "From Bohemia's Forests and Meadows" from Smetana's cycle "My Country", the "Sinfonietta" of Janacek and Dvorak's Symphony No. 8 in G, op. 88 (old No. 4).

Preceding the program there will be a performance of the "Music of the Blessed Spirits" from Gluck's "Orpheus and Euridice," given in memory of Samuel Diamond, violinist with the orchestra for more than 50 years.

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 113,750
SEP 29 1968 New England Newsclip

Hub Symphony Musical Tribute To Honor Czechs

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday announced a series of musical tributes to Czechoslovakia. Following a public rehearsal, two public performances will be held Friday afternoon and Sunday night.

Music by Czech masters was chosen by Conductor Erich Leinsdorf. The selections selected are from Smetana's "From Bohemia's Meadows and etta," and Dvorak's Symphony No. 8 in G."

Musical history reveals the impact of Czech instrumentalists and composers, according to the Symphony's archivist. The orchestra's late director, Serge Koussevitzky, studied under Rambosheck, talented Czach master.

BSO Honors Czechoslovakia

BOSTON (AP) — The Bosto Symphony Orchestra paid tribute to Czechoslovakia wh three performances this wee of music by Czech composers.

A spokesman said conducto Erich Leinsdorf chose music b Smetana, Janacek and Dvora for the performances of th orchestra's public rehearsal ar concerts Friday and today.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424
OCT 5 1968 New England

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873
OCT 4 1968 New England

2.

SECOND PROGRAM
Friday afternoon October 4 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening October 5 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

GLUCK — Music of the blessed spirits in the Elysian Fields from 'Orpheus and Euridice'
in memory of Samuel Diamond

SMETANA — From Bohemia's forests and meadows

JANÁČEK — Sinfonietta for orchestra op. 60
Allegretto
Andante – allegretto
Moderato
Allegretto
Andante con moto
first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

intermission

DVOŘÁK — Symphony no. 8 in G major op. 88*
Allegro con brio
Adagio
Allegretto grazioso
Finale: allegro ma non troppo

BSO: polished rusticity on Bohemian program

By Craig Stinson

Friday was Bohemian day at the symphony. Erich Leinsdorf, for his second program of the season, chose works by the three best known, and almost the only well-known, composers of what is now Czechoslovakia; Smetana, Dvořák, and Janáček. If the concert was thus somewhat short on variety, it nevertheless afforded an opportunity to observe the continuity in the music of these three men, as well as their more or less common roots in Slavonic and Moravian folk music.

It also included the Boston Symphony's first performance of the Janáček Sinfonietta, Op. 60, and its first performance since 1945 of Smetana's "From Bohemia's Forests and Meadows." The latter work seems to have been eased out of the repertory, along with the rest of Smetana's six-part cycle, "Má Vlast" (my country), excepting "Die Moldau." "Forests and Meadows," the fourth item in this cycle, is perhaps a less memorable piece than "Die Moldau"; but it has, unlike the latter, the cardinal virtue of not being overplayed.

The Sinfonietta was composed in 1926 for the Sokol festival of gymnastics and dedicated to the Czechoslovak armed forces. It is a fine show-off piece for the winds, especially the brass (9 C trumpets, 3 F trumpets, 2 bass trumpets, 4 trombones, 2 tenor tubas, bass tuba), and the fanfares that occur in strategic moments of all five movements are capable, in theory at least, of making quite a grand effect.

The last half of the concert was taken up by the familiar Symphony No. 8 in G of Dvořák (No. 4 by the old numbering system).

None of this music was Bohemian in the sociological sense of that word—the sense which implies anticonventionality. And its relation to a genuine folk culture was about as distant as that of a well-scrubbed and neatly dressed peasant.

Unfortunately it was performed in the same spirit of polished rusticity, with more than a trace of clumsiness under the surface gloss. Mr. Leinsdorf, who has played a good deal of Dvořák during his BSO tenure, is capable of more sympathetic and interesting performances — to say nothing about matters of balance, intonation, and accuracy of note-reading.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150

SEP 7 1968 New England Newsclip

Symphony Looks at Czech Spirit

Bohemian Melody Bright

By McLAREN HARRIS

When the program for this weekend's Symphony concerts was planned last spring to celebrate the 50th anniversary of the first Republic of Czechoslovakia there was no indication that events were to transpire during the summer which would keep the sovereignty of the Czech people in dark eclipse.

Outside armed and political forces have asserted their might in Czechoslovakia, but culture dies very, very hard; nationalistic music by Smetana, Dvorak and Janacek has outlasted a chain of tyrannies and breathes yet more robustly than many who would rob its people of their voice.

THIS HOLDS TRUE even as the first among these on the Symphony program, Smetana's "From Bohemia's Forests and Meadows," is by no means the strongest product of either country or composer. Smetana found an irrepressible musical lyricism in the folk art of rural Bohemia.

He felt, correctly, that a national musical language must gather its inspiration from the grassroots of the populace, not be codified for them at higher levels of society, which in Bohemia of that period were heavily infused with German tradition. Thus folk-flavored melody and dance-forms of the Bohemian countryside make frequent appearances in his works, and nowhere are they more in evidence than in "My Country," Smetana's cycle of six tone poems, of which "Forests" is the fourth.

The present example brims with bright melody, tone-paintings of rural scenery and an atmosphere of general cheer. Its failing is that it has just the one sentiment, the one message, slipping from one pastoral setting into another with little moment like a bland travelogue through green farmlands. It sounds like a pleasant pastime for a Friday afternoon, but its artistic impulse hardly fires human imagination.

There is much, too, that is nationalistic in inspiration and romantic in color about the Sinfonietta, Op. 60, of Leos Janacek. But here, unlike with Smetana, one finds an edge of modernism to the harmonies, vitality in rhythm, diverse moods and, perhaps above all, brilliant orchestration.

The Sinfonietta, as this program, found its inspiration in the establishment of the first Republic; its movements refer to landmarks in the city of Brno, Janacek's birthplace, and the original dedication was to the Czech army. Its orchestra is bolstered with many brass, yet in the three middle movements (the first and last are fanfares) they are treated with judicious taste, always with an ear for clear textures. The light motion of the second movement, the rich lyricism of the third and the martial flair of the remainder have given the Sinfonietta a respectable popularity which undoubtedly, and deservedly, will increase.

THE WORK of the orchestra an dErich Leinsdorf approached its most rewarding moments during the Janacek. The instrumental responses were neatly pointed, rhythmically accurate and the brass mustered many a resonant thrust.

More's the pity that they could not sustain the same energy for Dvorak's Symphony in G, Op. 88. Here is Dvorak at his melodic finest; the Allegretto may be counted among the most expressive and elegantly-phrased of the Scherzo genre. But the orchestra seemed inexplicably bored by the prospect of playing Op. 88 for what must be for them the zillionth time. Rhythms were flaccid, notable inaccuracies and stuttering entrances cropped up in the wind accompaniments, flaws in intonation showed up in clarinets and horns.

It doesn't take much shabbiness to steal the impetus from a performance; after a while it became a simple matter of providing volume at the right times, and that won't suffice for Dvorak or anyone else.

The Dance of the Blessed Spirits from Gluck's "Orfeo ed Euridice" opened the program as a memorial to a late BSO violinist, Samuel Diamond.

Next week Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Haydn's Symphony No. 90 in C, Alban Berg's Violin Concerto with Arthur Grumiaux as soloist and Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring."

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

OCT 5 1968 New England Newsclip

Symphony offers 'limp' tribute

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

Oct. 28 will mark the 50th anniversary of the founding of the first Czechoslovak Republic and the liberation of its people from centuries of Hapsburg domination.

Just five days ago, we had the 30th anniversary of the Republic's destruction by the signatories of the Munich agreement. Because the shock and the outrage of the Russian invasion of Czechoslovakia in August are still so fresh, we are, no doubt, more aware of the first two dates than we would otherwise have been.

It was presumably the cumulative effect of these events that led Erich Leinsdorf to plan Friday's Boston Symphony program as a musical tribute to Czechoslovakia. It was an appropriate gesture: the music was not imaginatively chosen, though, and the performances tended to make what should have been a moving occasion go limp.

Leinsdorf's one departure from the obvious was in his programming of the Janacek Sinfonietta, which the Boston Symphony had never played. Written in 1926 for a gymnastic festival, it begins with fanfares for brass (including nine trumpets!) and kettledrums. The fanfare style, declamatory, static, with many repetitions of short phrases, dominates the whole five-movement work.

The cumulative or additive, but non-developmental way of building, is not so much peculiar to the Sinfonietta as it is characteristic of Janacek's mature style in general.

The Sinfonietta is, however, a piece in which Janacek used the method with singular success. The catchiness of the tiny snatches of tune themselves, the odd and delightful stimulation in the inventively jerky play with shifting meters and speeds, and, most obviously perhaps, the brilliant sonorities, make the Sinfonietta one of the freshest and most spirited 20th century contributions to the repertory.

Its effect can be electrifying, but on Friday the piece fell almost as flat as possible. Rhythms were uncertain and tempi inadequately contrasted. All those trumpets made a splendid sound, but there was a lot of sloppy and unclear work elsewhere in the orchestra. The artistic and technical insufficiencies of the clarinet playing were especially shocking.

Without, as I have already said, troubling himself to be very imaginative about it, Leinsdorf filled out the rest of the program agreeably with Smetana's "From Bohemia's Forests and Meadows" (woods and fields, or what have you) and the Dvorak G. major Symphony, No. 8, the one that used to be known as No. 4. The Dvorak's third and fourth movements went more convincingly than the first two, though even their effect was a bit tense and hurried; the Smetana performance was perfunctory and rather much of the playing was sheer disaster.

Before the program proper, Leinsdorf led the Music of the Blessed Spirits from Gluck's "Orpheum," in memory of Samuel Diamond, who died in August, aged 75, a few days before completing his 50th season as a violinist with the Boston Symphony.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, ~~Erich Leinsdorf~~ conducting Smetana: "From Bohemia's Forests and Meadows;" Janacek: Sinfonietta; Dvorak: Symphony No. 8 in G major. Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

OCT 5 1968 New England Newsclip

Hub Symphony Musical Tribute To Honor Czechs

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday announced a series of musical tributes to Czechoslovakia. Following a public rehearsal, two public performances will be held Friday afternoon and Sunday night.

Music by Czech masters was chosen by Conductor Erich Leinsdorf. The selections selected are from Smetana's "From Bohemia's Meadows and etta," and Dvorak's Symphony No. 8 in G."

Musical history reveals the impact of Czech instrumentalists and composers, according to the Symphony's archivist. The orchestra's late director, Serge Koussevitzky, studied under Ramboshek, talented Czech master.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

OCT 4 1968 New England

BSO Honors Czechoslovakia

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra paid tribute to Czechoslovakia with three performances this week of music by Czech composers.

A spokesman said conductor Erich Leinsdorf chose music by Smetana, Janacek and Dvorak for the performances of the orchestra's public rehearsal and concerts Friday and today.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424

OCT 5 1968 New England

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 565,205

SEP 29 1968 New England Newsclip

B.S.O. to honor Czechoslovakia and Diamond

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's second program of the season Friday at 2 and Saturday at 8:30 will commemorate the 50th anniversary of the first Republic of Czechoslovakia.

As its selections, especially chosen by conductor Erich Leinsdorf, the orchestra will play "From Bohemia's Forests and Meadows" from Smetana's cycle "My Country", the "Sinfonietta" of Janacek and Dvorak's Symphony No. 8 in G, op. 88 (old No. 4).

Preceding the program there will be a performance of the "Music of the Blessed Spirits" from Gluck's "Orpheus and Euridice," given in memory of Samuel Diamond, violinist with the orchestra for more than 50 years.

Boston Symphony To Offer Second Program Oct. 4, 5

An all-orchestral program will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of its music director, Erich Leinsdorf, as the second program of the current season. The Friday-Saturday pair of concerts is Oct. 4 at 2 p. m. and Oct. 5 at 8.30 p. m.

The program opens with From Bohemia's Forests and Meadows from Smetana's cycle, My Country, music written in celebration of his native Bohemia. Leinsdorf will then conduct Janacek's Sinfonietta and Dvorak's Symphony No. 8 in G, op. 88 (old no. 4).

The music on this program was chosen by Leinsdorf to mark the 15th anniversary of the first Republic of Czechoslovakia. The program will be preceded by a performance of the Music of the Blessed Spirits in the Elysian Fields from 'Orpheus and Euridice' in memory of the late Samuel Diamond. Diamond, a violinist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra until his death this summer, was one of only three men to be a member of the orchestra for longer than 50 years.

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 113,750

SEP 29 1968 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony

Musical Salute to Czechoslovakia

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

In its second program of the season, the Boston Symphony extended hands-across-the-sea to stricken Czechoslovakia on the ironical 50th anniversary of its founding as a Republic. Smetana, Dvorak and Janacek, with their imaginative roots deep in the homeland, recalled the special genius that emerged from a racial complex. Smetana and Dvorak were Bohemian before the new nation; and the Moravian Janacek, after "the resurrection of 1918," discovered a new relationship to the freed country. ("I saw myself in it. I belonged to it.") All three composers draw strength from their response to the folk music they had lived with.

From medieval times, when popular tunes were often taken as a basis for sacred counterpoint, countless composers in every period have rediscovered a deep human reason for their private inspirations in the untoutered welling-up of song and dance—realized that the essentials of "form" are irrational because they are complex forces out of nature, and that the scheming mind can only rationalize and develop conscious techniques to a limited extent without losing the inner determination. This is a long argument that no American school of composers has quite solved, although Aaron Copland and Charles Ives have made brave attempts.

At the moment, Folk has become popular commercial entertainment full of gimmicks, and Art Music prides itself on an esoteric physics that is not intended to be an extension and fulfilment of human living—also gimmicks. In between these poles, hundreds of composers and thousands of concert programs pick their chancey way. If music isn't a way to live more fully, what is it? At this moment the popular front, with all its stupifying ignorance and banality, seems to have the jump on the new academicians of non-human tone.

And so the Symphony presentation of three Czechoslovakian composers was refreshing. Smetana, in one movement from the suite, My Country (From Bohemia's forests and meadows) with swirling strings and overriding melodies conjures up a fruitful countryside — like Beethoven in the Pastoral but without the storm. Dvorak's Symphony No. 8 makes large development of simple tunes — much noodling but also many moments of wide-spread orchestral harmony and, especially in the opening and finale, large melodies in the 'cello a la Brahms. The free and haunting lilt of real gypsy comes only in the Allegretto (third movement) and when it aspires to fugate (first movement) or grand climax (finale) seems over-blown and without enough inner substance. But Dvorak could contrive a sensational coda that can still stir the inertia of the Saturday night audience. In short, one must not expect revelation—better to sit back and wait for the moments of inspired melody and color.

The Boston played magnificently (such music is harder to make convincing than is Mozart) and with the Janacek Sinfonietta, with its short bursts of brilliant brass, its infectious poly-rhythms and primitive tunes—no development-fat this time—the Czechoslovakian celebration came close to modern sensibility. And the advent of nine trumpets, two tenor tubas, two bass trumpets and timpani, in Janacek's glorification of a military band, made me nostalgic for the old glory of Sousa's Band.

The opening piece was the "Music of the Blessed Spirits" from Gluck's Orpheus as a musical "wake" for Samuel Diamond, a fifty-year member of the string section. It was played with the graceful dignity that Gluck imagined—the flute solo a restrained warmth and an unsentimental recognition of human worth loss.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000
OCT 10 1968
New England Newsclip

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 25,000
JUN 13 1968

TUESDAY A SERIES

FIRST PROGRAM
Tuesday evening October 8 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

MOZART — Symphony no. 39 in E flat K. 543
Adagio – allegro
Andante con moto
Menuetto – trio
Finale: allegro

JANÁČEK — Sinfonietta for orchestra op. 60
Allegretto
Andante – allegretto
Moderato
Allegretto
Andante con moto

intermission

WAGNER — Die Götterdämmerung
Dawn – Siegfried's Rhine journey* – Interlude from Act one – Prelude to Act two – Siegfried's death – conclusion of Act three fanfares opening and concluding the work, later references to the fanfare motif, and the imaginative hyplay between lower brass and flutes in the superb third movement. The instrumental combinations are often extraordinary, and although this reviewer is familiar with the Sinfonietta from recordings, no disk can prepare you for the impact of this feast of sound in the concert hall.

The writing is not easy, least of all for

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150
OCT 11 1968
New England

FREE PRESS
PERRERELL MASS
WEEKLY CIRC. 200
OCT 3 1968
New England Newsclip

Symphony cancels

Boston Symphony Orchestra has canceled the concert previously announced to be given on Mon. Oct. 14, which would have been sponsored by the American Chemical Society, Northeast Region.

50th Anniversary Of Czechoslovakia

ASHBY - In commemoration of the 50th Anniversary of Independence of Free Czechoslovakia several events are planned in New England prior to the historic date of October 28 by Americans of Czech and Slovak background.

The Boston Symphony will dedicate its program of October 4th and 5th to the music of Czechoslovak composers.

The Czechoslovak flag will be presented to the Cathedral of the Pines, Rindge, New Hampshire at a special dedi[illegible] service on Sunda[illegible] at two o'[illegible] Law[illegible] livered by Mrs. Ilka Williams, President of Masaryk Club of Boston. The Czechoslovak flag will be presented by Mr. George Pavlik, [illegible] and Mr. Josef Suk [illegible] half of the Ame[illegible] slovak Society of [illegible] Douglas Sloane, founder [illegible] Cathedral of the Pines [illegible] of the Nation, will [illegible] Czechoslovak [illegible] played in [illegible] mies who would den[illegible] igious and politica[illegible] ever since 1415 when priest and rector of University of Prague was [illegible] Dolanska of

SENTINEL (e)
FITCHBURG, MASS.
CIRC. 20,496
OCT 3 1968
New England Newsclip

Cathedral Of Pines—

Czechoslovak Flag Dedication Sunday

ASHBY — In commemoration of the 50th Anniversary of the Independence of Free Czechoslovakia several events are planned in New England prior to the historic date of Monday, Oct. 28 by Americans of Czech and Slovak background.

The Boston Symphony will dedicate its program on Friday and Saturday this week to the music of Czechoslovak composers.

The Czechoslovak flag will be presented to the Cathedral of the Pines, Rindge, N.H. at a special dedication service Sunday at 2 p.m. Rev. Law[illegible] Marvin Jaffa, minist[illegible] First Parish Chu[illegible] of Ashby, and [illegible] Unitarian [illegible] offici[illegible] peals for protectio[illegible] oppression, an[illegible] chorale "Ye [illegible] which gave [illegible] to resist then [illegible] would deny their [illegible] political freedom ever [illegible] when Jan Hus, priest and [illegible] of Charles University of Pra[illegible] was burned.

Dr. Marie Dolanska[illegible] sley will play th[illegible] Charles R. Ka[illegible] is progra[illegible] Mrs. I[illegible] b[illegible]

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 62,736
OCT 9 1968
New England Newsclip

BSO Czech Music Premiere Lacks Real Emotional Force

By GEORGE GELLES, Music Critic

The music by Czech composers with which Erich Leinsdorf exclusively filled Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon had everything—harmonic richness, beauty of melody and orchestration that is always interesting; everything, that is, but real emotional force, and while the BSO program wasn't quite all desserts, a meaty main course was absent and needed.

It was somewhat of an occasion, for the "Sinfonietta" by the gifted Leos Janacek got its BSO premiere 42 years after its completion. This is a winning work in five short movements, with a colorful opening fanfare dominated by trumpets and tympani that really sounds, and a middle movement—the most extended—that skillfully metamorphoses its material.

Structurally, for the conductor beneficially, the pieces are outlined by the instrumentation (much more emphatically here than in either the Dvorak or Smetana also heard) and the performnce was a good one.

Incidentlly and ironically, the "Sinfonietta," which is dedicated to the Czechoslovak Armed Forces, expresses, according to its composer, "the contemporary free man, his spiritual beauty and joy, his strength, his courage and his determination to fight for victory."

Dvorak's Eighth Symphony (old No. 4)—his most coherent, successful, successful, beautiful—had its problems. Leinsdorf in the slow movement rushed through silences and didn't give sustained notes their due; there was also fuzzy rhythmic distortion, in part the Hall's fault, but only in part. And it looked ridiculous and seemed wasteful to preface the third movement with half a measure enormously drawn in the air.

Tempi in this and in Smetana's picture "From Bohemia's Forests and Meadows," were carefully chosen and, properly on the brisk side, but neither piece ever caught fire and caution won out.

Prefacing the Czech music Leinsdorf led the "Blessed Spirit" music from Gluck's "Orfeo and Euridice," a tribute to Symphony violinist Samuel Diamond, who passed away this summer in his sleep. Miss Dwyer, as has become customary on these sad occasions, played the flute solo beautifully.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873
OCT 5 1968
New England Newsclip

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 196,923
OCT 2 1968
New England Newsclip

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
OCT 3 1968
New England Newsclip

Czechs to Mark 50th Year of Independence

The 50th anniversary of the independence of Czechoslovakia commemorated later this month, will be observed with several events this week-end in New England.

The Boston Sympony Orchestra will dedicate its programs, Friday and Saturday, to Czech composers.

Sunday, at a special dedication service at the Ca[illegible] dral of the Pines in [illegible] N.H., the Czecho[illegible] will be pres[illegible] thedral. Re[illegible]

N.E. Groups To Observe Czech Independence Day

BOSTON — Three events commemorating the 50th anniversary of the independence of free Czechoslovakia will be held in New England this month prior to the anniversary date of Oct. 28.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will dedicate its programs Friday and Saturday to the performance of music by Cz[illegible] composers.

On Sunday the [illegible] flag will be [illegible] Cathedra[illegible] N.H.

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 62,736
OCT 3 1968

INFORMATION OBSCURED

3.

Boston Symphony

Musical Salute to Czechoslovakia

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

In its second program of the season, the Boston Symphony extended hands-across-the-sea to stricken Czechoslovakia on the ironical 50th anniversary of its founding as a Republic. Smetana, Dvorak and Janacek, with their imaginative roots deep in the homeland, recalled the special genius that emerged from a racial complex. Smetana and Dvorak were Bohemian before the new nation; and the Moravian Janacek, after "the resurrection of 1918," discovered a new relationship to the freed country. ("I saw myself in it. I belonged to it.") All three composers draw strength from their response to the folk music they had lived with.

From medieval times, when popular tunes were often taken as a basis for sacred counterpoint, countless composers in every period have rediscovered a deep human reason for their private inspirations in the untoutered welling-up of song and dance—realized that the essentials of "form" are irrational because they are complex forces out of nature, and that the scheming mind can only rationalize and develop conscious techniques to a limited extent without losing the inner determination. This is a long argument that no American school of composers has quite solved, although Aaron Copland and Charles Ives have made brave attempts.

At the moment, Folk has become popular commercial entertainment full of gimmicks, and Art Music prides itself on an esoteric physics that is not intended to be an extension and fulfilment of human living—also gimmicks. In between these poles, hundreds of composers and thousands of concert programs pick their chancey way. If music isn't a way to live more fully, what is it? At this moment the popular front, with all its stupifying ignorance and banality, seems to have the jump on the new academicians of non-human tone.

And so the Symphony presentation of three Czechoslovakian composers was refreshing. Smetana, in one movement from the suite, My Country (From Bohemia's forests and meadows) with swirling strings and overriding melodies conjures up a fruitful countryside — like Beethoven in the Pastoral but without the storm. Dvorak's Symphony No. 8 makes large development of simple tunes — much noodling but also many moments of wide-spread orchestral harmony and, especially in the opening and finale, large melodies in the 'cello a la Brahms. The free and haunting lilt of real gypsy comes only in the Allegretto (third movement) and when it aspires to fugate (first movement) or grand climax (finale) seems over-blown and without enough inner substance. But Dvorak could contrive a sensational coda that can still stir the inertia of the Saturday night audience. In short, one must not expect revelation—better to sit back and wait for the moments of inspired melody and color.

The Boston played magnificently (such music is harder to make convincing than is Mozart) and with the Janacek Sinfonietta, with its short bursts of brilliant brass, its infectious poly-rhythms and primitive tunes—no development-fat this time—the Czechoslovakian celebration came close to modern sensibility. And the advent of nine trumpets, two tenor tubas, two bass trumpets and timpani, in Janacek's glorification of a military band, made me nostalgic for the old glory of Sousa's Band.

The opening piece was the "Music of the Blessed Spirits" from Gluck's Orpheus as a musical "wake" for Samuel Diamond, a fifty-year member of the string section. It was played with the graceful dignity that Gluck imagined—the flute solo a restrained warmth and an unsentimental recognition of human worth loss.

JI. B w

OCT

A Feast Of Sound

By Peter M. Knapp

"Pops Parking" says the sign in the lot across from Symphony Hall. But that was last season, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra already is into the third week of its 88th season, the last under Erich Leinsdorf.

Last night's concert stayed mostly within the familiar repertory, with one exception — a welcome one. This was the Sinfonietta for orchestra by Leos Janacek, the Czech-Moravian composer whose music is stirring fresh interest 40 years after his death.

First BSO Performances

The Sinfonietta by this vigorously individual musician was completed in 1926, when Janacek was 72, and regrettably is only now receiving its first performances by the Boston Symphony. The reasons probably have more to do with difficulty of performance and the large forces required, than with qualitative judgments, for the Sinfonietta still sounds fresh and forward-looking today.

Janacek dedicated this piece to the Czech armed forces, and indicated subtitles for the five movements. But there is little need to attach any programmatic reference to this music; it stands on its own. It is scored for huge wind ensemble — including a dozen trumpets, four each of horns and trombones, three tubas — percussion and strings, which for once take a definite back seat.

All of this sets up a splendidly masculine brass sound in the bright fanfares opening and concluding the work, later references to the fanfare motif, and the imaginative byplay between lower brass and flutes in the superb third movement. The instrumental combinations are often exraordinary, and although this reviewer is familiar with the Sinfonietta from recordings, no disk can prepare you for the impact of this feast of sound in the concert hall.

The writing is not easy, least of all for the woodwinds, and the rhythms are tricky. But the Symphony met the demands of virtuosity in a performance that aroused more enthusiasm than for Mozart's familiar Symphony No. 39 in E-flat which opened the program. All of which indicates probably that audiences are not innately against the new or unfamiliar when they are works of quality, well performed.

Proper Scale

For the Mozart symphony, Leinsdorf used relatively few strings for this late, big symphony, gaining an immaculate balance and a purity of classical sound otherwise impossible with the battalions of violins often used.

It is good to hear Mozart on this scale, even though No. 39 has been done so often in Boston and at Tanglewood. It is a Leinsdorf specialty, best perhaps in the minuet and bantering finale, though the first two movements would have benefitted from a dash of emotion.

Likewise, Leinsdorf and the orchestra are on familiar grounds in the orchestral excerpts from "Goetterdaemmerung" concluding the program in a blaze of Wagnerian sound. Here, Leinsdorf generates more voltage to go with his scrupulous intellectual approach, and the excursion from dawn to the collapse of Valhalla is an exciting one.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150

OCT 11 1968 New England

Symphony cancels

Boston Symphony Orchestra has canceled the concert previously announced to be given on Mon. Oct. 14, which would have been sponsored by the American Chemical Society, Northeast Region.

FREE PRESS
PERPERELL, MASS.

OCT 3 1968 New England Newsclip

50th Anniversary Of Czechoslovakia

ASHBY - In commemoration of the 50th Anniversary of Independence of Free Czechoslovakia several events are planned in New England prior to the historic date of October 28 by Americans of Czech and Slovak background.

The Boston Symphony will dedicate its program of October 4th and 5th to the music of Czechoslovak composers.

The Czechoslovak flag will be presented to the Cathedral of the Pines, Rindge, New Hampshire at a special dedi service on Sunda at two o' Law livered by Mrs. Ilka Williams, President of Masaryk Club of Boston. The Czechoslovak flag will be presented by Mr. George Pavlik, President, and Mr. Josef Suk half of the Ame slovak Society of Douglas Sloane, founder Cathedral of the Pines of the Nation, wil Czechoslovak played i en mies who would den igious and politica ever since 1415 when priest and rector of University of Prague was Delanska of

SENTINEL (e)
FITCHBURG, MASS.
CIRC. 20,496

OCT 3 1968 New England Newsclip

Cathedral Of Pines— Czechoslovak Flag Dedication Sunday

ASHBY — In commemoration of the 50th Anniversary of the Independence of Free Czechoslovakia several events are planned in New England prior to the historic date of Monday, Oct. 28 by Americans of Czech and Slovak background.

The Boston Symphony will dedicate its program on Friday and Saturday this week to the music of Czechoslovak composers.

The Czechoslovak flag will be presented to the Cathedral of the Pines, Rindge, N.H. at a special dedication service Sunday at 2 p.m. Rev. Law Marvin Jaffa, minist First Parish Chu of Ashby, and Unitarian offici peals for protectio oppression, an chorale "Ye which gave to resist then would deny their political freedom ever when Jan Hus, priest and of Charles University of Pra was burned.

Dr. Marie Dolanska sley will play the Charles R. Ka is progra Mrs. I by

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 62,736

OCT 9 1968 New England Newsclip

BSO Czech Music Premiere Lacks Real Emotional Force

By GEORGE GELLES, Music Critic

The music by Czech composers with which Erich Leinsdorf exclusively filled Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon had everything—harmonic richness, beauty of melody and orchestration that is always interesting; everything, that is, but real emotional force, and while the BSO program wasn't quite all desserts, a meaty main course was absent and needed.

It was somewhat of an occasion, for the "Sinfonietta" by the gifted Leos Janacek got its BSO premiere 42 years after its completion. This is a winning work in five short movements, with a colorful opening fanfare dominated by trumpets and tympani that really sounds, and a middle movement—the most extended—that skillfully metamorphoses its material.

Structurally, for the conductor beneficially, the pieces are outlined by the instrumentation (much more emphatically here than in either the Dvorak or Smetana also heard) and the performnce was a good one.

Incidentlly and ironically, the "Sinfonietta," which is dedicated to the Czechoslovak Armed Forces, expresses, according to its composer, "the contemporary free man, his spiritual beauty and joy, his strength, his courage and his determination to fight for victory."

Dvorak's Eighth Symphony (old No. 4)—his most coherent, successful, successful, beautiful—had its problems. Leinsdorf in the slow movement rushed through silences and didn't give sustained notes their due; there was also fuzzy rhythmic distortion, in part the Hall's fault, but only in part. And it looked ridiculous and seemed wasteful to preface the third movement with half a measure enormously drawn in the air.

Tempi in this and in Smetana's picture "From Bohemia's Forests and Meadows," were carefully chosen and, properly on the brisk side, but neither piece ever caught fire and caution won out.

Prefacing the Czech music Leinsdorf led the "Blessed Spirit" music from Gluck's "Orfeo and Euridice," a tribute to Symphony violinist Samuel Diamond, who passed away this summer in his sleep. Miss Dwyer, as has become customary on these sad occasions, played the flute solo beautifully.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

OCT 5 1968 New England Newsclip

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 196,923

OCT 2 1968 New England Newsclip

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

OCT 3 1968 New England Newsclip

Czechs to Mark 50th Year of Independence

The 50th anniversary of the independence of Czechoslovakia commemorated later this month, will be observed with several events this week-end in New England.

The Boston Sympony Orchestra will dedicate its programs, Friday and Saturday, to Czech composers.

Sunday, at a special dedication service at the Cathedral of the Pines in N.H., the Czecho will be pres thedral

Re

N.E. Groups To Observe Czech Independence Day

BOSTON — Three events commemorating the 50th anniversary of the independence of free Czechoslovakia will be held in New England this month prior to the anniversary date of Oct. 28.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will dedicate its programs Friday and Saturday to the performance of music by Cz composers.

On Sunday the flag will be Cathedral N.H.

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 62,736

OCT 3 1968

4.

THIRD PROGRAM
Friday afternoon October 11 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening October 12 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

HAYDN — Symphony no. 90 in C
Adagio – allegro assai
Andante
Menuetto – trio
Finale: allegro assai

BERG — Violin concerto (1935)
Andante – allegretto
Allegro – adagio
ARTHUR GRUMIAUX

intermission

STRAVINSKY — Le sacre du printemps (The rite of spring)
Part one: The adoration of the earth
Introduction – Auguries of spring (Dances of the young girls) – Mock abduction – spring Khorovod (Round dance) – Games of the rival clans – Procession of the wise elder – Adoration of the earth (wise elder) – Dance of the earth

Part two: The sacrifice
Introduction – Mystical circles of the young girls – Glorification of the chosen victim – The summoning of the ancients – Ritual of the ancients – Sacrificial dance (the chosen victim)

At Symphony Hall

'Rite of Spring' Rich Experience

By McLAREN HARRIS

This weekend's Symphony program features Erich Leinsdorf conducting his first "Rite of Spring" in Boston and the result is promising in conception, although speckled in delivery. Yet its raw, elemental power, coupled yith the clearer textures of Alban Berg's Violin Concerto and the Haydn Symphony No. 90 make the experience eminently rewarding.

In a figurative sense Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" is no less a classic for its originality than is Hayen's C mahor Symphony in a musically literal sense. It struck the Parisian musical scene like a virtual bombshell in 1913, dividing the sentiments of audiences who had taken fully to heart the composer's "Firebird" of 1910. Whereas the earlier ballet had embraced formal designs in inner construction and sectional progression, Stravinsky's "Rite" now presented itself as seemingly chaotic, nearly amorphous, fraught with twisting lines, loosely functional harmony, displaced accents, massive and dissonant orchestral effects and pracgically everything else unnerving to a 1913 audience.

IT IS ALL of these, certainly; but one can become lost in analytical procedures and forget that it is first that it is a spontaneous creation of Stravinsky's mind and a supremely faithful realization of his objectives.

For all its denial of tradition the rhapsodic progression and variety of substance sustain it well over a rather considerable length, while many of the internal effects are ingeniously conceived—the swirling reservoir of instrumental color and kaleidoscopic patterns of meter and accent always presenting an eleent of surprise, imparting a sense of urgency and mounting frenzy.

The orchestra's reading was strong from standpoints of individual effort and collective volume, weak in areas of cohesion and inspiration. The dynamic outline was realized essentially faithfully, but with a feeling of application of exterior force rather than the inner fire which could have brought to life Stravinsky's vision. Rhythms were inclined to be leaden, to plod where they should have cracked, their energy dissipated by a scattering of attacks.

THERE WAS a potential for vivid expression and a ragged sort of conviction, but it sounded more like the first or second rehearsal than a finished product.

Soloist Arthur Grumiaux' reading of the Berg Violin Concerto represented one of the finest accomplishments with that work I have heard or expect to hear. His sense of lyricism was unfaling from beginnint to end, through the opening chains of fifths and the bare hint of Viennese jauntiness in the following Allegretto. Even during the strenuous, cadenza-like material of the Allegro he never threw away the linear approach or phrase-unity for virtuosic temptations, though virtuosity was by no means lacking.

These seemed to sound notes of rare truth for Berg's brand of expressionism here—refined, never abandoned or at a loss for dignity, yet at the same time totally sincere and intensely personal. The orchestra and Grumiaux got along well for the most part, though the former threatened to swamp the violinist now and then; but he survived.

THE OPENING Haydn 90th Symphony in C made its first appearance on Symphony programs in 51 years. It belongs with the group of "Paris" symphonies in terms of dash and pure melodic appeal, and the prominent wind work gives it plenty of color and harmonic support. Another verbal handshake for Leinsdorf for bringing it back.

After a week of touring, the orchestra returns on Oct. 25 and 26 under Colin Davis for Brahms' Third Symphony, Richard Rodney Bennett's Symphony No. 1 and Debussy's "La Mer."

BSO revives Haydn delight

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

The work that was probably least familiar to most of the audiences at Friday's Boston Symphony concert was Haydn's Symphony No. 90 in C, unplayed here since the days of Karl Muck. The two 20th-century classics on the program, Berg's Violin Concerto and Stravinsky's "Sacre du printemps," have had far more frequent performances, and recent ones, too.

I was delighted, at any rate, that Erich Leinsdorf chose to revive the Haydn, a fine piece that had been neglected everywhere. It is not so lyrical as some of its immediate neighbors, the rich sounding and equally unknown 91, or the popular 88 and Oxford. It is full of energy, though, both physical and intellectual, and its excursions into counterpoint get it into some wonderful and surprising adventures. In the Andante, one of those sets of double variations, one theme in major and one in minor, that one meets often in the symphonies, Haydn puts individual, quite unexpected, and very touching constructions on fairly conventional material. Lots of the symphony, the finale especially, is very funny, and the audience is quite poker-faced about that.

The performance was delicate rather than robust, and a good one of its kind. There was some of the rhythmic skidding one gets often from Leinsdorf—those moments when the last part of a bar is clipped and the downbeat arrives just a hair too soon—but most of the way things went very well, whit clean execution (the high horn parts were beautifully done), and with awareness of and pleasure in the play of Haydn's mind.

The Belgian violinist Arthur Grumiaux, who had not played in Boston in over 15 years, was a superb soloist for the Berg. There is nothing self-consciously Viennese in his playing, and he understands that Berg, for all the grief in this requiem of his for the 17 - year - old daughter of Walter and Alma Mahler Gropius and for all the Romanticism of his gestures, was an intensely disciplined classicist. What a pleasure to hear the rustic dance phrases of the first movement played so that they did not totter on the edge of parody, or not to be reminded of suet whenever the solo line lay low on the fourth string. It was, altogether, an interpretation of unfailing musical coherence, and noble and serene in spirit. Grumiaux is, besides, a truly elegant instrumentalist, and he played this terribly taxing, and not at all showy, work with an unobtrusive mastery that I have heard in no other performance of it.

What Leinsdorf and the orchestra did was on the tune, in every way beautiful, and Leinsdorf kept the textures wonderfully transparent. He moved from tempo to tempo more convincingly than in the performance with George Zazofsky five years ago (also in most respects an unusually fine one), and he maintained most of the time a chamber - musical intimacy of ensemble with his soloist.

Friday's performance of "Le sacre" was, I believe, Leinsdorf's first. We perhaps benefitted from the excitement of that: Leinsdorf, at any rate, conducted with unusual intensity, drive, and sense of drama. At the very end, in the sacrificial dance, highest level as well. The playing was attentive, in there was some slight rhythmic uncertainty — much less, actually, than in the Haydn — but everything else, beginning with the Introduction, which unfolded with relentless power, was firmly controlled. The tempi fit, the sonorities were clear and vivid, and the different sections were sharply characterized so as to give an impression of uncommon variety and vitality. Most of the orchestral playing was very good indeed: some of it — percussion, E flat clarinet, English horn, bassoon — was outstanding.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Erich Leinsdorf conducting Haydn: Symphony No. 90 in C; Berg: Violin Concerto, with Arthur Grumiaux, soloist; Stravinsky: Le sacre du printemps. Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
OCT 12 1968 New England

BSO Performs

HAYDN, BERG AND STRAVINSKY

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

Erich Leinsdorf last weekend led the Boston Symphony in a third program that was triumphant for both orchestra and audience. Three radical composers in three commissioned works shared, in absentia, the triumph.

Haydn (Symphony 90 in C) demonstrated once again his ability to give his aristocratic backers full measure of the originality they wanted (Will there ever again be such a time when an audience asks to be surprised?). Amateur string quartets know the delight of discovering many unplayed works wherein experiments succeeded, and similarly Symphony 90, allows a larger audience to spark to a work of genius seldom played. The verve of the first movement, kicked along by syncopation with much delicate pianissimo bounce in the strings; an Andante developed as a double variation, playing major against minor, recalling that Baroque counterpoint was still in the armory of classic-romantic composers; a Menuetto enriched beyond courtly grace to be a fit companion to sonata-form and variation, with a lovely oboe soloing in the trio-middle; a Finale that dares performers with its witty dash, and then for a coda-end, suspends us on four measures of absolute silence before plunging into the shock of an unexpected key, and plays around fantastically in a final development of surprises (this before Beethoven codas). The highest praise for the performance is that the symphony played with the color and finesse of a top string quartet.

There is nothing profoundly moving in this Haydn, for all its human warmth and wit; but there is in the Berg Violin Concerto that followed. Berg might never have fulfilled his commission by the violinist Louis Krasner, had he not been inspired by the paralysis and death of a dear friend, Manon Gropius. In a last burst of creation he composed a requiem that shortly would also sound for his own death. The personal neuroticism of the creative great ones has often afforded illumination for the normal.

In this concerto Berg, like the late Beethoven, cut across all boundaries of old and new; the twelve-tone scheme, without orientation to a key, was only an extension of late nineteenth century chromaticism (as it was for Schoenberg) — a limitation, and organization of wide-open possibility, but with no disregard for the relative effect in consonant-dissonant sounds, the relativity of simple and complex rhythms, and the final justice of the ear and idea.

Arthur Grumiaux, the great Belgian violinist, had not only the controlled virtuosity, but the musical grace to recognize the part the protagonist-violin should play in the orchestral whole. Like Mozart, Berg rescues the show-off concerto by imbedding the single instrument in a dialogue with the orchestra, often infusing or submerging in its larger concerns — true of all the great concertos.

Berg, like Mahler, uses a large orchestra with discretion, often pulling a few stops like an organist, to get a clear color for his contrapuntal voices, so that when a large thick harmony develops, it becomes engulfing. Berg stands with Bartok, Hindemith and Shoenberg as an innovator who never lost his birthright as an inheritor. The Boston performance, with Griumiaux so warmly tuned-in to the whole, without exploitation of his role, and Leinsdorf such a sensitive middle-man, made for a moving performance.

Intermission, like cheerfulness, broke in; and Mr. Feinberg's canny photographs of instruments and players, hung in the second-floor gallery, made a fine transitation to Stravinsky's Rite of Spring that followed. The Rite, so mangled in performance with the Diaghilev Ballet in 1913, has proved itself as musical experience since then. And rightly so, for the score preceded the choreography, and like all great music, is limited by the inadequacies of body-movement.

Leinsdorf conducted a clean, taut, exciting performance, from the high bassoon entrance of a wild pastoral motif to the climax of sacrificial death. This is certainly sophisticated primitivism with inspired use of not only primitive tunes, rhythms and the insistance of repetition, but provocative use of the instrumental sounds available to a modern composer. A new venture for Leinsdorf with the BSO, it came off with fresh excitement and all honors to the players.

Three radicals with a difference. Haydn stretched a concensus of revolutionary attitudes and forms by his genius (novelty that recovers humanity). Berg sifts a more modern complexity of technique to celebrate the fatality of life and death. Stravinsky with no conscious theory of technique, but conditioned by an experience of basic rhythm, melody and form recovers, objectively and uniquely, some aspects of the life-urge. And so these radicals become classic, proved in a great performance by the Boston Symphony.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
26,000
OCT 17 1968 New England

Haydn Symphony Nickname Might Be 'The Audacious'

By GEORGE GELLES
Music Critic

Add another to the list of Haydn symphony nicknames: No. 90, "The Audacious". This work, which opened Erich Leinsdorf's Friday afternoon BSO concert is remarkable in several ways, among them in the fragile delicacy of its scoring, but earns its title in its finale. Haydn comes to a noisy C Major close, writes four and a half measures of silence, and then brings in the movement's single theme a half tone higher, which finally works its way home.

There's a similar harmonic twist in the opening movement, which we got when Leinsdorf took the repeat; but why were repeats so arbitrarily handled in the slow movement, and why was no harpsichord filling in the texture?

The symphony was well led, though, aside from a watery second movement and minuet a bit too faceless for me. Except for some inelegancy from the solo violin and oboe, the orchestra, greatly reduced, sounded fine.

The Berg "Violen Concerto," which Arthur Grumiaux played, was frustrating and no joy. Patches of solo work were thrown off with clan, but, in large part, the interpretation seemed unconvincing, as if it were being told second-hand. Leinsdorf didn't help. The orchestral fabric of the Concerto is dense and complicated, and needed a lot more unraveling.

All during Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring," especially in the rhyhtmically complicated sections, I was feeling uneasy, as if the performance wasn't on too steady ground and in the next to last bar of the piece, someone finally made a wrong entrance.

Granted that the piece is unique and uncanny in both what it demands and what it gives—as the program notes—done single-handedly this week and the most foolishly irrelevant in a good long while, tried to show; yet in not having it firmly under control, Leinsdorf weakened, and it's too bad. One of the most interesting programs of the season.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873
OCT 12 1968 New England

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
OCT 12 1968 New England

Berg, Haydn, and Stravinsky

By Craig Stinson

Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" must be as familiar to the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as the so-called "drawing room" sonata of Mozart is to most pianists. So it seemed on Friday afternoon anyway, as the BSO made its way through "Le Sacre."

Erich Leinsdorf's approach to the music was, for the most part, genuinely exciting. Certain sections, such as the Dance of the Earth, which concludes part one, came off extraordinarily well. One seldom hears the machine-gun trumpet part at that point with such shivering clarity.

But there was about as much apparent attention to detail in the performance as one is apt to get from a middle-aged pianist perfunctorily reading through a piece he has known from childhood. It was marked by rhythmic fuzziness (especially in the Danse Sacrale) and an abnormal amount of dropped notes.

What presumably happened is that the orchestra spent more time preparing the more unusual item on the program, the Violin Concerto of Berg. That work, at any rate, received an accurate performance.

Arthur Grumiaux, the Belgian violinist, played the piece with convincing directness, avoiding the temptation to add more schmaltz than Berg required. Among other things, he did an admirable job of staying in the background when that was required of him.

Haydn's No. 90

The concerto is full of places where the violin soloist plays not the principal melodic line, but a secondary line which must be heard but must not predominate. Mr. Grumiaux and Mr. Leinsdorf succeeded throughout in the difficult task of balancing the piece properly.

The Haydn which opened the concert was a typical Leinsdorf-BSO affair — plenty of spirit, but a bit heavy and not too precise. The same fuzzy sound that one heard in the Stravinsky was a problem in the fast movements of the Haydn. Fewer strings would probably help matters; even though Mr. Leinsdorf uses a reduced string section, the sound it produces is still larger and heavier than that for which Haydn composed.

The symphony this time was No. 90 in C, which the orchestra hadn't played since Karl Muck conducted it in 1917. One hopes it will be heard again here before 2019.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150
OCT 14 1968 New England

4.

THIRD PROGRAM
Friday afternoon October 11 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening October 12 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

HAYDN — Symphony no. 90 in C
Adagio – allegro assai
Andante
Menuetto – trio
Finale: allegro assai

BERG — Violin concerto (1935)
Andante – allegretto
Allegro – adagio
ARTHUR GRUMIAUX

intermission

STRAVINSKY — Le sacre du printemps (The rite of spring)
Part one: The adoration of the earth
Introduction – Auguries of spring (Dances of the young girls) – Mock abduction – spring Khorovod (Round dance) – Games of the rival clans – Procession of the wise elder – Adoration of the earth (wise elder) – Dance of the earth

Part two: The sacrifice
Introduction – Mystical circles of the young girls – Glorification of the chosen victim – The summoning of the ancients – Ritual of the ancients – Sacrificial dance (the chosen victim)

At Symphony Hall

'Rite of Spring' Rich Experience

By McLAREN HARRIS

This weekend's Symphony program features Erich Leinsdorf conducting his first "Rite of Spring" in Boston and the result is promising in conception, although speckled in delivery. Yet its raw, elemental power, coupled yith the clearer textures of Alban Berg's Violin Concerto and the Haydn Symphony No. 90 make the experience eminently rewarding.

In a figurative sense Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" is no less a classic for its originality than is Hayen's C mahor Symphony in a musically literal sense. It struck the Parisian musical scene like a virtual bombshell in 1913, dividing the sentiments of audiences who had taken fully to heart the composer's "Firebird" of 1910. Whereas the earlier ballet had embraced formal designs in inner construction and sectional progression, Stravinsky's "Rite" now presented itself as seemingly chaotic, nearly amorphous, fraught with twisting lines, loosely functional harmony, displaced accents, massive and dissonant orchestral effects and pracgically everything else unnerving to a 1913 audience.

IT IS ALL of these, certainly; but one can become lost in analytical procedures and forget that it is first that it is a spontaneous creation of Stravinsky's mind and a supremely faithful realization of his objectives.

For all its denial of tradition the rhapsodic progression and variety of substance sustain it well over a rather considerable length, while many of the internal effects are ingeniously conceived—the swirling reservoir of instrumental color and kaleidoscopic patterns of meter and accent always presenting an eleent of surprise, imparting a sense of urgency and mounting frenzy.

The orchestra's reading was strong from standpoints of individual effort and collective volume, weak in areas of cohesion and inspiration. The dynamic outline was realized essentially faithfully, but with a feeling of application of exterior force rather than the inner fire which could have brought to life Stravinsky's vision. Rhythms were inclined to be leaden, to plod where they should have cracked, their energy dissipated by a scattering of attacks.

THERE WAS a potential for vivid expression and a ragged sort of conviction, but it sounded more like the first or second rehearsal than a finished product.

Soloist Arthur Grumiaux' reading of the Berg Violin Concerto represented one of the finest accomplishments with that work I have heard or expect to hear. His sense of lyricism was unfaling from beginnint to end, through the opening chains of fifths and the bare hint of Viennese jauntiness in the following Allegretto. Even during the strenuous, cadenza-like material of the Allegro he never threw away the linear approach or phrase-unity for virtuosic temptations, though virtuosity was by no means lacking.

These seemed to sound notes of rare truth for Berg's brand of expressionism here—refined, never abandoned or at a loss for dignity, yet at the same time totally sincere and intensely personal. The orchestra and Grumiaux got along well for the most part, though the former threatened to swamp the violinist now and then; but he survived.

THE OPENING Haydn 90th Symphony in C made its first appearance on Symphony programs in 51 years. It belongs with the group of "Paris" symphonies in terms of dash and pure melodic appeal, and the prominent wind work gives it plenty of color and harmonic support. Another verbal handshake for Leinsdorf for bringing it back.

After a week of touring, the orchestra returns on Oct. 25 and 26 under Colin Davis for Brahms' Third Symphony, Richard Rodney Bennett's Symphony No. 1 and Debussy's "La Mer."

BSO Performs

HAYDN, BERG AND STRAVINSKY

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

Erich Leinsdorf last weekend led the Boston Symphony in a third program that was triumphant for both orchestra and audience. Three radical composers in three commissioned works shared, in absentia, the triumph.

Haydn (Symphony 90 in C) demonstrated once again his ability to give his aristocratic backers full measure of the originality they wanted (Will there ever again be such a time when an audience asks to be surprised?). Amateur string quartets know the delight of discovering many unplayed works wherein experiments succeeded, and similarly Symphony 90, allows a larger audience to spark to a work of genius seldom played. The verve of the first movement, kicked along by syncopation with much delicate pianissimo bounce in the strings; an Andante developed as a double variation, playing major against minor, recalling that Baroque counterpoint was still in the armory of classic-romantic composers; a Menuetto enriched beyond courtly grace to be a fit companion to sonata-form and variation, with a lovely oboe soloing in the trio-middle; a Finale that dares performers with its witty dash, and then for a coda-end, suspends us on four measures of absolute silence before plunging into the shock of an unexpected key, and plays around fantastically in a final development of surprises (this before Beethoven codas). The highest praise for the performance is that the symphony played with the color and finesse of a top string quartet.

There is nothing profoundly moving in this Haydn, for all its human warmth and wit; but there is in the Berg Violin Concerto that followed. Berg might never have fulfilled his commission by the violinist Louis Krasner, had he not been inspired by the paralysis and death of a dear friend, Manon Gropius. In a last burst of creation he composed a requiem that shortly would also sound for his own death. The personal neuroticism of the creative great ones has often afforded illumination for the normal.

In this concerto Berg, like the late Beethoven, cut across all boundaries of old and new; the twelve-tone scheme, without orientation to a key, was only an extension of late nineteenth century chromaticism (as it was for Schoenberg) — a limitation, and organization of wide-open possibility, but with no disregard for the relative effect in consonant-dissonant sounds, the relativity of simple and complex rhythms, and the final justice of the ear and idea.

Arthur Grumiaux, the great Belgian violinist, had not only the controlled virtuosity, but the musical grace to recognize the part the protagonist-violin should play in the orchestral whole. Like Mozart, Berg rescues the show-off concerto by imbedding the single instrument in a dialogue with the orchestra, often infusing or submerging in its larger concerns — true of all the great concertos.

Berg, like Mahler, uses a large orchestra with discretion, often pulling a few stops like an organist, to get a clear color for his contrapuntal voices, so that when a large thick harmony develops, it becomes engulfing. Berg stands with Bartok, Hindemith and Shoenberg as an innovator who never lost his birthright as an inheritor. The Boston performance, with Griumiaux so warmly tuned-in to the whole, without exploitation of his role, and Leinsdorf such a sensitive middle-man, made for a moving performance.

Intermission, like cheerfulness, broke in; and Mr. Feinberg's canny photographs of instruments and players, hung in the second-floor gallery, made a fine transitation to Stravinsky's Rite of Spring that followed. The Rite, so mangled in performance with the Diaghilev Ballet in 1913, has proved itself as musical experience since then. And rightly so, for the score preceded the choreography, and like all great music, is limited by the inadequacies of body-movement.

Leinsdorf conducted a clean, taut, exciting performance, from the high bassoon entrance of a wild pastoral motif to the climax of sacrificial death. This is certainly sophisticated primitivism with inspired use of not only primitive tunes, rhythms and the insistance of repetition, but provocative use of the instrumental sounds available to a modern composer. A new venture for Leinsdorf with the BSO, it came off with fresh excitement and all honors to the players.

Three radicals with a difference. Haydn stretched a concensus of revolutionary attitudes and forms by his genius (novelty that recovers humanity). Berg sifts a more modern complexity of technique to celebrate the fatality of life and death. Stravinsky with no conscious theory of technique, but conditioned by an experience of basic rhythm, melody and form recovers, objectively and uniquely, some aspects of the life-urge. And so these radicals become classic, proved in a great performance by the Boston Symphony.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
26,000
OCT 17 1968 New England

Haydn Symphony Nickname Might Be 'The Audacious'

By GEORGE GELLES
Music Critic

Add another to the list of Haydn symphony nicknames: No. 90, "The Audacious". This work, which opened Erich Leinsdorf's Friday afternoon BSO concert is remarkable in several ways, among them in the fragile delicacy of its scoring, but earns its title in its finale. Haydn comes to a noisy C Major close, writes four and a half measures of silence, and then brings in the movement's single theme a half tone higher, which finally works its way home.

There's a similar harmonic twist in the opening movement, which we got when Leinsdorf took the repeat; but why were repeats so arbitrarily handled in the slow movement, and why was no harpsichord filling in the texture?

The symphony was well led, though, aside from a watery second movement and minuet a bit too faceless for me. Except for some inelegancy from the solo violin and oboe, the orchestra, greatly reduced, sounded fine.

The Berg "Violen Concerto," which Arthur Grumiaux played, was frustrating and no joy. Patches of solo work were thrown off with elan, but, in large part, the interpretation seemed unconvincing, as if it were being told second-hand. Leinsdorf didn't help. The orchestral fabric of the Concerto is dense and complicated, and needed a lot more unraveling.

All during Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring," especially in the rhyhtmically complicated sections, I was feeling uneasy, as if the performance wasn't on too steady ground and in the next to last bar of the piece, someone finally made a wrong entrance.

Granted that the piece is unique and uncanny in both what it demands and what it gives—as the program notes—done single-handedly this week and the most foolishly irrelevant in a good long while, tried to show; yet in not having it firmly under control, Leinsdorf weakened, and it's too bad. One of the most interesting programs of the season.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873
OCT 12 1968 New England

BSO revives Haydn delight

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

The work that was probably least familiar to most of the audiences at Friday's Boston Symphony concert was Haydn's Symphony No. 90 in C, unplayed here since the days of Karl Muck. The two 20th-century classics on the program, Berg's Violin Concerto and Stravinsky's "Sacre du printemps," have had far more frequent performances, and recent ones, too.

I was delighted, at any rate, that Erich Leinsdorf chose to revive the Haydn, a fine piece that had been neglected everywhere. It is not so lyrical as some of its immediate neighbors, the rich sounding and equally unknown 91, or the popular 88 and Oxford. It is full of energy, though, both physical and intellectual, and its excursions into counterpoint get it into some wonderful and surprising adventures. In the Andante, one of those sets of double variations, one theme in major and one in minor, that one meets often in the symphonies, Haydn puts individual, quite unexpected, and very touching constructions on fairly conventional material. Lots of the symphony, the finale especially, is very funny, and the audience is quite poker-faced about that.

The performance was delicate rather than robust, and a good one of its kind. There was some of the rhythmic skidding one gets often from Leinsdorf—those moments when the last part of a bar is clipped and the downbeat arrives just a hair too soon—but most of the way things went very well, whit clean execution (the high horn parts were beautifully done), and with awareness of and pleasure in the play of Haydn's mind.

The Belgian violinist Arthur Grumiaux, who had not played in Boston in over 15 years, was a superb soloist for the Berg. There is nothing self-consciously Viennese in his playing, and he understands that Berg, for all the grief in this requiem of his for the 17 - year - old daughter of Walter and Alma Mahler Gropius and for all the Romanticism of his gestures, was an intensely disciplined classicist. What a pleasure to hear the rustic dance phrases of the first movement played so that they did not totter on the edge of parody, or not to be reminded of suet whenever the solo line lay low on the fourth string. It was, altogether, an interpretation of unfailing musical coherence, and noble and serene in spirit. Grumiaux is, besides, a truly elegant instrumentalist, and he played this terribly taxing, and not at all showy, work with an unobtrusive mastery that I have heard in no other performance of it.

What Leinsdorf and the orchestra did was on the tune, in every way beautiful, and Leinsdorf kept the textures wonderfully transparent. He moved from tempo to tempo more convincingly than in the performance with George Zazofsky five years ago (also in most respects an unusually fine one), and he maintained most of the time a chamber - musical intimacy of ensemble with his soloist.

Friday's performance of "Le sacre" was, I believe, Leinsdorf's first. We perhaps benefitted from the excitement of that: Leinsdorf, at any rate, conducted with unusual intensity, drive, and sense of drama. At the very end, in the sacrificial dance, highest level as well. The playing was attentive, in there was some slight rhythmic uncertainty — much less, actually, than in the Haydn — but everything else, beginning with the Introduction, which unfolded with relentless power, was firmly controlled. The tempi fit, the sonorities were clear and vivid, and the different sections were sharply characterized so as to give an impression of uncommon variety and vitality. Most of the orchestral playing was very good indeed: some of it — percussion, E flat clarinet, English horn, bassoon — was outstanding.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Erich Leinsdorf conducting Haydn: Symphony No. 90 in C; Berg: Violin Concerto, with Arthur Grumiaux, soloist; Stravinsky: Le sacre du printemps. Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
OCT 12 1968 New England

Berg, Haydn, and Stravinsky

By Craig Stinson

Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" must be as familiar to the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as the so-called "drawing room" sonata of Mozart is to most pianists. So it seemed on Friday afternoon anyway, as the BSO made its way through "Le Sacre."

Erich Leinsdorf's approach to the music was, for the most part, genuinely exciting. Certain sections, such as the Dance of the Earth, which concludes part one, came off extraordinarily well. One seldom hears the machine-gun trumpet part at that point with such shivering clarity.

But there was about as much apparent attention to detail in the performance as one is apt to get from a middle-aged pianist perfunctorily reading through a piece he has known from childhood. It was marked by rhythmic fuzziness (especially in the Danse Sacrale) and an abnormal amount of dropped notes.

What presumably happened is that the orchestra spent more time preparing the more unusual item on the program, the Violin Concerto of Berg. That work, at any rate, received an accurate performance.

Arthur Grumiaux, the Belgian violinist, played the piece with convincing directness, avoiding the temptation to add more schmaltz than Berg required. Among other things, he did an admirable job of staying in the background when that was required of him.

Haydn's No. 90

The concerto is full of places where the violin soloist plays not the principal melodic line, but a secondary line which must be heard but must not predominate. Mr. Grumiaux and Mr. Leinsdorf succeeded throughout in the difficult task of balancing the piece properly.

The Haydn which opened the concert was a typical Leinsdorf-BSO affair — plenty of spirit, but a bit heavy and not too precise. The same fuzzy sound that one heard in the Stravinsky was a problem in the fast movements of the Haydn. Fewer strings would probably help matters; even though Mr. Leinsdorf uses a reduced string section, the sound it produces is still larger and heavier than that for which Haydn composed.

The symphony this time was No. 90 in C, which the orchestra hadn't played since Karl Muck conducted it in 1917. One hopes it will be heard again here before 2019.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150
OCT 14 1968 New England

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
OCT 12 1968 New England

TUESDAY B SERIES

FIRST PROGRAM
Tuesday evening October 15 at 7.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

MOZART — Symphony no. 39 in E flat K. 543
Adagio – allegro
Andante con moto
Menuetto – trio
Finale: allegro

WAGNER — Die Götterdämmerung
Siegfried's Rhine journey* and death music

intermission

STRAVINSKY — Le sacre du printemps (The rite of spring)

Part one: The adoration of the earth

Introduction – Auguries of spring (Dances of the young girls) – Mock abduction – spring Khorovod (Round dance) – Games of the rival clans – Procession of the wise elder – Adoration of the earth (wise elder) – Dance of the earth

Part two: The sacrifice

Introduction – Mystical circles of the young girls – Glorification of the chosen victim – The summoning of the ancients – Ritual of the ancients – Sacrificial dance (the chosen victim)

STANDARD-TIMES (e)
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 68,850

OCT 16 1968 New England Newsclip

Earl Dias Says:

Boston Symphony Weak On Mozart Rendition

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its 1968-69 Tuesday "B" Series last night in Symphony Hall with a program comprising Mozart's "Symphony No. 39 in E Flat, K. 543," Wagner's "Siegfried's Rhine Journey and Death Music" from "Die Gotterdammerung," and Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring." On the podium was Erich Leinsdorf, who is conducting his last full season with the orchestra.

Of the selections on the program, I had been looking forward most eagerly to the Mozart, which is one of the great trilogy of symphonies composed in 1788 and which is a transitional sort of work in that, in depth and in impact, is a forerunner of the magnificent "Jupiter" symphony. Unfortunately, Mr. Leinsdorf and his musicians gave us a somewhat heavy-handed reading (achieving the requisite lightness and brilliance only in the Minuet). In short, the rendition was too taut and tight-fisted — lacking the requisite fluidity.

In the Wagner, however, Mr. Leinsdorf and his ensemble came into their own. Recently, the orchestra has been recording a great deal of Wagner; sequently, both Mr. Leinsdorf and his players are in the vein. Th chromatic climaxes, the lovely death music, and the "Rhine Journey" section which is really a nostalgic recollection of Siegfried's heroic exploits and character — all these were conveyed in effective musical terms, sonorously, with admirable balance among the various instrumental sections, and with a nice regard for the lushness of the Wagnerian orchestration.

As for the Stravinsky "Rite of Spring," this is, of course, one of the master works of the 20th Century. When it is played expertly — and it was last night — it can exert a sort of primitive power inasmuch as what it depicts is the old pagan ritual of human sacrifice in the spring — a sacrifice that acts as a scapegoat for man's ills and which is made to return order and fertility to a civilization. Mr. Leinsdorf's reading has passion and clarity — and the orchestra was in fine fettle.

The next concert in the series, on Nov. 5, will feature Brahms' "German Requiem."

Boston Symphony Opens Tuesday 'B' Series

The Boston Symphony, orchestra's Tuesday "B" Series opened last week in Symphony Hall and marked the beginning of conductor Erich Leinsdorf's last complete season with the orchestra. For the concert, Mr. Leinsdorf chose to perform Mozart's "Symphony No. 39 in E Flat, K. 543," Wagner's "Siegfried's Rhine Journey and Death Music" from "Die Gotterdammerung," and Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring."

The Wagner music, with its chromatic climaxes and lush orchestration, is a work of much impact; the Stravinsky, as everyone knows, is a remarkable evocation of the power of the primitive in modern man — but I was most charmed by the Mozart, even though the rendition by Mr. Leinsdorf and his ensemble was rather heavy-handed and lacking in the lightness and brilliance requisite to the score.

In fact, the "Symphony No. 39" is one of the great trilogy that Mozart wrote in 1788; the others are "Symphony in G Minor, No. 40" and the magnificent "Symphony in C Major, No. 41" known to concert-goers as the "Jupiter." Someone once noted that the "Symphony No. 39" is the "swan song" of Mozart's youth, and the poetic E. T. Hoffmann observed about the work, "Love and melancholy breathe forth in purest spirit tones; we feel ourselves drawn with inexpressible longing towards the forms which beckon as the clouds in another sphere."

Although Hoffmann may be over-romanticizing in this patch of purple prose, he is, surprisingly right. The depth of feeling, the ardor, the irrepressible stream of rich harmony do have something unearthly about them, as though Mozart, perhaps the greatest of all composers, was asking us to follow him to a higher plane to which most of us mortals are incapable of ascending.

In any event, even when this symphony is not given a reading that I admire, I can still revel in its sound of genius.

HERE AND THERE — Franchot Tone left an estate estimated at between $250,000 — $500,000 . . . George Abbott will stage the Allan Sherman-Albert Hague musical, "The Fig Leaves Are Falling" . . . The Dimitri Mitropoulos International Music Competition for Conductors, set for New York in January, is being endowed by Prince Rainier of Monaco . . . The season's first Nielsen ratings list the following, in this order, as TV's most popular shows: Mayberry, RFD, Here's Lucy, Family Affair, Rowan and Martin, Bonanza, Doris Day, Carol Burnett, Gomer Pyle, Bob Hope and Julia.

STANDARD-TIMES (e)
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 68,850

OCT 20 1968 New England Newsclip

THE CONDUCTOR

Buck Hoeffler

CHARLES WILSON, Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, came to Boston from New York City, where for six years he was a conductor and on the musical staff of the New York City Opera Company. He returns regularly to the New York City Opera as a guest conductor; last season he directed performances of Mozart's The marriage of Figaro, and this season he has conducted the Company's production of Madam Butterfly.

Charles Wilson received a Bachelor of Science degree in Music in 1960 from the Mannes College of Music.

During the summer he conducted concerts by both the Boston Symphony and the Berkshire Music Center Orchestras, and as head of vocal music activities prepared the Tanglewood Choir and the Berkshire Chorus for performances with the Boston Symphony of Haydn's Nelson Mass and choral works of Brahms, including the German Requiem. As head of the Berkshire Music Center's vocal music department, he has already done much for solo vocal music at Tanglewood; he organized four lieder recitals by fellowship students during the 1968 session. He was also accompanist for Hanne-Lore Kuhse in her Prelude concert.

TUESDAY A SERIES

SECOND PROGRAM
Tuesday evening October 22 at 8.30

CHARLES WILSON conductor

HAYDN — Symphony no. 90 in C
Adagio – allegro assai
Andante
Menuetto – trio
Finale: allegro assai

SMETANA — From Bohemia's forests and meadows

intermission

DVOŘÁK — Symphony no. 8 in G major op. 88*
Allegro con brio
Adagio
Allegretto grazioso
Finale: allegro ma non troppo

Czech Musical Spirits

By Peter M. Knapp

Neither of the Bohemian composers represented on last night's Boston Symphony concert lived to see their native land become part of the nation of Czechoslovakia. Yet both Bedrich Smetana and Antonin Dvorak are ineradicably the Czech national musicial spirits, as Sibelius is to Finland.

In their music pulses the folk tunes and dances of their native land, its natural beauties, and the spirit of its people. And though most of us who attended last night's concert at Symphony Hall may not [redacted]chs, it is not difficult to identify [redacted]is music and its splendid orchestral [redacted]ations, or to reflect in Dvorak's noble [redacted] melancholy cello theme in the finale [redacted] 8th Symphony that Czechoslovakia [redacted]ive again.

50th Anniversary

But for this summer's events, it could have been a joyous occasion. Five days from now, Czechoslovakia will mark the 50th anniversary of its independence as a nation. But this intensely nationalistic music of Smetana and Dvorak remains liberated even if the people of their homeland are not.

Charles Wilson, the Boston Symphony's assistant conductor, was on the podium for the occasion. In the audience were the past and future music directors of the BSO — Charles Munch and William Steinberg. Scouting perhaps?

Wilson's program consisted of Haydn's Symphony No. 90 in C; Smetana's "From Bohemia's Forests and Meadows," part of the "My Fatherland" cycle, and Dvorak's Symphony No. 8 in G.:

Although it is not unusual repertoire, the program has its difficulties, though few were evident in the solidly-conceived and well-executed performances which found the orchestra playing in magnificent form. The horns were especially excellent in the Dvorak, the strings were bright and lucid in the Haydn, and Doriot Anthony Dwyer's flute chirped happily throughout the concert.

More Restrained

Wilson seems to be a much more disciplined conductor than he was last year at the time of his Boston debut. He has done an exceptional job with the choruses at Tanglewood over the past two years, in addition to appearing as pianist and organist with the orchestra and his behind-the-scenes assistance for Erich Leinsdorf. He is a well-schooled musician with the right instincts, drawing good sound from the orchestra and sharp in his handling of rhythm and metric changes, important in the Smetana and Dvorak pieces.

Last year, his gestures were exuberant and he tended to over-conduct. Now, he is more restrained, his technique has gained polish and he reflects confidence — even through a potentially embarrassing moment when the baton slipped out of his hand in a climax of the Dvorak first movement and bounced past the celli into the audience.

His conducting at times did seem cool — and the second movement of the Haydn was rather stodgy. But he released some emotion in the Smetana and the finale of the Dvorak wound up in an exciting swirl of sound.

The Pa[redacted], Wed., Oct. 23, 1968

TUESDAY B SERIES

FIRST PROGRAM
Tuesday evening October 15 at 7.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

MOZART — Symphony no. 39 in E flat K. 543
Adagio – allegro
Andante con moto
Menuetto – trio
Finale: allegro

WAGNER — Die Götterdämmerung
Siegfried's Rhine journey* and death music

intermission

STRAVINSKY — Le sacre du printemps (The rite of spring)
Part one: The adoration of the earth
Introduction – Auguries of spring (Dances of the young girls) – Mock abduction – spring Khorovod (Round dance) – Games of the rival clans – Procession of the wise elder – Adoration of the earth (wise elder) – Dance of the earth

Part two: The sacrifice
Introduction – Mystical circles of the young girls – Glorification of the chosen victim – The summoning of the ancients – Ritual of the ancients – Sacrificial dance (the chosen victim)

STANDARD-TIMES (e)
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 68,850

OCT 16 1968 New England Newsclip

Earl Dias Says:

Boston Symphony Weak On Mozart Rendition

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its 1968-69 Tuesday "B" Series last night in Symphony Hall with a program comprising Mozart's "Symphony No. 39 in E Flat, K. 543," Wagner's "Siegfried's Rhine Journey and Death Music" from "Die Gotterdammerung," and Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring." On the podium was Erich Leinsdorf, who is conducting his last full season with the orchestra.

Of the selections on the program, I had been looking forward most eagerly to the Mozart, which is one of the great trilogy of symphonies composed in 1788 and which is a transitional sort of work in that, in depth and in impact, is a forerunner of the magnificent "Jupiter" symphony. Unfortunately, Mr. Leinsdorf and his musicians gave us a somewhat heavy-handed reading (achieving the requisite lightness and brilliance only in the Minuet). In short, the rendition was too taut and tight-fisted — lacking the requisite fluidity.

In the Wagner, however, Mr. Leinsdorf and his ensemble came into their own. Recently, the orchestra has been recording a great deal of Wagner; sequently, both Mr. Leinsdorf and his players are in the vein. Th chromatic climaxes, the lovely death music, and the "Rhine Journey" section which is really a nostalgic recollection of Siegfried's heroic exploits and character — all these were conveyed in effective musical terms, sonorously, with admirable balance among the various instrumental sections, and with a nice regard for the lushness of the Wagnerian orchestration.

As for the Stravinsky "Rite of Spring," this is, of course, one of the master works of the 20th Century. When it is played expertly — and it was last night — it can exert a sort of primitive power inasmuch as what it depicts is the old pagan ritual of human sacrifice in the spring — a sacrifice that acts as a scapegoat for man's ills and which is made to return order and fertility to a civilization. Mr. Leinsdorf's reading has passion and clarity — and the orchestra was in fine fettle.

The next concert in the series, on Nov. 5, will feature Brahms' "German Requiem."

Boston Symphony Opens Tuesday 'B' Series

The Boston Symphony, orchestra's Tuesday "B" Series opened last week in Symphony Hall and marked the beginning of conductor Erich Leinsdorf's last complete season with the orchestra. For the concert, Mr. Leinsdorf chose to perform Mozart's "Symphony No. 39 in E Flat, K. 543," Wagner's "Siegfried's Rhine Journey and Death Music" from "Die Gotterdammerung," and Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring."

The Wagner music, with its chromatic climaxes and lush orchestration, is a work of much impact; the Stravinsky, as everyone knows, is a remarkable evocation of the power of the primitive in modern man — but I was most charmed by the Mozart, even though the rendition by Mr. Leinsdorf and his ensemble was rather heavy-handed and lacking in the lightness and brilliance requisite to the score.

In fact, the "Symphony No. 39" is one of the great trilogy that Mozart wrote in 1788; the others are "Symphony in G Minor, No. 40" and the magnificent "Symphony in C Major, No. 41" known to concert-goers as the "Jupiter." Someone once noted that the "Symphony No. 39" is the "swan song" of Mozart's youth, and the poetic E. T. Hoffmann observed about the work, "Love and melancholy breathe forth in purest spirit tones; we feel ourselves drawn with inexpressible longing towards the forms which beckon as the clouds in another sphere."

Although Hoffmann may be over-romanticizing in this patch of purple prose, he is, surprisingly right. The depth of feeling, the ardor, the irrepressible stream of rich harmony do have something unearthly about them, as though Mozart, perhaps the greatest of all composers, was asking us to follow him to a higher plane to which most of us mortals are incapable of ascending.

In any event, even when this symphony is not given a reading that I admire, I can still revel in its sound of genius.

HERE AND THERE — Franchot Tone left an estate estimated at between $250,000 — $500,000 . . . George Abbott will stage the Allan Sherman-Albert Hague musical, "The Fig Leaves Are Falling" . . . The Dimitri Mitropoulos International Music Competition for Conductors, set for New York in January, is being endowed by Prince Rainier of Monaco . . . The season's first Nielsen ratings list the following, in this order, as TV's most popular shows: Mayberry, RFD, Here's Lucy, Family Affair, Rowan and Martin, Bonanza, Doris Day, Carol Burnett, Gomer Pyle, Bob Hope and Julia.

STANDARD-TIMES (e)
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 68,850

OCT 20 1968 New England Newsclip

THE CONDUCTOR

Buck Hoeffler

CHARLES WILSON, Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, came to Boston from New York City, where for six years he was a conductor and on the musical staff of the New York City Opera Company. He returns regularly to the New York City Opera as a guest conductor; last season he directed performances of Mozart's The marriage of Figaro, and this season he has conducted the Company's production of Madam Butterfly.

Charles Wilson received a Bachelor of Science degree in Music in 1960 from the Mannes College of Music.

During the summer he conducted concerts by both the Boston Symphony and the Berkshire Music Center Orchestras, and as head of vocal music activities prepared the Tanglewood Choir and the Berkshire Chorus for performances with the Boston Symphony of Haydn's Nelson Mass and choral works of Brahms, including the German Requiem. As head of the Berkshire Music Center's vocal music department, he has already done much for solo vocal music at Tanglewood; he organized four lieder recitals by fellowship students during the 1968 session. He was also accompanist for Hanne-Lore Kuhse in her Prelude concert.

TUESDAY A SERIES

SECOND PROGRAM
Tuesday evening October 22 at 8.30

CHARLES WILSON conductor

HAYDN — Symphony no. 90 in C
Adagio – allegro assai
Andante
Menuetto – trio
Finale: allegro assai

SMETANA — From Bohemia's forests and meadows

intermission

DVOŘÁK — Symphony no. 8 in G major op. 88*
Allegro con brio
Adagio
Allegretto grazioso
Finale: allegro ma non troppo

Czech Musical Spirits

By Peter M. Knapp

Neither of the Bohemian composers represented on last night's Boston Symphony concert lived to see their native land become part of the nation of Czechoslovakia. Yet both Bedrich Smetana and Antonin Dvorak are ineradicably the Czech national musicial spirits, as Sibelius is to Finland.

In their music pulses the folk tunes and dances of their native land, its natural beauties, and the spirit of its people. And though most of us who attended last night's concert at Symphony Hall may not be Czechs, it is not difficult to identify with this music and its splendid orchestral colorations, or to reflect in Dvorak's noble and melancholy cello theme in the finale of his 8th Symphony that Czechoslovakia is captive again.

50th Anniversary

But for this summer's events, it could have been a joyous occasion. Five days from now, Czechoslovakia will mark the 50th anniversary of its independence as a nation. But this intensely nationalistic music of Smetana and Dvorak remains liberated even if the people of their homeland are not.

Charles Wilson, the Boston Symphony's assistant conductor, was on the podium for the occasion. In the audience were the past and future music directors of the BSO — Charles Munch and William Steinberg. Scouting perhaps?

Wilson's program consisted of Haydn's Symphony No. 90 in C; Smetana's "From Bohemia's Forests and Meadows," part of the "My Fatherland" cycle, and Dvorak's Symphony No. 8 in G.:

Although it is not unusual repertoire, the program has its difficulties, though few were evident in the solidly-conceived and well-executed performances which found the orchestra playing in magnificent form. The horns were especially excellent in the Dvorak, the strings were bright and lucid in the Haydn, and Doriot Anthony Dwyer's flute chirped happily throughout the concert.

More Restrained

Wilson seems to be a much more disciplined conductor than he was last year at the time of his Boston debut. He has done an exceptional job with the choruses at Tanglewood over the past two years, in addition to appearing as pianist and organist with the orchestra and his behind-the-scenes assistance for Erich Leinsdorf. He is a well-schooled musician with the right instincts, drawing good sound from the orchestra and sharp in his handling of rhythm and metric changes, important in the Smetana and Dvorak pieces.

Last year, his gestures were exuberant and he tended to over-conduct. Now, he is more restrained, his technique has gained polish and he reflects confidence — even through a potentially embarrassing moment when the baton slipped out of his hand in a climax of the Dvorak first movement and bounced past the celli into the audience.

His conducting at times did seem cool — and the second movement of the Haydn was rather stodgy. But he released some emotion in the Smetana and the finale of the Dvorak wound up in an exciting swirl of sound.

The Patriot Ledger, Wed., Oct. 23, 1968

6.

FOURTH PROGRAM
Friday afternoon October 25 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening October 26 at 8.30

COLIN DAVIS conductor

HAYDN — Symphony no. 99 in E flat
Adagio – vivace assai
Adagio
Menuetto – trio: allegretto
Vivace

BENNETT — Symphony no. 1 (1965)
Allegro
Andante
Molto vivace

first performance in Boston

intermission

BRAHMS — Symphony no. 3 in F op. 90*
Allegro con brio
Andante
Poco allegretto
Allegro

Davis conducts BSO superbly

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

The ARTS

When Colin Davis first came to the Boston Symphony as guest conductor in February of last year, many among both players and public hoped some day to see the then 40-year-old Englishman take charge of the orchestra as music director. After the announcement last December of Erich Leinsdorf's resignation, Davis's name stood probably at the top of the rumor list. The subsequent appointment, effective next Fall, of William Steinberg left Davis's supporters as much interested in him as ever, though the target date for their hopes was deferred until at least 1972, the expiration date of Steinberg's initial contract. At any rate, Davis's return to the Boston Symphony on Friday afternoon was anticipated with more than ordinary interest, and the audience, which, incidentally, included Dr. Steinberg, applauded him with unusual warmth.

Davis began with Haydn's Symphony No. 99 in E flat (by coincidence last done here in 1960 by Steinberg at his first Boston Symphony concert). The first of the six symphonies Haydn wrote for his second London visit, it is one of those pieces of his late years in which the symphonic process takes place at an incredible level of luminous energy, and, of course, with the happiest blend of the popular with the exceedingly subtle, of humor and high spirits with the heart-piercing tenderness.

I could hardly imagine a more beautiful performance than the one Davis extracted from the Boston Symphony. Davis knows just who Haydn was and what his music is all about. There was energy, grace, lyricism, a delighted response to the winged play of Haydn's mind, a touch of something like swagger; more over, the superlatively apt characterization of detail was marshaled into coherent and long-breathed progression, whose achievement was the result of uncommon perception and concentration.

The orchestra played beautifully for Davis, and in a way that was very different from the rather tense, anxious-to-please playing they did for him on his first visit. This time, there was none of the super-gloss that seems to Europeans so characteristic of American orchestras; there was, instead, a beautifully adjusted, relaxed, chamber-musical quality to the playing that reminded me of their work for Rafael Kubelik two seasons ago, though the level of technical efficiency was higher. The solo woodwind writing in Haydn's Adagio was especially well taken by Mrs. Dwyer and Messrs. Gomberg, Holmes, and Walt.

Davis next conducted the Symphony No. 1 by the 32-year-old English composer, Richard Rodney Bennett. Written three years ago, it is a work of 20 minutes or so in the familiar quick-slow-quick pattern. Bennett's is not a particularly personal voice, but he manages a neo-Stravinskian language with considerable invention and with an awesome technical command. There is plenty of vitality to the first movement and considerable intensity to the Andante; the finale, though, seems to obviously be a rewriting of the Danse sacrale of Stravinsky's "Sacre." The most unequivocal success Bennett achieves is with his dazzling scoring, and under Davis's leadership, the players responded to the virtuoso writing with zest and an infectious joy in their own skill.

The Brahms Third is frighteningly difficult. To be sure Brahms is easier than Haydn in the sense that the richer variegation on the surface of his music provides a more obvious guide to what is really happening at skeletal and bloodstream level, though it was precisely his ability to discern and project form through the relatively subtle differentiations in Haydn that made Davis's conducting of the Symphony No. 99 so remarkable. But nothing absolutely nothing, in Brahms takes care of itself, and it wants unremitting vigilance on the part of a conductor to get minimal intelligibility.

Davis's Brahms performance was never bad, but, except for the drive and force with which he gave the finale, and which, to some degree, he had anticipated in the first movement's recapitulation, it was unremarkable. He played the Symhony for buoyance and grace more than for mystery, sentiment and drama, and that is by no means a bad idea. His conducting of it was coherent, intelligent, and tasteful, and that he made the relaxation of tempo into the epilogue occur where Brahms directs rather than with the viola triplets 15 bars sooner (as most conductors do) is a tribute to all three qualities. Again except for some less then first-rate horn playing, and the flat, but not quite as flat as usual, clarinet, the orchestra did beautifully for Davis. It was a careful, responsible job of house-cleaning, but the place didn't feel lived in.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA: Colin Davis conductor. Haydn: Symphony No. 99 in E flat; Bennett: Symphony No. 1; Brahms: Symphony No. 3 in F. Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
OCT 26 1968
New England Newsclip

Haydn, Brahms Flank Fine Bennet Symphony

By GEORGE GELLES
Music Critic

The mystery of the week is why Colin Davis, chief conductor of the BBC Symphony, one of Britain's two or three top musical exports, and guest conductor this week of the Boston Symphony, brought the First Symphony of Richard Rodney Bennett to Friday afternoon's Symphony Hall concert.

Bennett's past credits include many film scores, that is, music written not to be heard, and his Symphony is of a piece with these. There's much bustle and the mandatory elegiac middle movement, an orchestral gloss derived in large measure from Walton, but the whole thing is little more than instant atmosphere, a poor man's Persichetti not unlike the most vapid products of the American academy.

That the performance sounded fine is all the more reason to regret that Davis' healthy chauvanism didn't lead him to other of his countrymen, to the still much neglected Michael Tippett or to that excellent contemporary of Bennett's, Peter Maxwell Davies.

Haydn, whose 99th Symphony flanked the Bennett on one side, was ideally paired by Davis with Brahms, whose 3rd Symphony was on the other side, for though almost ninety years separated their works, the composers thought about music and wrote symphonies in essentially the same way.

Both pieces were successes from the first, and Davis handled both extremely well. One slight resrvation about the introduction to the Haydn: whatever else Haydn meant by cut time I'm sure he didn't mean eight beats to the bar. This short section seemed too measured Friday, and the slow movement as well.

Otherwise the performances were dandy, clearly and intelligently conceived and executed with clarity. The orchestra responded remarkably well to Davis (though the solo clarinet refused to play in tune), with conviction, interest in what it was doing, and from the solo horn, flute and oboe, some beautiful playing. The concerts this weekend are Davis' only ones here this season, and one of the repeats, sleepy Bennett Symphony and all, shouldn't be missed.

An added inducement is what will surely be the most creative misprint in this year's program book; Stravinsky's "Chant du Rossignol", to be heard two weeks hence, has become "Champ du Rossignol". He'll have a field day.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
OCT 26 1968
New England

Symphony

Brahms No. 3 Is Perfection

By McLAREN HARRIS

Days like yesterday seem to occur only once in a great while but thankfully, memories endure. Yesterday's Boston Symphony performance of the Brahms Symphony No. 3 conducted by Colin Davis was one of the finest performances I have ever heard of any work, by any orchestra, under any conductor.

This was one of those times, exceedingly rare, when everything falls into place and a composition unfolds just as one imagines the composer to have conceived it — a mass carved in great depth, progressing with seemingly weightless motion, etched in perfect blends of instrumental timbre. The feat was a joint effort of Davis and the orchestra — the artisan genius of the former, the keenly sensitive responses of the latter.

THE POWER which swelled out of Brahms' lyric phraseology was not a case of simple volume buildup, of matter being piled on from outside to obscure original outlines, but rose with the strength inherent in the melodic curvature in uninterrupted, fluid progression. The dynamic alterations were gradual and studied, exalting the lines with graceful arches, setting leading motives and answering phrases in three-dimensional relief.

Every seam in the contrapuntal framework was tightly woven, the tonal combinations fused by instrumental balances which could hardly have been more exact. The symphony was as carefully crafted and beautifully wrought as the finest examples of sculpture or painting. Between the opening chordal pillars to the air of mystery on muted strings presaging the closing bars of the finale, to single out particular sections or aspects for consideration would be arbitrary, even futile; it was the kind of experience when the listener loses awareness of the various elements and sits in awe before the eloquence of the whole.

The weekend program is totally symphonic in content. The Brahms F major was preceded by Haydn's Symphony No. 99 and the First Symphony of Richard Rodney Bennett, one of the younger generation of 12-tone composers in England (his music has been heard, probably unconsciously, by a great many people as film scores to certain popular motion pictures).

Bennett's symphony, though time will test its powers of endurance, is an expertly-written work, full of energetic, distinctive thematic material and orchestrated for essentially conventional forces with solid and brilliant tonal combinations in a sort of post-Elgarian style.

EXCEPT FOR some staggered-note scoring in the open movement and aside from the absence of harmonic-melodic patterns, the symphony presents traditional faces in terms of form and often texture. The first movement is in three parts, in which the mood of energy relaxes briefly into soft string tones before the reprise; the second is like a nocturne but more impassioned, contrasting solemn brass chords with a melancholic motive which wends its way through the woodwinds. The third movement again quickens the pace; working two brief motives, one thematic and the other densely-textured and incisive, to a spirited conclusion.

This is very accessible music as duodecaphonal works go. Its material holds interest and the orchestra is large and powerful but lean in sound, avoiding ponderous masses or ear-shattering assaults. The performance, albeit not the final word in rhythmic precision, was effective.

Satisfying, too, was Haydn's E flat major Symphony, husky in its rhythmic pulse and metric underline, dashing in a briskly-paced finale. It was a chapter from more-or-less familiar Haydn, and although not his finest chapter, was yet brushed with mature dignity and humor.

Next week Erich Leinsdorf will return to conduct Brahms' German Requiem, with Saramae Endich, soprano, David Clatworthy, baritone, and the New England Conservatory Chorus.

Boston Symphony Electric Under Colin Davis' Baton

By ROBERT H. NEWALL

BOSTON — Freshness and vitality were the hallmarks of the Boston Symphony's performance [illegible] afternoon. Eliciting a succulent tone, not always an attribute of this orchestra, and sculpting clean melodic lines, Colin Davis galvanized his man, evidently very willing to submit to his subtle persuasions. There was nothing jaded about this concert.

Haydn's Symphony No. 99, not one of the half-dozen phenomenally popular ones and yet not among the least-known either, started things off. Despite admirable clarity and accuracy, it had a touch of blandness that never quite vanished, although there was some lovely, pliant playing in the Minuet, especially from the basses as they polished off the descending E-flat triads that form the warp and woof of the movement.

But from the first explosions of the brasses in Bennett's Symphony No. 1, a work of only 20-minutes' duration, Davis and the BSO generated electricity. Although there were a few — a very few — dissidents like the woman in front of me whose "clucks" were decidedly disapproving, most were gripped by the energy and compositional verve of this score. Sharply dissonant passages were succeeded by stretches of conventional melody, particularly in the second movement.

From the first measure Davis showed that this music is in his marrow: he believes in it, his players responded acutely and the results were thrilling (and I use this word sparingly).

After intermission came Brahms' Third Symphony, a score that can be ruined by heavy, thick playing. But nothing like this marred Friday's performance. I cannot remember hearing so exquisite a texture, sweet but not saccharine, transparent but not thin. Further, the conductor knows the secret of pacing a score, even one of many involvements and convolutions like this, without hurrying it.

Neither had his attention to detail robbed the symphony of its essential grandeur, its organic wholeness. The curvaceous melodies of the first movement, overlapping in the wheels of a locomotive, in particular had a winsome beauty that quite overwhelmed the listener.

An orchestra so polished as the BSO can be expected to play reasonably well under even an inferior conductor (as lesser groups cannot), but the kind of playing it gave so prodigally the other day takes a conductor of the ilk of Colin Davis. The standing ovation was amply deserved.

NEWS (e)
BANGOR, ME.
CIRC. 79,750
OCT 29 1968
New England Newsclip

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873
OCT 26 1968
New England Newsclip

Colin Davis

. . . will be guest conductor for the Boston Symphony this afternoon and Saturday and Tuesday evenings at Symphony Hall.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150
OCT 25 1968
New England Newsclip

6.

FOURTH PROGRAM
Friday afternoon October 25 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening October 26 at 8.30

COLIN DAVIS conductor

HAYDN — Symphony no. 99 in E flat
Adagio – vivace assai
Adagio
Menuetto – trio: allegretto
Vivace

BENNETT — Symphony no. 1 (1965)
Allegro
Andante
Molto vivace

first performance in Boston

intermission

BRAHMS — Symphony no. 3 in F op. 90*
Allegro con brio
Andante
Poco allegretto
Allegro

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

OCT 26 1968

New England Newsclip

Davis conducts BSO superbly

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

The ARTS

When Colin Davis first came to the Boston Symphony as guest conductor in February of last year, many among both players and public hoped some day to see the then 40-year-old Englishman take charge of the orchestra as music director. After the announcement last December of Erich Leinsdorf's resignation, Davis's name stood probably at the top of the rumor list. The subsequent appointment, effective next Fall, of William Steinberg left Davis's supporters as much interested in him as ever, though the target date for their hopes was deferred until at least 1972, the expiration date of Steinberg's initial contract. At any rate, Davis's return to the Boston Symphony on Friday afternoon was anticipated with more than ordinary interest, and the audience, which, incidentally, included Dr. Steinberg, applauded him with unusual warmth.

Davis began with Haydn's Symphony No. 99 in E flat (by coincidence last done here in 1960 by Steinberg at his first Boston Symphony concert). The first of the six symphonies Haydn wrote for his second London visit, it is one of those pieces of his late years in which the symphonic process takes place at an incredible level of luminous energy, and, of course, with the happiest blend of the popular with the exceedingly subtle, of humor and high spirits with the heart-piercing tenderness.

I could hardly imagine a more beautiful performance than the one Davis extracted from the Boston Symphony. Davis knows just who Haydn was and what his music is all about. There was energy, grace, lyricism, a delighted response to the winged play of Haydn's mind, a touch of something like swagger; more over, the superlatively apt characterization of detail was marshaled into coherent and long-breathed progression, whose achievement was the result of uncommon perception and concentration.

The orchestra played beautifully for Davis, and in a way that was very different from the rather tense, anxious-to-please playing they did for him on his first visit. This time, there was none of the super-gloss that seems to Europeans so characteristic of American orchestras; there was, instead, a beautifully adjusted, relaxed, chamber-musical quality to the playing that reminded me of their work for Rafael Kubelik two seasons ago, though the level of technical efficiency was higher. The solo woodwind writing in Haydn's Adagio was especially well taken by Mrs. Dwyer and Messrs. Gomberg, Holmes, and Walt.

Davis next conducted the Symphony No. 1 by the 32-year-old English composer, Richard Rodney Bennett. Written three years ago, it is a work of 20 minutes or so in the familiar quick-slow-quick pattern. Bennett's is not a particularly personal voice, but he manages a neo-Stravinskian language with considerable invention and with an awesome technical command. There is plenty of vitality to the first movement and considerable intensity to the Andante; the finale, though, seems to obviously be a rewriting of the Danse sacrale of Stravinsky's "Sacre." The most unequivocal success Bennett achieves is with his dazzling scoring, and under Davis's leadership, the players responded to the virtuoso writing with zest and an infectious joy in their own skill.

The Brahms Third is frighteningly difficult. To be sure Brahms is easier than Haydn in the sense that the richer variegation on the surface of his music provides a more obvious guide to what is really happening at skeletal and bloodstream level, though it was precisely his ability to discern and project form through the relatively subtle differentiations in Haydn that made Davis's conducting of the Symphony No. 99 so remarkable. But nothing absolutely nothing, in Brahms takes care of itself, and it wants unremitting vigilance on the part of a conductor to get minimal intelligibility.

Davis's Brahms performance was never bad, but, except for the drive and force with which he gave the finale, and which, to some degree, he had anticipated in the first movement's recapitulation, it was unremarkable. He played the Symhony for buoyance and grace more than for mystery, sentiment and drama, and that is by no means a bad idea. His conducting of it was coherent, intelligent, and tasteful, and that he made the relaxation of tempo into the epilogue occur where Brahms directs rather than with the viola triplets 15 bars sooner (as most conductors do) is a tribute to all three qualities. Again except for some less then first-rate horn playing, and the flat, but not quite as flat as usual, clarinet, the orchestra did beautifully for Davis. It was a careful, responsible job of house-cleaning, but the place didn't feel lived in.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Colin Davis conducting. Haydn: Symphony No. 99 in E flat; Bennett: Symphony No. 1; Brahms: Symphony No. 3 in F. Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

OCT 26 1968

New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Electric Under Colin Davis' Baton

By ROBERT H. NEWALL

BOSTON — Freshness and vitality were the hallmarks of the Boston Symphony's performance Friday afternoon. Eliciting a succulent tone, not always an attribute of this orchestra, and sculpting clean melodic lines, Colin Davis galvanized his man, evidently very willing to submit to his subtle persuasions. There was nothing jaded about this concert.

Haydn's Symphony No. 99, not one of the half-dozen phenomenally popular ones and yet not among the least-known either, started things off. Despite admirable clarity and accuracy, it had a touch of blandness that never quite vanished, although there was some lovely, pliant playing in the Minuet, especially from the basses as they polished off the descending E-flat triads that form the warp and woof of the movement.

But from the first explosions of the brasses in Bennett's Symphony No. 1, a work of only 20-minutes' duration, Davis and the BSO generated electricity. Although there were a few — a very few — dissidents like the woman in front of me whose "clucks" were decidedly disapproving, most were gripped by the energy and compositional verve of this score. Sharply dissonant passages were succeeded by stretches of conventional melody, particularly in the second movement.

From the first measure Davis showed that this music is in his marrow: he believes in it, his players responded acutely and the results were thrilling (and I use this word sparingly).

After intermission came Brahms' Third Symphony, a score that can be ruined by heavy, thick playing. But nothing like this marred Friday's performance. I cannot remember hearing so exquisite a texture, sweet but not saccharine, transparent but not thin. Further, the conductor knows the secret of pacing a score, even one of many involvements and convolutions like this, without hurrying it.

Neither had his attention to detail robbed the symphony of its essential grandeur, its organic wholeness. The curvaceous melodies of the first movement, overlapping in the wheels of a locomotive, in particular had a winsome beauty that quite overwhelmed the listener.

An orchestra so polished as the BSO can be expected to play reasonably well under even an inferior conductor (as lesser groups cannot), but the kind of playing it gave so prodigally the other day takes a conductor of the ilk of Colin Davis. The standing ovation was amply deserved.

NEWS (e)
BANGOR, ME.
CIRC. 79,750

OCT 29 1968

New England Newsclip

Haydn, Brahms Flank Fine Bennet Symphony

By GEORGE GELLES
Music Critic

The mystery of the week is why Colin Davis, chief conductor of the BBC Symphony, one of Britain's two or three top musical exports, and guest conductor this week of the Boston Symphony, brought the First Symphony of Richard Rodney Bennett to Friday afternoon's Symphony Hall concert.

Bennett's past credits include many film scores, that is, music written not to be heard, and his Symphony is of a piece with these. There's much bustle and the mandatory elegiac middle movement, an orchestral gloss derived in large measure from Walton, but the whole thing is little more than instant atmosphere, a poor man's Persichetti not unlike the most vapid products of the American academy.

That the performance sounded fine is all the more reason to regret that Davis' healthy chauvanism didn't lead him to other of his countrymen, to the still much neglected Michael Tippett or to that excellent contemporary of Bennett's, Peter Maxwell Davies.

Haydn, whose 99th Symphony flanked the Bennett on one side, was ideally paired by Davis with Brahms, whose 3rd Symphony was on the other side, for though almost ninety years separated their works, the composers thought about music and wrote symphonies in essentially the same way.

Both pieces were successes from the frst, and Davis handled both extremely well. One slight resrvation about the introduction to the Haydn: whatever else Haydn meant by cut time I'm sure he didn't mean eight beats to the bar. This short section seemed too measured Friday, and the slow movement as well.

Otherwise the performances were dandy, clearly and intelligently conceived and executed with clarity. The orchestra responded remarkably well to Davis (though the solo clarinet refused to play in tune), with conviction, interest in what it was doing, and from the solo horn, flute and oboe, some beautiful playing. The concerts this weekend are Davis' only ones here this season, and one of the repeats, sleepy Bennett Symphony and all, shouldn't be missed.

An added inducement is what will surely be the most creative misprint in this year's program book; Stravinsky's "Chant du Rossignol", to be heard two weeks hence, has become "Champ du Rossignol". He'll have a field day.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150

OCT 25 1968

New England Newsclip

Colin Davis

. . . will be guest conductor for the Boston Symphony this afternoon and Saturday and Tuesday evenings at Symphony Hall.

Symphony

Brahms No. 3 Is Perfection

By McLAREN HARRIS

Days like yesterday seem to occur only once in a great while but thankfully, memories endure. Yesterday's Boston Symphony performance of the Brahms Symphony No. 3 conducted by Colin Davis was one of the finest performances I have ever heard of any work, by any orchestra, under any conductor.

This was one of those times, exceedingly rare, when everything falls into place and a composition unfolds just as one imagines the composer to have conceived it — a mass carved in great depth, progressing with seemingly weightless motion, etched in perfect blends of instrumental timbre. The feat was a joint effort of Davis and the orchestra — the artisan genius of the former, the keenly sensitive responses of the latter.

THE POWER which swelled out of Brahms' lyric phraseology was not a case of simple volume buildup, of matter being piled on from outside to obscure original outlines, but rose with the strength inherent in the melodic curvature in uninterrupted, fluid progression. The dynamic alterations were gradual and studied, exalting the lines with graceful arches, setting leading motives and answering phrases in three-dimensional relief.

Every seam in the contrapuntal framework was tightly woven, the tonal combinations fused by instrumental balances which could hardly have been more exact. The symphony was as carefully crafted and beautifully wrought as the finest examples of sculpture or painting. Between the opening chordal pillars to the air of mystery on muted strings presaging the closing bars of the finale, to single out particular sections or aspects for consideration would be arbitrary, even futile; it was the kind of experience when the listener loses awareness of the various elements and sits in awe before the eloquence of the whole.

The weekend program is totally symphonic in content. The Brahms F major was preceded by Haydn's Symphony No. 99 and the First Symphony of Richard Rodney Bennett, one of the younger generation of 12-tone composers in England (his music has been heard, probably unconsciously, by a great many people as film scores to certain popular motion pictures).

Bennett's symphony, though time will test its powers of endurance, is an expertly-written work, full of energetic, distinctive thematic material and orchestrated for essentially conventional forces with solid and brilliant tonal combinations in a sort of post-Elgarian style.

EXCEPT FOR some staggered-note scoring in the open-movement and aside from the absence of harmonic-melodic patterns, the symphony presents traditional faces in terms of form and often texture. The first movement is in three parts, in which the mood of energy relaxes briefly into soft string tones before the reprise; the second is like a nocturne but more impassioned, contrasting solemn brass chords with a melancholic motive which wends its way through the woodwinds. The third movement again quickens the pace, working two brief motives, one thematic and the other densely-textured and incisive, to a spirited conclusion.

This is very accessible music as duodecaphonal works go. Its material holds interest and the orchestra is large and powerful but lean in sound, avoiding ponderous masses or ear-shattering assaults. The performance, albeit not the final word in rhythmic precision, was effective.

Satisfying, too, was Haydn's E flat major Symphony, husky in its rhythmic pulse and metric underline, dashing in a briskly-paced finale. It was a chapter from more-or-less familiar Haydn, and although not his finest chapter, was yet brushed with mature dignity and humor.

Next week Erich Leinsdorf will return to conduct Brahms' German Requiem, with Saramae Endich, soprano, David Clatworthy, baritone, and the New England Conservatory Chorus.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

OCT 26 1968

New England

Conductor Davis prepares for BSO appearance

MICHAEL STEINBERG

Colin Davis is here for concerts with the Boston symphony this Friday and Saturday, and Tuesday of next week. There will be three symphonies: the Haydn 99th, the first by 32-year-old Englishman Richard Rodney Bennett and the Brahms Third.

"I haven't done the Brahms for 11 years," Davis said a few minutes before Tuesday morning's rehearsal, "but you know it's because of it that I'm a professional conductor." It had been his audition piece when he applied for, and got, the post of assistant conductor at Glasgow, and that was the beginning of a career that has brought him, at 42, to the conductorship of the BBC Symphony (London), and an uncommon respect and admiration from audiences, his fellow professionals, and the orchestras with which he has worked.

"The Third is the best of the Brahms, don't you think?" What Davis especially likes about it is a certain lightness in it, an un-Brahmsian non-turgidity, the finale's tremendous energy. It is also extremely difficult, he went on to say, "especially the second subject in the first movement. That's the bit that never seems to go right. There's that terrific wall of an opening, then suddenly they have to play chamber music. It's like the Clarinet Trio there. Of course I don't know if I shall be able to bring it off either."

Davis is glad to be introducing the Bennett, none of whose music has been done in Boston. "He has a marvelous ear — I wish I had one as good — and even in the most complex chords he knows exactly what he has written. It's not true of all composers by any means. He's a great help at rehearsals, because it gives everyone a lot of confidence to feel that he knows what's happening and that he has done it on purpose. There's great vitality to this symphony, and really a lot of emotional intensity to the slow movement — if one can make it go."

Davis is much concerned with such "ifs," with the unpredictable and variable elements, with the necessity of taking nothing for granted, and those concerns are at the root of the untterly sober, responsible professionalism that is so characteristic of him and that sets him apart from so many of his colleagues in his generation.

"Everything is hard for me," he says. No outside observer is in a postion to say how right he is in what perhpas seems like self-deprecation. It is sure, though, that Davis does not lament his lack of facility, the going "like a knife through lvey soft butter," that, on the contrary, he has found special rewards in the gradual maturation of ideas, in the slow struggle to make the music he performs his own, as it were.

He made a joke of saying that his performance of the Elgar First, which he conducts with the New York Philharmonic this season, and which he hopes to bring to Boston when he returns for two weeks in Spring 1970, will be that much more mature then, but obviously he meant it seriously, too. "My God, one hopes to learn and improve, doesn't one."

He spoke of his changing musical tastes and activities. For the Metropolitan Opera in the Spring, he is now studying Berg's "Wozzeck," a new line of country for him, but I want to enlarge my line of country." Schumann's and Grieg's Piano Concertos — he says of the latter, "you really never hear it done decently" — are among the works for which he has only recently come to feel affection. "I enjoy accompanying now, but I used to dread it." And what had he moved away from? "Some Stravinsky, Les Noces, Oedipus Rex, for example. I don't want to be knocked over the head just now. I'm interested in Agon now and in Orphehus, which I did just last week — that long, quiet melodic line. I love these pieces with masks."

What about the much discussed "impossibilities" of the music director's job under today's pressures? "Yes, if one assumes that every concert is meant to be an occasion, that's quite impossible when there are so many. You just can't rise to it that often. Now, if you could be put out to grass for a fortnight and then come back with everything you've stored . . ." And the problem is equally acute for the players, he finds.

"The humane values to which I was brought up—and I bet you were, too—are disappearing. The world is moving at a much quicker, a terrifying, tempo, too. And there's not a thing we can do about it. Perhaps nothiing is changing. It's only that we are fortyish. Look," he said, as the personnel manager came in to say that the orchestra was ready to rehearse, "look, maybe it isn't all as gloomy as we've made it sound. Look at the weather today."

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 196,923

OCT 23 1968 New England

Boston Symphony: the Davis touch

By Allan Sly

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's subscribers responded to Colin Davis's conducting on the weekend with enthusiastic endorsement. They yielded easily to his forthrightness, approved his program, admired his clear leadership. They saw how he has added to his rich musical endowment a finely honed craftsmanship.

Friday afternoon's concert bore most fruit after the intermission, with a performance of the Brahms Third Symphony that exhibited every detail of design as in a close-up, yet delivered, ultimately, a splendid sense of the whole.

The orchestra played with glowing, song-like eloquence—the characteristic of all the good orchestras of Mr. Davis's native England—but not, I submit, quite recognizing its own identity in the process. It might, if it had a few more weeks with Mr. Davis, but then it wouldn't be quite the BSO that we have known.

It will be interesting to hear how it sounds when William Steinberg handles it, and again to compare its sound when Charles Munch stops by.

But this is not the prime purpose of concert attendance. Rather one endures innumerable exposures in order to be prepared for the great moments of revelation, when they come.

Structure illuminated

Fortunately, Bostonians have experienced many of these insights, at various times, and may have had some flashes this week; but for one listener they illuminated, shiningly, the music's architecture and structural content more than they did its motivation, or its subjective significance. The more splendid the Brahms Third sounded, as music, the more I was led to doubt its ultimate greatness as a human document—as is, all will agree, the Beethoven Fifth. (Yet the Brahms performance remains rooted in one's memory as a great one.)

Mr. Davis's physical motions bring to a fine focus, for an observer, what is going on. But they also give the impression of a very tight rein, and in the Haydn Symphony No. 99 in E-flat, which opened the concert, this close control rather inhibited the effect. The good nature and ready wit of Papa Haydn came to us rather strait-jacketed. The old man's geniality could not quite show through the high fashion of the musical discourse.

Today and tomorrow

In the new work, Richard Rodney Bennett's Symphony No. 1 of 1965. Mr. Davis's exuberance, coupled with his great ability as a conductor, offered us a work of today and tomorrow that sharply reminds us how far musicmaking in London has traveled since Delius, Vaughan Williams, and Bax; an admirable program note assures us of this. Mr. Bennett is part of that scene, as is Mr. Davis. The new symphony takes our measure and that of our various musical preoccupations, and it does it with courtesy and grace; though when it had run its course I confess to having been more entertained than enlightened.

Mr. Davis will surely be welcomed back to Boston at any time; and many will be watching hopefully for glimpses of depth, for intimations of man's greatest moments, as well as of his dazzling achievements. Mr. Davis may well be giving us all of these some day.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150

OCT 28 1968 New England

To Conduct

A Boston Symphony Orchestra performance will open the Smith College Concert Course Thursday at 8:15 at John M. Greene Hall.

Colin Davis, conductor of London's BBC Orchestra, will be the guest conductor.

Featured on the program will be the First Symphony by the young English composer, Richard Rodney Bennett. This will be the first performance of the work by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

After the work's premiere in 1966, critic William Mann wrote "...it is virtuoso music, delighting in rapid passage work and stratospheric violin-writing, and jubilant fortissimo chords for the brass."

The orchestra will also play Haydn's Symphony No. 99 in E flat and Brahms' Symphony No. 3 in F opus 90.

Tickets for the series and for the individual concerts are available through the department of music, Sage Hall, Smith College. On Thursday, the day of the performance, those tickets remaining may be purchased at the box office of John M. Greene Hall.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE (e)
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
CIRC. 14,250

OCT 19 1968 New England

Munch conducting Orchestre de Paris

By Craig Stinson

The story is that Colin Davis, who conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra this weekend, withdrew Debussy's "La Mer" from the program when he heard that Charles Munch would precede him with the same work on Wednesday with his new Orchestre de Paris. If the change was made out of consideration for those patrons that might have suffered from an overload of impressionism by hearing both concerts, it is in a way too bad; the comparison of interpretations by two outstanding conductors would have been enlightening.

But Mr. Davis's move may well have been a wise one; for it seems that l'Orchestre de Paris' claim to be the showcase orchestra of France is to some extent a legitimate one. And having all the advantages of sufficient rehearsal, homecoming fervor for Mr. Munch, and a challenge to national honor in the case of "La Mer," the Frenchmen might well have made discouraging competition for our local ensemble.

The first half of their concert, at any rate, consisted of some remarkably polished orchestral playing. The new orchestra could hardly have made a stronger first impression on the Boston public. A large amount of the acclaim, of course, was for Mr. Munch personally, for reasons that were as much a mixture of sentiment and long-standing gratitude as appreciation for the specific event. But the orchestra too made an impression that will likely be remembered when it returns to Boston.

Their playing of "La Mer" was above all suave and clean. The slow tempos that Mr. Munch took, especially in the opening movement, would not have been possible without the utmost control over rhythmic detail and orchestral balance. With such control, Mr. Munch produced a remarkably relaxed performance — an unhurried, small-craft view of the sea, quite in contrast to the more usual sort of steamship approach.

What happened after intermission, unfortunately, was less satisfying. The Frenchmen did not apply themselves to the First Symphony of Brahms with quite the same degree of care and finesse. Mr. Munch conducted a quite lovely third movement, but, for this listener his treatment of the outer movements was too precious and insufficient in rhythmic gusto.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150

OCT 26 1968 New England

BSO Conductor Revises Program

Colin Davis, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week at Symphony Hall and in Northampton, has revised his program to include Haydn's Symphony No. 99, which replaces Debussy's "La Mer." The Debussy work is on Charles Munch's program with the Orchestre de Paris Wednesday night at Symphony Hall.

Davis' programs with the Boston Symphony on Friday and Saturday will open with the Haydn Symphony and continue with Richard Rodney Bennett's Symphony No. 1 and Brahms' Symphony No. 3 as previously scheduled. Davis will also conduct the orchestra in Northampton on Thursday night and again at Symphony Hall on Tuesday, Oct. 29.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

OCT 21 1968 New England

Colin Davis B.S.O. guest conductor

Colin Davis, conductor of London's BBC Orchestra, returns for his second guest engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in concerts Friday and Saturday. The program will include the first Boston performance of Richard Rodney Bennett's First Symphony, as well as Brahms' Third Syphony nd Haydn's Symphony No. 99.

Henry Lewis, conductor of the New Jersey Symphony Orchestra, has been announced as guest conductor for the concerts of March 28 and 29. Although Lewis has conducted previously in Boston, this will mark his debut with the Boston Symphony. Last season, he directed performances of "Carmen" with his wife, soprano Marilyn Horne, in the title role.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905

OCT 20 1968 New England

8.

CAMBRIDGE SERIES

Boston Symphony Davis of London Guest Conductor

Colin Davis, conductor of London's BBC Orchestra, will be the first guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 88th season. Returning to the orchestra for his second guest engagement, Mr. Davis will conduct this week's Friday/Saturday concerts.

Featured on Davis' program is the First Symphony by the young English composer, Richard Rodney Bennett.

Bennett is also known as a composer of opera. His first opera, "Mines of Sulphur," given its initial production at Covert Garden, was later produced at La Scala, Milan, and with success last season in New York.

Haydn's Symphony No. 99 will open the program and Brahms' Third Symphony will close.

Collin Davis will conduct the same music when the orchestra plays in Northampton, Massachusetts on Thursday evening. The concert is at 8:30 at John M. Greene Hall.

On Tuesday evening at 8:30 the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays the second concert in its Tuesday "A" series of ten concerts. Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct, opening the program with Haydn's Symphony no. 90. Smetana's "From Bohemia's forest and meadows" and Dvorak's no. 8 will also be played.

Erich Leinsdorf, music director, has announced that the season's final guest conductor will be Henry Lewis, 35-year-old conductor of the New Jersey Symphony Orchestra. This will be Mr. Wewis' debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Last season, he conducted performances of "Carmen" with his wife, soprano Marilyn Horne, in the title role.

Mr. Lewis will conduct the Orchestra Friday afternoon, March 28, at 2 o'clock and Saturday evening, March 29, at 8:30.

FIRST PROGRAM
Tuesday evening October 29 at 8.30

COLIN DAVIS conductor

HAYDN	Symphony no. 99 in E flat Adagio – vivace assai Adagio Menuetto – trio: allegretto Vivace
BENNETT	Symphony no. 1 (1965) Allegro Andante Molto vivace
intermission
BRAHMS	Symphony no. 3 in F op. 90* Allegro con brio Andante Poco allegretto Allegro

COLIN DAVIS, conductor of London's BBC Orchestra, will be guest conductor for three Boston Symphony concerts at Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon, Saturday night and next Tuesday, performing works by Haydn, Bennett and Brahms.

Davis Conducts BSO At Smith College

By R. C. HAMMERICH

NORTHAMPTON — The Boston Symphony Orchestra came into John M. Greene Hall of Smith College Thursday night with a guest conductor from England, Colin Davis, 42, the highly touted, youthful leader of the BBC Symphony Orchestra in London.

Interesting Music

He offered a program that began with Hydn's 99th Symphony and ended with Brahms's Third. In the middle was, now that the aforementioned are so well known, the most interesting music on the program, Symphony No. 1 by Richard Rodney Bennett, 32, also of England.

It was the first performance of the symphony by the orchestra, but it is scheduled to be repeated with the rest of the program in Boston tonight, Saturday and Tuesday with Davis still on the podium.

It is a volatile, acrid piece with the full range of dissonance and discord we have reason to expect from a piece composed in 1965.

Three Movements

There are three movements. The first is largely an angular, coarsely woven mesh of lghtning shots and thunderbolts. The second uses long, densely chromatic, shimmering chords that are sometimes lightly wafted behind a thin flute or violin solo and sometimes thick and shrill.

The third returns to the prickly, eccentric texture of the first movement but has a somewhat lighter, less thrusting power, although is no less tertering on the edge of apparent chaos.

It was variable and volatile enough Thursday night to be interesting most of the time, and certainly was infinitely more colorful than the Haydn and Brahms that preceded and followed it.

But, of course, they are not intended to be colorful. Davis' view of the Haydn symphony Thursday was squarely cut with strongly rhythmic accents. The adagio second movement displayed a bit of classical grace, but overall, the work was a bit more ponderous than is usual with Haydn's symphonies.

Cooler Than Expected

The Brahms symphony started off cooler than expected, somewhat without inner spirit. It warmed during the second and third movements and became a good, serviceable portrayal of that composer's style in the modern manner, which is to say, with full and precise sonority, silky strings but without emotional exaggeration.

Davis is a handsome fellow with closely cropped hair and an athletic stance. He is immensely popular in England, delivers his signals to the orchestra with widely sweeping gestures, mostly with the right arm, and maintains a tight rein on the pace.

It was reported reliably a year or so ago that he was offered the permament conductorship of the Boston orchestra and turned it down for two reasons—he was already committed for three years of contracts and he feels, as several other young conductors do, that the music director's job in Boston and Tanglewood is too big.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424

OCT 25 1968 New England

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL OPEN CONCERT COURSE AT SMITH COLLEGE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of guest conductor Colin Davis of London's BBC Orchestra, will open the Smith College Concert Course, October 24 at 8:15 p.m.

Featured on the program will be the First Symphony by English composer Richard Rodney Bennett, Haydn's Symphony No. 99 in E flat and Brahms' Symphony No. 3 in F Opus 90. The concert will be in John M. Greene Hall. Tickets are available through the music department, Sage Hall.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
CIRC. 26,950

OCT 1 8 1968 New England

THE CONDUCTOR

COLIN DAVIS, Conductor of the BBC Symphony Orchestra since September 1967, was born in England. After studies at the Royal College of Music he became a professional clarinetist. National service in the Household Cavalry was followed by his first conducting engagements with the Kalmar Orchestra and the Chelsea Opera Group. His opera performances and guest appearances with English orchestras gradually brought him to the attention of the musical world.

He had been Assistant Conductor of the BBC Scottish Orchestra for two years when he was called to the Royal Festival Hall in 1959 to deputise for Otto Klemperer in a concert performance of Don Giovanni. This marked a turning point in his career: he was appointed Musical Director of the Sadler's Wells Opera Company the following year, conducted Die Zauberflöte at Glyndebourne in place of the ailing Sir Thomas Beecham, and began conducting the major London orchestras regularly, as well as opera at Sadler's Wells, and both ballet and opera at Covent Garden.

He conducted in Canada, the United States and in Russia, directed the first German performance of Britten's War Requiem with the Berlin Philharmonic, and shared the podium with Solti and Kertesz on the 1964 world tour of the London Symphony Orchestra.

Colin Davis is now a regular visitor to America. Apart from his appearances in Boston, he has conducted the Orchestras in Philadelphia, Montreal, Toronto, Los Angeles and at the Metropolitan Opera. Later this season he will conduct Peter Grimes and Wozzeck at the Metropolitan, and spend four weeks with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

8.

CAMBRIDGE SERIES

Boston Symphony Davis of London Guest Conductor

Colin Davis, conductor of London's BBC Orchestra, will be the first guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 88th season. Returning to the orchestra for his second guest engagement, Mr. Davis will conduct this week's Friday/Saturday concerts.

Featured on Davis' program is the First Symphony by the young English composer, Richard Rodney Bennett.

Bennett is also known as a composer of opera. His first opera, "Mines of Sulphur," given its initial production at Covert Garden, was later produced at La Scala, Milan, and with success last season in New York.

Haydn's Symphony No. 99 will open the program and Brahms' Third Symphony will close.

Collin Davis will conduct the same music when the orchestra plays in Northampton, Massachusetts on Thursday evening. The concert is at 8:30 at John M. Greene Hall.

On Tuesday evening at 8:30 the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays the second concert in its Tuesday "A" series of ten concerts. Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct, opening the program with Haydn's Symphony no. 90. Smetana's "From Bohemia's forest and meadows" and Dvorak's no. 8 will also be played.

Erich Leinsdorf, music director, has announced that the season's final guest conductor will be Henry Lewis, 35-year-old conductor of the New Jersey Symphony Orchestra. This will be Mr. Wewis' debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Last season, he conducted performances of "Carmen" with his wife, soprano Marilyn Horne, in the title role.

Mr. Lewis will conduct the Orchestra Friday afternoon, March 28, at 2 o'clock and Saturday evening, March 29, at 8:30.

COLIN DAVIS, conductor of London's BBC Orchestra, will be guest conductor for three Boston Symphony concerts at Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon, Saturday night and next Tuesday, performing works by Haydn, Bennett and Brahms.

Davis Conducts BSO At Smith College

By R. C. HAMMERICH

NORTHAMPTON — The Boston Symphony Orchestra came into John M. Greene Hall of Smith College Thursday night with a guest conductor from England, Colin Davis, 42, the highly touted, youthful leader of the BBC Symphony Orchestra in London.

Interesting Music

He offered a program that began with Hydn's 99th Symphony and ended with Brahms's Third. In the middle was, now that the aforementioned are so well known, the most interesting music on the program, Symphony No. 1 by Richard Rodney Bennett, 32, also of England.

It was the first performance of the symphony by the orchestra, but it is scheduled to be repeated with the rest of the program in Boston tonight, Saturday and Tuesday with Davis still on the podium.

It is a volatile, acrid piece with the full range of dissonance and discord we have reason to expect from a piece composed in 1965.

Three Movements

There are three movements. The first is largely an angular, coarsely woven mesh of lightning shots and thunderbolts. The second uses long, densely chromatic, shimmering chords that are sometimes lightly wafted behind a thin flute or violin solo and sometimes thick and shrill.

The third returns to the prickly, eccentric texture of the first movement but has a somewhat lighter, less thrusting power, although is no less tertering on the edge of apparent chaos.

It was variable and volatile enough Thursday night to be interesting most of the time, and certainly was infinitely more colorful than the Haydn and Brahms that preceded and followed it.

But, of course, they are not intended to be colorful. Davis' view of the Haydn symphony Thursday was squarely cut with strongly rhythmic accents. The adagio second movement displayed a bit of classical grace, but overall, the work was a bit more ponderous than is usual with Haydn's symphonies.

Cooler Than Expected

The Brahms symphony started off cooler than expected, somewhat without inner spirit. It warmed during the second and third movements and became a good, serviceable portrayal of that composer's style in the modern manner, which is to say, with full and precise sonority, silky strings but without emotional exaggeration.

Davis is a handsome fellow with closely cropped hair and an athletic stance. He is immensely popular in England, delivers his signals to the orchestra with widely sweeping gestures, mostly with the right arm, and maintains a tight rein on the pace.

It was reported reliably a year or so ago that he was offered the permament conductorship of the Boston orchestra and turned it down for two reasons—he was already committed for three years of contracts and he feels, as several other young conductors do, that the music director's job in Boston and Tanglewood is too big.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424

OCT 25 '68 New England

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL OPEN CONCERT COURSE AT SMITH COLLEGE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of guest conductor Colin Davis of London's BBC Orchestra, will open the Smith College Concert Course, October 24 at 8:15 p.m.

Featured on the program will be the First Symphony by English composer Richard Rodney Bennett, Haydn's Symphony No. 99 in E flat and Brahms' Symphony No. 3 in F Opus 90. The concert will be in John M. Greene Hall. Tickets are available through the music department, Sage Hall.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
CIRC. 26,950

OCT 1 8 1968 New England

FIRST PROGRAM
Tuesday evening October 29 at 8.30

COLIN DAVIS conductor

HAYDN — Symphony no. 99 in E flat
Adagio – vivace assai
Adagio
Menuetto – trio: allegretto
Vivace

BENNETT — Symphony no. 1 (1965)
Allegro
Andante
Molto vivace

intermission

BRAHMS — Symphony no. 3 in F op. 90*
Allegro con brio
Andante
Poco allegretto
Allegro

THE CONDUCTOR

COLIN DAVIS, Conductor of the BBC Symphony Orchestra since September 1967, was born in England. After studies at the Royal College of Music he became a professional clarinetist. National service in the Household Cavalry was followed by his first conducting engagements with the Kalmar Orchestra and the Chelsea Opera Group. His opera performances and guest appearances with English orchestras gradually brought him to the attention of the musical world.

He had been Assistant Conductor of the BBC Scottish Orchestra for two years when he was called to the Royal Festival Hall in 1959 to deputise for Otto Klemperer in a concert performance of Don Giovanni. This marked a turning point in his career: he was appointed Musical Director of the Sadler's Wells Opera Company the following year, conducted Die Zauberflöte at Glyndebourne in place of the ailing Sir Thomas Beecham, and began conducting the major London orchestras regularly, as well as opera at Sadler's Wells, and both ballet and opera at Covent Garden.

He conducted in Canada, the United States and in Russia, directed the first German performance of Britten's War Requiem with the Berlin Philharmonic, and shared the podium with Solti and Kertesz on the 1964 world tour of the London Symphony Orchestra.

Colin Davis is now a regular visitor to America. Apart from his appearances in Boston, he has conducted the Orchestras in Philadelphia, Montreal, Toronto, Los Angeles and at the Metropolitan Opera. Later this season he will conduct Peter Grimes and Wozzeck at the Metropolitan, and spend four weeks with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

FIFTH PROGRAM
Friday afternoon November 1 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening November 2 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BACH — 'Wedding' Cantata no. 202 for soprano 'Weichet nur, betrübte Schatten' (Vanish, gloomy shadows)

Aria: Weichet nur, betrübte Schatten
Recitative: Die Welt wird wieder neu
Aria: Phöbus eilt mit schnellen Pferden
Recitative: D'rum sucht auch Amor sein Vergnügen
Aria: Wenn die Frühlings lüfte streichen
Recitative: Und dieses ist das Glücke
Aria: Sich üben im Lieben
Recitative: So sei das Band der keuschen Liebe
Gavotte: Sehet in Zufriedenheit

SARAMAE ENDICH soprano
JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN violin
CHARLES WILSON harpsichord continuo
HENRY PORTNOI double bass continuo
RALPH GOMBERG oboe
JULES ESKIN cello continuo
SHERMAN WALT bassoon continuo

intermission

BRAHMS — Ein deutsches Requiem op. 45

Chorus: Selig sind, die da Leid tragen
Chorus: Denn alles Fleisch es ist wie Gras
Baritone and chorus: Herr, lehre doch mich, dass ein Ende
Chorus: Wie lieblich sind deine Wohnungen
Soprano and chorus: Ihr habt nun Traurigkeit
Baritone and chorus: Denn wir haben hie keine bleibende Statt
Chorus: Selig sind die Toten

SARAMAE ENDICH soprano DAVID CLATWORTHY baritone
NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY CHORUS
LORNA COOKE de VARON conductor

The Symphony

German Requiem Inspires Awe

By McLAREN HARRIS

Every now and then a discussion arises about a rather small circle of choral works from the standard repertoire which appears to rotate in performance among various Greater Boston musical organizations. Brahms' German Requiem is one from this circle to receive frequent exposure; yet I know of few other works which are as welcome.

The German Requiem, performed yesterday by the Boston Symphony, New England Conservatory Chorus, soprano Saramae Endich and baritone David Clatworthy, is a work which inspires almost universal awe because of the utter absence of overstatement in spite of a great emotional content bound within its forms, because of the expressive power which surges through its entire substance, not on its surface.

THE WORK HAS UNDERGONE countless theological analyses, in light of the text's lack of references to any Christian dogma, by persons interested in probing the composer's beliefs. But what concerns us musically is that the German Requiem is the antithesis of the thunder-and-lightning drama of Verdi's Requiem, for example, as well as of most of the traditional ideas about death.

This is a humanly oriented creation; except perhaps for the ethereal, darkly spacious passages beginning the second movement, "Denn alles Fleisch es ist wie Gras," there is nothing supernatural about its character, nothing fearsome in either its textual excerpts or musical climaxes. Its contrapuntal fabric is woven with a myriad of instrumental and vocal elements which build pillars of majesty around words of gladness and joy, which move in gentle undercurrents beneath a serenely sustained surface.

Brahms' Requiem holds strength in every quarter, and difficulty as well. Internal considerations of clarity pose great problems. If voices predominate, instrumental figures are lost; if instruments are brought out, choral diction becomes even more obscure than it already is. The forces were on approximately even terms yesterday, but the problem remained largely unsolved because many sections were just too loud, as at the beginning of the final movement when the soaring choral soprano line actually caused ringing in the ears.

THE OVERALL SHAPE of the work remained strong in Leinsdorf's grasp. He chose tempos well, although the fugue, "Herr, du bist wuerdig," concluding the sixth movement sounded a bit hasty, and there were numerous instrumental and vocal touches which enhanced the texture, such as the emergence of the horns in the great crescendo of "Denn alles Fleisch" and the note-separation at "nach den Vorhoefen" in the tender fourth section.

However, some sagging individual efforts spoiled a good part of its success. The general coordination of ensemble bespoke a trifle of unpreparedness, and woodwind intonation was never satisfactory, even causing stinging discords a time or two. Baritone Clatworthy, however pleasant his vocal quality, went over his text with no more consideration than a railroad engine shows for the track underneath it.

The conservatory singers sang well in their individual sections and with acceptable diction, though their accumulate tone was somewhat undefined. Miss Endich's solo work in "Ihr habt nun Trauerrigkeit" was secure in range and essentially in phrasing, but the vibrato was inclined to add weight where lightness was called for.

BACH'S "WEDDING CANTATA 202 was the program's other work, was another repeat from the Tanglewood season, giving Miss Endich opportunity to display her prowess with contrapuntal lines. This thoroughly cheerful work, which concludes with a short gavotte to correspond with the chorale in a sacred cantata, was done with an appropriately miniature ensemble of about a dozen players. The solo efforts, especially Ralph Gomberg's oboe and Charles Wilson's harpsichord realizations, were fine all around. Again Miss Endich's vibrato appeared to impede her agility, but her securely-focused quality held its strength in all registers.

Next week Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Kurt Weill's suite from "Kleine Dreigroschenmusik," Schoenberg's Kammersymphonie, Op. 9b, Stravinsky's "Chant du Rossignol" and Rachmannioff's Paganini Rhapsody with Leonard Pennario as piano soloist.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
NOV 2 1968 New England Newsclip

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150
NOV 4 1968 New England

BSO: young Brahms's message

By Allan Sly

ARTS ENTERTAINMENT

The Boston Symphony's presentation of the Brahms Requiem this week did many things. It showed the New England Conservatory Chorus to be among the very finest; it showed Erich Leinsdorf to be without peer as a conductor of chorus and orchestra together; it exemplified Alec Robertson's description of the work (in an unusually copious program note) as a choral symphony; and it showed the young Brahms infused with a great message for all of us.

The artful contrivances of the Third Symphony, heard last week, were forgotten as the less self-conscious complexities of this score were followed, and instead of the later work's urbanity and fashionable Weltschmerz ("universal anguish"), a keen personal involvement with some of life's most intimate and enduring challenges was felt.

For this we have Mr. Leinsdorf to thank; he handled the varied forces like a great general in a successful campaign. The enormous chorus and the full Boston Symphony achieved a fusion of tone, an elasticity, that beyond being beautiful in themselves became ideal vehicles for what Mr. Leinsdorf perceives to be the Requiem's essential character—an endorsement, a renewal, of some great moments from man's experience as he tries to grow in knowledge and wisdom. (The music of the romantic composers often enthralls the listener in this way; indeed this may be why choral and orchestral music has become such a compelling facet of our culture.)

Mr. Leinsdorf's Brahms was shaped leanly, yet in glowing colors; with animation but without haste; with breadth but with transparency. The brass, at times almost Wagnerian in its proclamations, remained always warm and round. The strings played with penetrating intensity, while all seemed in ideal ensemble with the voices, whose contribution matched the orchestra's in sensitivity and conviction.

Eloquent tenors

This brings us to Mrs. Lorna Cooke de Varon's superb achievement, the present New England Conservatory Chorus. Large enough to assure continuity in spite of the inevitable annual turnover, it displays a large and eloquent tenor section, virile basses, brilliant sopranos. The altos match them in numbers and expressivity, though one misses the true contralto quality, evidently a rarity nowadays. Together these young singers can do anything that is asked for, and Mr. Leinsdorf's demands ranged over a wide spectrum of dynamics, color, text enunciation, the shaping of phrases, and timing. His approach does not seem to be subjective, but the result is entirely so, and all the better for it.

Delectable cantata

David Clatworthy was a superb baritone soloist, and Saramae Endich, stationed farther back nearer the chorus, added an extra dimension to "Ich will euch trösten." Luther's text came through clearly, not least from the chorus. Mr. Leinsdorf threw us into No. 5, and again into No. 6, with little breathing space after what preceded in each case. This proved most effective, tightening up the symphonic unity pointed out by Mr. Robertson, and also perhaps forestalling or at least minimizing a hint of chorus fatigue that made those later numbers not quite as transcendent as the earlier ones — or was the audience itself tiring? A substantial part of the Friday afternoon audience noticeably failed to support Mr. Leinsdorf's entries for each half of the program, and similarly neglected to greet Mrs. de Varon as she deserved.

The delectable Bach Wedding Cantata, No. 202, which served as a short first half, raised the question of whether the format of the BSO series in Symphony Hall is quite the right setting for works of chamber proportions, or whether perhaps this discrepancy is overriden by the thought that many patrons would not otherwise experience such delicious side dishes. At any rate it prepared the palate for the rich fare that followed, and gave us further evidence of the artistry of both Miss Endich and six of the BSO's many renowned soloists.

Symphony to Perform Brahms Requiem, Nov. 1,2

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will perform the Brahms Requiem, joined by Saramae Endich, soprano, David Clatworthy, baritone, as soloists, and the New England Conservatory Chorus, directed by Lorna Cooke de Varon. Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director of the Orchestra, will conduct. The performances are Nov. 1 and 2, the fourth program of the 1968-69 Friday-Saturday series.

The Brahms Requiem was last performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this past summer as part of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood. In a review headlined "Brahms' Requiem -- astonishing in its force," the Boston Globe's Michael Steinberg wrote that the performance was "an occasion for astonishment . . . one that deeply moved me . . . The performance was superbly paced . . . and there were moments of burning intensity."

The program will open with Saramae Endich as soloist in Bach's Cantata no. 202, known as the "Wedding Cantata," conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf. The instrumental solos will be played by Joseph Silverstein and Ralph Gomberg, the Orchestra's Concertmaster and first oboist respectively.

LEDGER-TIMES
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY C[illegible]0,000
OCT 31 1968 New [illegible]

CITIZEN ITEM
ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,600
OCT 31 1968 New England

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3,450
OCT 31 1968 New England Newsclip

Soloists with the Symphony

Soprano Saramae Endich and baritone David Clatworthy will appear as asoloists with the Boston Symphony in performances of Brahms' "A German Requiem." Miss Endich also will sing in Bach's "Wedding Cantata" on the same program.

The B.S.O. program will take place in Symphony Hall Friday at 2 and Saturday at 8:30, Erich Leinsdorf conducting.

This Tuesday at 8:30 guest conductor Colin Davis's program will include Brahms' Symphony No. 3, Bennett's Symphony No. 1 and Haydn's Symphony No. 99.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905
OCT 27 1968 New England

SARAMAE ENDICH will be the soprano soloist in next weekend's performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Brahms' German Requiem with the New England Conservatory Chorus.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436
OCT 27 1968 New England

Brahms' Epic Slated Friday On WAMC

Brahms' great German Requiem will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday in a concert to be heard on radio station WAMC-FM (90.3 mc.) beginning at 2 p.m.

Broadcast "live from Boston's Symphony Hall, the oratorio will be conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. Joining the orchestra for this performance will be the New England Conservatory Chorus and soloists Saramae Endich, soprano, and David Clatworthy, baritone.

SCHENECTADY GAZETTE
Monday, October 28, 1968

Brahms Requiem Planned by BSO

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will perform the Brahms Requiem, with Saramae Endich, soprano, David Clatworthy, baritone, and the New England Conservatory Chorus this Friday and Saturday. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct.

The program will open with Saramae Endich as soloist in Bach's Cantata 202, known as the "Wedding Cantata."

On Tuesday evening, Colin Davis will open the "Cambridge" series of six Tuesday-evening concerts with an all-orchestral program consisting of works of Haydn, Richard Rodney Bennett, and Brahms.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436
OCT 27 1968 New England Newsclip

FIFTH PROGRAM
Friday afternoon November 1 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening November 2 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BACH — 'Wedding' Cantata no. 202 for soprano 'Weichet nur, betrübte Schatten' (Vanish, gloomy shadows)

Aria: Weichet nur, betrübte Schatten
Recitative: Die Welt wird wieder neu
Aria: Phöbus eilt mit schnellen Pferden
Recitative: D'rum sucht auch Amor sein Vergnügen
Aria: Wenn die Frühlings lüfte streichen
Recitative: Und dieses ist das Glücke
Aria: Sich üben im Lieben
Recitative: So sei das Band der keuschen Liebe
Gavotte: Sehet in Zufriedenheit

SARAMAE ENDICH soprano
JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN violin
CHARLES WILSON harpsichord continuo
HENRY PORTNOI double bass continuo
RALPH GOMBERG oboe
JULES ESKIN cello continuo
SHERMAN WALT bassoon continuo

intermission

BRAHMS — Ein deutsches Requiem op. 45

Chorus: Selig sind, die da Leid tragen
Chorus: Denn alles Fleisch es ist wie Gras
Baritone and chorus: Herr, lehre doch mich, dass ein Ende
Chorus: Wie lieblich sind deine Wohnungen
Soprano and chorus: Ihr habt nun Traurigkeit
Baritone and chorus: Denn wir haben hie keine bleibende Statt
Chorus: Selig sind die Toten

SARAMAE ENDICH soprano
DAVID CLATWORTHY baritone
NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY CHORUS
LORNA COOKE de VARON conductor

Symphony to Perform Brahms Requiem, Nov. 1,2

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will perform the Brahms Requiem, joined by Saramae Endich, soprano, David Clatworthy, baritone, as soloists, and the New England Conservatory Chorus, directed by Lorna Cooke de Varon. Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director of the Orchestra, will conduct. The performances are Nov. 1 and 2, the fourth program of the 1968-69 Friday-Saturday series.

The Brahms Requiem was last performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this past summer as part of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood. In a review headlined "Brahms' Requiem -- astonishing in its force," the Boston Globe's Michael Steinberg wrote that the performance was "an occasion for astonishment . . .one that deeply moved me . . . The performance was superbly paced . . .and there were moments of burning intensity."

The program will open with Saramae Endich as soloist in Bach's Cantata no. 202, known as the "Wedding Cantata," conducted by Mr. Leinsdorf. The instrumental solos will be played by Joseph Silverstein and Ralph Gomberg, the Orchestra's Concertmaster and first oboist respectively.

LEDGER-TIMES
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY C[illegible] 0,000
OCT 31 1968 New

CITIZEN ITEM
ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. [illegible]
OCT 31 1968 New England

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3,[illegible]50
OCT 31 1968 New England Newsclip

The Symphony

German Requiem Inspires Awe

By McLAREN HARRIS

Every now and then a discussion arises about a rather small circle of choral works from the standard repertoire which appears to rotate in performance among various Greater Boston musical organizations. Brahms' German Requiem is one from this circle to receive frequent exposure; yet I know of few other works which are as welcome.

The German Requiem, performed yesterday by the Boston Symphony, New England Conservatory Chorus, soprano Saramae Endich and baritone David Clatworthy, is a work which inspires almost universal awe because of the utter absence of overstatement in spite of a great emotional content bound within its forms, because of the expressive power which surges through its entire substance, not on its surface.

THE WORK HAS UNDERGONE countless theological analyses, in light of the text's lack of references to any Christian dogma, by persons interested in probing the composer's beliefs. But what concerns us musically is that the German Requiem is the antithesis of the thunder-and-lightning drama of Verdi's Requiem, for example, as well as of most of the traditional ideas about death.

This is a humanly oriented creation; except perhaps for the ethereal, darkly spacious passages beginning the second movement, "Denn alles Fleisch es ist wie Gras," there is nothing supernatural about its character, nothing fearsome in either its textual excerpts or musical climaxes. Its contrapuntal fabric is woven with a myriad of instrumental and vocal elements which build pillars of majesty around words of gladness and joy, which move in gentle undercurrents beneath a serenely sustained surface.

Brahms' Requiem holds strength in every quarter, and difficulty as well. Internal considerations of clarity pose great problems. If voices predominate, instrumental figures are lost; if instruments are brought out, choral diction becomes even more obscure than it already is. The forces were on approximately even terms yesterday, but the problem remained largely unsolved because many sections were just too loud, as at the beginning of the final movement when the soaring choral soprano line actually caused ringing in the ears.

THE OVERALL SHAPE of the work remained strong in Leinsdorf's grasp. He chose tempos well, although the fugue, "Herr, du bist wuerdig," concluding the sixth movement sounded a bit hasty, and there were numerous instrumental and vocal touches which enhanced the texture, such as the emergence of the horns in the great crescendo of "Denn alles Fleisch" and the note-separation at "nach den Vorhoefen" in the tender fourth section.

However, some sagging individual efforts spoiled a good part of its success. The general coordination of ensemble bespoke a trifle of unpreparedness, and woodwind intonation was never satisfactory, even causing stinging discords a time or two. Baritone Clatworthy, however pleasant his vocal quality, went over his text with no more consideration than a railroad engine shows for the track underneath it.

The conservatory singers sang well in their individual sections and with acceptable diction, though their accumulate tone was somewhat undefined. Miss Endich's solo work in "Ihr habt nun Trauerrigkeit" was secure in range and essentially in phrasing, but the vibrato was inclined to add weight where lightness was called for.

BACH'S "WEDDING CANTATA 202 was the program's other work, was another repeat from the Tanglewood season, giving Miss Endich opportunity to display her prowess with contrapuntal lines. This thoroughly cheerful work, which concludes with a short gavotte to correspond with the chorale in a sacred cantata, was done with an appropriately miniature ensemble of about a dozen players. The solo efforts, especially Ralph Gomberg's oboe and Charles Wilson's harpsichord realizations, were fine all around. Again Miss Endich's vibrato appeared to impede her agility, but her securely-focused quality held its strength in all registers.

Next week Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Kurt Weill's suite from "Kleine Dreigroschenmusik," Schoenberg's Kammersymphonie, Op. 9b, Stravinsky's "Chant du Rossignol" and Rachmannioff's Paganini Rhapsody with Leonard Pennario as piano soloist.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150
NOV 4 1968 New England

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
NOV 2 1968 New England Newsclip

BSO: young Brahms's message

By Allan Sly

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

The Boston Symphony's presentation of the Brahms Requiem this week did many things. It showed the New England Conservatory Chorus to be among the very finest; it showed Erich Leinsdorf to be without peer as a conductor of chorus and orchestra together; it exemplified Alec Robertson's description of the work (in an unusually copious program note) as a choral symphony; and it showed the young Brahms infused with a great message for all of us.

The artful contrivances of the Third Symphony, heard last week, were forgotten as the less self-conscious complexities of this score were followed, and instead of the later work's urbanity and fashionable Weltschmerz ("universal anguish"), a keen personal involvement with some of life's most intimate and enduring challenges was felt.

For this we have Mr. Leinsdorf to thank; he handled the varied forces like a great general in a successful campaign. The enormous chorus and the full Boston Symphony achieved a fusion of tone, an elasticity, that beyond being beautiful in themselves became ideal vehicles for what Mr. Leinsdorf perceives to be the Requiem's essential character—an endorsement, a renewal, of some great moments from man's experience as he tries to grow in knowledge and wisdom. (The music of the romantic composers often enthralls the listener in this way; indeed this may be why choral and orchestral music has become such a compelling facet of our culture.)

Mr. Leinsdorf's Brahms was shaped leanly, yet in glowing colors; with animation but without haste; with breadth but with transparency. The brass, at times almost Wagnerian in its proclamations, remained always warm and round. The strings played with penetrating intensity, while all seemed in ideal ensemble with the voices, whose contribution matched the orchestra's in sensitivity and conviction.

Eloquent tenors

This brings us to Mrs. Lorna Cooke de Varon's superb achievement, the present New England Conservatory Chorus. Large enough to assure continuity in spite of the inevitable annual turnover, it displays a large and eloquent tenor section, virile basses, brilliant sopranos. The altos match them in numbers and expressivity, though one misses the true contralto quality, evidently a rarity nowadays. Together these young singers can do anything that is asked for, and Mr. Leinsdorf's demands ranged over a wide spectrum of dynamics, color, text enunciation, the shaping of phrases, and timing. His approach does not seem to be subjective, but the result is entirely so, and all the better for it.

Delectable cantata

David Clatworthy was a superb baritone soloist, and Saramae Endich, stationed farther back nearer the chorus, added an extra dimension to "Ich will euch trösten." Luther's text came through clearly, not least from the chorus. Mr. Leinsdorf threw us into No. 5, and again into No. 6, with little breathing space after what preceded in each case. This proved most effective, tightening up the symphonic unity pointed out by Mr. Robertson, and also perhaps forestalling or at least minimizing a hint of chorus fatigue that made those later numbers not quite as transcendent as the earlier ones — or was the audience itself tiring? A substantial part of the Friday afternoon audience noticeably failed to support Mr. Leinsdorf's entries for each half of the program, and similarly neglected to greet Mrs. de Varon as she deserved.

The delectable Bach Wedding Cantata, No. 202, which served as a short first half, raised the question of whether the format of the BSO series in Symphony Hall is quite the right setting for works of chamber proportions, or whether perhaps this discrepancy is overriden by the thought that many patrons would not otherwise experience such delicious side dishes. At any rate it prepared the palate for the rich fare that followed, and gave us further evidence of the artistry of both Miss Endich and six of the BSO's many renowned soloists.

Soloists with the Symphony

Soprano Saramae Endich and baritone David Clatworthy will appear as asoloists with the Boston Symphony in performances of Brahms' "A German Requiem." Miss Endich also will sing in Bach's "Wedding Cantata" on the same program.

The B.S.O. program will take place in Symphony Hall Friday at 2 and Saturday at 8:30, Erich Leinsdorf conducting.

This Tuesday at 8:30 guest conductor Colin Davis's program will include Brahms' Symphony No. 3, Bennett's Symphony No. 1 and Haydn's Symphony No. 99.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905
SEP 27 1968 New England

SARAMAE ENDICH will be the soprano soloist in next weekend's performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Brahms' German Requiem with the New England Conservatory Chorus.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436
SEP 27 1968 New England

Brahms' Epic Slated Friday On WAMC

Brahms' great German Requiem will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday in a concert to be heard on radio station WAMC-FM (90.3 mc.) beginning at 2 p.m.

Broadcast "live from Boston's Symphony Hall, the oratorio will be conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. Joining the orchestra for this performance will be the New England Conservatory Chorus and soloists Saramae Endich, soprano, and David Clatworthy, baritone.

SCHENECTADY GAZETTE
Monday, October 28, 1968

Brahms Requiem Planned by BSO

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will perform the Brahms Requiem, with Saramae Endich, soprano, David Clatworthy, baritone, and the New England Conservatory Chorus this Friday and Saturday. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct.

The program will open with Saramae Endich as soloist in Bach's Cantata 202, known as the "Wedding Cantata."

On Tuesday evening, Colin Davis will open the "Cambridge" series of six Tuesday-evening concerts with an all-orchestral program consisting of works of Haydn, Richard Rodney Bennett, and Brahms.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436
SEP 27 1968 New England Newsclip

SECOND PROGRAM
Tuesday evening November 5 at 7.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BACH — 'Wedding' Cantata no. 202 for soprano 'Weichet nur, betrübte Schatten' (Vanish, gloomy shadows)

Aria: Weichet nur, betrübte Schatten
Recitative: Die Welt wird wieder neu
Aria: Phöbus eilt mit schnellen Pferden
Recitative: D'rum sucht auch Amor sein Vergnügen
Aria: Wenn die Frühlings lüfte streichen
Recitative: Und dieses ist das Glücke
Aria: Sich üben im Lieben
Recitative: So sei das Band der keuschen Liebe
Gavotte: Sehet in Zufriedenheit

SARAMAE ENDICH soprano
JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN violin
CHARLES WILSON harpsichord continuo
HENRY PORTNOI double bass continuo
RALPH GOMBERG oboe
JULES ESKIN cello continuo
SHERMAN WALT bassoon continuo

intermission

BRAHMS — Ein deutsches Requiem op. 45

Chorus: Selig sind, die da Leid tragen
Chorus: Denn alles Fleisch es ist wie Gras
Baritone and chorus: Herr, lehre doch mich, dass ein Ende
Chorus: Wie lieblich sind deine Wohnungen
Soprano and chorus: Ihr habt nun Traurigkeit
Baritone and chorus: Denn wir haben hie keine bleibende Statt
Chorus: Selig sind die Toten

SARAMAE ENDICH soprano DAVID CLATWORTHY baritone
NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY CHORUS
LORNA COOKE de VARON conductor

SOLOISTS AT NEXT week's Friday and Saturday concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be Claude Frank, pianist and Felix Viscuglia, a member of the Symphony. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct. Claude Frank who has appeared with outstanding success locally will play the Piano Concerto in B flat, K. 595, by Mozart. Mr. Viscuglia will be heard in the Rhapsody for Saxophone and Orchestra.

On Tuesday evening, in the Cambridge Series, the Orchestra assisted by the New England Conservatory Chorus, Lorna Cooke DeVaron, director, and assisted by Saramae Endich, soprano and David Clatworthy, baritone, will offer Bach's "Wedding Cantata No. 202, and Ein deutches Requiem Op. 45. Miss Terry Schlegel, soprano, a student at the Conservatory, and formerly of this city, will appear with the chorus.

SUN (e)
LOWELL, MASS.
CIRC. 47,948
NOV 23 1968
New England Newsclip

TUESDAY B SERIES

THURSDAY A SERIES

Charles Munch rose to the challenge of replacing a great conductor of a great orchestra.

From the Sun Record Call of Jan. 12, '69
Article on p. 183 in this book

EIGHTY-EIGHTH SEASON 1968-1969

FIRST PROGRAM
Thursday evening November 7 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

IN MEMORY OF CHARLES MUNCH

FAURE — 'The death of Mélisande' from the incidental music to 'Pelléas et Mélisande' op. 80

The audience is asked not to applaud after this piece

BRAHMS — Symphony no. 4 in E minor op. 98*

Allegro non troppo
Andante moderato
Allegro giocoso
Allegro energico e passionato

intermission

STRAVINSKY — Le sacre du printemps (The rite of spring)

Part one: The adoration of the earth

Introduction – Auguries of spring (Dances of the young girls) – Mock abduction – spring Khorovod (Round dance) – Games of the rival clans – Procession of the wise elder – Adoration of the earth (wise elder) – Dance of the earth

Part two: The sacrifice

Introduction – Mystical circles of the young girls – Glorification of the chosen victim – The summoning of the ancients – Ritual of the ancients – Sacrificial dance (the chosen victim)

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA RECORDS*

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
CIRC. 26,950
NOV 11 1968
New England

"I am a conductor . . ."

He was known as "Le Beau Charles," he took the Boston Symphony on three international tours, he gathered, in his 13 years with the orchestra, music's highest awards. When he died last Tuesday, Charles Munch was recognized as one of the most sensitive interpreters of the world's greatest music.

On Wednesday the strains of Gabriel Faure's "The Death of Melisande" echoed in Boston's Symphony Hall. The music of Faure's play "Pelleas Melisande" had long been a favorite of Munch's. A saddened Eric Leinsdorf opened the evening performance with the only fitting tribute to a great man.

Charles Munch wrote a book which was called "I Am A Conductor." He was. He was one of the finest. The world of music is poorer for his passing; richer for the memorable music he gave it.

10.

SECOND PROGRAM
Tuesday evening November 5 at 7.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BACH — 'Wedding' Cantata no. 202 for soprano 'We chet nur, betrübte Schatten' (Vanish, gloom shadows)

Aria: Weichet nur, betrübte Schatten
Recitative: Die Welt wird wieder neu
Aria: Phöbus eilt mit schnellen Pferden
Recitative: D'rum sucht auch Amor sein Vergnüger
Aria: Wenn die Frühlings lüfte streichen
Recitative: Und dieses ist das Glücke
Aria: Sich üben im Lieben
Recitative: So sei das Band der keuschen Liebe
Gavotte: Sehet in Zufriedenheit

SARAMAE ENDICH soprano
JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN violin
CHARLES WILSON harpsichord continuo
HENRY PORTNOI double bass continuo
RALPH GOMBERG oboe
JULES ESKIN cello contin
SHERMAN WALT bassoon contin

intermission

BRAHMS — Ein deutsches Requiem op. 45

Chorus: Selig sind, die da Leid tragen
Chorus: Denn alles Fleisch es ist wie Gras
Baritone and chorus: Herr, lehre doch mich, dass ein Ende
Chorus: Wie lieblich sind deine Wohnungen
Soprano and chorus: Ihr habt nun Traurigkeit
Baritone and chorus: Denn wir haben hie keine bleibende Statt
Chorus: Selig sind die Toten

SARAMAE ENDICH soprano
DAVID CLATWORTHY barit
NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY CHORUS
LORNA COOKE de VARON conductor

SOLOISTS AT NEXT week's Friday and Saturday concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be Claude Frank, pianist and Felix Viscuglia, a member of the Symphony. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct. Claude Frank who has appeared with outstanding success locally will play the Piano Concerto in B flat, K. 595, by Mozart. Mr. Viscuglia will be heard in the Rhapsody for Saxophone and Orchestra.

On Tuesday evening, in the Cambridge Series, the Orchestra assisted by the New England Conservatory Chorus, Lorna Cooke DeVaron, director, and assisted by Saramae Endich, soprano and David Clatworthy, baritone, will offer Bach's "Wedding Cantata No. 202, and Ein deutches Requiem Op. 45. Miss Terry Schlegel, soprano, a student at the Conservatory, and formerly of this city, will appear with the chorus.

SUN (e)
LOWELL, MASS.
CIRC. 47,948
NOV 23 1968
New England Newsclip

CHARLES MUNCH
September 26 1891 – November 6 1968

Charles Munch, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1949 to 1962, died peacefully in his sleep in the early morning of November 6 1968 at Richmond, Virginia. He had conducted the Orchestre de Paris, of which he was conductor and music director, in a concert at Raleigh, North Carolina, two days earlier.

Born in Strasbourg, he came from a distinguished musical family. His father was his first violin teacher and with his three brothers and two sisters he spent much time during his childhood making music. He contemplated a medical career, and went at the age of twenty-one to study in Paris. But he was soon devoting his time to the violin. After service in the first world war, he resumed his career as a student of Carl Flesch in Berlin and as concertmaster of the Strasbourg Orchestra. He moved to Leipzig, where he spent eight years in the first desk of the violins in the Gewandhaus Orchestra under Wilhelm Furtwängler and Bruno Walter.

In 1932 Charles Munch settled in Paris, and began his conducting career. He founded the Orchestre Symphonique de Paris and conducted the Lamoureux Concerts. Engagements as guest conductor in other cities soon followed. In 1937 he became conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra. His first visit to the United States was in 1946; he conducted the Boston Symphony on December 27 and in the following month made the first of his many appearances with the New York Philharmonic.

In the spring of 1948 Charles Munch was engaged to succeed Serge Koussevitzky as Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his tenure to begin with the 1949-50 season. Meanwhile, in the autumn of 1948, he toured throughout the United States with the Orchestre National de la Radiodiffusion Française, of which he was conductor.

During his years with the Boston Symphony, Charles Munch led the Orchestra on its first tour of Europe, in May 1952, which opened in Paris, and included his birthplace Strasbourg. In the spring of the following year he and the Orchestra toured to the West Coast. The second European tour, in 1956, took the Orchestra to Moscow and Leningrad; this was the first visit of a western orchestra to the USSR. Four years later Charles Munch introduced the Orchestra to Japan and other Far Eastern countries.

After his retirement from the Boston Symphony in 1962 he returned each season as one of the Orchestra's guest conductors. During 1967 he was appointed conductor of the newly founded Orchestre de Paris, the first French orchestra to be fully subsidized by the State, which made its debut at the Théâtre des Champs-Elysées on November 14 of last year. The concert was by all accounts a great occasion, and already during the last twelve months the Orchestra's high standard of playing under Charles Munch had begun to galvanize France's concert life.

In 1933 Charles Munch married Geneviève Maury, a distinguished author and translator. Mme Munch died in 1956. He was made a Commander in the Legion of Honor by the French government in 1945. During his last years Charles Munch lived in a beautiful eighteenth century house near Versailles.

On October 23 last he led a concert by the Orchestre de Paris in Symphony Hall, Boston, when he conducted Debussy's La mer, Medea's meditation and dance of vengeance by Samuel Barber and the Symphony no. 1 in C minor of Brahms.

Charles Munch expressed a wish to members of the Orchestra on several occasions that 'The death of Mélisande' from the incidental music to Pelléas et Mélisande by Fauré should be played to commemorate his death, when the time came. He was a man who instilled love and loyalty in all the people who shared his devotion to music, players and audiences alike. His own devotion is perhaps best summed up in his own words: 'Music is the art of expressing the inexpressible. It rises far above what words can mean or the intelligence define. Its domain is the imponderable and impalpable land of the unconscious. Man's right to speak this language is for me the most precious gift that heaven has bestowed on us.'

Charles Munch rose to the challenge of replacing a great conductor of a great orchestra.

From the Sun. Record Call of Jan. 12, '69 Article on p. 183 in this book

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
CIRC. 26,950
NOV 11 1968
New England

"I am a conductor . . ."

He was known as "Le Beau Charles," he took the Boston Symphony on three international tours, he gathered, in his 13 years with the orchestra, music's highest awards. When he died last Tuesday, Charles Munch was recognized as one of the most sensitive interpreters of the world's greatest music.

On Wednesday the strains of Gabriel Faure's "The Death of Melisande" echoed in Boston's Symphony Hall. The music of Faure's play "Pelleas Melisande" had long been a favorite of Munch's. A saddened Eric Leinsdorf opened the evening performance with the only fitting tribute to a great man.

Charles Munch wrote a book which was called "I Am A Conductor." He was. He was one of the finest. The world of music is poorer for his passing; richer for the memorable music he gave it.

10.

SECOND PROGRAM
Tuesday evening November 5 at 7.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BACH — 'Wedding' Cantata no. 202 for soprano 'Weichet nur, betrübte Schatten' (Vanish, gloomy shadows)

Aria: Weichet nur, betrübte Schatten
Recitative: Die Welt wird wieder neu
Aria: Phöbus eilt mit schnellen Pferden
Recitative: D'rum sucht auch Amor sein Vergnügen
Aria: Wenn die Frühlings lüfte streichen
Recitative: Und dieses ist das Glücke
Aria: Sich üben im Lieben
Recitative: So sei das Band der keuschen Liebe
Gavotte: Sehet in Zufriedenheit

SARAMAE ENDICH soprano
JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN violin
CHARLES WILSON harpsichord continuo
HENRY PORTNOI double bass continuo
RALPH GOMBERG oboe
JULES ESKIN cello continuo
SHERMAN WALT bassoon continuo

intermission

BRAHMS — Ein deutsches Requiem op. 45

Chorus: Selig sind, die da Leid tragen
Chorus: Denn alles Fleisch es ist wie Gras
Baritone and chorus: Herr, lehre doch mich, dass ein Ende
Chorus: Wie lieblich sind deine Wohnungen
Soprano and chorus: Ihr habt nun Traurigkeit
Baritone and chorus: Denn wir haben hie keine bleibende Statt
Chorus: Selig sind die Toten

SARAMAE ENDICH soprano
DAVID CLATWORTHY baritone
NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY CHORUS
LORNA COOKE de VARON conductor

SOLOISTS AT NEXT week's Friday and Saturday concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be Claude Frank, pianist and Felix Viscuglia, a member of the Symphony. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct. Claude Frank who has appeared with outstanding success locally will play the Piano Concerto in B flat, K. 595, by Mozart. Mr. Viscuglia will be heard in the Rhapsody for Saxophone and Orchestra.

On Tuesday evening, in the Cambridge Series, the Orchestra assisted by the New England Conservatory Chorus, Lorna Cooke DeVaron, director, and assisted by Saramae Endich, soprano and David Clatworthy, baritone, will offer Bach's "Wedding Cantata No. 202, and Ein deutches Requiem Op. 45. Miss Terry Schlegel, soprano, a student at the Conservatory, and formerly of this city, will appear with the chorus.

SUN (e)
LOWELL, MASS.
CIRC. 47,948
NOV 23 1968
New England Newsclip

TUESDAY B SERIES

THURSDAY A SERIES

EIGHTY-EIGHTH SEASON 1968-1969

FIRST PROGRAM
Thursday evening November 7 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

IN MEMORY OF CHARLES MUNCH

FAURE — 'The death of Mélisande' from the incidental music to 'Pelléas et Mélisande' op. 80

The audience is asked not to applaud after this piece

BRAHMS — Symphony no. 4 in E minor op. 98*

Allegro non troppo
Andante moderato
Allegro giocoso
Allegro energico e passionato

intermission

STRAVINSKY — Le sacre du printemps (The rite of spring)

Part one: The adoration of the earth

Introduction – Auguries of spring (Dances of the young girls) – Mock abduction – spring Khorovod (Round dance) – Games of the rival clans – Procession of the wise elder – Adoration of the earth (wise elder) – Dance of the earth

Part two: The sacrifice

Introduction – Mystical circles of the young girls – Glorification of the chosen victim – The summoning of the ancients – Ritual of the ancients – Sacrificial dance (the chosen victim)

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA RECORDS*

Charles Munch rose to the challenge of replacing a great conductor of a great orchestra.

From the Sun Record
Call again 12.'69
Article on p. 183 in this book

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
CIRC. 26,950
NOV 11 1968
New England

"I am a conductor . . ."

He was known as "Le Beau Charles," he took the Boston Symphony on three international tours, he gathered, in his 13 years with the orchestra, music's highest awards. When he died last Tuesday, Charles Munch was recognized as one of the most sensitive interpreters of the world's greatest music.

On Wednesday the strains of Gabriel Faure's "The Death of Melisande" echoed in Boston's Symphony Hall. The music of Faure's play "Pelleas Melisande" had long been a favorite of Munch's. A saddened Eric Leinsdorf opened the evening performance with the only fitting tribute to a great man.

Charles Munch wrote a book which was called "I Am A Conductor." He was. He was one of the finest. The world of music is poorer for his passing; richer for the memorable music he gave it.

Boston Symphony

Moving tribute to Charles Munch

EIGHTY-EIGHTH SEASON 1968-1969

SIXTH PROGRAM
Friday afternoon November 8 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening November 9 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

IN MEMORY OF CHARLES MUNCH

FAURE — 'The death of Mélisande' from the incidental music to 'Pelléas et Mélisande' op. 80

The audience is asked not to applaud after this piece

SCHOENBERG — Kammersymphonie op. 9b

RACHMANINOV — Rhapsody on a theme of Paganini op. 43
LEONARD PENNARIO

intermission

BRAHMS — Symphony no. 4 in E minor op. 98*
Allegro non troppo
Andante moderato
Allegro giocoso
Allegro energico e passionato

Leonard Pennario plays the Steinway piano

BALDWIN PIANO
RCA RECORDS*

The clean, no-nonsense lyricism, the sharp rib-poking, the witty thematic tricks, all provided capital entertainment, and the soloist's wizard pianism recalled Rachmaninov at his own best.

'Frontier piece'

The work's startling excitement served to eclipse the meritorious Schoenberg that had preceded it, a true masterpiece of its transitional period, a brave new frontier piece. The Rachmaninov, after all, draws copiously from all directions except the future, and in so doing steals all the other man's thunder. But that's how it is. Mr. Leinsdorf is on top of it all. We shall miss him next week, but Charles Wilson promises us the Strauss "Don Juan," the Britten "Peter Grimes" interludes, and the Sibelius Second.

ay, November 11, 1968 11

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
NOV 6 1968
New England Newsclip

Pianist replaced for BSO concerts

Pianist Jorge Bolet has been hospitalized and his place at the Boston Symphony's Friday-Saturday concerts will be taken by Leonard Pennario. The program will still include the Rachmaninoff Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini for orchestra and piano. Bolet expects to rejoin the orchestra for its New York performances of this work ater this month.

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

HODGE-PODGE AT SYMPHONY

Last weekend's concert formed a deep valley beside the peaks of the preceding week's Brahms' Requiem.

It need not have been. The program as originally scheduled was of more than average interest: Schoenberg's Chamber Symphony, Op. 9b; Stravinsky's Nightingale Song; the Suite from Kurt Weill's "Three Penny Opera;" and Rachmaninoff's Rhapsody on a Theme by Paganini. But in the meantime came Mr. Munch's death and out went the Stravinsky and Weill and in their stead came the death music from Faure's "Pelleas and Melisande" Suite and Brahms' Fourth Symphony. The total on balance amounted to rather a lacklustre hodge-podge.

To do the death of Melisande was, of course, as it should be in paying tribute to Mr. Munch, whose performance of the Faure incidental music was virtually a trademark. It is reported that he explicitly requested this piece as his musical memorial It was done with devotion, and during the playing and the prolonged silent meditation that followed one could ponder the career of Charles Munch here. Whatever the limitations of his later years, the decent, kindly man for so many of us created whole new dimensions with his illuminating treatment of the French repertoire, conducted ad hoc performances that often burst spontaneously into flame, and mounted frequent revivals of the great Bach choral works—all of this along with numerous if unsung acts of personal generosity to members of the orchestra community.

The work of chief interest was the Schoenberg Chamber Symphony. Written just after the turn of the century as a chamber work for fifteen solo instruments and rescored for full orchestra in 1935, it stems from that fascinating period when Schoenberg was gradually carrying chromaticism to the limits of tonality and achieving a degree of concentration that music had never before known. Thus the opening theme of the work is a series of built up fourth chords and its one movement contains the elements of a multi-movement symphony. The piece takes off almost as if by quotation from late Mahler and bids fair forthwith to cross the frontier of tonality. Whether intentionally or otherwise, Schoenberg was not then quite prepared to carry through the logic of his theory of the emancipation of dissonance, to wit, that as the ear becomes progressively familiar with a great number of discords it may comprehend them as much as concords. Duke of Yorkwise, then, having marched up the hill, he marched down again.

If there is plenty in the context that is absorbing, there is likewise in the composition itself for those who will clearly attend. Amid the concentration one can espy the exposition, development, scherzo, adagio and recapitulation, and there is the beautifully wrought orchestration, a side of Schoenberg's genius that is too often glossed over. I am not sufficiently familiar with the score to adjudge the merits of interpretation and playing, but things did appear to unfold without that hectic quality that often characterizes performances of earlier renditions of difficult and unfamiliar modern works.

Less can be said for the rest of the concert. The Paganini Variations of Rochmaninoff were last played here in 1955, when Arthur Fiedler enjoyed his day in the sun conducting the orchestra. In Mr. Fiedler's domain the piece is great, but in a more serious forum it sounds utterly cliche ridden. The soloist, Leonard Pennario, played in a loud and distended fashion, and Mr. Leinsdorf's less-than- scintillating accompaniment was not the alchemy calculated to turn the piece into a silk purse.

As for the Brahms Fourth, its combination of tremendous power and wistfulness, its feeling of complete inevitability and the resourcefulness of its technique make it one of the more luminous instants of the symphonic literature, something to be cherished selectively. Here is distinctly Leinsdorf territory and he ordinarily does it with great strength and authority. But not on this occasion, where the tempos were dragged, where not spasmodic, and where the over-all projection was flaccid and spiritless, passages here and there in the Scherzo and Passacaglia excepted.

Maybe it was a case of over-Brahms. What with the Third Symphony, the Requiem and the Fourth all on successive weeks, and the Haydn Variations coming up in a fortnight, the Fourth Symphony at this time seemed a little de trop

This week Charles Wilson conducts a program of Strauss, Britten and Sibelius.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000
NOV 14 1968
New England Newsclip

Symphony Audience Responds to Pennario

By GEORGE GELLES
Music Critic

It's a measure of how far we still have to go that the Boston Symphony audience Friday afternoon responded warmly to Leonard Pennario's playing of Rachmaninoff's "Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini" but gave only the most perfunctory, polite applause to the one major work that Erich Leinsdorf retained for his rearranged Munch memorial concert—Schoenberg's First Chamber Symphony.

Not that Leinsodrf's reading of the Chamber Symphony was good beyond expectations; the tempi might have been more closely observed—something the composer harped on in criticizing performances he had heard—which would have given the piece more impact; and it would have been much nicer had the piece been played in its original verision for solo instruments (especially as it was first programmed with Weill's "Threepenny Opera" chamber suite), since the revised scoring, if not over-ripe, at least emphasizes all the Strauss still there.

But for letting us hear Schoenberg's early, crucial score at all Leinsdorf and his players deserved a greater show of gratitude.

Both this and the Rachmaninoff, whose scoring is its forte, proved that next to nothing can be heard of balance, and only the most basic of phrasing and nuance, from a seat beneath the over-hang close to the stage. I let these matters ride.

I could hear plenty of Pennario though and I didn't like it; he's one of the drabest pianists, surely to ever paly in Symphony Hall. His piano was no beauty and didn't help him; but then his monochrome, unreflective, uninflected playing might have been beyond help.

Leinsdorf and the BSO opened the afternoon with the "Death of Melisande" from Faure's incidental music to "Pelleas et Melisande," the piece Charles Munch wanted played on his death. They closed the program with the Brahms Fourth, a Leinsdorf favorite, though it never seems very good in concert.

It didn't Friday either; lacking most of all was a grasp of the architectonics of the piece, especially of the initial movement, which Friday was all asea. I found the other movements wanting in authority and clarity (the kind Klemperer gives to anything he touches). It was an everyman's Brahms Fourth, and not enough.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873
NOV 9 1968
New England Newsclip

The Boston Globe — Saturday, November 9, 1968

Moving adieu to Munch opens BSO concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its farewell to Charles Munch, former music director who died Wednesday, by playing The Death of Melisande from Faure's incidental music to Maeterlinck's "Pelleas et Melisande."

The piece was played by a request made by Munch himself some years ago. Erich Leinsdorf opened Thursday's and Friday's concert with it, and will do so again tonight. The audience stood during the music, as it customarily did in greeting to Munch at his recent appearances here.

Leinsdorf opened the regular part of Friday's program with Schoenberg's Chamber Symphony No. 1, played in the version for large orchestra that Schoenberg prepared in 1935.

It was an admirable performance, lucid in sonority, full of intensity and fire, and, except for the glossing over of the retard that prepares the coda, it was effectively paced. It was also an occasion for superb work from the orchestra.

Leonard Pennario, soloist in Rachmaninov's ingenious and diverting Rhapsody on a Theme by Paganini is pianist enough to manage the notes with ease; however, his fluent playing was so undifferentiated, pianistically as well as musically, that he really hardly gave a performance at all.

Both he and Leinsdorf tended to rush like mad.

The concert ended with the Symphony No. 4 by Brahms.

MICHAEL STEINBERG

INFORMATION OBSCURED

CHARLES MUNCH
September 26 1891 – November 6 1968

Charles Munch, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1949 to 1962, died peacefully in his sleep in the early morning of November 6 1968 at Richmond, Virginia. He had conducted the Orchestre de Paris, of which he was conductor and music director, in a concert at Raleigh, North Carolina, two days earlier.

Born in Strasbourg, he came from a distinguished musical family. His father was his first violin teacher and with his three brothers and two sisters he spent much time during his childhood making music. He contemplated a medical career, and went at the age of twenty-one to study in Paris. But he was soon devoting his time to the violin. After service in the first world war, he resumed his career as a student of Carl Flesch in Berlin and as concertmaster of the Strasbourg Orchestra. He moved to Leipzig, where he spent eight years in the first desk of the violins in the Gewandhaus Orchestra under Wilhelm Furtwängler and Bruno Walter.

In 1932 Charles Munch settled in Paris, and began his conducting career. He founded the Orchestre Symphonique de Paris and conducted the Lamoureux Concerts. Engagements as guest conductor in other cities soon followed. In 1937 he became conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra. His first visit to the United States was in 1946; he conducted the Boston Symphony on December 27 and in the following month made the first of his many appearances with the New York Philharmonic.

In the spring of 1948 Charles Munch was engaged to succeed Serge Koussevitzky as Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his tenure to begin with the 1949-50 season. Meanwhile, in the autumn of 1948, he toured throughout the United States with the Orchestre National de la Radiodiffusion Française, of which he was conductor.

cont'd. on inside of Thurs A series program on opposite page —

Boston Symphony

Moving tribute to Charles Munch

By Allan Sly

The Boston Symphony this week paid a quiet tribute to the memory of Charles Munch, fulfilling an oft-expressed wish of his by playing Fauré's "The Death of Melisande." Recasting of the program brought us also, after intermission, the Brahms Fourth, in its own elegiac way equally commemorative, though at the other end of the emotional scale and speaking a very different language.

With this performance the concert be- Eastern countries.

After his retirement from the Boston each season as one of the Orchestra'; he was appointed conductor of the ne the first French orchestra to be fully made its debut at the Théâtre des Cha last year. The concert was by all accou during the last twelve months the Orc under Charles Munch had begun to ga

In 1933 Charles Munch married Ge author and translator: Mme Munch Commander in the Legion of Honor 1945. During his last years Charles Mun century house near Versailles.

On October 23 last he led a concer Symphony Hall, Boston, when he cond meditation and dance of vengeance phony no. 1 in C minor of Brahms.

Charles Munch ... to several occ ... e death of mus ... Mélisande by Faur ... h, when the time came. ... oyalty in all the people who shar and audiences alike. His own devotio his own words: 'Music is the art of rises far above what words can mea domain is the imponderable and imp Man's right to speak this language is that heaven has bestowed on us.'

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

came very much Mr. Leinsdorf's. Whoever said that the conductor's function is to convey experience probably meant to the players, some of whom, of necessity, benefit from such guidance; but Mr. Leinsdorf went further and showed the audience what they could hardly achieve for themselves — a fusion of Brahms' Vienna with life as we know it here and now.

When Mr. Leinsdorf first came to the Metropolitan Opera he was notorious among the stage hands for making Wagner last minutes longer than his predecessor had.

In Boston this week he noticeably took minutes off the playing time of the Brahms Fourth, heightening the work's emotional charge and revealing its splendid design while letting every detail speak tellingly in its place. This is where experience shows, of both conductor and players (and ultimately of the audience too). The orchestra, under such direction, reaches a kind of superchamber music understanding among itself, even while its total sound meets the concept of its leader—a discreet instrumental eloquence, quite unlike the full-throated songlike sound it gave Colin Davis recently or the translucent texture it used to give Charles Munch. Yet of course there is continuity of aim and dedication, the many personnel changes notwithstanding.

Incandescence

Mr. Leinsdorf's Brahms reached heights of incandescence and depths of reflection that set this performance firmly in the memory. In passing one has to deplore an occasional intonation problem among the horns but to commend the excellence of the brass otherwise, and the overall tidy voices of the strings. The leadership of Joseph Silverstein and of his fellow principals is showing handsomely these days. The solo woodwinds do not seem as much in evidence as formerly, but Everett Firth's electrifying timpani playing does, and of course Doriot Anthony Dwyer's solo had one holding one's breath.

The program changes denied us Stravinsky's "Nightingale's Song" and a suite derived from Kurt Weill's "Threepenny Opera," but gave us the announced Schoenberg "Kammersymphonie" (in its 1935 rescored form) and the Rachmaninov Paganini rhapsody, which Leonard Pennario played at short notice (Jorge Bolet being indisposed). This Pennario-Leinsdorf partnership proved unbeatable. They took more minutes off the playing time — in fact the headlong pace increased the satanic nature of the work and heightened its balletic potential (as Charles Munch, to a very different end, used to do in the Beethoven Sixth).

The clean, no-nonsense lyricism, the sharp rib-poking, the witty thematic tricks, all provided capital entertainment, and the soloist's wizard pianism recalled Rachmaninov at his own best.

'Frontier piece'

The work's startling excitement served to eclipse the meritorious Schoenberg that had preceded it, a true masterpiece of its transitional period, a brave new frontier piece. The Rachmaninov, after all, draws copiously from all directions except the future, and in so doing steals all the other man's thunder. But that's how it is. Mr. Leinsdorf is on top of it all. We shall miss him next week, but Charles Wilson promises us the Strauss "Don Juan," the Britten "Peter Grimes" interludes, and the Sibelius Second.

...ay, November 11, 1968 ▲ 11

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
NOV 6 1968
New England Newsclip

Pianist replaced for BSO concerts

Pianist Jorge Bolet has been hospitalized and his place at the Boston Symphony's Friday-Saturday con-certs will be taken by Leonard Pennario. The program will still include the Rachmaninoff Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini for orchestra and piano. Bolet expects to rejoin the orchestra for its New York performances of this work ater this month.

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

HODGE-PODGE AT SYMPHONY

Last weekend's concert formed a deep valley beside the peaks of the preceding week's Brahms' Requiem.

It need not have been. The program as originally scheduled was of more than average interest: Schoenberg's Chamber Symphony, Op. 9b; Stravinsky's Nightingale Song; the Suite from Kurt Weill's "Three Penny Opera;" and Rachmaninoff's Rhapsody on a Theme by Paganini. But in the meantime came Mr. Munch's death and out went the Stravinsky and Weill and in their stead came the death music from Faure's "Pelleas and Melisande" Suite and Brahms' Fourth Symphony. The total on balance amounted to rather a lacklustre hodge-podge.

To do the death of Melisande was, of course, as it should be in paying tribute to Mr. Munch, whose performance of the Faure incidental music was virtually a trademark. It is reported that he explicitly requested this piece as his musical memorial It was done with devotion, and during the playing and the prolonged silent meditation that followed one could ponder the career of Charles Munch here. Whatever the limitations of his later years, the decent, kindly man for so many of us created whole new dimensions with his illuminating treatment of the French repertoire, conducted ad hoc performances that often burst spontaneously into flame, and mounted frequent revivals of the great Bach choral works—all of this along with numerous if unsung acts of personal generosity to members of the orchestra community.

The work of chief interest was the Schoenberg Chamber Symphony. Written just after the turn of the century as a chamber work for fifteen solo instruments and rescored for full orchestra in 1935, it stems from that fascinating period when Schoenberg was gradually carrying chromaticism to the limits of tonality and achieving a degree of concentration that music had never before known. Thus the opening theme of the work is a series of built up fourth chords and its one movement contains the elements of a multi-movement symphony. The piece takes off almost as if by quotation from late Mahler and bids fair forthwith to cross the frontier of tonality. Whether intentionally or otherwise, Schoenberg was not then quite prepared to carry through the logic of his theory of the emancipation of dissonance, to wit, that as the ear becomes progressively familiar with a great number of discords it may comprehend them as much as concords. Duke of Yorkwise, then, having marched up the hill, he marched down again.

If there is plenty in the context that is absorbing, there is likewise in the composition itself for those who will clearly attend. Amid the concentration one can espy the exposition, development, scherzo, adagio and recapitulation, and there is the beautifully wrought orchestration, a side of Schoenberg's genius that is too often glossed over. I am not sufficiently familiar with the score to adjudge the merits of interpretation and playing, but things did appear to unfold without that hectic quality that often characterizes performances of earlier renditions of difficult and unfamiliar modern works.

Less can be said for the rest of the concert. The Paganini Variations of Rochmaninoff were last played here in 1955, when Arthur Fiedler enjoyed his day in the sun conducting the orchestra. In Mr. Fiedler's domain the piece is great, but in a more serious forum it sounds utterly cliche ridden. The soloist, Leonard Pennario, played in a loud and distended fashion, and Mr. Leinsdorf's less-than- scintillating accompaniment was not the alchemy calculated to turn the piece into a silk purse.

As for the Brahms Fourth, its combination of tremendous power and wistfulness, its feeling of complete inevitability and the resourcefulness of its technique make it one of the more luminous instants of the symphonic literature, something to be cherished selectively. Here is distinctly Leinsdorf territory and he ordinarily does it with great strength and authority. But not on this occasion, where the tempos were dragged, where not spasmodic, and where the over-all projection was flaccid and spiritless, passages here and there in the Scherzo and Passacaglia excepted.

Maybe it was a case of over-Brahms. What with the Third Symphony, the Requiem and the Fourth all on successive weeks, and the Haydn Variations coming up in a fortnight, the Fourth Symphony at this time seemed a little de trop

This week Charles Wilson conducts a program of Strauss, Britten and Sibelius.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000
NOV 14 1968
New England Newsclip

Symphony Audience Responds to Pennario

1

By GEORGE GELLES
Music Critic

It's a measure of how far we still have to go that the Boston Symphony audience Friday afternoon responded warmly to Leonard Pennario's playing of Rachmaninoff's "Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini" but gave only the most perfunctory, polite applause to the one major work that Erich Leinsdorf retained for his rearranged Munch memorial concert—Schoenberg's First Chamber Symphony.

Not that Leinsodrf's reading of the Chamber Symphony was good beyond expectations; the tempi might have been more closely observed—something the composer harped on in criticizing performances he had heard —which would have given the piece more impact; and it would have been much nicer had the piece been played in its original verision for solo instruments (especially as it was first programmed with Weill's "Threepenny Opera" chamber suite), since the revised scoring, if not over-ripe, at least emphasizes all the Strauss still there.

But for letting us hear Schoenberg's early, crucial score at all Leinsdorf and his players deserved a greater show of gratitude.

Both this and the Rachmaninoff, whose scoring is its forte, proved that next to nothing can be heard of balance, and only the most basic of phrasing and nuance, from a seat beneath the over-hang close to the stage. I let these matters ride.

I could hear plenty of Pennario though and I didn't like it; he's one of the drabest pianists, surely to ever paly in Symphony Hall. His piano was no beauty and didn't help him; but then his monochrome, unreflective, uninflected playing might have been beyond help.

Leinsdorf and the BSO opened the afternoon with the "Death of Melisande" from Faure's incidental music to "Pelleas et Melisande," the piece Charles Munch wanted played on his death. They closed the program with the Brahms Fourth, a Leinsdorf favorite, though it never seems very good in concert.

It didn't Friday either; lacking most of all was a grasp of the architectonics of the piece, especially of the initial movement, which Friday was all asea. I found the other movements wanting in authority and clarity (the kind Klemperer gives to anything he touches). It was an everyman's Brahms Fourth, and not enough.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873
NOV 9 1968
New England Newsclip

The Boston Globe — Saturday, November 9, 1968

Moving adieu to Munch opens BSO concert

The Boston Symphon chestra made its farew Charles Munch, fo music director who Wednesday, by playing Death of Melisande Faure's incidental mus Maeterlinck's "Pelleas Melisande."

The piece was played request made by M himself some years Erich Leinsdorf o Thursday's and Friday's cert with it, and will again tonight. The aud stood during the music, customarily did in gre to Munch at his recen pearances here.

Leinsdorf opened the ular part of Friday's gram with Schoenb Chamber Symphony N played in the version large orchestra Schoenberg prepared 1935.

It was an admirable formance, lucid in son full of intensity and and, except for the glo

CH

November 6 1968

Charles Munch, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1949 to 1962, died peacefully in his sleep in the early morning of November 6 1968 at Richmond, Virginia. He had conducted the Orchestre de Paris, of which he was conductor and music director, in a concert at Raleigh, North Carolina, two days earlier.

Born in Strasbourg, he came from a distinguished musical family. His father was his first violin teacher and with his three brothers and two sisters he spent much time during his childhood making music. He contemplated a medical career, and went at the age of twenty-one to study oon devoting his time to the violin. After service he resumed his career as a student of Carl Flesch rtmaster of the Strasbourg Orchestra. He moved pent eight years in the first desk of the violins in hestra under Wilhelm Furtwängler and Bruno ch settled in Paris, and began his conducting e Orchestre Symphonique de Paris and conducted rts. Engagements as guest conductor in other In 1937 he became conductor of the Paris Con- his first visit to the United States was in 1946; on Symphony on December 27 and in the fol- he first of his many appearances with the New Charles Munch was engaged to succeed Serge Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his the 1949-50 season. Meanwhile, in the autumn roughout the United States with the Orchestre ffusion Française, of which he was conductor.

inside of series program on opposite page —

Boston Symphony

Moving tribute to Charles Munch

By Allan Sly

The Boston Symphony this week paid a quiet tribute to the memory of Charles Munch, fulfilling an oft-expressed wish of his by playing Fauré's "The Death of Melisande." Recasting of the program brought us also, after intermission, the Brahms Fourth, in its own elegiac way equally commemorative, though at the other end of the emotional scale and speaking a very different language.

With this performance the concert be- Eastern countries.

After his retirement from the Boston each season as one of the Orchestra's he was appointed conductor of the ne the first French orchestra to be fully made its debut at the Théâtre des Cha last year. The concert was by all accou during the last twelve months the Orc under Charles Munch had begun to ga

In 1933 Charles Munch married Ge author and translator: Mme Munch Commander in the Legion of Honor 1945. During his last years Charles Mun century house near Versailles.

On October 23 last he led a concer Symphony Hall, Boston, when he cond meditation and dance of vengeance phony no. 1 in C minor of Brahms.

Charles Munch ... n to several oc ... e death of mus ... Mélisande by Faur ... n, when the time came. ... oyalty in all the people who shar and audiences alike. His own devotio his own words: 'Music is the art of rises far above what words can mea domain is the imponderable and imp. Man's right to speak this language is that heaven has bestowed on us.'

came very much Mr. Leinsdorf's. Whoever said that the conductor's function is to convey experience probably meant to the players, some of whom, of necessity, benefit from such guidance; but Mr. Leinsdorf went further and showed the audience what they could hardly achieve for themselves — a fusion of Brahms' Vienna with life as we know it here and now.

When Mr. Leinsdorf first came to the Metropolitan Opera he was notorious among the stage hands for making Wagner last minutes longer than his predecessor had.

In Boston this week he noticeably took minutes off the playing time of the Brahms Fourth, heightening the work's emotional charge and revealing its splendid design while letting every detail speak tellingly in its place. This is where experience shows, of both conductor and players (and ultimately of the audience too). The orchestra, under such direction, reaches a kind of superchamber music understanding among itself, even while its total sound meets the concept of its leader—a discreet instrumental eloquence, quite unlike the full-throated songlike sound it gave Colin Davis recently or the translucent texture it used to give Charles Munch. Yet of course there is continuity of aim and dedication, the many personnel changes notwithstanding.

Incandescence

Mr. Leinsdorf's Brahms reached heights of incandescence and depths of reflection that set this performance firmly in the memory. In passing one has to deplore an occasional intonation problem among the horns but to commend the excellence of the brass otherwise, and the overall tidy voices of the strings. The leadership of Joseph Silverstein and of his fellow principals is showing handsomely these days. The solo woodwinds do not seem as much in evidence as formerly, but Everett Firth's electrifying timpani playing does, and of course Doriot Anthony Dwyer's solo had one holding one's breath.

The program changes denied us Stravinsky's "Nightingale's Song" and a suite derived from Kurt Weill's "Threepenny Opera," but gave us the announced Schoenberg "Kammersymphonie" (in its 1935 rescored form) and the Rachmaninov Paganini rhapsody, which Leonard Pennario played at short notice (Jorge Bolet being indisposed). This Pennario-Leinsdorf partnership proved unbeatable. They took more minutes off the playing time — in fact the headlong pace increased the satanic nature of the work and heightened its balletic potential (as Charles Munch, to a very different end, used to do in the Beethoven Sixth).

The clean, no-nonsense lyricism, the sharp rib-poking, the witty thematic tricks, all provided capital entertainment, and the soloist's wizard pianism recalled Rachmaninov at his own best.

'Frontier piece'

The work's startling excitement served to eclipse the meritorious Schoenberg that had preceded it, a true masterpiece of its transitional period, a brave new frontier piece. The Rachmaninov, after all, draws copiously from all directions except the future, and in so doing steals all the other man's thunder. But that's how it is. Mr. Leinsdorf is on top of it all. We shall miss him next week, but Charles Wilson promises us the Strauss "Don Juan," the Britten "Peter Grimes" interludes, and the Sibelius Second.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

11

ay, November 11, 1968

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

NOV 6 196

New England Newsclip

Pianist replaced for BSO concerts

Pianist Jorge Bolet has been hospitalized and his place at the Boston Symphony's Friday-Saturday concerts will be taken by Leonard Pennario. The program will still include the Rachmaninoff Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini for orchestra and piano. Bolet expects to rejoin the orchestra for its New York performances of this work ater this month.

11.

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

HODGE-PODGE AT SYMPHONY

Last weekend's concert formed a deep valley beside the peaks of the preceding week's Brahms' Requiem.

It need not have been. The program as originally scheduled was of more than average interest: Schoenberg's Chamber Symphony, Op. 9b; Stravinsky's Nightingale Song; the Suite from Kurt Weill's "Three Penny Opera;" and Rachmaninoff's Rhapsody on a Theme by Paganini. But in the meantime came Mr. Munch's death and out went the Stravinsky and Weill and in their stead came the death music from Faure's "Pelleas and Melisande" Suite and Brahms' Fourth Symphony. The total on balance amounted to rather a lacklustre hodge-podge.

To do the death of Melisande was, of course, as it should be in paying tribute to Mr. Munch, whose performance of the Faure incidental music was virtually a trademark. It is reported that he explicitly requested this piece as his musical memorial It was done with devotion, and during the playing and the prolonged silent meditation that followed one could ponder the career of Charles Munch here. Whatever the limitations of his later years, the decent, kindly man for so many of us created whole new dimensions with his illuminating treatment of the French repertoire, conducted ad hoc performances that often burst spontaneously into flame, and mounted frequent revivals of the great Bach choral works—all of this along with numerous if unsung acts of personal generosity to members of the orchestra community.

The work of chief interest was the Schoenberg Chamber Symphony. Written just after the turn of the century as a chamber work for fifteen solo instruments and rescored for full orchestra in 1935, it stems from that fascinating period when Schoenberg was gradually carrying chromaticism to the limits of tonality and achieving a degree of concentration that music had never before known. Thus the opening theme of the work is a series of built up fourth chords and its one movement contains the elements of a multi-movement symphony. The piece takes off almost as if by quotation from late Mahler and bids fair forthwith to cross the frontier of tonality. Whether intentionally or otherwise, Schoenberg was not then quite prepared to carry through the logic of his theory of the emancipation of dissonance, to wit, that as the ear becomes progressively familiar with a great number of discords it may comprehend them as much as concords. Duke of Yorkwise, then, having marched up the hill, he marched down again.

If there is plenty in the context that is absorbing, there is likewise in the composition itself for those who will clearly attend. Amid the concentration one can espy the exposition, development, scherzo, adagio and recapitulation, and there is the beautifully wrought orchestration, a side of Schoenberg's genius that is too often glossed over. I am not sufficiently familiar with the score to adjudge the merits of interpretation and playing, but things did appear to unfold without that hectic quality that often characterizes performances of earlier renditions of difficult and unfamiliar modern works.

Less can be said for the rest of the concert. The Paganini Variations of Rochmaninoff were last played here in 1955, when Arthur Fiedler enjoyed his day in the sun conducting the orchestra. In Mr. Fiedler's domain the piece is great, but in a more serious forum it sounds utterly cliche ridden. The soloist, Leonard Pennario, played in a loud and distended fashion, and Mr. Leinsdorf's less-than- scintillating accompaniment was not the alchemy calculated to turn the piece into a silk purse.

As for the Brahms Fourth, its combination of tremendous power and wistfulness, its feeling of complete inevitability and the resourcefulness of its technique make it one of the more luminous instants of the symphonic literature, something to be cherished selectively. Here is distinctly Leinsdorf territory and he ordinarily does it with great strength and authority. But not on this occasion, where the tempos were dragged, where not spasmodic, and where the over-all projection was flaccid and spiritless, passages here and there in the Scherzo and Passacaglia excepted.

Maybe it was a case of over-Brahms. What with the Third Symphony, the Requiem and the Fourth all on successive weeks, and the Haydn Variations coming up in a fortnight, the Fourth Symphony at this time seemed a little de trop

This week Charles Wilson conducts a program of Strauss, Britten and Sibelius.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

NOV 14 1968

New England Newsclip

Symphony Audience Responds to Pennario

1

By GEORGE GELLES
Music Critic

It's a measure of how far we still have to go that the Boston Symphony audience Friday afternoon responded warmly to Leonard Pennario's playing of Rachmaninoff's "Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini" but gave only the most perfunctory, polite applause to the one major work that Erich Leinsdorf retained for his rearranged Munch memorial concert—Schoenberg's First Chamber Symphony.

Not that Leinsodrf's reading of the Chamber Symphony was good beyond expectations; the tempi might have been more closely observed—something the composer harped on in criticizing performances he had heard —which would have given the piece more impact; and it would have been much nicer had the piece been played in its original verision for solo instruments (especially as it was first programmed with Weill's "Threepenny Opera" chamber suite), since the revised scoring, if not over-ripe, at least emphasizes all the Strauss still there.

But for letting us hear Schoenberg's early, crucial score at all Leinsdorf and his players deserved a greater show of gratitude.

Both this and the Rachmaninoff, whose scoring is its forte, proved that next to nothing can be heard of balance, and only the most basic of phrasing and nuance, from a seat beneath the over-hang close to the stage. I let these matters ride.

I could hear plenty of Pennario though and I didn't like it; he's one of the drabest pianists, surely, to ever paly in Symphony Hall. His piano was no beauty and didn't help him; but then his monochrome, unreflective, uninflected playing might have been beyond help.

Leinsdorf and the BSO opened the afternoon with the "Death of Melisande" from Faure's incidental music to "Pelleas et Melisande," the piece Charles Munch wanted played on his death. They closed the program with the Brahms Fourth, a Leinsdorf favorite, though it never seems very good in concert.

It didn't Friday either; lacking most of all was a grasp of the architectonics of the piece, especially of the initial movement, which Friday was all asea. I found the other movements wanting in authority and clarity (the kind Klemperer gives to anything he touches). It was an everyman's Brahms Fourth, and not enough.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

NOV 9 1968

New England Newsclip

The Boston Globe — Saturday, November 9, 1968

Moving adieu to Munch opens BSO concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its farewell to Charles Munch, former music director who died Wednesday, by playing The Death of Melisande from Faure's incidental music to Maeterlinck's "Pelleas et Melisande."

The piece was played by a request made by Munch himself some years ago. Erich Leinsdorf opened Thursday's and Friday's concert with it, and will do so again tonight. The audience stood during the music, as it customarily did in greeting to Munch at his recent appearances here.

Leinsdorf opened the regular part of Friday's program with Schoenberg's Chamber Symphony No. 1, played in the version for large orchestra that Schoenberg prepared in 1935.

It was an admirable performance, lucid in sonority, full of intensity and fire, and, except for the glossing over of the retard that prepares the coda, it was effectively paced. It was also an occasion for superb work from the orchestra.

Leonard Pennario, soloist in Rachmaninov's ingenious and diverting Rhapsody on a Theme by Paganini is pianist enough to manage the notes with ease; however, his fluent playing was so undifferentiated, pianistically as well as musically, that he really hardly gave a performance at all.

Both he and Leinsdorf tended to rush like mad.

The concert ended with the Symphony No. 4 by Brahms.

MICHAEL STEINBERG

CH
November 6 1968

Charles Munch, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1949 to 1962, died peacefully in his sleep in the early morning of November 6 1968 at Richmond, Virginia. He had conducted the Orchestre de Paris, of which he was conductor and music director, in a concert at Raleigh, North Carolina, two days earlier.

Born in Strasbourg, he came from a distinguished musical family. His father was his first violin teacher and with his three brothers and two sisters he spent much time during his childhood making music. He contemplated a medical career, and went at the age of twenty-one to study on devoting his time to the violin. After service he resumed his career as a student of Carl Flesch rtmaster of the Strasbourg Orchestra. He moved pent eight years in the first desk of the violins in hestra under Wilhelm Furtwängler and Bruno ch settled in Paris, and began his conducting Orchestre Symphonique de Paris and conducted rts. Engagements as guest conductor in other In 1937 he became conductor of the Paris Con- His first visit to the United States was in 1946; on Symphony on December 27 and in the fol- he first of his many appearances with the New Charles Munch was engaged to succeed Serge Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his he 1949-50 season. Meanwhile, in the autumn roughout the United States with the Orchestre ffusion Française, of which he was conductor.

made of series program on opposite page —

Boston Symphony

Moving tribute to Charles Munch

By Allan Sly

The Boston Symphony this week paid a quiet tribute to the memory of Charles Munch, fulfilling an oft-expressed wish of his by playing Fauré's "The Death of Melisande." Recasting of the program brought us also, after intermission, the Brahms Fourth, in its own elegiac way equally commemorative, though at the other end of the emotional scale and speaking a very different language.

With this performance the concert be- Eastern countries.

After his retirement from the Boston each season as one of the Orchestra's he was appointed conductor of the ne the first French orchestra to be fully made its debut at the Théâtre des Cha last year. The concert was by all accou during the last twelve months the Orc under Charles Munch had begun to ga

In 1933 Charles Munch married G author and translator: Mme Munch Commander in the Legion of Honor 1945. During his last years Charles Mun century house near Versailles.

On October 23 last he led a concer Symphony Hall, Boston, when he cond meditation and dance of vengeance phony no. 1 in C minor of Brahms.

Charles Munch ... on to several oc ... e death of mus ... Mélisande by Faur ... n, when the time came. ... oyalty in all the people who shar and audiences alike. His own devotio his own words: 'Music is the art of rises far above what words can mea domain is the imponderable and imp. Man's right to speak this language is that heaven has bestowed on us.'

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

came very much Mr. Leinsdorf's. Whoever said that the conductor's function is to convey experience probably meant to the players, some of whom, of necessity, benefit from such guidance; but Mr. Leinsdorf went further and showed the audience what they could hardly achieve for themselves — a fusion of Brahms' Vienna with life as we know it here and now.

When Mr. Leinsdorf first came to the Metropolitan Opera he was notorious among the stage hands for making Wagner last minutes longer than his predecessor had.

In Boston this week he noticeably took minutes off the playing time of the Brahms Fourth, heightening the work's emotional charge and revealing its splendid design while letting every detail speak tellingly in its place. This is where experience shows, of both conductor and players (and ultimately of the audience too). The orchestra, under such direction, reaches a kind of superchamber music understanding among itself, even while its total sound meets the concept of its leader—a discreet instrumental eloquence, quite unlike the full-throated songlike sound it gave Colin Davis recently or the translucent texture it used to give Charles Munch. Yet of course there is continuity of aim and dedication, the many personnel changes notwithstanding.

Incandescence

Mr. Leinsdorf's Brahms reached heights of incandescence and depths of reflection that set this performance firmly in the memory. In passing one has to deplore an occasional intonation problem among the horns but to commend the excellence of the brass otherwise, and the overall tidy voices of the strings. The leadership of Joseph Silverstein and of his fellow principals is showing handsomely these days. The solo woodwinds do not seem as much in evidence as formerly, but Everett Firth's electrifying timpani playing does, and of course Doriot Anthony Dwyer's solo had one holding one's breath.

The program changes denied us Stravinsky's "Nightingale's Song" and a suite derived from Kurt Weill's "Threepenny Opera," but gave us the announced Schoenberg "Kammersymphonie" (in its 1935 rescored form) and the Rachmaninov Paganini rhapsody, which Leonard Pennario played at short notice (Jorge Bolet being indisposed). This Pennario-Leinsdorf partnership proved unbeatable. They took more minutes off the playing time — in fact the headlong pace increased the satanic nature of the work and heightened its balletic potential (as Charles Munch, to a very different end, used to do in the Beethoven Sixth).

The clean, no-nonsense lyricism, the sharp rib-poking, the witty thematic tricks, all provided capital entertainment, and the soloist's wizard pianism recalled Rachmaninov at his own best.

'Frontier piece'

The work's startling excitement served to eclipse the meritorious Schoenberg that had preceded it, a true masterpiece of its transitional period, a brave new frontier piece. The Rachmaninov, after all, draws copiously from all directions except the future, and in so doing steals all the other man's thunder. But that's how it is. Mr. Leinsdorf is on top of it all. We shall miss him next week, but Charles Wilson promises us the Strauss "Don Juan," the Britten "Peter Grimes" interludes, and the Sibelius Second.

11

...ay, November 11, 1968

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 341,702

NOV 6 1968

New England Newsclip

Pianist replaced for BSO concerts

Pianist Jorge Bolet has been hospitalized and his place at the Boston Symphony's Friday-Saturday concerts will be taken by Leonard Pennario. The program will still include the Rachmaninoff Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini for orchestra and piano. Bolet expects to rejoin the orchestra for its New York performances of this work ater this month.

11.

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

HODGE-PODGE AT SYMPHONY

Last weekend's concert formed a deep valley beside the peaks of the preceding week's Brahms' Requiem.

It need not have been. The program as originally scheduled was of more than average interest: Schoenberg's Chamber Symphony, Op. 9b; Stravinsky's Nightingale Song; the Suite from Kurt Weill's "Three Penny Opera;" and Rachmaninoff's Rhapsody on a Theme by Paganini. But in the meantime came Mr. Munch's death and out went the Stravinsky and Weill and in their stead came the death music from Faure's "Pelleas and Melisande" Suite and Brahms' Fourth Symphony. The total on balance amounted to rather a lacklustre hodge-podge.

To do the death of Melisande was, of course, as it should be in paying tribute to Mr. Munch, whose performance of the Faure incidental music was virtually a trademark. It is reported that he explicitly requested this piece as his musical memorial It was done with devotion, and during the playing and the prolonged silent meditation that followed one could ponder the career of Charles Munch here. Whatever the limitations of his later years, the decent, kindly man for so many of us created whole new dimensions with his illuminating treatment of the French repertoire, conducted ad hoc performances that often burst spontaneously into flame, and mounted frequent revivals of the great Bach choral works—all of this along with numerous if unsung acts of personal generosity to members of the orchestra community.

The work of chief interest was the Schoenberg Chamber Symphony. Written just after the turn of the century as a chamber work for fifteen solo instruments and rescored for full orchestra in 1935, it stems from that fascinating period when Schoenberg was gradually carrying chromaticism to the limits of tonality and achieving a degree of concentration that music had never before known. Thus the opening theme of the work is a series of built up fourth chords and its one movement contains the elements of a multi-movement symphony. The piece takes off almost as if by quotation from late Mahler and bids fair forthwith to cross the frontier of tonality. Whether intentionally or otherwise, Schoenberg was not then quite prepared to carry through the logic of his theory of the emancipation of dissonance, to wit, that as the ear becomes progressively familiar with a great number of discords it may comprehend them as much as concords. Duke of Yorkwise, then, having marched up the hill, he marched down again.

If there is plenty in the context that is absorbing, there is likewise in the composition itself for those who will clearly attend. Amid the concentration one can espy the exposition, development, scherzo, adagio and recapitulation, and there is the beautifully wrought orchestration, a side of Schoenberg's genius that is too often glossed over. I am not sufficiently familiar with the score to adjudge the merits of interpretation and playing, but things did appear to unfold without that hectic quality that often characterizes performances of earlier renditions of difficult and unfamiliar modern works.

Less can be said for the rest of the concert. The Paganini Variations of Rochmaninoff were last played here in 1955, when Arthur Fiedler enjoyed his day in the sun conducting the orchestra. In Mr. Fiedler's domain the piece is great, but in a more serious forum it sounds utterly cliche ridden. The soloist, Leonard Pennario, played in a loud and distended fashion, and Mr. Leinsdorf's less-than- scintillating accompaniment was not the alchemy calculated to turn the piece into a silk purse.

As for the Brahms Fourth, its combination of tremendous power and wistfulness, its feeling of complete inevitability and the resourcefulness of its technique make it one of the more luminous instants of the symphonic literature, something to be cherished selectively. Here is distinctly Leinsdorf territory and he ordinarily does it with great strength and authority. But not on this occasion, where the tempos were dragged, where not spasmodic, and where the over-all projection was flaccid and spiritless, passages here and there in the Scherzo and Passacaglia excepted.

Maybe it was a case of over-Brahms. What with the Third Symphony, the Requiem and the Fourth all on successive weeks, and the Haydn Variations coming up in a fortnight, the Fourth Symphony at this time seemed a little de trop

This week Charles Wilson conducts a program of Strauss, Britten and Sibelius.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

NOV 14 1968

New England Newsclip

Symphony Audience Responds to Pennario

1

By GEORGE GELLES
Music Critic

It's a measure of how far we still have to go that the Boston Symphony audience Friday afternoon responded warmly to Leonard Pennario's playing of Rachmaninoff's "Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini" but gave only the most perfunctory, polite applause to the one major work that Erich Leinsdorf retained for his rearranged Munch memorial concert—Schoenberg's First Chamber Symphony.

Not that Leinsodrf's reading of the Chamber Symphony was good beyond expectations; the tempi might have been more closely observed—something the composer harped on in criticizing performances he had heard —which would have given the piece more impact; and it would have been much nicer had the piece been played in its original verision for solo instruments (especially as it was first programmed with Weill's "Threepenny Opera" chamber suite), since the revised scoring, if not over-ripe, at least emphasizes all the Strauss still there.

But for letting us hear Schoenberg's early, crucial score at all Leinsdorf and his players deserved a greater show of gratitude.

Both this and the Rachmaninoff, whose scoring is its forte, proved that next to nothing can be heard of balance, and only the most basic of phrasing and nuance, from a seat beneath the over-hang close to the stage. I let these matters ride.

I could hear plenty of Pennario though and I didn't like it; he's one of the drabest pianists, surely, to ever paly in Symphony Hall. His piano was no beauty and didn't help him; but then his monochrome, unreflective, uninflected playing might have been beyond help.

Leinsdorf and the BSO opened the afternoon with the "Death of Melisande" from Faure's incidental music to "Pelleas et Melisande," the piece Charles Munch wanted played on his death. They closed the program with the Brahms Fourth, a Leinsdorf favorite, though it never seems very good in concert.

It didn't Friday either; lacking most of all was a grasp of the architectonics of the piece, especially of the initial movement, which Friday was all asea. I found the other movements wanting in authority and clarity (the kind Klemperer gives to anything he touches). It was an everyman's Brahms Fourth, and not enough.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

NOV 9 1968

New England Newsclip

The Boston Globe — Saturday, November 9, 1968

Moving adieu to Munch opens BSO concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its farewell to Charles Munch, former music director who died Wednesday, by playing The Death of Melisande from Faure's incidental music to Maeterlinck's "Pelleas et Melisande."

The piece was played by a request made by Munch himself some years ago. Erich Leinsdorf opened Thursday's and Friday's concert with it, and will do so again tonight. The audience stood during the music, as it customarily did in greeting to Munch at his recent appearances here.

Leinsdorf opened the regular part of Friday's program with Schoenberg's Chamber Symphony No. 1, played in the version for large orchestra that Schoenberg prepared in 1935.

It was an admirable performance, lucid in sonority, full of intensity and fire, and, except for the glossing over of the retard that prepares the coda, it was effectively paced. It was also an occasion for superb work from the orchestra.

Leonard Pennario, soloist in Rachmaninov's ingenious and diverting Rhapsody on a Theme by Paganini is pianist enough to manage the notes with ease; however, his fluent playing was so undifferentiated, pianistically as well as musically, that he really hardly gave a performance at all.

Both he and Leinsdorf tended to rush like mad.

The concert ended with the Symphony No. 4 by Brahms.

MICHAEL STEINBERG

12.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
NOV 9 1968
New England Newsclip

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905
NOV 17 1968
New England Newsclip

Weekend Symphony

The Music Was Munch's: Gentle

By McLAREN HARRIS

The weekend Symphony program bears scant resemblance to the one originally planned for this time. Only Rachmaninov remains from the first composers list of Beethoven, Rachmaninov, Weill and Liszt. A week ago it was altered to read Schoenberg, Stravinsky, Weill and Rachmaninov, and upon the death of Charles Munch the final form became Faure, Schoenberg, Rachmaninov and Brahms.

ACCORDING TO some of the Symphony players Munch had once expressed a preference that "The Death of Melisande" from Faure's Incidental Music to "Pelleas et Melisande" be performed in his memory. As was the man, so is the music — gentle, unpretentious, expressive through its intrinsic simplicity. It is a true lament, solemn but without rending tragedy, mournful more through implication than on its exterior. Faure and the memory of a conductor merged with silence; than these there could have been no greater eloquence.

Schoenberg's Kammersymphonie, Op. 9b, followed Faure. Looking back at this product of 1906 comes almost as a jolt of revelation, for what was greeted with derision and dismay 60 years ago now appears as but a step in Schoenberg's evolution and a logical extension of 19th-century Wagner and Strauss.

In expanded harmonic language and with chains of thematic fourths it is yet tonal, but now it seems that such harmony matters less than what happens to its motives and in its scoring. Through revealing soloistic writing its themes undergo very concentrated development; its phrase-structures are brief but with undiminished content so that a kaleidoscopic succession of ideas passes by in a short time. Its mood and texture change, but the chain of fourths — ascending, descending or divided among various timbres — forges a firm unity.

Opus 9b is the version for full orchestra, and the Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf performed it well, losing none of its internal facets or dynamic shape. Yet there is an inescapable alteration of tonal makeup, for where the original scoring for 16 instruments produces a more incisive, sharply transparent substance, the later version is reminiscent of Strauss in assigning solo lines to full sections. Its beauty and intensity, however, remain.

RACHMANINOV'S RHAPSODY on a Theme of Paganini, Op. 43, is one of those works whose merits it is possible to forget after some separation. One remembers its playful thematic turns and the warmly romantic melody at its center, perhaps that is all, and marks it down mentally as a sentimental trifle. But it is much more — a marvel of variation technique, a pianistic tour de force, a work of many moods whose peripatetic digressions never seem to tear quite loose from the subject at hand.

The performance of Leonard Pennario, substituting for an indisposed Jorge Bolet, was polished and captivating in moments of lightly virtuosic display, and a well-informed lyric flow warmed the interior strains. During heavier passages he was inclined to look to the pedal for support and it didn't help his articulation. Sometimes, too, Pennario and the orchestra didn't know quite what to expect from one another, but for that the Rhapsody fared with full voice and attractive flair.

To my knowledge this week brings the first Brahms Fourth Symphony Leinsdorf has conducted here since early 1962, and I much regret that it seemed to have been brought up in something of a hurry (it was originally scheduled for next Tuesday). Brahms, perhaps especially in the Fourth Symphony, does not benefit by haste.

Two good performances

The year of Schoenberg

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

There was a rare opportunity recently to hear good performances of both of Schoenberg's Chamber Symphonies within a 24-hour period: Thursday evening, Nov. 7, Frederik Prausnitz conducted No. 2 with the New England Conservatory Symphony Orchestra and the following afternoon Erich Leinsdorf conducted No. 1 at a Boston Symphony concert. This is Boston's year for those crucial, fascinating, and beautiful pieces: Prausnitz will conduct No. 1 later in his season as part of a survey of Schoenberg's non-12 tone orchestral music, and the Philharmonia plans to include both symphonies in its series. Richard Burgin and Leon Kirchner conducting.

Schoenberg began two Chamber Symphonies in 1906. One, the E major, Op. 9, he finished the same year. The other, in E flat minor, resisted him perhaps because Op.9, as it developed, pointed toward so interesting and promising a future that it became impossible for Schoenberg to continue to work in what, when he had begun, was still the present. He continued to make sketches for No. 2 until 1911 and again in 1916. Then he abandoned it, but surprisingly picked it up and completed it in 1939.

By 1906 Schoenberg had written a number of songs both with piano and with orchestra, two string quartets, "Transfigured Night," the symphonic poem "Pelleas et Melisande," and, except for the instrumentation, "Gurrelieder." Just ahead, in 1907-09, lie the works of his border-crossing out of the world on conventional tonality, the Quartet in F sharp minor, the Stefan George songs, the piano pieces, Op. 11, Five Pieces for Orchestra, Op.16, and "Erwartung."

Here is Schoenberg's own comment on the critical moment at which the Chamber Symphony No. 1 appeared: "When I had finished (it) I told my friends, 'Now I have established my style. I know now how I have to compose.' But my next work showed a great deviation from this style: It was a first step toward my present style. My destiny had forced me in this direction — I was not destined to continue in the manner of 'Transfigured Night' or 'Gurrelieder' or even 'Pelleas.' The Supreme Commander had ordered me on a harder road."

And No. 2? Between 1906 and 1939, Schoenberg composed, besides the works already mentioned, "Pierrot lunaire," the operas "Die glueckliche Hand," "Von heute auf morgen," and "Moses und Aron," most of his piano music, the Serenade, Quintet, and Suite, the Quartets Nos. 3 and 4, the Songs, Op.22, the Variations for Orchestra, and the Violin Concerto. Most of his creative life was bracketed inside that delicate arch of the E flat minor Chamber Symphony.

How was it that Schoenberg, who was so much of a developing, experiencing personality, could return after so long a time and after such interventions? Nostalgia, of course — that nostalgia he mentioned when he was asked to explain why, in his 60s, he had begun writing occasional tonal pieces again; that nostalgia we can so easily hear in his music, that makes it so different from that of his 9-years younger pupil, Webern, and that has brought him the contempt of some bright young people of all ages.

But nostalgia serves better as explanation of why Schoenberg wanted to return than of how he, whose catalogue is full of incomplete works and projects not carried out, actually could return. When Schoenberg told his friends in 1906, "Now I have established my style, I now know how I have to compose," he was in the deepest sense right. A vast expansion of his vocabulary was to follow, and compositional innovations that were to change the face of music in the 20th century, but the essential Schoenberg, the man with something to say and with an unmistakable voice, was already all there.

Prausnitz spoke to this problem in the interesting program note he wrote for his concert, and he also quoted Schoenberg's biographer Stuckenschmidt on the subject of this music: "Stylistically, already by 1906 it presented such a definite unity that almost no important new characteristic was added to it later."

In the published score of No. 2, the first movement, an E flat minor Adagio, bears the completion date, Aug. 15, 1939. I do not know the details, but the assumption of Schoenberg experts seems to be that the Adagio was essentially complete in 1906, though obviously, because of the date in the score, that must have been further work or revision later, and that Schoenberg's main task in 1939 was the making of a finale. He abandoned his original idea and arrived at his eventual plan, a quick movement in G major (the key relationship of the two movements is typical Haydn-Beethoven), followed by a return to the tempo, material, and key of the first movement.

The effect is not so much of finale with epilogue as of an arch. The central part effects the highest tension in the symphony, partly because it is harmonically more emancipated than either Adagio, and partly because of its peculiar fiery, and quite non-Romantic, intensity, which, from point of view of musical character, seems to me unique in Schoenberg's oeuvre. The retransition, in which the Adagio, when it returns, is subtly but deeply transformed by the experience of the "con fuoco" movement, to make what Prausnitz with perfect accuracy called "the shattering close of the work."

What of course has struck the E flat minor Adagio music is not just the experience of the past few minutes, but that of three decades. The coincidence of technique and psychology, of form and expression, is complete. One could well apply to the end of the Chamber Symphony No. 2 what Schoenberg said about his 1940 Organ Variations (in D minor), that here is the filling of the gap between his early and his "dissonant" music. To that he added a significant further thought: "There are many still unused possibilities here."

The characters of the two quasi-simultaneous symphonies are marvelously different, and one's delight in their diversity is deepened by an understanding of the place each fills in Schoenberg's life: The exuberant No. 1, the springboard into an exciting and uncharted future, and the introspective No. 2, the arch over the life work, and, in a way that I am only now beginning to understand, the key to it.

I was glad of the chance that brought the two works together in consecutive concerts, and I should certainly not wish to end this note without again expressing gartitude to both conductors and to both orchestras for their meticulously prepared, understanding, and vital performances.

TUESDAY A SERIES

THIRD PROGRAM
Tuesday evening November 12 at 8.30

CHARLES WILSON conductor

FAURE — 'The death of Mélisande' from the incidental music to 'Pelléas et Mélisande' op. 80

This piece is played in memory of Charles Munch; the audience is asked not to applaud.

BRAHMS — Symphony no. 3 in F op. 90*

Allegro con brio
Andante
Poco allegretto
Allegro

RACHMANINOV — Rhapsody on a theme of Paganini op. 43

LEONARD PENNARIO

intermission

STRAVINSKY — Le sacre du printemps (The rite of spring)

Part one: The adoration of the earth

Introduction – Auguries of spring (Dances of the young girls) – Mock abduction – spring Khorovod (Round dance) – Games of the rival clans – Procession of the wise elder – Adoration of the earth (wise elder) – Dance of the earth

Part two: The sacrifice

Introduction – Mystical circles of the young girls – Glorification of the chosen victim – The summoning of the ancients – Ritual of the ancients – Sacrificial dance (the chosen victim)

Leonard Pennario plays the Steinway piano

Symphony Hall Rites

By Peter M. Knapp

The slow, sad "Death of Melisande" from Gabriel Faure's incidental music to "Pelleas et Melisande" paid homage to the late Charles Munch again at last night's Boston Symphony concert, as the audience stood in tribute to the orchestra's former music director.

Originally, the program conducted by Assistant Conductor Charles Wilson was to include Beethoven's First Symphony and Brahms' Fourth. And pianist Jorge Bolet was scheduled to appear in Rachmaninoff's "Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini." But Bolet became ill, Leonard Pennario substituted on short notice, and the program was otherwise shuffled to include Brahms' Third Symphony and Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring."

Neither Brahms nor Rachmaninoff fared particularly well. The symphony suffered from a basic lack of control in the first movement, with individual parts out of balance and shrilly calling for individual attention. It was like a cake mixture in which the ingredients refuse to blend. Brahms surely requires more careful mixing, and at times the main lines were buried under subsidiary material.

Things began to even out along toward the middle of the andante, though, and the third movement had an airy legato, at last with homogenized Brahmsian sound. Again in the finale there were uneasy moments, and it didn't quite come off.

The Rachmaninoff was pitched on a rather vulgar level, loud, explosive, and with little contrast to set off the variations. Many in the audience, though, were willing to overlook the excesses for the virtues of Pennario's confident virtuosity.

He has a sure set of fingers and a brilliant technique — obvious assets for a piece of flashy pianism which the Rachmaninoff essentially is. Nevertheless, beneath the torrent of notes lay little subtlety and little variation of tone production. It was an impressive display of surface gloss.

Forceful Stravinsky

"The Rite of Spring" set matters right, in a performance of cohesion, clarity and considerable punch. Wilson handled Stravinsky's complex score and all its metrical traps with admirable precision and restraint, without losing its high-octaine primitive drive.

Perhaps there could have been more emotion injected here and there, but the performance had notable balance and superb playing. The woodwind introduction to part one was especially good, as were the subsequent contributions from the trumpets, timpani and bass clarinet. And the dances ending both parts reached a savage force.

The Patriot Ledger, Wed., Nov. 13, 1968

12.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

NOV 9 1969

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905

NOV 1 7 19

New England Newsclip

Weekend Symphony

The Music Was Munch's: Gentle

By McLAREN HARRIS

The weekend Symphony program bears scant resemblance to the one originally planned for this time. Only Rachmaninov remains from the first composers list of Beethoven, Rachmaninov, Weill and Liszt. A week ago it was altered to read Schoenberg, Stravinsky, Weill and Rachmaninov, and upon the death of Charles Munch the final form became Faure, Schoenberg, Rachmaninov and Brahms.

ACCORDING TO some of the Symphony players Munch had once expressed a preference that "The Death of Melisande" from Faure's Incidental Music to "Pelleas et Melisande" be performed in his memory. As was the man, so is the music — gentle, unpretentious, expressive through its intrinsic simplicity. It is a true lament, solemn but without rending tragedy, mournful more through implication than on its exterior. Faure and the memory of a conductor merged with silence; than these there could have been no greater eloquence.

Schoenberg's Kammersymphonie, Op. 9b, followed Faure. Looking back at this product of 1906 comes almost as a jolt of revelation, for what was greeted with derision and dismay 60 years ago now appears as but a step in Schoenberg's evolution and a logical extension of 19th-century Wagner and Strauss.

In expanded harmonic language and with chains of thematic fourths it is yet tonal, but now it seems that such harmony matters less than what happens to its motives and in its scoring. Through revealing soloistic writing its themes undergo very concentrated development; its phrase-structures are brief but with undiminished content so that a kaleidoscopic succession of ideas passes by in a short time. Its mood and texture change, but the chain of fourths — ascending, descending or divided among various timbres — forges a firm unity.

Opus 9b is the version for full orchestra, and the Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf performed it well, losing none of its internal facets or dynamic shape. Yet there is an inescapable alteration of tonal makeup, for where the original scoring for 16 instruments produces a more incisive, sharply transparent substance, the later version is reminiscent of Strauss in assigning solo lines to full sections. Its beauty and intensity, however, remain.

RACHMANINOV'S RHAPSODY on a Theme of Paganini, Op. 43, is one of those works whose merits it is possible to forget after some separation. One remembers its playful thematic turns and the warmly romantic melody at its center, perhaps that is all, and marks it down mentally as a sentimental trifle. But it is much more — a marvel of variation technique, a pianistic tour de force, a work of many moods whose peripatetic digressions never seem to tear quite loose from the subject at hand.

The performance of Leonard Pennario, substituting for an indisposed Jorge Bolet, was polished and captivating in moments of lightly virtuosic display, and a well-informed lyric flow warmed the interior strains. During heavier passages he was inclined to look to the pedal for support and it didn't help his articulation. Sometimes, too, Pennario and the orchestra didn't know quite what to expect from one another, but for that the Rhapsody fared with full voice and attractive flair.

To my knowledge this week brings the first Brahms Fourth Symphony Leinsdorf has conducted here since early 1962, and I much regret that it seemed to have been brought up in something of a hurry (it was originally scheduled for next Tuesday). Brahms, perhaps especially in the Fourth Symphony, does not benefit by haste.

Two good performances

The year of Schoenberg

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

There was a rare opportunity recently to hear good performances of both of Schoenberg's Chamber Symphonies within a 24-hour period: Thursday evening, Nov. 7, Frederik Prausnitz conducted No. 2 with the New England Conservatory Symphony Orchestra and the following afternoon Erich Leinsdorf conducted No. 1 at a Boston Symphony concert. This is Boston's year for those crucial, fascinating, and beautiful pieces: Prausnitz will conduct No. 1 later in his season as part of a survey of Schoenberg's non-12 tone orchestral music, and the Philharmonia plans to include both symphonies in its series. Richard Burgin and Leon Kirchner conducting.

Schoenberg began two Chamber Symphonies in 1906. One, the E major, Op. 9, he finished the same year. The other, in E flat minor, resisted him perhaps because Op.9, as it developed, pointed toward so interesting and promising a future that it became impossible for Schoenberg to continue to work in what, when he had begun, was still the present. He continued to make sketches for No. 2 until 1911 and again in 1916. Then he abandoned it, but surprisingly picked it up and completed it in 1939.

By 1906 Schoenberg had written a number of songs both with piano and with orchestra, two string quartets, "Transfigured Night," the symphonic poem "Pelleas et Melisande," and, except for the instrumentation, "Gurrelieder." Just ahead, in 1907-09, lie the works of his border-crossing out of the world on conventional tonality, the Quartet in F sharp minor, the Stefan George songs, the piano pieces, Op. 11, Five Pieces for Orchestra, Op.16, and "Erwartung."

Here is Schoenberg's own comment on the critical moment at which the Chamber Symphony No. 1 appeared: "When I had finished (it) I told my friends, 'Now I have established my style. I know now how I have to compose.' But my next work showed a great deviation from this style: It was a first step toward my present style. My destiny had forced me in this direction — I was not destined to continue in the manner of 'Transfigured Night' or 'Gurrelieder' or even 'Pelleas.' The Supreme Commander had ordered me on a harder road."

And No. 2? Between 1906 and 1939, Schoenberg composed, besides the works already mentioned, "Pierrot lunaire," the operas "Die glueckliche Hand," "Von heute auf morgen," and "Moses und Aron," most of his piano music, the Serenade, Quintet, and Suite, the Quartets Nos. 3 and 4, the Songs, Op.22, the Variations for Orchestra, and the Violin Concerto. Most of his creative life was bracketed inside that delicate arch of the E flat minor Chamber Symphony.

How was it that Schoenberg, who was so much of a developing, experiencing personality, could return after so long a time and after such interventions? Nostalgia, of course — that nostalgia he mentioned when he was asked to explain why, in his 60s, he had begun writing occasional tonal pieces again; that nostalgia we can so easily hear in his music, that makes it so different from that of his 9-years younger pupil, Webern, and that has brought him the contempt of some bright young people of all ages.

But nostalgia serves better as explanation of why Schoenberg wanted to return than of how he, whose catalogue is full of incomplete works and projects not carried out, actually could return. When Schoenberg told his friends in 1906, "Now I have established my style. I now know how I have to compose," he was in the deepest sense right. A vast expansion of his vocabulary was to follow, and compositional innovations that were to change the face of music in the 20th century, but the essential Schoenberg, the man with something to say and with an unmistakable voice, was already all there.

Prausnitz spoke to this problem in the interesting program note he wrote for his concert, and he also quoted Schoenberg's biographer Stuckenschmidt on the subject of this music: "Stylistically, already by 1906 it presented such a definite unity that almost no important new characteristic was added to it later."

In the published score of No. 2, the first movement, an E flat minor Adagio, bears the completion date, Aug. 15, 1939. I do not know the details, but the assumption of Schoenberg experts seems to be that the Adagio was essentially complete in 1906, though obviously, because of the date in the score, that must have been further work or revision later, and that Schoenberg's main task in 1939 was the making of a finale. He abandoned his original idea and arrived at his eventual plan, a quick movement in G major (the key relationship of the two movements is typical Haydn-Beethoven), followed by a return to the tempo, material, and key of the first movement.

The effect is not so much of finale with epilogue as of an arch. The central part effects the highest tension in the symphony, partly because it is harmonically more emancipated than either Adagio, and partly because of its peculiar fiery, and quite non-Romantic, intensity, which, from point of view of musical character, seems to me unique in Schoenberg's oeuvre. The retransition, in which the Adagio, when it returns, is subtly but deeply transformed by the experience of the "con fuoco" movement, to make what Prausnitz with perfect accuracy called "the shattering close of the work."

What of course has struck the E flat minor Adagio music is not just the experience of the past few minutes, but that of three decades. The coincidence of technique and psychology, of form and expression, is complete. One could well apply to the end of the Chamber Symphony No. 2 what Schoenberg said about his 1940 Organ Variations (in D minor), that here is the filling of the gap between his early and his "dissonant" music. To that he added a significant further thought: "There are many still unused possibilities here."

The characters of the two quasi-simultaneous symphonies are marvelously different, and one's delight in their diversity is deepened by an understanding of the place each fills in Schoenberg's life: The exuberant No. 1, the springboard into an exciting and uncharted future, and the introspective No. 2, the arch over the life work, and, in a way that I am only now beginning to understand, the key to it.

I was glad of the chance that brought the two works together in consecutive concerts, and I should certainly not wish to end this note without again expressing gartitude to both conductors and to both orchestras for their meticulously prepared, understanding, and vital performances.

TUESDAY A SERIES

THIRD PROGRAM
Tuesday evening November 12 at 8.30

CHARLES WILSON conductor

FAURE — 'The death of Mélisande' from the incidental music to 'Pelléas et Mélisande' op. 80

This piece is played in memory of Charles Munch; the audience is asked not to applaud.

BRAHMS — Symphony no. 3 in F op. 90*

Allegro con brio
Andante
Poco allegretto
Allegro

RACHMANINOV — Rhapsody on a theme of Paganini op. 43

LEONARD PENNARIO

intermission

STRAVINSKY — Le sacre du printemps (The rite of spring)

Part one: The adoration of the earth

Introduction – Auguries of spring (Dances of the young girls) – Mock abduction – spring Khorovod (Round dance) – Games of the rival clans – Procession of the wise elder – Adoration of the earth (wise elder) – Dance of the earth

Part two: The sacrifice

Introduction – Mystical circles of the young girls – Glorification of the chosen victim – The summoning of the ancients – Ritual of the ancients – Sacrificial dance (the chosen victim)

Leonard Pennario plays the Steinway piano

Symphony Hall Rites

By Peter M. Knapp

The slow, sad "Death of Melisande" from Gabriel Faure's incidental music to "Pelleas et Melisande" paid homage to the late Charles Munch again at last night's Boston Symphony concert, as the audience stood in tribute to the orchestra's former music director.

Originally, the program conducted by Assistant Conductor Charles Wilson was to include Beethoven's First Symphony and Brahms' Fourth. And pianist Jorge Bolet was scheduled to appear in Rachmaninoff's "Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini." But Bolet became ill, Leonard Pennario substituted on short notice, and the program was otherwise shuffled to include Brahms' Third Symphony and Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring."

Neither Brahms nor Rachmaninoff fared particularly well. The symphony suffered from a basic lack of control in the first movement, with individual parts out of balance and shrilly calling for individual attention. It was like a cake mixture in which the ingredients refuse to blend. Brahms surely requires more careful mixing, and at times the main lines were buried under subsidiary material.

Things began to even out along toward the middle of the andante, though, and the third movement had an airy legato, at last with homogenized Brahmsian sound. Again in the finale there were uneasy moments, and it didn't quite come off.

The Rachmaninoff was pitched on a rather vulgar level, loud, explosive, and with little contrast to set off the variations. Many in the audience, though, were willing to overlook the excesses for the virtues of Pennario's confident virtuosity.

He has a sure set of fingers and a brilliant technique — obvious assets for a piece of flashy pianism which the Rachmaninoff essentially is. Nevertheless, beneath the torrent of notes lay little subtlety and little variation of tone production. It was an impressive display of surface gloss.

Forceful Stravinsky

"The Rite of Spring" set matters right, in a performance of cohesion, clarity and considerable punch. Wilson handled Stravinsky's complex score and all its metrical traps with admirable precision and restraint, without losing its high-octaine primitive drive.

Perhaps there could have been more emotion injected here and there, but the performance had notable balance and superb playing. The woodwind introduction to part one was especially good, as were the subsequent contributions from the trumpets, timpani and bass clarinet. And the dances ending both parts reached a savage force.

The Patriot Ledger, Wed., Nov. 13, 1968

SEVENTH PROGRAM
Friday afternoon November 15 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening November 16 at 8.30

CHARLES WILSON conductor

STRAUSS — Don Juan op. 20

STRAVINSKY — Le chant du rossignol (The nightingale's song)
The fête in the Emperor of China's palace
The two nightingales
Illness and recovery of the Emperor of China

intermission

SIBELIUS — Symphony no. 2 in D major op. 43
Allegretto
Tempo andante ma rubato
Vivacissimo – lento e suave
Finale: allegro moderato

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
NOV 16 1968
New England Newsclip

Conducting lacks individuality

By HARRY NEVILLE
Associated Critic

Associate Conductor Charles Wilson led the Boston Symphony Friday afternoon in a program of two very familiar works — Richard Strauss' "Don Juan" and Sibelius' Symphony No. 2 — and a third — Stravinsky's "Le Chant du Rossignol" — whose name is likely for most of us, to be more familiar than the music.

Such works as the Strauss and Sibelius are fairly sure bets for both orchestras and conductors. Most groups can play them while sleeping — and sometimes do. But even badly played, they somehow manage to please most audiences.

In a sense, however, it takes some courage to present these pieces for both are especially revealing of a conductor.

For one thing, their very familiarity provides an immediate basis of comparison. For another, they are a kind of music that allows a great deal of room for the legitimate expression of individuality.

No matter how well a conductor may solve their mechanical problems, he will ultimately be judged on a very personal level of taste.

It is the rather nebulous quality of individuality that seems to me the element most lacking in Wilson's conducting. There was very little of a personal imprint in his treatment of tempos, for example, or dynamics. Although quite nicely played, the pieces hadn't enough of the surge and excitement that comes from plasticity of phrasing or from a superb sense of the dramatic pause and attack.

It is a pleasure, though, to report that his relatively straightforward approach had its positive side too. There is a certain inviting vulgarity about much of the music of Strauss and Sibelius, and Wilson did not succumb to its lure. Climaxes were never overwrought or tempos rushed for the sake of easy effects.

Stravinsky's "Le Chant du Rossignol" is in many ways the entithesis of the other works on the program. There is hardly any question of "interpretation" here; it only needs to be played—as nearly as possible — as written. And this is quite a feat. The score abounds in intricacies that present really difficult ensemble problems.

These were handled quite well, for the most part. My only real question concerns a cut of some seven pages toward the end of the score. It had the effect of very nearly destroying the musical sense of the conclusion.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Charles Wilson conducting. Strauss, "Don Juan;" Stravinsky, "Le Chant du Rossignol;" Sibelius, Symphony No. 2. Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
NOV 16 1968
New England Newsclip

SUNDAY ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 434,330
NOV 17 1968
New England Newsclip

MUSIC NOTES

11/17 Rec-Am

Sibelius Symphony Scored

By GEORGE GELLES
Music Critic

In the entire orchestral repertory, Jean Sibelius' Second Symphony (led last Friday at Symphony Hall by Charles Wilson) is the piece most intimately bound with the history of the BSO.

Wilhelm Gericke brought the work to Boston, the first piece by the Finnish composer to be heard here, in 1904, and its reception was cool. But by its next appearance on New Year's Eve of 1908 there was a new critic in town; Olin Downes, writing for the Boston Post, was a man mad for Sibelius, and did his best to spread the word.

His review on the first of the year, 1909, hit rapturous heights of giddiness; "It is disconcertingly vital. It is brusque, direct, unsparing of emphasis, a primeval product . . . The instrumentation is harsh and thick, and as often again of the highest brilliance . . . Destiny has its hand on this music, its might is unconquerable . . . There is no escaping the mood. And what themes!" So it gushed for 500 words, and the Second Symphony stayed in town.

★

The greatest honor, though, was paid it in 1936, when Serge Koussevitzky chose the Second for the opening concert of his Berkshire Symphonic Festival. Tanglewood's forerunner at its moment of birth—"The exceptional musical event of the summer in America," said Downes—featured three concerts on a borrowed estate, and brought Sibelius and Symphony closer than ever.

Things changed, Sibelius' fortunes included, and the Symphony met with some pretty harsh words. Eloquent and razor-sharp was Virgil Thompson, who had the good luck to find the piece on the first New York Philharmonic concert he reviewed for the Herald-Tribune.

★

"Twenty years' residence on the European continent has largely spared me Sibelius," Thomson bemoaned. "I found (the Second Symphony) vulgar, self-indulgent, and provincial beyond all description. I realize that there are sincere Sibelius-lovers in the world, though I must say I've never met one among educated, professional musicians." These were fighting words, but Downes, who was then with the New York Times seems to have avoided the clash.

A contemporary critique must side with Thomson (whom, in many matters other than Sibelius, history has shown to have been the far more perceptive of the two); Sibelius, he said, is a demagogic symphonist, because the expressive power of his work is greater than its interest as music. "Sibelius is in no sense a naif; he is merely provincial;" perhaps, but powerful enough to have made his Boston relationship a lasting one.

Stravinsky's 'Rossignol' Has Fanciful Appeal

By McLAREN HARRIS

Stravinsky's "Le Chant du Rossignol," postponed from last week, has turned up on the current Symphony program led by assistant conductor Charles Wilson, replacing Benjamin Britten's Four Sea Interludes from "Peter Grimes." The Stravinsky thus makes its first series appearance in eight years—a pleasant return, to be sure, but all the same I hope the Interludes will not now be lost.

Begun before and completed after such sensational creations as "The Firebird" and "The Rite of Spring," "Le Rossignol" was Stravinsky's first operatic opus. I am tempted to add "abortive," for the composer's own dissatisfaction with his opera is evident in its revision as a ballet, then further condensation into a three-part concert form, both following the original within a span of six years.

THE THREE PARTS, played without break, follow at a rather rapid pace the basic outline of Hans Christian Andersen's tale about the true nightingale and its clockwork counterpart. The orchestral textures are light, projecting an atmosphere of a child's fairy tale with gently ringing timbres from piano, celesta and harp, ample twittering from woodwinds and quasi-martial fanfares from the trumpets. The musical ideas are well-expressed—contrast the cheerful-yet-tender turns of melody depicting the real nightingale's song with the ostinato-like descending chirp for the mechanical bird—and even without program the work has a fanciful appeal through the simplicity of its musical elements and delightfully clear orchestration. Andersen's tale is sufficient to fill a symphonic poem; an opera, hardly.

Stravinsky's piece brought the orchestra's and Wilson's best efforts of the day. It had been scheduled under Erich Leinsdorf, and Wilson obviously had spent much in preparation since the shuffle, for he had everything — orchestral language, meter, tempo — securely in hand.

Stravinsky's companions, Richard Strauss' "Don Juan" and the Second Symphony of Sibelius, were also given voluble expression on the high dynamic end. "Don Juan" swept through its heaviest passages with considerable dash and assurance, but the intervening lyric sections were inclined to lack much lustre, dropping down to a safe but constant volume level and staying there until time to rise again. The pauses of silence were also overplayed to some extent, causing some loose joints in the architecture.

Something of a similar bent may be said for the Sibelius performance. Wilson gave good play to the peaks of substance, which came across in decent form with a few ragged edges of tone, but the interior, so to speak, had not the eloquence to sustain the overall shape. Those silences, again, plus the tempo rubato of the second movement were laid out too explicitly, and form dissolved into rhapsody. Wilson was, however, able to regroup his forces in the finale for a decently momentous conclusion, although the suspense of minor-major tonality could have been greater (a trumpeter, most unfortunately, gave in momentarily under the strain).

Next week the orchestra goes on tour, and the Nov. 29-30 programs have undergone another reshuffle. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct Beethoven's Symphony No. 1, Debussy's Rhapsody for saxophone (Felix Viscuglia, soloist), Mozart's B flat Piano Concerto, K. 595, with Claude Frank, and Weill's suite from "Kleine Dreigroschenmusik."

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873
NOV 16 1968
New England Newsclip

Wilson Leads 2d Symphony

By GEORGE GELLES
Music Critic

Charles Wilson, the assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony who has done consistently excellent work preparing choruses that sing with the orchestra, had the podium to himself yesterday afternoon and chose to share it with musical has-beens.

Jean Sibelius is an objectional composer because he asks from his listener neither interest nor intelligence, only that he be there so the music—the Second Symphony in this case—can push him around. The Symphony has sweep and its moments of power, but extremely little musical worth. It is provincial music and wants a backwoods response.

What I heard of the work (the first two movements) sounded fine. Wilson conducted cleanly realizing the composer's gesture, and not good playing from the orchestra, too (though the basses couldn't play the opening of the second movement as one).

His reading of Strauss' blustery "Don Juan" was very well led, pointed and with lots of zip, but there's no need to further slow down the built-in ritard that Strauss has written just before the entrance of the sticky "feminine" theme).

Aside from very ugly oboe playing, the orchestra's response was precise and sharp, the kind of playing Stravinsky's "Chant du Rossignol" needed, but never got. "Rossignol" is Stravinsky twice removed (originally an opera, then a ballet, then the symphonic poem heard at Symphony Hall), and not his most coherent score. It has flare and atmosphere and a primitive brilliance, though, but needs crisp and stylish solo work to come alive.

There was a seriously distorting cut made in the score, and for the BSO to nowhere inform its patrons of this seems particularly high-handed.

Stravinsky, Strauss, Sibelius at Symphony

By Alan Sly

High on the list of the Boston Symphony's assets is Charles Wilson, its assistant conductor, who was in command this week. The current repertoire-shuffling caused cancellation of the Peter Grimes interludes but regaled us after all with Stravinsky's "Le Chant du Rossignol," and we are promised, two weeks from now, the Threepenny Opera Suite when the orchestra returns from its tour west and south.

The Stravinsky was preceded by the Strauss "Don Juan" and followed by the Sibelius Second. Such a program, spanning two decades before and and two after the turn of the century, can be surveyed somewhat objectively, as it was presented. Orchestra and conductor cooperated at every point to deliver a well-paced, lithe, and vivid exposition of three large tone-canvases.

Mr. Wilson takes every detail of the task in his easy stride. He leaves nothing for granted nor does he fuss unduly, so that to observe him closely is to learn a great deal about musical syntax and to have some rhythmic complexities (such as abound in the Stravinsky) clearly elucidated. This may not be symphonic listening at its most exalted level, but it is a very necessary and healthy step in that direction, and one could leave the hall feeling the benefit of increased enlightenment, and with the recollection of a feast of splendid sounds. The orchestra played superbly, and if any very minor blemishes occurred, the memory of them was at once erased.

What persisted, however, was a nagging thought that Sibelius overstays his welcome in this day and age. That great bear of a temperament, it might be argued, rather smothers one. One never has a chance to meet it half way, as one willingly does with the Stravinsky. Even for all its arrogant self-pride, the Strauss has grace and wit, and stays on its own side of the room.

But when all's said and done Sibelius is a prince among composers, and our vocabulary would be the poorer if it did not include the idioms he added to it. Incidentally, James Lyons's rundown of critical opinion on Sibelius (in the program book) makes engaging reading. It makes one want to go and watch Mr. Wilson in action a second time. Yet there are symphonists, whose careers also straddled these recent decades, whom we never hear anymore. Should not they too be recalled?

On the day following Thanksgiving the incomparable Debussy Saxophone Rhapsody (with Felix Viscuglia as soloist), Mozart's last piano concerto (with Claude Frank), the Threepenny Opera Suite, and the Beethoven First will be heard.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150
NOV 18
New England Newsclip

SEVENTH PROGRAM
Friday afternoon November 15 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening November 16 at 8.30

CHARLES WILSON conductor

STRAUSS — Don Juan op. 20

STRAVINSKY — Le chant du rossignol (The nightingale's song)
The fête in the Emperor of China's palace
The two nightingales
Illness and recovery of the Emperor of China

intermission

SIBELIUS — Symphony no. 2 in D major op. 43
Allegretto
Tempo andante ma rubato
Vivacissimo – lento e suave
Finale: allegro moderato

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
NOV 16 1968
New England Newsclip

Conducting lacks individuality

By HARRY NEVILLE
Associated Critic

Associate Conductor Charles Wilson led the Boston Symphony Friday afternoon in a program of two very familiar works — Richard Strauss' "Don Juan" and Sibelius' Symphony No. 2 — and a third — Stravinsky's "Le Chant du Rossignol" — whose name is likely for most of us, to be more familiar than the music.

Such works as the Strauss and Sibelius are fairly sure bets for both orchestras and conductors. Most groups can play them while sleeping — and sometimes do. But even badly played, they somehow manage to please most audiences.

In a sense, however, it takes some courage to present these pieces for both are especially revealing of a conductor.

For one thing, their very familiarity provides an immediate basis of comparison. For another, they are a kind of music that allows a great deal of room for the legitimate expression of individuality.

No matter how well a conductor may solve their mechanical problems, he will ultimately be judged on a very personal level of taste.

It is the rather nebulous quality of individuality that seems to me the element most lacking in Wilson's conducting. There was very little of a personal imprint in his treatment of tempos, for example, or dynamics. Although quite nicely played, the pieces hadn't enough of the surge and excitement that comes from plasticity of phrasing or from a superb sense of the dramatic pause and attack.

It is a pleasure, though, to report that his relatively straightforward approach had its positive side too. There is a certain inviting vulgarity about much of the music of Strauss and Sibelius, and Wilson did not succumb to its lure. Climaxes were never overwrought or tempos rushed for the sake of easy effects.

Stravinsky's "Le Chant du Rossignol" is in many ways the entithesis of the other works on the program. There is hardly any question of "interpretation" here; it only needs to be played—as nearly as possible — as written. And this is quite a feat. The score abounds in intricacies that present really difficult ensemble problems.

These were handled quite well, for the most part. My only real question concerns a cut of some seven pages toward the end of the score. It had the effect of very nearly destroying the musical sense of the conclusion.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Ch[redacted]ducting. Strauss, "Don Juan;" Stravinsky, "Le Chant du Rossignol;" Sibelius, Symphony No. 2. Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
NOV 16 1968
New England Newsclip

SUNDAY ADVERTISER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 434,330
NOV 17 1968
New England Newsclip

MUSIC NOTES

Sibelius Symphony Scored

11/17 Rec-Am

By GEORGE GELLES
Music Critic

In the entire orchestral repertory, Jean Sibelius' Second Symphony (led last Friday at Symphony Hall by Charles Wilson) is the piece most intimately bound with the history of the BSO.

Wilhelm Gericke brought the work to Boston, the first piece by the Finnish composer to be heard here, in 1904, and its reception was cool. But by its next appearance on New Year's Eve of 1908 there was a new critic in town; Olin Downes, writing for the Boston Post, was a man mad for Sibelius, and did his best to spread the word.

His review on the first of the year, 1909, hit rapturous heights of giddiness: "It is disconcertingly vital. It is brusque, direct, unsparing of emphasis, a primeval product . . . The instrumentation is harsh and thick, and as often again of the highest brilliance . . . Destiny has its hand on this music, its might is unconquerable . . . There is no escaping the mood. And what themes!" So it gushed for 500 words, and the Second Symphony stayed in town.

★

The greatest honor, though, was paid it in 1936, when Serge Koussevitzky chose the Second for the opening concert of his Berkshire Symphonic Festival. Tanglewood's forerunner at its moment of birth—"The exceptional musical event of the summer in America," said Downes—featured three concerts on a borrowed estate, and brought Sibelius and Symphony closer than ever.

Things changed, Sibelius' fortunes included, and the Symphony met with some pretty harsh words. Eloquent and razor-sharp was Virgil Thompson, who had the good luck to find the piece on the first New York Philharmonic concert he reviewed for the Herald-Tribune.

★

"Twenty years' residence on the European continent has largely spared me Sibelius," Thomson bemoaned. "I found (the Second Symphony) vulgar, self-indulgent, and provincial beyond all description. I realize that there are sincere Sibelius-lovers in the world, though I must say I've never met one among educated, professional musicians." These were fighting words, but Downes, who was then with the New York Times seems to have avoided the clash.

A contemporary critique must side with Thomson (whom, in many matters other than Sibelius, history has shown to have been the far more perceptive of the two); Sibelius, he said, is a demagogic symphonist, because the expressive power of his work is greater than its interest as music. "Sibelius is in no sense a naif; he is merely provincial;" perhaps, but powerful enough to have made his Boston relationship a lasting one.

Stravinsky's 'Rossignol' Has Fanciful Appeal

By McLAREN HARRIS

Stravinsky's "Le Chant du Rossignol," postponed from last week, has turned up on the current Symphony program led by assistant conductor Charles Wilson, replacing Benjamin Britten's Four Sea Interludes from "Peter Grimes." The Stravinsky thus makes its first series appearance in eight years—a pleasant return, to be sure, but all the same I hope the Interludes will not now be lost.

Begun before and completed after such sensational creations as "The Firebird" and "The Rite of Spring," "Le Rossignol" was Stravinsky's first operatic opus. I am tempted to add "abortive," for the composer's own dissatisfaction with his opera is evident in its revision as a ballet, then further condensation into a three-part concert form, both following the original within a span of six years.

THE THREE PARTS, played without break, follow at a rather rapid pace the basic outline of Hans Christian Andersen's tale about the true nightingale and its clockwork counterpart. The orchestral textures are light, projecting an atmosphere of a child's fairy tale with gently ringing timbres from piano, celesta and harp, ample twittering from woodwinds and quasi-martial fanfares from the trumpets. The musical ideas are well-expressed—contrast the cheerful-yet-tender turns of melody depicting the real nightingale's song with the ostinato-like descending chirp for the mechanical bird—and even without program the work has a fanciful appeal through the simplicity of its musical elements and delightfully clear orchestration. Andersen's tale is sufficient to fill a symphonic poem; an opera, hardly.

Stravinsky's piece brought the orchestra's and Wilson's best efforts of the day. It had been scheduled under Erich Leinsdorf, and Wilson obviously had spent much in preparation since the shuffle, for he had everything — orchestral language, meter, tempo — securely in hand.

Stravinsky's companions, Richard Strauss' "Don Juan" and the Second Symphony of Sibelius, were also given voluble expression on the high dynamic end. "Don Juan" swept through its heaviest passages with considerable dash and assurance, but the intervening lyric sections were inclined to lack much lustre, dropping down to a safe but constant volume level and staying there until time to rise again. The pauses of silence were also overplayed to some extent, causing some loose joints in the architecture.

Something of a similar bent may be said for the Sibelius performance. Wilson gave good play to the peaks of substance, which came across in decent form with a few ragged edges of tone, but the interior, so to speak, had not the eloquence to sustain the overall shape. Those silences, again, plus the tempo rubato of the second movement were laid out too explicitly, and form dissolved into rhapsody. Wilson was, however, able to regroup his forces in the finale for a decently momentous conclusion, although the suspense of minor-major tonality could have been greater (a trumpeter, most unfortunately, gave in momentarily under the strain).

Next week the orchestra goes on tour, and the Nov. 29-30 programs have undergone another reshuffle. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct Beethoven's Symphony No. 1, Debussy's Rhapsody for saxophone (Felix Viscuglia, soloist), Mozart's B flat Piano Concerto, K. 595, with Claude Frank, and Weill's suite from "Kleine Dreigroschenmusik."

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873
NOV 16 1968
New England Newsclip

Stravinsky, Strauss, Sibelius at Symphony

By Alan Sly

High on the list of the Boston Symphony's assets is Charles Wilson, its assistant conductor, who was in command this week. The current repertoire-shuffling caused cancellation of the Peter Grimes interludes but regaled us after all with Stravinsky's "Le Chant du Rossignol," and we are promised, two weeks from now, the Threepenny Opera Suite when the orchestra returns from its tour west and south.

The Stravinsky was preceded by the Strauss "Don Juan" and followed by the Sibelius Second. Such a program, spanning two decades before and and two after the turn of the century, can be surveyed somewhat objectively, as it was presented. Orchestra and conductor cooperated at every point to deliver a well-paced, lithe, and vivid exposition of three large tone-canvases.

Mr. Wilson takes every detail of the task in his easy stride. He leaves nothing for granted nor does he fuss unduly, so that to observe him closely is to learn a great deal about musical syntax and to have some rhythmic complexities (such as abound in the Stravinsky) clearly elucidated. This may not be symphonic listening at its most exalted level, but it is a very necessary and healthy step in that direction, and one could leave the hall feeling the benefit of increased enlightenment, and with the recollection of a feast of splendid sounds. The orchestra played superbly, and if any very minor blemishes occurred, the memory of them was at once erased.

What persisted, however, was a nagging thought that Sibelius overstays his welcome in this day and age. That great bear of a temperament, it might be argued, rather smothers one. One never has a chance to meet it half way, as one willingly does with the Stravinsky. Even for all its arrogant self-pride, the Strauss has grace and wit, and stays on its own side of the room.

But when all's said and done Sibelius is a prince among composers, and our vocabulary would be the poorer if it did not include the idioms he added to it. Incidentally, James Lyons's rundown of critical opinion on Sibelius (in the program book) makes engaging reading. It makes one want to go and watch Mr. Wilson in action a second time. Yet there are symphonists, whose careers also straddled these recent decades, whom we never hear anymore. Should not they too be recalled?

On the day following Thanksgiving the incomparable Debussy Saxophone Rhapsody (with Felix Viscuglia as soloist), Mozart's last piano concerto (with Claude Frank), the Threepenny Opera Suite, and the Beethoven First will be heard.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150
NOV 18
New England Newsclip

Wilson Leads 2d Symphony

By GEORGE GELLES
Music Critic

Charles Wilson, the assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony who has done consistently excellent work preparing choruses that sing with the orchestra, had the podium to himself yesterday afternoon and chose to share it with musical has-beens.

Jean Sibelius is an objectional composer because he asks from his listener neither interest nor intelligence, only that he be there so the music—the Second Symphony in this case—can push him around. The Symphony has sweep and its moments of power, but extremely little musical worth. It is provincial music and wants a backwoods response.

What I heard of the work (the first two movements) sounded fine. Wilson conducted cleanly realizing the composer's gesture, and not good playing from the orchestra, too (though the basses couldn't play the opening of the second movement as one).

His reading of Strauss' blustery "Don Juan" was very well led, pointed and with lots of zip, but there's no need to further slow down the built-in ritard that Strauss has written just before the entrance of the sticky "feminine" theme).

Aside from very ugly oboe playing, the orchestra's response was precise and sharp, the kind of playing Stravinsky's Chant du Rossignol" needed, but never got. "Rossignol" is Stravinsky twice removed (originally an opera, then a ballet, then the symphonic poem heard at Symphony Hall), and not his most coherent score. It has flare and atmosphere and a primitive brilliance, though, but needs crisp and stylish solo work to come alive.

There was a seriously distorting cut made in the score, and for the BSO to nowhere inform its patrons of this seems particularly high-handed.

PASTE OVER

14.

CAMBRIDGE SERIES

SECOND PROGRAM
Tuesday evening November 26 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

IN MEMORY OF CHARLES MUNCH

BACH — 'Wedding' Cantata no. 202 for soprano 'Weichet nur, betrübte Schatten' (Vanish, gloomy shadows)

Aria: Weichet nur, betrübte Schatten
Recitative: Die Welt wird wieder neu
Aria: Phöbus eilt mit schnellen Pferden
Recitative: D'rum sucht auch Amor sein Vergnügen
Aria: Wenn die Frühlings lüfte streichen
Recitative: Und dieses ist das Glücke
Aria: Sich üben im Lieben
Recitative: So sei das Band der keuschen Liebe
Gavotte: Sehet in Zufriedenheit

SARAMAE ENDICH soprano
JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN violin
CHARLES WILSON harpsichord continuo
HENRY PORTNOI double bass continuo
RALPH GOMBERG oboe
JULES ESKIN cello continuo
SHERMAN WALT bassoon continuo

intermission

BRAHMS — Ein deutsches Requiem op. 45

Chorus: Selig sind, die da Leid tragen
Chorus: Denn alles Fleisch es ist wie Gras
Baritone and chorus: Herr, lehre doch mich, dass ein Ende
Chorus: Wie lieblich sind deine Wohnungen
Soprano and chorus: Ihr habt nun Traurigkeit
Baritone and chorus: Denn wir haben hie keine bleibende Statt
Chorus: Selig sind die Toten

SARAMAE ENDICH soprano DAVID CLATWORTHY baritone
NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY CHORUS
LORNA COOKE de VARON conductor

Concert by Boston Symphony To Be Telecast Live Tuesday

The first color telecast of a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert live and in stereo from Symphony Hall will be on Channels 2 and 44 Tuesday, Nov. 26 at 8.30 p.m.

Broadcast simultaneously by WGBH-FM in stereo, the concert will be conducted by Erich Leinsdorf and is devoted to two works: Bach's Wedding Cantata with Saramae Endich, soprano and Brahms' Requiem with Miss Endich, baritone David Clatworthy and the New England Conservatory Chorus.

Music lovers are urged to watch the program on either Channel 2 or 44 (in some areas WGBH's Channel 44 provides extra sharp reception) and to turn down the sound on the TV set, listening instead to the superior stereophonic sound provided by WGBH-FM (89.7 mc).

Marking the 12th year of live Boston Syymphony broadcasts on Channel 2, this is the first of several concert color telecasts planned for the coming season.

The symphony producer is Jordan Whitelaw and the television director is William Cosel, with William Pierce providing the commentary.

****

TRANSCRIPT (e)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
CIRC. 13,350
NOV 23 1968
New England Newsclip

WGBH-TV 2

Program Notes

The first color telecast of a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert live and in stereo from Symphony Hall will be on Channel 2. Tuesday, Nov. 26, at 8:30 p.m.

Broadcast simultaneously by WGBH-FM in stereo, the concert will be conducted by Erich Leinsdorf and is devoted to two works: Bach's Wedding Cantata with Saramae Endich, soprano and Brahms' Requiem with Miss Endich, baritone David Clatworthy and the New England Conservatory Chorus.

Music lovers are urged to watch the program on Channel 2 and to turn down the sound on the TV set, listening instead to the superior stereophonic sound provided by WGBH-FM (89.7 mc).

"Black Journal" ponders " dilemma of the black c beat, Monday, Nov Channel 2.

In N

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3,800
NOV 21 1968
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony in Color Telecast Nov. 26

The first color telecast of a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert live and in stereo from Symphony Hall will be on Channels 2 and 44 Tuesday, Nov. 26, at 8:30 p.m.

Broadcast simultaneously by WGBH-FM in stereo, the concert will be conducted by Erich Leinsdorf and is devoted to two works: Bach's Wedding Cantata, with Saramae Endich, soprano and Brahms' Requiem with Miss Endich, baritone David Clatworthy and the New England Conservatory Chorus.

STAR
WINCHESTER, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 5,450
NOV 21 1968
New England Newsclip

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000
NOV 21 1968
New England Newsclip

HERALD (e)
NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
CIRC. 32,400
NOV 25 1968
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony No Longer Hunts For Saxophone

BOSTON (UPI) — The Boston Symphony will play the Debussy Rhapsody for Saxophone and Orchestra this week and it is likely no international search will be needed for a solo instrument.

Such was not the case in the late 1880's when Wilhelm Gericke, the orchestra's second conductor, scheduled a suite by Georges Bizet.

At rehearsal, Geriche turned to soloist Eustach Strasser and asked him, "Where is the saxophone?" "Herr Strasser replied, "Herr Conductor, the instrument is so new that we must substitute a clarinet. After all, that also is a single reed instrument."

"Bizet has a fine ear for tone color. If he requires a saxophone, we must use one. Where is it?" Geriche insisted.

The librarian explained he could not find one of the newly invented instruments in Boston, New York or Philadelphia. Geriche postponed the piece until a "sax" was sent over from Paris.

When the saxophone arrived in battered condition, Strasser volunteered to repair it and Geriche gave him the instrument as a reward.

Strasser became the first person in Boston to own a sax and the Boston Symphony was the first American concert orchestra to use one.

The Rhapsody was commissioned from Debussy by Mrs. Elise B. Coolidge, president of Orchestral Club of Boston.

The soloist this week will be Felix Viscuglia, a member of the orchestra. If he needs a sax he can go to the nearest music store. They're no longer rare.

TIMES (e)
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 10,450
NOV 27 1968
New England Newsclip

Finding sax no problem; it was once

BOSTON (UPI) — The Boston Symphony will play the Debussy Rhapsody for Saxophone and Orchestra this week and it is likely no international search will be needed for a solo instrunot the case in the ... Wilhelm Ger- ... second con- ... suite by

BANNER (e)
BENNINGTON, VT.
CIRC. 6,100
NOV 26 1968
New England

Finding a Sax Is No Longer A Problem

BOSTON (UPI) — The Boston Symphony will play the Debussy Rhapsody for Saxophone and Orchestra this week and it is likely no international search will be needed for a solo instrument.

Such was not the case in the late 1880's when Wilhelm Gericke, the orchestra's second conductor, sch Georges

At r to s

SENTINEL (E)
KEENE, N. H.
CIRC. 9,250
NOV 25 1968

NEWS (e)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 96,93

EXPRESS (e)
PORTLAND, ME.
CIRC. 28,750
NOV 25 1968
New England Newsclip

NEWS (e)
BANGOR, ME.
CIRC. 79,750
DEC 3 1968
New England Newsclip

Ascetic Describes Conductor Leinsdorf

By ROBERT H. NEWALL

BOSTON — Friday afternoon's concert at Symphony Hall was a fascinating contrast to the last I heard there, the palpable difference lying in the art and philosophy of the conductors.

Colin Davis, not feverishly concerned with minutiae, drew out of his willing players a warm, lambent tone, whereas Erich Leinsdorf, more punctilious and decidedly more rigid, affects a starker, more ascetic — even more antiseptic — approach. Under his guidance the music is neatly packaged and quite meticulously delivered, although, curiously, there are some pitch problems, chiefly among the woodwinds.

Having chosen Beethoven's bright and mercurial Symphony No. 1 to open this holiday program, Leinsdorf fortunately did not treat it like late Haydn or Mozart. Musical bridges between the leading exponents of classicism and this brash young romantic there be, but the perceptive conductor seizes upon those already implied distinctions — the opening dissonance (what a shocker in 1800!), the unconventional tuning of the kettledrums (C and G, though the key is F), the fugal suggestions in the Andante cantabile.

If this were not a reading that penetrated to the heart, it did make one fiercely aware of the uniqueness of Beethoven's genius that blossoms radiantly even here in this earliest symphony. The Minuet, a precursor of Beethoven's scherzi, was given a dash of elan if not much charm.

Evidently unplayed by the Boston Symphony since before World War II, Debussy's Rhapsody for saxophone and orchestra was performed by Felix Viscuglia, having for the moment forsaken his bass clarinet. Because Debussy could work up enthusiasm only for the fee offered by Elsie Coolidge Hall, a lady saxophonist of Boston, the orchestration had to be filled in from incomplete sketches left by the composer.

In those days the saxophone had not yet been made respectable by jazz bands; hence there was little literature for it. In any case, the composition, though syrupy and rather too contrived, has moments of interest and beauty. Viscuglia made the most of a sticky and too heavily textured score.

Spare and economical, by contrast, is Mozart's B-flat concerto (K. 595), A work of incredible, Supernal Beauty. Against a chamber orchestra, Claude Frank, a German-born pianist, created the intimacy it demands. The concerto is suffused with nobility and unearthiness, at least until the glistening last movement when the piano immediately initiates a meteroic theme, the more joyous coming after the exquisitely elegaic contours of the middle section.

With the right degree of relaxation and insight, Frank, tracing the jeweled melodies with pliancy and regal tone, still imparted a kind of harpsichordal effect not unbecoming to so personal an utterance. With a more sanguine partner, he might have invested the music with more charm.

Weill's "Kleine Dreigroschenmusik fur Blasorchester" (Suite from "The Threepenny Opera") was done with artistry. The musicians, apparently relishing the opportunity to cut loose on a battery of drums, a guitar, a banjo and the like, had a good time with its satiric overtones. The music is pithy and brassy a fit complement to the sordid tale of Mack, and Leinsdorf and his men gave it perhaps more artistry than it warrants.

This program did not have the electricity of last month's but it had its own rewards.

NEWS (E)
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
CIRC. 18,650
NOV 25 1968

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, M
CIRC. 30,239
NOV 26

Time

As Far as

BOSTON (UPI) — The Boston Symphony will play the Debussy Rhapsody for Saxophone and Orchestra this week and it is likely no international search will be needed for a solo instrument.

Such was not the case in the 1880s when Wilhelm Gericke, the orchestra's second conductor, scheduled a suite by Georges Bizet.

At rehearsal, Geriche turned to soloist Eustach Strasser and asked him, "Where is the saxophone?" "Strasser replied, "Herr Conductor, the instrument is so new that we must substitute a clarinet. After all, that also is a single reed instrument.

"Bizet has a fine ear for tone color. If he requires a saxophone, we must use one. Where is it?" Geriche insisted.

Repairs Needed

When the saxophone arrived in battered condition, Strasser volunteered to repair it and Gericke gave him the instrument as a reward.

Strasser became the first person in Boston to own a sax and the Boston Symphony was the first American concert orchestra to use one.

The Rhapsody was commissioned from Debussy by Mrs. Elise B. Coolidge, president of Orchestral Club of Boston.

The soloist this week will be Felix Viscuglia, a member of the orchestra. If he needs a sax he can go to the nearest music store. They're no longer rare.

PASTE OVER

14.

CAMBRIDGE SERIES

SECOND PROGRAM
Tuesday evening November 26 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

IN MEMORY OF CHARLES MUNCH

BACH — 'Wedding' Cantata no. 202 for soprano 'Weichet nur, betrübte Schatten' (Vanish, gloomy shadows)

Aria: Weichet nur, betrübte Schatten
Recitative: Die Welt wird wieder neu
Aria: Phöbus eilt mit schnellen Pferden
Recitative: D'rum sucht auch Amor sein Vergnügen
Aria: Wenn die Frühlings lüfte streichen
Recitative: Und dieses ist das Glücke
Aria: Sich üben im Lieben
Recitative: So sei das Band der keuschen Liebe
Gavotte: Sehet in Zufriedenheit

SARAMAE ENDICH soprano
JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN violin
CHARLES WILSON harpsichord continuo
HENRY PORTNOI double bass continuo
RALPH GOMBERG oboe
JULES ESKIN cello continuo
SHERMAN WALT bassoon continuo

intermission

BRAHMS — Ein deutsches Requiem op. 45

Chorus: Selig sind, die da Leid tragen
Chorus: Denn alles Fleisch es ist wie Gras
Baritone and chorus: Herr, lehre doch mich, dass ein Ende
Chorus: Wie lieblich sind deine Wohnungen
Soprano and chorus: Ihr habt nun Traurigkeit
Baritone and chorus: Denn wir haben hie keine bleibende Statt
Chorus: Selig sind die Toten

SARAMAE ENDICH soprano
DAVID CLATWORTHY baritone
NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY CHORUS
LORNA COOKE de VARON conductor

Concert by Boston Symphony To Be Telecast Live Tuesday

The first color telecast of a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert live and in stereo from Symphony Hall will be on Channels 2 and 44 Tuesday, Nov. 26 at 8.30 p.m.

Broadcast simultaneously by WGBH-FM in stereo, the concert will be conducted by Erich Leinsdorf and is devoted to two works: Bach's Wedding Cantata with Saramae Endich, soprano and Brahms' Requiem with Miss Endich, baritone David Clatworthy and the New England Conservatory Chorus.

Music lovers are urged to watch the program on either Channel 2 or 44 (in some areas WGBH's Channel 44 provides extra sharp reception) and to turn down the sound on the TV set, listening instead to the superior stereophonic sound provided by WGBH-FM (89.7 mc).

Marking the 12th year of live Boston Syymphony broadcasts on Channel 2, this is the first of several concert color telecasts planned for the coming season.

The symphony producer is Jordan Whitelaw and the television director is William Cosel, with William Pierce providing the commentary.

****

TRANSCRIPT (e)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
CIRC. 13,350
NOV 23 1968
New England Newsclip

WGBH-TV 2

Program Notes

The first color telecaste of a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert live and in stereo from Symphony Hall will be on Channel 2. Tuesday. Nov. 26, at 8:30 p.m.

Broadcast simultaneously by WGBH-FM in stereo. the concert will be conducted by Erich Leinsdorf and is devoted to two works: Bach's Wedding Cantata with Saramae Endich. soprano and Brahms' Requiem with Miss Endich. baritone David Clatworthy and the New England Conservatory Chorus.

Music lovers are urged to watch the program on Channel 2 and to turn down the sound on the TV set. listening instead to the superior stereophonic sound provided by WGBH-FM (89.7 mc).

"Black Journal" ponders dilemma of the black co- beat. Monday, Nov Channel 2.

In N

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3,800
NOV 21 1968
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony in Color Telecast Nov. 26

The first color telecast of a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert live and in stereo from Symphony Hall will be on Channels 2 and 44 Tuesday, Nov. 26, at 8:30 p.m.

Broadcast simultaneously by WGBH-FM in stereo, the concert will be conducted by Erich Leinsdorf and is devoted to two works: Bach's Wedding Cantata, with Saramae Endich, soprano and Brahms' Requiem with Miss Endich, baritone David Clatworthy and the New England Conservatory Chorus.

STAR
WINCHESTER, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 5,450
NOV 21 1968
New England Newsclip

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000
NOV 21 1968
New England Newsclip

HERALD (e)
NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
CIRC. 32,400
NOV 25 1968
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony No Longer Hunts For Saxophone

BOSTON (UPI) — The Boston Symphony will play the Debussy Rhapsody for Saxophone and Orchestra this week and it is likely no international search will be needed for a solo instrument.

Such was not the case in the late 1880's when Wilhelm Gericke, the orchestra's second conductor, scheduled a suite by Georges Bizet.

At rehearsal, Geriche turned to soloist Eustach Strasser and asked him, "Where is the saxophone?" Strasser replied, "Herr Conductor, the instrument is so new that we must substitute a clarinet. After all, that also is a single reed instrument."

"Bizet has a fine ear for tone color. If he requires a saxophone, we must use one. Where is it?" Geriche insisted. The librarian explained he could not find one of the newly invented instruments in Boston, New York or Philadelphia. Geriche postponed the piece until a "sax" was sent over from Paris.

When the saxophone arrived in battered condition, Strasser volunteered to repair it and Geriche gave him the instrument as a reward.

Strasser became the first person in Boston to own a sax and the Boston Symphony was the first American concert orchestra to use one.

The Rhapsody was commissioned from Debussy by Mrs. Elise B. Coolidge, the former Richard J. Hall, president of Orchestral Club of Boston.

The soloist this week will be Felix Viscuglia, a member of the orchestra. If he needs a sax he can go to the nearest music store. They're no longer rare.

TIMES (e)
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 10,450
NOV 27 1968
New England Newsclip

Finding sax no problem; it was once

BOSTON (UPI) — The Boston Symphony will play the Debussy Rhapsody for Saxophone and Orchestra this week and it is likely no international search will be needed for a solo instrunot the case in the Wilhelm Geri- second con- suite. by

BANNER (e)
BENNINGTON, VT.
CIRC. 6,100
NOV 26 1968
New England

Finding a Sax Is No Longer A Problem

BOSTON (UPI) — The Boston Symphony will play the Debussy Rhapsody for Saxophone and Orchestra this week and it is likely no international search will be needed for a solo instrument.

Such was not the case in the late 1880's when the orchestra, the orchestra's second conductor, sch Georges

At r to s

SENTINEL (E)
KEENE, N. H.
CIRC. 9,250
NOV 25 1968

NEWS (e)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS
CIRC. 96,93

EXPRESS (e)
PORTLAND, ME.
CIRC. 28,750
NOV 25 1968
New England Newsclip

NEWS (e)
BANGOR, ME.
CIRC. 79,750
DEC 3 1968
New England Newsclip

Ascetic Describes Conductor Leinsdort

By ROBERT H. NEWALL

BOSTON — Friday afternoon's concert at Symphony Hall was a fascinating contrast to the last I heard there, the palpable difference lying in the art and philosophy of the conductors.

Colin Davis, not feverishly concerned with minutiae, drew out of his willing players a warm, lambent tone, whereas Erich Leinsdorf, more punctilious and decidedly more rigid, affects a starker, more ascetic — even more antiseptic — approach. Under his guidance the music is neatly packaged and quite meticulously delivered, although, curiously, there are some pitch problems, chiefly among the woodwinds.

Having chosen Beethoven's bright and mercurial Symphony No. 1 to open this holiday program, Leinsdorf fortunately did not treat it like late Haydn or Mozart. Musical bridges between the leading exponents of classicism and this brash young romantic there be, but the perceptive conductor seizes upon those already implied distinctions — the opening dissonance (what a shocker in 1800!), the unconventional tuning of the kettledrums (C and G, though the key is F), the fugal suggestions in the Andante cantabile.

If this were not a reading that penetrated to the heart, it did make one fiercely aware of the uniqueness of Beethoven's genius that blossoms radiantly even here in this earliest symphony. The Minuet, a precursor of Beethoven's scherzi, was given a dash of elan if not much charm.

Evidently unplayed by the Boston Symphony since before World War II, Debussy's Rhapsody for saxophone and orchestra was performed by Felix Viscuglia, having for the moment forsaken his bass clarinet. Because Debussy could work up enthusiasm only for the fee offered by Elsie Coolidge Hall, a lady saxophonist of Boston, the orchestration had to be filled in from incomplete sketches left by the composer.

In those days the saxophone had not yet been made respectable by jazz bands; hence there was little literature for it. In any case, the composition, though syrupy and rather too contrived, has moments of interest and beauty. Viscuglia made the most of a sticky and too heavily textured score.

Spare and economical, by contrast, is Mozart's B-flat concerto (K. 595), A work of incredible, Supernal Beauty. Against a chamber orchestra, Claude Frank, a German-born pianist, created the intimacy it demands. The concerto is suffused with nobility and unearthiness, at least until the glistening last movement when the piano immediately initiates a meteroic theme, the more joyous coming after the exquisitely elegaic contours of the mddle section.

With the right degree of relaxation and insight, Frank, tracing the jeweled melodies with pliancy and regal tone, still imparted a kind of harpsichordal effect not unbecoming to so personal an utterance. With a more sanguine partner, he might have invested the music with more charm.

Weill's "Kleine Dreigroschenmusik fur Blasorchester" (Suite from "The Threepenny Opera") was done with artistry. The musicians, apparently relishing the opportunity to cut loose on a battery of drums, a guitar, a banjo and the like, had a good time with its satiric overtones. The music is pithy and brassy a fit complement to the sordid tale of Mack, and Leinsdorf and his men gave it perhaps more artistry than it warrants.

This program did not have the electricity of last month's but it had its own rewards.

NEWS (E)
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
CIRC. 18,650
NOV 25 1968

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, M
CIRC. 30,239
NOV 26

Time
As Far as

BOSTON (UPI) — The Boston Symphony will play the Debussy Rhapsody for Saxophone and Orchestra this week and it is likely no international search will be needed for a solo instrument.

Such was not the case in the late 1880s when Wilhelm Gericke, the orchestra's second conductor, scheduled a suite by Georges Bizet.

At rehearsal, Geriche turned to soloist Eustach Strasser and asked him, "Where is the saxophone?" Strasser replied, "Herr Conductor, the instrument is so new that we must substitute a clarinet. After all, that also is a single reed instrument."

"Bizet has a fine ear for tone color. If he requires a saxophone, we must use one. Where is it?" Geriche insisted. The librarian explained he could not find one of the newly invented instruments in Boston, New York or Philadelphia. Geriche postponed the piece until a "sax" was sent over from Paris.

When the saxophone arrived in battered condition, Strasser volunteered to repair it and Gericke gave him the instrument as a reward.

Strasser became the first person in Boston to own a sax and the Boston Symphony was the first American concert orchestra to use one.

The Rhapsody was commissioned from Debussy by Mrs. Elise B. Coolidge, the former Richard J. Hall, president of Orchestral Club of Boston.

The soloist this week will be Felix Viscuglia, a member of the orchestra. If he needs a sax he can go to the nearest music store. They're no longer rare.

Repairs Needed

EIGHTH PROGRAM
Friday afternoon November 29 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening November 30 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BEETHOVEN — Symphony no. 1 in C major op. 21
Adagio molto – allegro con brio
Andante cantabile con moto
Menuetto: allegro molto e vivace
Finale: adagio – allegro molto vivace

DEBUSSY — Rhapsody for saxophone and orchestra
FELIX VISCUGLIA

intermission

MOZART — Piano concerto in B flat K. 595
Allegro
Larghetto
Allegro
CLAUDE FRANK

WEILL — Suite from 'Kleine Dreigroschenmusik für Blasorchester'
Overture
Die Moritat von Mackie Messer
(The 'Moritat' of Mac the Knife)
Die Ballade vom angenehmen Leben
(The ballad of the good life)
Pollys Lied (Polly's song)
Tango-Ballade (Tango ballad)
Kanonen-Song (The song of the big guns)

Soloists, BSO feel the holiday

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

The performances of Mozart piano concertos that Claude Frank has given in recent seasons at Tanglewood have been among the most beautiful I have ever heard of that stupendous repertory, distinguished as they have been by taste, intelligence, and by a vibrantly energetic manner of playing that made the music, for all its delicacy, emerge as something verile and bouyant.

When Frank played Mozart's last concerto, K. 595 in B flat, with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony yesterday afternoon, the taste and the intelligence were there, but the level of vitality was low.

Sometimes — in the cadenzas of both quick movements; in the chain of trills in the middle movement; often in the finale — there were reminders of the exciting playing Frank can do, but most of the time he produced an under-inflected, pallid murmur that might as well have come from a pianist like Anda or Entremont or Crochet.

COMICAL

Not that Leinsdorf and the orchestra helped matters. In that department, too, something would occasionally break through the fog, for example, Leinsdorf's shaping of the first tutti in the second movement, or a few phrases from the oboe or bassoon that were projected with some conviction.

Most of the playing, though, was without character, some if it was bloodcurdlingly ugly, and some of it was comical — the abjectly dopey honking out of notes that the cellos and basses were permitted to do under the Larghetto's G flat major melody was the most highly developed instance of unintended humor.

The conducting was, with everything else, impatient, and to the point where the rushing across rests and the clipping of phrase endings reduced one of Mozart's greatest pages — the first movement's development—to a matter of almost no consequence.

The performance of the Mozart concerto was not beautiful, but it was the best thing about the concert, and by miles.

BOSTON LADY

Debussy's Rhapsody for Orchestra and Saxophone was played by Felix Viscuglia, a member of the Boston Symphony, where his usual instrument is the bass clarinet.

Not even the knowledge that the piece was commissioned by a Boston lady, referred to by Debussy as "la femme-saxophone," who played the instrument for her health, makes this dry exercise at all amusing to listen to. The performance was dully competent — or is that an impossible paradox? — but John Burk's program note is a delight.

Leinsdorf began the concert with a hectic, rhythmless skid across the surface of Beethoven's First Symphony. It was played rather brutally by the orchestra, which, given the mad rush and the unpredictability of arrival of the next downbeat, they could not entirely help.

Services ended with six sections of Weill's "Kleine Dreigroschenmusik," ingenious and delightful instrumental settings of parts of the "Three Penny Opera." I still remember with pleasure the superbly stylish performance some New England Conservatory students gave last Spring with Frederik Prausnitz conducting.

Leinsdorf's go at it, however, was really quite impossible, what with his absurdly raced tempi and his astonishing knack for combining inflexibility with rhythmic vagueness.

INEPT

None of the playing was in any truly relevant sense good. Some of it — notably the trombone solo in "Mac the Knife" and the clarinet solo in Polly's song — reached levels of musical and technical ineptness that in a less absurd universe would be unimaginable in a major orchestra.

But after all, look who's going to be Vice President in 51 days.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
NOV 30 1968
New England Newsclip

15.

At Symphony Hall

Not Orthodox But Pleasant

By McLAREN HARRIS

"Not only politics makes strange bedfellows," remarked Warren Storey Smith at the conclusion of yesterday's Symphony concert, referring to the idiomatically-disjunct array of works which turned up this weekend as a result of current schedules and prior postponements. Erich Leinsdorf's choices of Beethoven, Debussy, Mozart and Kurt Weill call for continual changes of pace — a bit unorthodox, but not altogether unpleasant.

Beethoven's First Symphony opened, as tradition would have it, in an energetic, somewhat taut rendition. There was no dalliance, no soft sell here; the tempos were on the brisk side and sustained without breaks in stride, the contrasts sharp and the larger volumes unreserved (the orchestra was, unclassically, nearly full strength). It was less 18th-century Beethoven than an anticipation of the later symphonies, but exciting nonetheless.

FROM THERE to Debussy's Rhapsody for saxophone and orchestra is a long jump in time, idiom and overall conception. The Rhapsody is a curious work, undertaken rather reluctantly by the composer as a commission from Bostonian Elise Coolidge Hall, an amateur saxophonist.

John Burk's tale of the work's fortunes and Debussy's impressions of Mrs. Hall are amusing; suffice to say that the work languished in Debussy's mind and in sketches until after his death. Jean Roger-Ducasse orchestrated the final sketch and the Rhapsody was published in 1919, 18 years after its commission.

The Rhapsody is anything but a display-piece, treating the saxophone as simply the principal element in an orchestral texture. That is not to say that the lead part is easy, for there is ample intricacy in the Latin-flavored rhythms and melodic figures; but some reflection of Debussy's disinterest seems evident in the rather undistinctive dynamic structure, the lack of harmonic adventure or thematic identity.

FELIX VISCUGLIA, usually the orchestra's bass clarinetist, filled the soloist's role expertly, applying as much sweep to his lines as room would allow and gliding through livelier passages with facile motion. The work, beter known to saxophonists than to audiences, was last performed by the orchestra 29 years ago, and its future outlook is probably not too much brighter.

Claude Frank followed Viscuglia as soloist in Mozart's Piano Concerto in B flat, K. 595, the composer's final effort in the genre and one which seems released from the intense drama of some earlier concertos. It is a more intimate creation that its predecessors, given more to introspection than to stormy outpourings, but it impressed me rather less than I had hoped, a situation I ascribe to its performance.

Frank is among the most gifted of pianists for classic traditions, but there seemed a want of disposition, on both his part and the orchestra's, to summon the alertness and spirit necessary to express what drama the concerto does contain. It was not a bad performance, but one emotionally incomplete, released from tension but with little to substitute besides exterior felicity.

KURT WEILL'S partially jazz-inspired suite from "Kleine Dreigroschenmusik" for winds plus percussion, guitar, banjo and accordion (bandoneon?) might appear slightly out of place for such august happenings as Symphony concerts, but yesterday's audience enjoyed it immensely and I must go along with it.

The suite is garnered from Weill's "Threepenny Opera" score, arranged for a small ensemble of brass, woodwinds and others to give the varicolored timbres reminiscent of cabaret bands.

Several familiar themes — the "Moritat" of Mack the Knife, Polly's Song, etc — turn up in their characteristic trappings of sardonic humor. The work is of light sentiment but ingeniously put together and given excellent (who said square?) reading by the Symphony men. That was the real change of pace, and in one humble opinion, welcome.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
NOV 30 1968
New England Newsclip

MICHAEL STEINBERG

Mozart Concerto 1st for Symphony

It defies belief, but there it is: Mozart's B flat Piano Concerto, K. 595, which Claude Frank will play with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony this week-end and next Tuesday, has never been on one of the orchestra's programs before.

Mozart's calendar of concerto composition reflects the rise and decline of his popularity in Vienna. There are three piano concertos from the first Viennese years, 1782-83, six in 1784, and another six in 1785-86. By 1788 — Mozart was 32 that year — his public career had begun to go badly. There had been a time when he could report as he did in a letter to his father in March 1784, that he had 22 concerts in 38 days.

"I don't think I can possibly get out of practice this way," he adds.

But by 1788, even "Figaro," so popular when it was introduced two years earlier, had been dropped from the repertory. "Don Giovanni," first played in Vienna in May 1788, was not a great success, and the performance on Dec. 15 that year was the last Viennese one in Mozart's lifetime.

The year 1788 was the beginning of financial catastrophe for Mozart. The series of concerts for which he probably wrote his last three symphonies that that Summer seems to have been canceled perhaps because of inadequate ticket sales. We know that after that Summer, Mozart gave no more public concerts of his own in Vienna, that he wrote no more symphonies, and that he composed only the B flat Piano Concerto, K. 595, which he played at a concert of the clarinetist Joseph Baehr on March 4, 1791 (the Coronation Concerto for Frankfurt belongs to 1788).

Certainly K.595 is very special, not only because it is the last and because it stands in a position of some isolation from its predecessors. The idea of H. C. Robbins Landon that Mozart, at the time of his death, was on the verge of a new style, is persuasive. This concerto and the one for clarinet, his music for glass harmonica, "The Magic Flute," the "Ave verum," all partake of a new simplicity, which is combined with extraordinary technical sophistication. It is as though Mozart, who had always known how to combine with unique grace the popular and the learned, passion and manners, had discovered a new intersection of nature and art.

K.595 is a quiet work. Mozart surrounds the sound of the piano with that of a single flute, pairs of oboes, bassoons, and horns, and of course strings — no clarinets, no trumpets and drums. It begins like no other concerto of his, with a measure of accompaniment, to set atmosphere and pace and key, to carry us with utmost gentleness into his world of exquisite sweetness and pain.

The first melodic phrase, which is played on the violins, emerges as an extension upward and out. While the melody pauses for breath, the winds make a little five-note comment, opening the horizons astonishingly for the modesty of the gesture, and the melody resumes with new energy, its upbeat standing out clearly against the silence, the murmuring accompaniment gone for a moment.

★

As I write, I sing this through to myself, and I am amazed again by the simplicity of it. There seems to be nothing but the tonic chord, B flat, D, F, in the accompaniment; in the rise of the first phrase and again in its gracefully embellished fall; in the woodwinds' and horns' comment; in the upbeat of the violins' next phrase. Economy is an essential characteristic here, and it is an economy both of emotional expression and of compositional means.

The most overwhelming music in this movement comes at the beginning of the development. There is a formal close, as unassuming as Mozart can make it, but it takes an ambiguous turn. With acute human sensibility, the piano, which has been silent during the orchestra's closing flourishes, at once seizes on that ambiguity, and in the utmost quiet, as though without moving a muscle, gives a most extreme interpretation of it.

Piano and orchestra begin a mysterious dialogue, moving like dancers who try to find each other in the dark. We are plunged from one strangeness to another, from F major to B minor; almost to E minor, but turned to C at the last moment; through C minor to E flat; through E flat minor to a glimpse of the B major world; eventually to daylight again; all done with the fewest imaginable notes, a small repertory of "ordinary" gestures, manipulated with an inventiveness in matters of texture and phrase that matches the audacious harmonic fantasy.

But the strangest passage of all is even simpler, one only Mozart could have written, and he only at the end of his life. It occurs in the slow movement, the Larghetto. The opening melody makes its fourth appearance, played on the piano as before, but now with flute added, and with violins an octave below. Then came Mozart's afterthought: he struck out the accompaniment in the pianist's left hand, and the melody with its solemn escort of flute and violin, floats, as Landon says, "serene and unearthly into the final tutti."

Elsewhere Landon quotes Shakespeare, "A Winter's Tale," and the phrase fits this concerto: it is music in which "the heart dances, but not for joy."

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
NOV 27 1968
New England

Frank's Piano Solo Refined, Brilliant

By GEORGE GELLES Music Critic

I've been trying for weeks to find the logic behind Erich Leinsdorf's program for the past Friday's Boston Symphony concert, and finally I've got it; It was a holiday hash that added two as yet unplayed leftovers from a few weeks ago to the two solo works originally planned. And though it made no sense in itself, it gave Boston its first BSO performance, coming scandalously 178 years after its completion, of Mozart's last piano concerto, K. 595 in B flat.

Claude Frank, perhaps the unshowiest and most intelligent of first-rank pianists today, was the soloist and his playing was fine, refined and unassuming, knowing in its choice of tempi (even though the second movement was quite slow it was beautifully sustained), and wise in saving the real displays of brilliance for the cadenzas.

Leinsdorf's accompaniment I found lacking in contrast and a bit drab. And as long as the piece was finally being done, someone might have looked at the New Mozart Edition to find out when the composer really wanted the full string section to play in the first movement.

Debussy's "Rapsodie pour orchestre et saxophone," which Felix Viscuglia played Friday at Symphony Hall, owes its unlikely existence to Boston's Mrs. Richard J. Hall (nee Elise B. Coolidge) who at the turn of the century asked the Frenchman to write a piece for her passion, the saxophone.

The "femme-saxophone" never played the "Rapsodie", for Debussy never finished it. Orchestrated (and not wholly convincingly) after his death, it's a short piece, Spanish in flavor, and after the introduction doesn't give the soloist much to do. Viscuglia did it well, thought without making the work as ravishing as did Marcel Mule in performances I heard some six years ago.

Also heard were excerpts from Kurt Weill's "Threepenny Opera Music" in a stuffy and ungainly reading by Leinsdorf, and Beethoven's First Symphony, a performance that had the virtues of good tempi and proper repeats, but had wooden string sound and no great commitment.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873
NOV 30 1968
New England

EIGHTH PROGRAM
Friday afternoon November 29 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening November 30 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BEETHOVEN — Symphony no. 1 in C major op. 21
Adagio molto – allegro con brio
Andante cantabile con moto
Menuetto: allegro molto e vivace
Finale: adagio – allegro molto vivace

DEBUSSY — Rhapsody for saxophone and orchestra
FELIX VISCUGLIA

intermission

MOZART — Piano concerto in B flat K. 595
Allegro
Larghetto
Allegro
CLAUDE FRANK

WEILL — Suite from 'Kleine Dreigroschenmusik für Blasorchester'
Overture
Die Moritat von Mackie Messer
(The 'Moritat' of Mac the Knife)
Die Ballade vom angenehmen Leben
(The ballad of the good life)
Pollys Lied (Polly's song)
Tango-Ballade (Tango ballad)
Kanonen-Song (The song of the big guns)

Soloists, BSO feel the holiday

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

The performances of Mozart piano concertos that Claude Frank has given in recent seasons at Tanglewood have been among the most beautiful I have ever heard of that stupendous repertory, distinguished as they have been by taste, intelligence, and by a vibrantly energetic manner of playing that made the music, for all its delicacy, emerge as something verile and bouyant.

When Frank played Mozart's last concerto, K. 595 in B flat, with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony yesterday afternoon, the taste and the intelligence were there, but the level of vitality was low.

Sometimes — in the cadenzas of both quick movements; in the chain of trills in the middle movement; often in the finale — there were reminders of the exciting playing Frank can do, but most of the time he produced an under-inflected, pallid murmur that might as well have come from a pianist like Anda or Entremont or Crochet.

COMICAL

Not that Leinsdorf and the orchestra helped matters. In that department, too, something would occasionally break through the fog, for example, Leinsdorf's shaping of the first tutti in the second movement, or a few phrases from the oboe or bassoon that were projected with some conviction.

Most of the playing, though, was without character, some if it was bloodcurdlingly ugly, and some of it was comical — the abjectly dopey honking out of notes that the cellos and basses were permitted to do under the Larghetto's G flat major melody was the most highly developed instance of unintended humor.

The conducting was, with everything else, impatient, and to the point where the rushing across rests and the clipping of phrase endings reduced one of Mozart's greatest pages — the first movement's development—to a matter of almost no consequence.

The performance of the Mozart concerto was not beautiful, but it was the best thing about the concert, and by miles.

BOSTON LADY

Debussy's Rhapsody for Orchestra and Saxophone was played by Felix Viscuglia, a member of the Boston Symphony, where his usual instrument is the bass clarinet.

Not even the knowledge that the piece was commissioned by a Boston lady, referred to by Debussy as "la femme-saxophone," who played the instrument for her health, makes this dry exercise at all amusing to listen to. The performance was dully competent — or is that an impossible paradox? — but John Burk's program note is a delight.

Leinsdorf began the concert with a hectic, rhythmless skid across the surface of Beethoven's First Symphony. It was played rather brutally by the orchestra, which, given the mad rush and the unpredictability of arrival of the next downbeat, they could not entirely help.

Services ended with six sections of Weill's "Kleine Dreigroschenmusik," ingenious and delightful instrumental settings of parts of the "Three Penny Opera." I still remember with pleasure the superbly stylish performance some New England Conservatory students gave last Spring with Frederik Prausnitz conducting.

Leinsdorf's go at it, however, was really quite impossible, what with his absurdly raced tempi and his astonishing knack for combining inflexibility with rhythmic vagueness.

INEPT

None of the playing was in any truly relevant sense good. Some of it — notably the trombone solo in "Mac the Knife" and the clarinet solo in Polly's song — reached levels of musical and technical ineptness that in a less absurd universe would be unimaginable in a major orchestra.

But after all, look who's going to be Vice President in 51 days.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
NOV 30 1968
New England Newsclip

MICHAEL STEINBERG

Mozart Concerto 1st for Symphony

It defies belief, but there it is: Mozart's B flat Piano Concerto, K. 595, which Claude Frank will play with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony this week-end and next Tuesday, has never been on one of the orchestra's programs before.

Mozart's calendar of concerto composition reflects the rise and decline of his popularity in Vienna. There are three piano concertos from the first Viennese years, 1782-83, six in 1784, and another six in 1785-86. By 1788 — Mozart was 32 that year — his public career had begun to go badly. There had been a time when he could report as he did in a letter to his father in March 1784, that he had 22 concerts in 38 days.

"I don't think I can possibly get out of practice this way," he adds.

But by 1788, even "Figaro," so popular when it was introduced two years earlier, had been dropped from the repertory. "Don Giovanni," first played in Vienna in May 1788, was not a great success, and the performance on Dec. 15 that year was the last Viennese one in Mozart's lifetime.

The year 1788 was the beginning of financial catastrophe for Mozart. The series of concerts for which he probably wrote his last three symphonies that that Summer seems to have been canceled perhaps because of inadequate ticket sales. We know that after that Summer, Mozart gave no more public concerts of his own in Vienna, that he wrote no more symphonies, and that he composed only the B flat Piano Concerto, K. 595, which he played at a concert of the clarinetist Joseph Baehr on March 4, 1791 (the Coronation Concerto for Frankfurt belongs to 1788).

Certainly K.595 is very special, not only because it is the last and because it stands in a position of some isolation from its predecessors. The idea of H. C. Robbins Landon that Mozart, at the time of his death, was on the verge of a new style, is persuasive. This concerto and the one for clarinet, his music for glass harmonica, "The Magic Flute," the "Ave verum," all partake of a new simplicity, which is combined with extraordinary technical sophistication. It is as though Mozart, who had always known how to combine with unique grace the popular and the learned, passion and manners, had discovered a new intersection of nature and art.

K.595 is a quiet work. Mozart surrounds the sound of the piano with that of a single flute, pairs of oboes, bassoons, and horns, and of course strings — no clarinets, no trumpets and drums. It begins like no other concerto of his, with a measure of accompaniment, to set atmosphere and pace and key, to carry us with utmost gentleness into his world of exquisite sweetness and pain.

The first melodic phrase, which is played on the violins, emerges as an extension upward and out. While the melody pauses for breath, the winds make a little five-note comment, opening the horizons astonishingly for the modesty of the gesture, and the melody resumes with new energy, its upbeat standing out clearly against the silence, the murmuring accompaniment gone for a moment.

★

As I write, I sing this through to myself, and I am amazed again by the simplicity of it. There seems to be nothing but the tonic chord, B flat, D, F, in the accompaniment; in the rise of the first phrase and again in its gracefully embellished fall; in the woodwinds' and horns' comment; in the upbeat of the violins' next phrase. Economy is an essential characteristic here, and it is an economy both of emotional expression and of compositional means.

The most overwhelming music in this movement comes at the beginning of the development. There is a formal close, as unassuming as Mozart can make it, but it takes an ambiguous turn. With acute human sensibility, the piano, which has been silent during the orchestra's closing flourishes, at once seizes on that ambiguity, and in the utmost quiet, as though without moving a muscle, gives a most extreme interpretation of it.

Piano and orchestra begin a mysterious dialogue, moving like dancers who try to find each other in the dark. We are plunged from one strangeness to another, from F major to B minor; almost to E minor, but turned to C at the last moment; through C minor to E flat; through E flat minor to a glimpse of the B major world; eventually to daylight again; all done with the fewest imaginable notes, a small repertory of "ordinary" gestures, manipulated with an inventiveness in matters of texture and phrase that matches the audacious harmonic fantasy.

But the strangest passage of all is even simpler, one only Mozart could have written, and he only at the end of his life. It occurs in the slow movement, the Larghetto. The opening melody makes its fourth appearance, played on the piano as before, but now with flute added, and with violins an octave below. Then came Mozart's afterthought: he struck out the accompaniment in the pianist's left hand, and the melody with its solemn escort of flute and violin, floats, as Landon says, "serene and unearthly into the final tutti."

Elsewhere Landon quotes Shakespeare, "A Winter's Tale," and the phrase fits this concerto: it is music in which "the heart dances, but not for joy."

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
NOV 27 1968
New England

15.

At Symphony Hall

Not Orthodox But Pleasant

By McLAREN HARRIS

"Not only politics makes strange bedfellows," remarked Warren Storey Smith at the conclusion of yesterday's Symphony concert, referring to the idiomatically-disjunct array of works which turned up this weekend as a result of current schedules and prior postponements. Erich Leinsdorf's choices of Beethoven, Debussy, Mozart and Kurt Weill call for continual changes of pace — a bit unorthodox, but not altogether unpleasant.

Beethoven's First Symphony opened, as tradition would have it, in an energetic, somewhat taut rendition. There was no dalliance, no soft sell here; the tempos were on the brisk side and sustained without breaks in stride, the contrasts sharp and the larger volumes unreserved (the orchestra was, unclassically, nearly full strength). It was less 18th-century Beethoven than an anticipation of the later symphonies, but exciting nonetheless.

FROM THERE to Debussy's Rhapsody for saxophone and orchestra is a long jump in time, idiom and overall conception. The Rhapsody is a curious work, undertaken rather reluctantly by the composer as a commission from Bostonian Elise Coolidge Hall, an amateur saxophonist.

John Burk's tale of the work's fortunes and Debussy's impressions of Mrs. Hall are amusing; suffice to say that the work languished in Debussy's mind and in sketches until after his death. Jean Roger-Ducasse orchestrated the final sketch and the Rhapsody was published in 1919, 18 years after its commission.

The Rhapsody is anything but a display-piece, treating the saxophone as simply the principal element in an orchestral texture. That is not to say that the lead part is easy, for there is ample intricacy in the Latin-flavored rhythms and melodic figures; but some reflection of Debussy's disinterest seems evident in the rather undistinctive dynamic structure, the lack of harmonic adventure or thematic identity.

FELIX VISCUGLIA, usually the orchestra's bass clarinetist, filled the soloist's role expertly, applying as much sweep to his lines as room would allow and gliding through livelier passages with facile motion. The work, beter known to saxophonists than to audiences, was last performed by the orchestra 29 years ago, and its future outlook is probably not too much brighter.

Claude Frank followed Viscuglia as soloist in Mozart's Piano Concerto in B flat, K. 595, the composer's final effort in the genre and one which seems released from the intense drama of some earlier concertos. It is a more intimate creation that its predecessors, given more to introspection than to stormy outpourings, but it impressed me rather less than I had hoped, a situation I ascribe to its performance.

Frank is among the most gifted of pianists for classic traditions, but there seemed a want of disposition, on both his part and the orchestra's, to summon the alertness and spirit necessary to express what drama the concerto does contain. It was not a bad performance, but one emotionally incomplete, released from tension but with little to substitute besides exterior felicity.

KURT WEILL'S partially jazz-inspired suite from "Kleine Dreigroschenmusik" for winds plus percussion, guitar, banjo and accordion (bandoneon?) might appear slightly out of place for such august happenings as Symphony concerts, but yesterday's audience enjoyed it immensely and I must go along with it.

The suite is garnered from Weill's "Threepenny Opera" score, arranged for a small ensemble of brass, woodwinds and others to give the varicolored timbres reminiscent of cabaret bands.

Several familiar themes — the "Moritat" of Mack the Knife, Polly's Song, etc — turn up in their characteristic trappings of sardonic humor. The work is of light sentiment but ingeniously put together and given excellent (who said square?) reading by the Symphony men. That was the real change of pace, and in one humble opinion, welcome.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
NOV 30 1968
New England Newsclip

Frank's Piano Solo Refined, Brilliant

By GEORGE GELLES Music Critic

I've been trying for weeks to find the logic behind Erich Leinsdorf's program for the past Friday's Boston Symphony concert, and finally I've got it; It was a holiday hash that added two as yet unplayed leftovers from a few weeks ago to the two solo works originally planned. And though it made no sense in itself, it gave Boston its first BSO performance, coming scandalously 178 years after its completion, of Mozart's last piano concerto, K. 595 in B flat.

Claude Frank, perhaps the unshowiest and most intelligent of first-rank pianists today, was the soloist and his playing was fine, refined and unassuming, knowing in its choice of tempi (even though the second movement was quite slow it was beautifully sustained), and wise in saving the real displays of brilliance for the cadenzas.

Leinsdorf's accompaniment I found lacking in contrast and a bit drab. And as long as the piece was finally being done, someone might have looked at the New Mozart Edition to find out when the composer really wanted the full string section to play in the first movement.

Debussy's "Rapsodie pour orchestre et saxophone," which Felix Viscuglia played Friday at Symphony Hall, owes its unlikely existence to Boston's Mrs. Richard J. Hall (nee Elise B. Coolidge) who at the turn of the century asked the Frenchman to write a piece for her passion, the saxophone.

The "femme-saxophone" never played the "Rapsodie", for Debussy never finished it. Orchestrated (and not wholly convincingly) after his death, it's a short piece, Spanish in flavor, and after the introduction doesn't give the soloist much to do. Viscuglia did it well, thought without making the work as ravishing as did Marcel Mule in performances I heard some six years ago.

Also heard were excerpts from Kurt Weill's "Threepenny Opera Music" in a stuffy and ungainly reading by Leinsdorf, and Beethoven's First Symphony, a performance that had the virtues of good tempi and proper repeats, but had wooden string sound and no great commitment.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873
NOV 30 1968
New England

16.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000
DEC 5 1968 New England

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

BSO: POST-PRANDIAL GLOW

Other critical quarters have suggested that last weekend's concert must have been the victim of the torpor induced from too much Thanksgiving indulgence. Herewith an opinion that views its otherwise.

The bill of fare, revised from an earlier announcement, included one repertory staple, the first Symphony Hall performance (so help me!) of a classic work of incandescent genius, rable holiday afterglow.

First was the staple — by no means an overdone one — Beethoven's First Symphony. Mr. Leinsdorf's reading was rather on the pell-mell side and lacking in nuance, but the orchestral sound was fine, and the traversal carried a certain aspect of lean strength about it. In any case it is a never failing source of pleasure to apprehend the first subdued roars of the lion-to-be emerging from his mastery of and obeisance to the forms of the classical period.

There followed the first novelty, which was Debussy's Rhapsody for saxophone and orchestra. As might be expected, this was a commissioned work, commissioned in fact around the turn of the century for a Boston lady saxophonist named Mrs. Hall. As might also be expected, it isn't much of a piece. At the very least a solo work ought either to be a display vehicle for the instrument or of intrinsic musical interest per se. The Saxophone Rhapsody is neither. The solo passages are as miniscule as they are dull, while the work as an entity sounds almost as if Debussy were parodying himself. The soloist, Felix Viscuglia, of the orchestra's clarinet section, is a real pro (until he joined the orchestra last year, violinists doubling in reeds had been obligated to take over the mercifully infrequent saxophone chores) and carried out his assignment unblinkingly. But he would need to have been a sorcerer to make a thing of beauty out of the cows' moo that is the sound of the saxophone. The Rhapsody was last performed here thirty years ago and the year 2009 would seem to be a good target date for another hearing.

The piece de resistance was Mozart's Piano concerto in B flat, K.595, #27, with Claude Frank soloist. That Mozart reached the peak of his creative achievement in his piano concertos scarcely needs reiteration here. The K.595, however, as the last of them and written only 11 months before Mozart died, carries a special poignancy and uniqueness about it. Along with the simple, ingenuous melodies there are not only the most intricate and delicate instrumental chamber combinations but harmonic advances whose potentialities, had Mozart lived another decade, are stupefying to contemplate.

Mr. Frank, something of the pianist in non-residence of the orchestra, brought immense authority to his performance. The musicianship was at the same time scrupulous and free, and impeccable fingerwork graced a fine singing line. The accompaniment had its uneven moments when I had heard it Friday afternoon but was without kinks when I listened again on the Saturday evening live broadcast.

The second novelty was Kurt Weill's own suite from the "Three Penny Opera," performed with about a dozen instruments. If the sound and setting seemed highly improbable for a symphony performance, the fact remains that the overall impact of Weill's masterpiece, with its powerful evocation of the Weimar Republic era and the penetrating jazzy quality of his curious chamber orchestra, was eerily effective. Mr. Leinsdorf's stick technique visually resembled that of the late Tommy Dorsey, but aurally the performance could have done with a measure of that gentleman's plasticity. One was left with the feeling that a couple of good shots of schnapps for conductor and players was in order.

This weekend the second guest conductor of the season, Georg Semkow, will perform a program consisting of the Overture to the "Abduction from the Seraglio" and the Jupiter Symphony of Mozart and the first local performance of Scriabin's Symphony No. 2.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000
NOV 21 1968 New England Newsclip

BSO ON FM

Pianist Claude Frank will be soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Friday and Saturday, Nov. 29 and 30 in Mozart's Concerto in B Flat. Broadcast live by WGBH-FM from Symphony Hall, both Friday afternoon at 2 p.m. and Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m. Erich Leinsdorf conducts the orchestra in a program that also includes Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Debussy's Rapsodie for Saxophone and Orchestra, with Felix Viscuglia as soloist and the suite from Strauss' "Der Rosenkavalier."

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150
DEC 2 1968 New England

For young and old

BSO: Mozart, Weill

By Allan Sly

The Boston Symphony's return to home base this week, with Erich Leinsdorf at the podium, graced the holiday season with an appropriate program for young and old. Late Mozart faced early Beethoven across the less well known, but easy-to-assimilate, Debussy Saxophone Rhapsodie. Finally a small body of wind soloists, plus some other prominent members of the orchestra playing eccentric—in these surroundings—instruments (banjo, accordion, "traps") remained to jolt us out of our complacency with Kurt Weill's Threepenny Opera Suite.

This was a dynamic program in which one could perceive Mr. Leinsdorf's enjoyment of manipulating the mood of his audience. His conducting of the Beethoven First brought out its youthful ebullience, its visceral energy, its sense of physical well-being. On the other hand, in Mozart's last piano concerto (in B flat, K. 595) he collaborated with the soloist, Claude Frank, to produce a subjective inner calm, a lofty detachment, an attainment of sweet ripeness, that in its own way was equally telling.

Interpretive significance

His presentation of Felix Viscuglia in the Debussy work was noticeably paternal. From this collaboration proceeded a toothsome ten minutes of glamorous French color and innuendo, indulging a fondness for a rich diet and a long acquaintance with the exotic. The Weill teased us with its banality, cynicism, and harsh bitterness, seeming nonetheless to reflect some undeniable aspects of our common humanity. We left Symphony Hall with a keen sense of this troubled century overlying our earlier glimpses of innocence and serenity.

As for the afternoon's executive details, the horns still seemed dogged with some obscure intonation problem, and while the woodwinds generally seemed free of this trouble, the former glory of its chief soloists appeared to have departed. But the Mozart and Beethoven are, after all, rather in black and white. Improvement was hoped for in the Debussy. Here, although there was some fine work from the lower strings, more than one transparent cadence was marred by some individual player lacking the refinement of ensemble that so distinguishes the majority.

Since the BSO thees days, for all its enormous versatility and virtuosity, does not exude the unique sound that it once did, it might compensate by impeccable regulation of its own inner relationships. This is not to demand overriding direction from the podium—Mr. Leinsdorf's somewhat stylized gestures have an interpretive significance far more desirable than podium tyranny, which in any case would likely not solve the problem. Actually he is most meticulous, always about the important things, and always in relation to what is going to happen next. It should be up to the orchestra's own sense of identity to tidy up cadences, intonation, timing, and such matters. After all, when one instrumental voice can be detected out of adjustment to the whole, one knows this would be corrected for a recording, and should we concertgoers settle for less?

The Sound of Music

'Dreigroschenmusik'

By Peter M. Knapp

The "Mac the Knife" part of the repertoire in Symphony Hall usually belongs to Arthur Fiedler.

But Erich Leinsdorf is having his fling with Mackie Messer, Polly Peachum and the rest of the scruffy characters of Kurt Weill's "Threepenny Opera," and the suite from the Brecht-Weill anti-opera of the Twenties was on last night's Boston Symphony program.

So was another curiosity — the Debussy Rhapsody for saxophone and orchestra, performed by Felix Viscuglia, the orchestra's bass clarinetist. These two examples of innovative programming coexisted with Beethoven's Symphony No. 1 and Mozart's last piano concerto, in B-flat, K. 595, for which Claude Frank was soloist.

Up Tight

Actually, the Weill suite is a lot of fun, though being juxtaposed to Mozart is somewhat unfair. Its bite has softened with the years and its language seems quaint today. But it is a score one can accept with fondness, and admire Weill's bold instrumentation (for his time) and sense of theater. Leinsdorf deserves congratulations for presenting it.

The performance, however, was too uptight and unidiomatic to really work. It tended to sound like those early European attempts to play American jazz — well-meaning, but stiff, self-conscious and lacking a sense of joyous abandon. And so much of its effect, as well as its sarcasm, was lost.

The Debussy rhapsody has Boston associations — it was commissioned around the turn of the century by Mrs. Richards J. Hall, a saxophonist and member of the francophile Boston Orchestral Club. But Debussy never really set his heart to the score, and the sketch the composer produced was completed after his death by Jean Roger-Ducasse.

The composer's lack of commitment shows up in the score, not vintage Debussy, and not very interesting music. It meanders, more or less rhapsodically, using the saxophone more as a prominent member of the ensemble than as a featured solo instrument. But the solo part was played with a lovely, warm sound by Viscuglia.

The Beethoven symphony moved quite well after a tense-sounding first movement. The second and fourth movements were particularly good, Leinsdorf evoking fine clarity of detail and line from his players, and the finale ending in a romp of brilliant string playing.

But best of all was the Mozart piano concerto, a relaxed, perhaps resigned farewell to this form the Austrian master developed to perfection. It is an intimate, chamber-scaled work, for strings daubed with wind colorations, and Frank played it magnificently.

Frank is among the finest of our current Mozart performers, tasteful, refined, sensitive to nuance, articulate in phrasing, producing a clean-cut tone that sounds right for Mozart. He seems, though, to be developing some stage mannerisms — such as fingering the orchestral parts on the keyboard while the soloist has a rest — which do not enhance his art.

The Patriot Ledger, Wed. Dec. 4, 1968

TUESDAY A SERIES

FOURTH PROGRAM
Tuesday evening December 3 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BEETHOVEN — Symphony no. 1 in C major op. 21
Adagio molto – allegro con brio
Andante cantabile con moto
Menuetto: allegro molto e vivace
Finale: adagio – allegro molto vivace

DEBUSSY — Rhapsody for saxophone and orchestra
FELIX VISCUGLIA

intermission

MOZART — Piano concerto in B flat K. 595
Allegro
Larghetto
Allegro
CLAUDE FRANK

WEILL — Suite from 'Kleine Dreigroschenmusik für Blasorchester'
Overture
Die Moritat von Mackie Messer
(The 'Moritat' of Mac the Knife)
Die Ballade vom angenehmen Leben
(The ballad of the good life)
Pollys Lied (Polly's song)
Tango-Ballade (Tango ballad)
Kanonen-Song (The song of the big guns)

THURSDAY A SERIES

SECOND PROGRAM
Thursday evening December 5 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BACH — 'Wedding' Cantata no. 202 for soprano 'Weichet nur, betrübte Schatten' (Vanish, gloomy shadows)
Aria: Weichet nur, betrübte Schatten
Recitative: Die Welt wird wieder neu
Aria: Phöbus eilt mit schnellen Pferden
Recitative: D'rum sucht auch Amor sein Vergnügen
Aria: Wenn die Frühlings lüfte streichen
Recitative: Und dieses ist das Glücke
Aria: Sich üben im Lieben
Recitative: So sei das Band der keuschen Liebe
Gavotte: Sehet in Zufriedenheit

SARAMAE ENDICH soprano
JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN violin
CHARLES WILSON harpsichord continuo
HENRY PORTNOI double bass continuo
RALPH GOMBERG oboe
JULES ESKIN cello continuo
SHERMAN WALT bassoon continuo

intermission

BRAHMS — Ein deutsches Requiem op. 45
Chorus: Selig sind, die da Leid tragen
Chorus: Denn alles Fleisch es ist wie Gras
Baritone and chorus: Herr, lehre doch mich, dass ein Ende
Chorus: Wie lieblich sind deine Wohnungen
Soprano and chorus: Ihr habt nun Traurigkeit
Baritone and chorus: Denn wir haben hie keine bleibende Statt
Chorus: Selig sind die Toten

SARAMAE ENDICH soprano
DAVID CLATWORTHY baritone
NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY CHORUS
LORNA COOKE de VARON conductor

16.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

DEC 5 1968 New England

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

BSO: POST-PRANDIAL GLOW

Other critical quarters have suggested that last weekend's concert must have been the victim of the torpor induced from too much Thanksgiving indulgence. Herewith an opinion that views its otherwise.

The bill of fare, revised from an earlier announcement, included one repertory staple, the first Symphony Hall performance (so help me!) of a classic work of incandescent genius, rable holiday afterglow.

First was the staple — by no means an overdone one — Beethoven's First Symphony. Mr. Leinsdorf's reading was rather on the pell-mell side and lacking in nuance, but the orchestral sound was fine, and the traversal carried a certain aspect of lean strength about it. In any case it is a never failing source of pleasure to apprehend the first subdued roars of the lion-to-be emerging from his mastery of and obeisance to the forms of the classical period.

There followed the first novelty, which was Debussy's Rhapsody for saxophone and orchestra. As might be expected, this was a commissioned work, commissioned in fact around the turn of the century for a Boston lady saxophonist named Mrs. Hall. As might also be expected, it isn't much of a piece. At the very least a solo work ought either to be a display vehicle for the instrument or of intrinsic musical interest per se. The Saxophone Rhapsody is neither. The solo passages are as miniscule as they are dull, while the work as an entity sounds almost as if Debussy were parodying himself. The soloist, Felix Viscuglia, of the orchestra's clarinet section, is a real pro (until he joined the orchestra last year, violinists doubling in reeds had been obligated to take over the mercifully infrequent saxophone chores) and carried out his assignment unblinkingly. But he would need to have been a sorcerer to make a thing of beauty out of the cows' moo that is the sound of the saxophone. The Rhapsody was last performed here thirty years ago and the year 2009 would seem to be a good target date for another hearing.

The piece de resistance was Mozart's Piano concerto in B flat, K.595, #27, with Claude Frank soloist. That Mozart reached the peak of his creative achievement in his piano concertos scarcely needs reiteration here. The K.595, however, as the last of them and written only 11 months before Mozart died, carries a special poignancy and uniqueness about it. Along with the simple, ingenuous melodies there are not only the most intricate and delicate instrumental chamber combinations but harmonic advances whose potentialities, had Mozart lived another decade, are stupefying to contemplate.

Mr. Frank, something of the pianist in non-residence of the orchestra, brought immense authority to his performance. The musicianship was at the same time scrupulous and free, and impeccable fingerwork graced a fine singing line. The accompaniment had its uneven moments when I had heard it Friday afternoon but was without kinks when I listened again on the Saturday evening live broadcast.

The second novelty was Kurt Weill's own suite from the "Three Penny Opera," performed with about a dozen instruments. If the sound and setting seemed highly improbable for a symphony performance, the fact remains that the overall impact of Weill's masterpiece, with its powerful evocation of the Weimar Republic era and the penetrating jazzy quality of his curious chamber orchestra, was eerily effective. Mr. Leinsdorf's stick technique visually resembled that of the late Tommy Dorsey, but aurally the performance could have done with a measure of that gentleman's plasticity. One was left with the feeling that a couple of good shots of schnapps for conductor and players was in order.

This weekend the second guest conductor of the season, Georg Semkow, will perform a program consisting of the Overture to the "Abduction from the Seraglio" and the Jupiter Symphony of Mozart and the first local performance of Scriabin's Symphony No. 2.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

NOV 21 1968 New England Newsclip

BSO ON FM

Pianist Claude Frank will be soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Friday and Saturday, Nov. 29 and 30 in Mozart's Concerto in B Flat. Broadcast live by WGBH-FM from Symphony Hall, both Friday afternoon at 2 p.m. and Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m. Erich Leinsdorf conducts the orchestra in a program that also includes Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn, Debussy's Rapsodie for Saxophone and Orchestra, with Felix Viscuglia as soloist and the suite from Strauss' "Der Rosenkavalier."

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150

DEC 2 1968 New England

For young and old

BSO: Mozart, Weill

By Allan Sly

The Boston Symphony's return to home base this week, with Erich Leinsdorf at the podium, graced the holiday season with an appropriate program for young and old. Late Mozart faced early Beethoven across the less well known, but easy-to-assimilate, Debussy Saxophone Rhapsodie. Finally a small body of wind soloists, plus some other prominent members of the orchestra playing eccentric—in these surroundings—instruments (banjo, accordion, "traps") remained to jolt us out of our complacency with Kurt Weill's Threepenny Opera Suite.

This was a dynamic program in which one could perceive Mr. Leinsdorf's enjoyment of manipulating the mood of his audience. His conducting of the Beethoven First brought out its youthful ebullience, its visceral energy, its sense of physical well-being. On the other hand, in Mozart's last piano concerto (in B flat, K. 595) he collaborated with the soloist, Claude Frank, to produce a subjective inner calm, a lofty detachment, an attainment of sweet ripeness, that in its own way was equally telling.

Interpretive significance

His presentation of Felix Viscuglia in the Debussy work was noticeably paternal. From this collaboration proceeded a toothsome ten minutes of glamorous French color and innuendo, indulging a fondness for a rich diet and a long acquaintance with the exotic. The Weill teased us with its banality, cynicism, and harsh bitterness, seeming nonetheless to reflect some undeniable aspects of our common humanity. We left Symphony Hall with a keen sense of this troubled century overlying our earlier glimpses of innocence and serenity.

As for the afternoon's executive details, the horns still seemed dogged with some obscure intonation problem, and while the woodwinds generally seemed free of this trouble, the former glory of its chief soloists appeared to have departed. But the Mozart and Beethoven are, after all, rather in black and white. Improvement was hoped for in the Debussy. Here, although there was some fine work from the lower strings, more than one transparent cadence was marred by some individual player lacking the refinement of ensemble that so distinguishes the majority.

Since the BSO thees days, for all its enormous versatility and virtuosity, does not exude the unique sound that it once did, it might compensate by impeccable regulation of its own inner relationships. This is not to demand overriding direction from the podium—Mr. Leinsdorf's somewhat stylized gestures have an interpretive significance far more desirable than podium tyranny, which in any case would likely not solve the problem. Actually he is most meticulous, always about the important things, and always in relation to what is going to happen next. It should be up to the orchestra's own sense of identity to tidy up cadences, intonation, timing, and such matters. After all, when one instrumental voice can be detected out of adjustment to the whole, one knows this would be corrected for a recording, and should we concertgoers settle for less?

The Sound of Music

'Dreigroschenmusik'

By Peter M. Knapp

The "Mac the Knife" part of the repertoire in Symphony Hall usually belongs to Arthur Fiedler.

But Erich Leinsdorf is having his fling with Mackie Messer, Polly Peachum and the rest of the scruffy characters of Kurt Weill's "Threepenny Opera," and the suite from the Brecht-Weill anti-opera of the Twenties was on last night's Boston Symphony program.

So was another curiosity — the Debussy Rhapsody for saxophone and orchestra, performed by Felix Viscuglia, the orchestra's bass clarinetist. These two examples of innovative programming coexisted with Beethoven's Symphony No. 1 and Mozart's last piano concerto, in B-flat, K. 595, for which Claude Frank was soloist.

Up Tight

Actually, the Weill suite is a lot of fun, though being juxtaposed to Mozart is somewhat unfair. Its bite has softened with the years and its language seems quaint today. But it is a score one can accept with fondness, and admire Weill's bold instrumentation (for his time) and sense of theater. Leinsdorf deserves congratulations for presenting it.

The performance, however, was too uptight and unidiomatic to really work. It tended to sound like those early European attempts to play American jazz — well-meaning, but stiff, self-conscious and lacking a sense of joyous abandon. And so much of its effect, as well as its sarcasm, was lost.

The Debussy rhapsody has Boston associations — it was commissioned around the turn of the century by Mrs. Richards J. Hall, a saxophonist and member of the francophile Boston Orchestral Club. But Debussy never really set his heart to the score, and the sketch the composer produced was completed after his death by Jean Roger-Ducasse.

The composer's lack of commitment shows up in the score, not vintage Debussy, and not very interesting music. It meanders, more or less rhapsodically, using the saxophone more as a prominent member of the ensemble than as a featured solo instrument. But the solo part was played with a lovely, warm sound by Viscuglia.

The Beethoven symphony moved quite well after a tense-sounding first movement. The second and fourth movements were particularly good, Leinsdorf evoking fine clarity of detail and line from his players, and the finale ending in a romp of brilliant string playing.

But best of all was the Mozart piano concerto, a relaxed, perhaps resigned farewell to this form the Austrian master developed to perfection. It is an intimate, chamber-scaled work, for strings daubed with wind colorations, and Frank played it magnificently.

Frank is among the finest of our current Mozart performers, tasteful, refined, sensitive to nuance, articulate in phrasing, producing a clean-cut tone that sounds right for Mozart. He seems, though, to be developing some stage mannerisms — such as fingering the orchestral parts on the keyboard while the soloist has a rest — which do not enhance his art.

The Patriot Ledger, Wed., Dec. 4, 1968

TUESDAY A SERIES

FOURTH PROGRAM
Tuesday evening December 3 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BEETHOVEN — Symphony no. 1 in C major op. 21
Adagio molto – allegro con brio
Andante cantabile con moto
Menuetto: allegro molto e vivace
Finale: adagio – allegro molto vivace

DEBUSSY — Rhapsody for saxophone and orchestra
FELIX VISCUGLIA

intermission

MOZART — Piano concerto in B flat K. 595
Allegro
Larghetto
Allegro
CLAUDE FRANK

WEILL — Suite from 'Kleine Dreigroschenmusik für Blasorchester'
Overture
Die Moritat von Mackie Messer (The 'Moritat' of Mac the Knife)
Die Ballade vom angenehmen Leben (The ballad of the good life)
Pollys Lied (Polly's song)
Tango-Ballade (Tango ballad)
Kanonen-Song (The song of the big guns)

THURSDAY A SERIES

SECOND PROGRAM
Thursday evening December 5 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BACH — 'Wedding' Cantata no. 202 for soprano 'Weichet nur, betrübte Schatten' (Vanish, gloomy shadows)
Aria: Weichet nur, betrübte Schatten
Recitative: Die Welt wird wieder neu
Aria: Phöbus eilt mit schnellen Pferden
Recitative: D'rum sucht auch Amor sein Vergnügen
Aria: Wenn die Frühlings lüfte streichen
Recitative: Und dieses ist das Glücke
Aria: Sich üben im Lieben
Recitative: So sei das Band der keuschen Liebe
Gavotte: Sehet in Zufriedenheit

SARAMAE ENDICH soprano
JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN violin
CHARLES WILSON harpsichord continuo
HENRY PORTNOI double bass continuo
RALPH GOMBERG oboe
JULES ESKIN cello continuo
SHERMAN WALT bassoon continuo

intermission

BRAHMS — Ein deutsches Requiem op. 45
Chorus: Selig sind, die da Leid tragen
Chorus: Denn alles Fleisch es ist wie Gras
Baritone and chorus: Herr, lehre doch mich, dass ein Ende
Chorus: Wie lieblich sind deine Wohnungen
Soprano and chorus: Ihr habt nun Traurigkeit
Baritone and chorus: Denn wir haben hie keine bleibende Statt
Chorus: Selig sind die Toten

SARAMAE ENDICH soprano
DAVID CLATWORTHY baritone
NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY CHORUS
LORNA COOKE de VARON conductor

NINTH PROGRAM
Friday afternoon December 6 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening December 7 at 8.30

GEORG SEMKOW conductor

MOZART — Overture to 'Die Entführung aus dem Serail'

MOZART — Symphony no. 41 in C major K. 551 'The Jupiter'*
Allegro vivace
Andante cantabile
Menuetto: allegretto
Finale: allegro molto

intermission

SCRIABIN — Symphony no. 2 in C minor
Andante – allegro giocoso – andante
Allegro
Andante
Tempestoso
Maestoso

first performance in the United States

Semkow to Debut With Symphony

The ninth Friday/Saturday pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will see the American debut of the forty-year-old Polish conductor, Georg Semkow. Mr. Semkow will conduct the weekend concerts and the Tuesday "B" series concert of Dec. 10.

New to the Boston Symphony Orchestra programs will be the Symphony No. 2 in C minor by Alexander Scriabin, which will be the sole work on the second part of Mr. Semkow's program. The first part of the program lists two works by Mozart, the Overture to "Die Entfuehrung" and the "Jupiter" Symphony, No. 41.

Georg Semkow was born in Radomsk, Poland. He studied at the Cracow Conservatory before moving to the Leningrad Conservatory for advanced study. After making his debut with the Leningrad Philharmonic, he conducted that orchestra from 1953 to 1956 in its home city and on tour, including appearances in Moscow and in his native Poland. He then became leading conductor of the Bolshoi Opera in Moscow.

Mr. Semkow returned to Warsaw in 1959 to become the conductor of the Opera. He has appeared widely in Europe—at La Scala, with the Berlin and Vienna Philharmonics, in London, and in Czechoslovakia. Later this season, he will appear with the New York Philharmonic and Montreal Symphony Orchestras.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436
DEC 1 1968
New England Newsclip

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873
DEC 7 1968
New England Newsclip

Semkow Too Low-Key In Debut at Symphony

By GEORGE GELLES, Music Critic

The Boston Symphony debut of George Semkow Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall raises an important question, which for the moment I'll shelve.

Semkow, a 40-year-old Pole who studied in Leningrad and is presently Artistic Director of Danish Royal Opera in Copenhagen, is making his first tour of the states.

In looks, he is a leaner, more angular Colin Davis; in podium style, he is usually a spring wound up, snapping cues sharply at the orchestra, shaking his head and setting his cowlick awry; and in performance, he is low-key to the point of being no-key.

There was, however, a clinical cleanliness about his work; tempi he took in Mozart and Scriabin were unwarrentedly slow, but this helped make for an absence of rough edges (for the most part, I add. String playing in Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, at the lead-in to the first movement false reprise, was very sloppy.) But slow tempi or not, there was no reason to play the "Jupiter" with no repeats other than the unavoidable ones in the minuet.

It seemed slightly irrelevant to program Scriabin's Second Symphony, though the performance was claimed an American premiere, when no symphonic work of Rachmaninoff is scheduled this season, one of Tchaikovsky's (the fifth, how imaginative!), none of Mahler's, and one of Bruckner's (the Sixth).

The second was roundly panned at its premier, but for the wrong reason. Its chromaticism — the thorn then — has lost its shock, and sounds blandly routine when compared with Scriabin's late piano pieces. But the Symphony is also without the simple charm of the Piano Concerto (which the Handel and Haydn Society played two weeks ago; its sentiment is sticky and it is expressed bombastically. What I heard of the reading was, like the Mozart, tidy and without warmth.

The point is that there are dozens of Semkows in Europe, opera conductors who can get performances for better or worse, shipshape in no time; why the BSO trustees chose this Semkow is in no way clear.

BSO shines with Semkow

By HARRY NEVILLE
Associated Critic

The ARTS

Polish conductor Georg Semkow, artistic director of the Danish Royal Opera and formerly conductor of the Leningrad Philharmonic, made his United States debut in yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert.

The occasion was noteworthy in several respects. Semkow has a clear, precise baton technique that got uncommonly good results in Mozart's overture to "Die Entfuehrung" and in the same composer's Symphony No. 41. His careful articulation of dynamic distinctions was impressive throughout and especially so in the overture.

The Symphony No. 41 received a poised, elegant reading — one from which the overstated passion of many "Jupiter" performances was happily missing.

The string sound was on the thin side and could have benefited from more firmness without detriment to Semkow's restrained approach. Aside from some questionable inflections in the Andante, rhythm was quite good — not inflexible, yet with a strong forward impetus.

Scriabin's Symphony No. 2 is probably no one's idea of a masterpiece, or even of one of this composer's better works. Its inclusion on the program was nevertheless welcome, for such pieces provide a musical perspective lacking in most of us.

If their performance could be said to displace some of the more hackneyed repertory items, then the Boston Symphony would deserve nothing but encouragement in this kind of programming.

The work is in five movements, none of which were particularly engaging to one's musical sensibilities. Even with the cuts sanctioned by the composer, the symphony still seemed overlong and diffuse — interesting as historical phenomenon, but seldon as music.

As in the rest of the program, Semkow conducted from memory and with obvious affection for the work. In view of some rather turgid scoring, the clarity he was able to give the music deserves special commendation.

Boston Symphony, Georg Semkow conducting Mozart, overture to "Die Entfuehrung," Symphony No. 41; Scriabin, Symphony No. 2. Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
DEC 7 1968
New England Newsclip

BSO: Semkow conducts Scriabin

By Allan Sly

ARTS ENTERTAINMENT

The interest of the weekend's Boston Symphony concerts bore three distinct aspects: the conductor, the orchestra's response to him, and the program itself. While closely related, they bear separate treatment.

Georg Semkow's first American appearance Friday afternoon was exciting. The Polish conductor's antecedents earn him the glamour of the exotic, his long responsibilities in opera guarantee his readiness to make innumerable split-second decisions, his emergence in the symphonic field promises interpretative distinction. His Mozart showed courtly grace and vivid characterization in the Entführung overture, breadth and elegance in the Jupiter Symphony, and transparent clarity of execution in both.

Silken strings

His choice of the Scriabin Symphony No. 2, of 1901, never before heard in the United States, showed him to be alert as an exponent of cultural values on an international scale. The American public is readily intrigued with any additions to its knowledge of recent Russian accomplishment in the arts.

As to the orchestra's response, from the start the strings gave out that silken sound that we have missed since Koussevitzky's departure. The woodwind soloists were in evidence, the brass opulent and in superb adjustment among themselves and in relation to the whole orchestra. The many busy passages, though brilliantly consummated, never obtruded on the expressive purpose in hand.

One may marvel at the easy flow from prodigies of skill to flashes of interpretive insight that an orchestra unself-consciously exhibits when playing at its best. This is how the orchestra responded to George Semkow.

His podium manner is meticulous: He takes nothing for granted, but neither does he fuss. Using no score, he summons out of the air, as it were, the embodiment of the music in hand in terms clear to musicians and revelatory to all.

In particular Mr. Semkow has a way of indicating relative differences of dynamic intensities that produced instantaneous response, thereby unfolding the novel, or at least unfamiliar, emotional program of the Scriabin in such a way that the audience easily identified with it. His handling of the music's style goes along with an incandescent temperament. This listener became enthralled, and remained so.

Timely reminder

As for the 1901 Scriabin itself: Many reading this will have read Nicolas Slonimsky's magnificent program note on it. Since it was too long to read at the concert in the half-light of Symphony Hall, one had to hear the symphony without benefit of all that information.

The work is easy to comprehend, and it parallels many symphonies of those years that one has heard; in particular it uses idioms familiar in Elgar's works, though the two men could not have known each other. It verges on the banal at times more than Elgar, and it does not hold itself together as circumspectly as Rachmaninoff's "Dresden" symphony of a few years later. It paraphrases Wagner more than either of these others, and it carries a more intense preoccupation with itself that presages the composer's later eccentricities.

But as played this week it is a timely reminder of what the modern orchestra is designed to do superbly well. We have all heard the orchestral medium abused, perverted, fragmented, denatured; it is healthy to hear it again rejoicing as a giant to run his course. The voice of the new century came as a timely reminder of stars we had once steered by. That Georg Semkow had acted as our guide underscores his importance to the world of today.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150
DEC 9 1968
New England Newsclip

Semkow debuts with B.S.O.

Polish conductor Georg Semkow will make his American debut in concerts this week and next with the Boston Symphony. The program will include Scriabin's Symphony No. 2, in its first performance by the orchestra, and two works by Mozart, the overture to "Die Entfuerung" and the Symphony No. 41. Scheduled for Friday at 2 and Saturday at 8:30, the program will be repeated Dec. 10 at 7:30.

Born in Radomsk, Poland, Semkow studied at the Cracow and Leningrad conservatories. He conducted the Leningrad Philharmonic from 1953 to 1956 and then became leading conductor of the Bolshoi Opera. He returned to Warsaw in 1959 to become conductor of that city's opera company. Later this season he will appear as guest conductor in New York and Montreal.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905
DEC 1 1968
New England

NINTH PROGRAM
Friday afternoon December 6 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening December 7 at 8.30

GEORG SEMKOW conductor

MOZART	Overture to 'Die Entführung aus dem Serail'
MOZART	Symphony no. 41 in C major K. 551 'The Jupiter'*
	Allegro vivace
	Andante cantabile
	Menuetto: allegretto
	Finale: allegro molto
intermission
SCRIABIN	Symphony no. 2 in C minor
	Andante – allegro giocoso – andante
	Allegro
	Andante
	Tempestoso
	Maestoso

first performance in the United States

Semkow to Debut With Symphony

The ninth Friday/Saturday pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will see the American debut of the forty-year-old Polish conductor, Georg Semkow. Mr. Semkow will conduct the weekend concerts and the Tuesday "B" series concert of Dec. 10.

New to the Boston Symphony Orchestra programs will be the Symphony No. 2 in C minor by Alexander Scriabin, which will be the sole work on the second part of Mr. Semkow's program. The first part of the program lists two works by Mozart, the Overture to "Die Entfuehrung" and the "Jupiter" Symphony, No. 41.

Georg Semkow was born in Radomsk, Poland. He studied at the Cracow Conservatory before moving to the Leningrad Conservatory for advanced study. After making his debut with the Leningrad Philharmonic, he conducted that orchestra from 1953 to 1956 in its home city and on tour, including appearances in Moscow and in his native Poland. He then became leading conductor of the Bolshoi Opera in Moscow.

Mr. Semkow returned to Warsaw in 1959 to become the conductor of the Opera. He has appeared widely in Europe—at La Scala, with the Berlin and Vienna Philharmonics, in London, and in Czechoslovakia. Later this season, he will appear with the New York Philharmonic and Montreal Symphony Orchestras.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436

DEC 1 1968 New England Newsclip

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

DEC 7 1968 New England Newsclip

Semkow Too Low-Key In Debut at Symphony

By GEORGE GELLES, Music Critic

The Boston Symphony debut of George Semkow Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall raises an important question, which for the moment I'll shelve.

Semkow, a 40-year-old Pole who studied in Leningrad and is presently Artistic Director of Danish Royal Opera in Copenhagen, is making his first tour of the states.

In looks, he is a leaner, more angular Colin Davis; in podium style, he is usually a spring wound up, snapping cues sharply at the orchestra, shaking his head and setting his cowlick awry; and in performance, he is low-key to the point of being no-key.

There was, however, a clinical cleanliness about his work; tempi he took in Mozart and Scriabin were unwarrentedly slow, but this helped make for an absence of rough edges (for the most part, I add. String playing in Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, at the lead-in to the first movement false reprise, was very sloppy.) But slow tempi or not, there was no reason to play the "Jupiter" with no repeats other than the unavoidable ones in the minuet.

It seemed slightly irrelevant to program Scriabin's Second Symphony, though the performance was claimed an American premiere, when no symphonic work of Rachmaninoff is scheduled this season, one of Tchaikovsky's (the fifth, how imaginative!), none of Mahler's, and one of Bruckner's (the Sixth).

The second was roundly panned at its premier, but for the wrong reason. Its chromaticism — the thorn then — has lost its shock, and sounds blandly routine when compared with Scriabin's late piano pieces. But the Symphony is also without the simple charm of the Piano Concerto (which the Handel and Haydn Society played two weeks ago; its sentiment is sticky and it is expressed bombastically. What I heard of the reading was, like the Mozart, tidy and without warmth.

The point is that there are dozens of Semkows in Europe, opera conductors who can get performances for better or worse, shipshape in no time; why the BSO trustees chose this Semkow is in no way clear.

BSO shines with Semkow

By HARRY NEVILLE
Associated Critic

The ARTS

Polish conductor Georg Semkow, artistic director of the Danish Royal Opera and formerly conductor of the Leningrad Philharmonic, made his United States debut in yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert.

The occasion was noteworthy in several respects. Semkow has a clear, precise baton technique that got uncommonly good results in Mozart's overture to "Die Entfuehrung" and in the same composer's Symphony No. 41. His careful articulation of dynamic distinctions was impressive throughout and especially so in the overture.

The Symphony No. 41 received a poised, elegant reading — one from which the overstated passion of many "Jupiter" performances was happily missing.

The string sound was on the thin side and could have benefited from more firmness without detriment to Semkow's restrained approach. Aside from some questionable inflections in the Andante, rhythm was quite good — not inflexible, yet with a strong forward impetus.

Scriabin's Symphony No. 2 is probably no one's idea of a masterpiece, or even of one of this composer's better works. Its inclusion on the program was nevertheless welcome, for such pieces provide a musical perspective lacking in most of us.

If their performance could be said to displace some of the more hackneyed repertory items, then the Boston Symphony would deserve nothing but encouragement in this kind of programming.

The work is in five movements, none of which were particularly engaging to one's musical sensibilities. Even with the cuts sanctioned by the composer, the symphony still seemed overlong and diffuse — interesting as historical phenomenon, but seldon as music.

As in the rest of the program, Semkow conducted from memory and with obvious affection for the work. In view of some rather turgid scoring, the clarity he was able to give the music deserves special commendation.

Boston Symphony, Georg Semkow conducting: Mozart, overture to "Die Entfuehrung," Symphony No. 41; Scriabin, Symphony No. 2. Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

DEC 7 1968 New England Newsclip

BSO: Semkow conducts Scriabin

By Allan Sly

ARTS ENTERTAINMENT

The interest of the weekend's Boston Symphony concerts bore three distinct aspects: the conductor, the orchestra's response to him, and the program itself. While closely related, they bear separate treatment.

Georg Semkow's first American appearance Friday afternoon was exciting. The Polish conductor's antecedents earn him the glamour of the exotic, his long responsibilities in opera guarantee his readiness to make innumerable split-second decisions, his emergence in the symphonic field promises interpretative distinction. His Mozart showed courtly grace and vivid characterization in the Entführung overture, breadth and elegance in the Jupiter Symphony, and transparent clarity of execution in both.

Silken strings

His choice of the Scriabin Symphony No. 2, of 1901, never before heard in the United States, showed him to be alert as an exponent of cultural values on an international scale. The American public is readily intrigued with any additions to its knowledge of recent Russian accomplishment in the arts.

As to the orchestra's response, from the start the strings gave out that silken sound that we have missed since Koussevitzky's departure. The woodwind soloists were in evidence, the brass opulent and in superb adjustment among themselves and in relation to the whole orchestra. The many busy passages, though brilliantly consummated, never obtruded on the expressive purpose in hand.

One may marvel at the easy flow from prodigies of skill to flashes of interpretive insight that an orchestra unself-consciously exhibits when playing at its best. This is how the orchestra responded to George Semkow.

His podium manner is meticulous: He takes nothing for granted, but neither does he fuss. Using no score, he summons out of the air, as it were, the embodiment of the music in hand in terms clear to musicians and revelatory to all.

In particular Mr. Semkow has a way of indicating relative differences of dynamic intensities that produced instantaneous response, thereby unfolding the novel, or at least unfamiliar, emotional program of the Scriabin in such a way that the audience easily identified with it. His handling of the music's style goes along with an incandescent temperament. This listener became enthralled, and remained so.

Timely reminder

As for the 1901 Scriabin itself: Many reading this will have read Nicolas Slonimsky's magnificent program note on it. Since it was too long to read at the concert in the half-light of Symphony Hall, one had to hear the symphony without benefit of all that information.

The work is easy to comprehend, and it parallels many symphonies of those years that one has heard; in particular it uses idioms familiar in Elgar's works, though the two men could not have known each other. It verges on the banal at times more than Elgar, and it does not hold itself together as circumspectly as Rachmaninoff's "Dresden" symphony of a few years later. It paraphrases Wagner more than either of these others, and it carries a more intense preoccupation with itself that presages the composer's later eccentricities.

But as played this week it is a timely reminder of what the modern orchestra is designed to do superbly well. We have all heard the orchestral medium abused, perverted, fragmented, denatured; it is healthy to hear it again rejoicing as a giant to run his course. The voice of the new century came as a timely reminder of stars we had once steered by. That Georg Semkow had acted as our guide underscores his importance to the world of today.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150

DEC 9 1968 New England Newsclip

Semkow debuts with B.S.O.

Polish conductor Georg Semkow will make his American debut in concerts this week and next with the Boston Symphony. The program will include Scriabin's Symphony No. 2, in its first performance by the orchestra, and two works by Mozart, the overture to "Die Entfuerung" and the Symphony No. 41. Scheduled for Friday at 2 and Saturday at 8:30, the program will be repeated Dec. 10 at 7:30.

Born in Radomsk, Poland, Semkow studied at the Cracow and Leningrad conservatories. He conducted the Leningrad Philharmonic from 1953 to 1956 and then became leading conductor of the Bolshoi Opera. He returned to Warsaw in 1959 to become conductor of that city's opera company. Later this season he will appear as guest conductor in New York and Montreal.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905

DEC 1 1968 New England

18.

Scriabin's Symphony No. 2

BSO Performs a First

By McLAREN HARRIS

Strange it is, long-time Boston Symphony conductor Serge Koussevitzky having been a virtual oracle for Alexander Scriabin, that yesterday's Symphony performance of Scriabin's Symphony No. 2 should be the first in the United States.

But then everything about Scriabin, during his lifetime and after, carries an element of strangeness. He began as a piano virtuoso, then turned to composing in a manner after Chopin and Liszt, but as he delved into mysticism and subjective expression of moods and personality current in Russian literature near the end of the 19th century, a sense of mission overtook him.

He believed implicitly in the superiority of his own talent and in his destiny for greatness, and conceived himself as the procreator of a work surpassing even the Wagnerian Gesamtkunstwerk for breadth, encompassing science, religion and philosophy in addition to the arts.

His project never got off the ground and his compositional idiom, a chromaticism progressing from romantic usage in the early works to virtual atonality in the later, lost shortly after his death in 1915 what favor it had gained during his life. Even Koussevitzky's enthusiasm for Scriabin cooled as years passed; thus it fell upon Polish conductor Georg Semkow to introduce the Second Symphony yesterday to an American audience.

NOW FOR ALL the ridicule heaped upon Scriabin's harmonic favorite, the "mystic" chord, and for all the tales told of his ideas about color organs and perfume dispensers, the Symphony No. 2 is not that bad. He uses a conventional-size orchestra, not one of those late-romantic monsters. His harmony, mystic chord or no, goes very little if any beyond Wagner.

His orchestration is strongly reminiscent of Bruckner's and his textures are oftentimes a good deal more vigorous. His formal structures and sequential plan are, by and large, solid; the Second makes as much overall sense as Rachmaniov's symphonies, though Scriabin lacked the latter's melodic bent. It is an intelligently-written work.

But you know that when someone describes a work as "intelligently - written" he usually means it contains some other tragic failing. In Scriabin's case it may be defined as an inadequate sense of direction. Within the five movements, which form a good collective variety, the composer tends to indulge in more or less a single mood without much feeling of progress until he deems it time for a change.

THE SHORTER motives, distinctive in themselves, are sometimes repeated more than their interest advises, and such redundance extends to cadential figures. And the longer the themes become, the more their identity suffers.

At that, this rather early and conventional symphony makes a good case for itself, especially in a post-romantic maelstrom and especially again in the hands of Semkow. The orchestra cannot have had long acquaintance with the work, but players and conductor pulled together effectively, dynamically, cleanly.

SEMKOW IS A conductor who uses discipline expertly and meaningfully. What abilities he displayed with Scriabin's slightly ungainly substance had become evident earlier in a masterful reading of Mozart's Symphony No. 41, the "Jupiter." His pace, particularly in the early movements, was on the leisurely side, but he revealed Mozart's inner spaces with a crystalline clarity I have never before encountered. There was perspective to everything — leading motives, counter-figures, fugal passages; the themes, whole or in part, were beautifully articulated. The orchestral balance extended through all registers and timbres.

THE OPENING Overture to Mozart's "Abduction from the Seraglio" was more briskly paced but equally sharp in definition, as fresh as the cold, clear air when swept through Boston yesterday. Any list of young conductors to watch without Semkow's name on it is just plain incomplete.

Next week Erich Leinsdorf will conduct Schoenberg's Variations for orchestra, Op. 31, Xaver Scharwenka's Piano Concerto in B flat minor (Earl Wild, soloist), and Prokofiev's Scenes from "Romeo and Juliet."

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
DEC 7 1968
New England

RECORD (e)
CHELSEA, MASS.
CIRC. 6,324
DEC 23 1968
New England Newsclip

Polish Affairs and Folks

Polish Conductor
Polish conductor George Semkow made his American debut last Tuesday as he directed the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall in Boston. Station WGBH F.M. 89.7 carried the program.

Closed
The public schools town, Ohio, hav due to the fi city. Mo ther

Appointed Manager
The writer who is con with the Polish Tra association of Un ceived word " ski has Am

TUESDAY B SERIES

THIRD PROGRAM
Tuesday evening December 10 at 7.30

GEORG SEMKOW conductor

MOZART — Overture to 'Die Entführung aus dem Serail'

MOZART — Symphony no. 41 in C major K. 551 'The Jupiter'*
Allegro vivace
Andante cantabile
Menuetto: allegretto
Finale: allegro molto

intermission

SCRIABIN — Symphony no. 2 in C minor
Andante – allegro giocoso – andante
Allegro
Andante
Tempestoso
Maestoso

THE CONDUCTOR

GEORG SEMKOW, who makes his debut in the United States at these concerts with the Boston Symphony, was born in Radomsk, Poland, in 1928. He studied at the Conservatory of Music in Cracow and simultaneously in the Department of Mathematics at the Jagiellonski University in that city. In 1950 he moved to Leningrad to study conducting at the Conservatory. After graduating he began his artistic career as a conductor of the Leningrad Philharmonic.

From 1953 to 1956 Georg Semkow conducted the Leningrad Philharmonic in its home city and in Moscow, Erivan and other cities of the USSR. He also made many guest appearances in Poland. He then became a leading conductor of the Bolshoi Opera in Moscow, conducting during the next three years more than a hundred operatic performances. He also traveled to Austria, Czechoslovakia, Germany and Italy.

In 1959 he returned to Warsaw to become the conductor of the Opera, and supervised a number of notable productions, including Boris Godunov and Andrea Chenier.

In the years since, Georg Semkow has appeared widely in Europe, at La Scala in Milan, with the Berlin and Vienna Philharmonics, in London and elsewhere. He lives now in Copenhagen, where he is artistic director of the Danish Royal Opera. Later this season he will appear with the New York Philharmonic and Montreal Symphony Orchestras.

18.

Scriabin's Symphony No. 2

BSO Performs a First

By McLAREN HARRIS

Strange it is, long-time Boston Symphony conductor Serge Koussevitzky having been a virtual oracle for Alexander Scriabin, that yesterday's Symphony performance of Scriabin's Symphony No. 2 should be the first in the United States.

But then everything about Scriabin, during his lifetime and after, carries an element of strangeness. He began as a piano virtuoso, then turned to composing in a manner after Chopin and Liszt, but as he delved into mysticism and subjective expression of moods and personality current in Russian literature near the end of the 19th century, a sense of mission overtook him.

He believed implicitly in the superiority of his own talent and in his destiny for greatness, and conceived himself as the procreator of a work surpassing even the Wagnerian Gesamtkunstwerk for breadth, encompassing science, religion and philosophy in addition to the arts.

His project never got off the ground and his compositional idiom, a chromaticism progressing from romantic usage in the early works to virtual atonality in the later, lost shortly after his death in 1915 what favor it had gained during his life. Even Koussevitzky's enthusiasm for Scriabin cooled as years passed; thus it fell upon Polish conductor Georg Semkow to introduce the Second Symphony yesterday to an American audience.

NOW FOR ALL the ridicule heaped upon Scriabin's harmonic favorite, the "mystic" chord, and for all the tales told of his ideas about color organs and perfume dispensers, the Symphony No. 2 is not that bad. He uses a conventional-size orchestra, not one of those late-romantic monsters. His harmony, mystic chord or no, goes very little if any beyond Wagner.

His orchestration is strongly reminiscent of Bruckner's and his textures are oftentimes a good deal more vigorous. His formal structures and sequential plan are, by and large, solid; the Second makes as much overall sense as Rachmaniov's symphonies, though Scriabin lacked the latter's melodic bent. It is an intelligently-written work.

But you know that when someone describes a work as "intelligently - written" he usually means it contains some other tragic failing. In Scriabin's case it may be defined as an inadequate sense of direction. Within the five movements, which form a good collective variety, the composer tends to indulge in more or less a single mood without much feeling of progress until he deems it time for a change.

THE SHORTER motives, distinctive in themselves, are sometimes repeated more than their interest advises, and such redundance extends to cadential figures. And the longer the themes become, the more their identity suffers.

At that, this rather early and conventional symphony makes a good case for itself, especially in a post-romantic maelstrom and especially again in the hands of Semkow. The orchestra cannot have had long acquaintance with the work, but players and conductor pulled together effectively, dynamically, cleanly.

SEMKOW IS A conductor who uses discipline expertly and meaningfully. What abilities he displayed with Scriabin's slightly ungainly substance had become evident earlier in a masterful reading of Mozart's Symphony No. 41, the "Jupiter." His pace, particularly in the early movements, was on the leisurely side, but he revealed Mozart's inner spaces with a crystalline clarity I have never before encountered. There was perspective to everything — leading motives, counter-figures, fugal passages; the themes, whole or in part, were beautifully articulated. The orchestral balance extended through all registers and timbres.

THE OPENING Overture to Mozart's "Abduction from the Seraglio" was more briskly paced but equally sharp in definition, as fresh as the cold, clear air when swept through Boston yesterday. Any list of young conductors to watch without Semkow's name on it is just plain incomplete.

Next week Erich Leinsdorf will conduct Schoenberg's Variations for orchestra, Op. 31, Xaver Scharwenka's Piano Concerto in B flat minor (Earl Wild, soloist), and Prokofiev's Scenes from "Romeo and Juliet."

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
DEC 7 1968
New England

RECORD (e)
CHELSEA, MASS.
CIRC. 6,324
DEC 23 1968
New England Newsclip

Polish Affairs and Folks

Polish Conductor

Polish conductor George Semkow made his American debut last Tuesday as he directed the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall in Boston. Station WGBH F.M. 89.7 carried the program.

Closed

The public schools town, Ohio, hav due to the fi city. Me the

Appointed Manager

The writer who is con with the Polish Tra association of Ur ceived word ski has Am

TUESDAY B SERIES

THIRD PROGRAM
Tuesday evening December 10 at 7.30

GEORG SEMKOW conductor

MOZART — Overture to 'Die Entführung aus dem Serail'

MOZART — Symphony no. 41 in C major K. 551 'The Jupiter'*
Allegro vivace
Andante cantabile
Menuetto: allegretto
Finale: allegro molto

intermission

SCRIABIN — Symphony no. 2 in C minor
Andante – allegro giocoso – andante
Allegro
Andante
Tempestoso
Maestoso

THE CONDUCTOR

GEORG SEMKOW, who makes his debut in the United States at these concerts with the Boston Symphony, was born in Radomsk, Poland, in 1928. He studied at the Conservatory of Music in Cracow and simultaneously in the Department of Mathematics at the Jagiellonski University in that city. In 1950 he moved to Leningrad to study conducting at the Conservatory. After graduating he began his artistic career as a conductor of the Leningrad Philharmonic.

From 1953 to 1956 Georg Semkow conducted the Leningrad Philharmonic in its home city and in Moscow, Erivan and other cities of the USSR. He also made many guest appearances in Poland. He then became a leading conductor of the Bolshoi Opera in Moscow, conducting during the next three years more than a hundred operatic performances. He also traveled to Austria, Czechoslovakia, Germany and Italy.

In 1959 he returned to Warsaw to become the conductor of the Opera, and supervised a number of notable productions, including Boris Godunov and Andrea Chenier.

In the years since, Georg Semkow has appeared widely in Europe, at La Scala in Milan, with the Berlin and Vienna Philharmonics, in London and elsewhere. He lives now in Copenhagen, where he is artistic director of the Danish Royal Opera. Later this season he will appear with the New York Philharmonic and Montreal Symphony Orchestras.

Last Played Here 70 Years Ago

Scharwenka Concerto Highlight at BSO

By McLAREN HARRIS

With Erich Leinsdorf continuing his convalescence, assistant Charles Wilson stepped into the breach to conduct the weekend Symphony concerts. This necessitated another program change, which has been the rule rather than the exception lately; but that is one of the hazards of early program announcements.

Rossini's overture to "L'Italiana in Algeri" sat in for Schoenberg's Variations, Op. 31—understandable, considering the short notice usually involved. It is an overture like almost all such Rossini products ("William Tell" is the exception)—full of sunny melody, lots of harmony in thirds, woodwind color, trumpet-fanfare conclusions and standard horse-race form. The orchestra took care of it handily.

THE BIG NEWS of the day, though by no means new news, was Xaver Scharwenka's Piano Concerto in B flat minor, No. 1, which was last played here 70 years ago by pianist Moritz Rosenthal under Wilhelm Gericke. This week is Earl Wild's turn with the solo part by no mere coincidence, for Wild once studied with a pupil of Scharwenka.

At the outset and now and then throughout the progress of the concerto, one may wonder why it hasn't taken its place alongside Tchaikovsky's B flat minor Concerto and others which survived their time. The romantic thematic work is strong and with good character delineation, the harmonies well-conceived, the orchestration capable and the relationship between orchestra and pianist-hero securely in the mainstream of tradition from Liszt to Rachmaninoff, where full-blown virtuosic display was supremely adored.

BUT THE CONTEXT in which everything takes place reveals why Scharwenka, a comparative late-comer in the romantic era anyway, is more remembered for his establishment of the Berlin Conservatory and other pedagogical activities than for his music. The forms, as the program notes hint, are rather curious.

The three-movement concerto contains no slow movement; instead Scharwenka slipped an Adagio section into the first in place of the development. Such sleight-of-pen wouldn't be an altogether bad idea were it not for the weakness it imparts to the first movement's recapitulation or the fact that it doesn't quiet relieve the dullness of three essentially fast movements.

The finale's form is even more obscure, marked by random returns of the principal material in a drawn-out succession of anti-climaxes. Only the intervening Scherzo, itself th matically profuse, produces unity and direction.

THAT LACK of coherence and the solo part's descent into virtuosic hack-work on numerous occasions make Scharwenka's work less than musically exciting, but it is nonetheless entertaining in its old-style pianistic flavor of Anton Rubinstein, where thundering octaves, resounding chords and melodic sweep outweighed some considerations of absolute note-accuracy or clarity. Thus it is no derogation to Earl Wild that he played it in such a fashion — massively attacked in its heavier passages, poetically voiced in tall dynamic arches in gentler areas.

Wilson and the orchestra contributed rich-bodied complement, and the overall impression was that, though superior genius not be discovered, this bit of archive-sniffing was worthwhile.

Scenes from Prokofiev's ballet music to "Romeo and Juliet" comprised the second half — up from the original plan of nine scenes to 15 to make up for the Rossini's brevity. Unfortunately, nine is about all Prodofiev should be allowed, for although each of the sections contains its own charms, stringing the larger number together makes for some tedium.

THE HIGHLIGHTS are several: the first "Juliet," "Romeo," the Love Dance, the always captivating Morning Serenade and others. What it lacks is unity, without which its considerable length weighs heavily, indeed. The orchestra gave Prokofiev satisfactory representation, though signs of fatigue crept from the trumpets; other solo work was praiseworthy.

After a week away the Symphony returns on Dec. 27-28, again under Charles Wilson, for Corelli's "Christmas" Concerto, Schubert's 5th Symphony in B flat, Stravinsky's "Jeu de Cartes" and the Mozart "Haffner" Symphony.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436
DEC 8 1968 New England

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905
DEC 8 1968 New England

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
DEC 16 1968 New England

SYMPHONY TO PERFORM SCHARWENKA CONCERTO

The long-neglected first piano concerto of the late-nineteenth century Polish pianist-composer Xaver Scharwenka will be a major work on the Boston Symphony Orchestra program of Friday and Saturday. Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct; Earl Wild will be soloist.

The program will open with Schoenberg's Variations Op. 31 and close with Scenes from "Romeo and Juliet", a suite drawn from Prokofiev's music for the ballet.

Between 1891 and 1913, the Scharwenka piano concerto No. 1 in B flat minor was played six times by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Scharwenka was soloist in three of the performances, which were conducted by Nikisch and Urack. In 1911, Scharwenka's fourth piano concerto was performed by the orchestra, also with Scharwenka as soloist. In the ensuing years, Scharwenka's music has all but disappeared from the repertory.

Commenting on his choice of the Scharwenka concerto, Erich Leinsdorf remarked, "It's a good idea to hear these pieces occasionally, to look them over and discover which ones have life in them and deserve to be played. There's a great body of this music which we don't hear any longer, but which audiences once enjoyed and which can give pleasure now."

Earl Wild, soloist in the Scharwenka concerto, studied in his native Pittsburgh with a pupil of Scharwenka. He attributes much of his special interest in the virtuoso music of the nineteenth century to this influence. Among his extensive recordings are two discs for Vanguard, "The Virtuoso Piano" and "The Daemonic Liszt." Mr. Wild has appeared with the Boston Pops Orchestra under Arthur Fiedler, most recently at Tanglewood during the summer of 1967.

Scharwenka revival at Symphony

The first piano concerto of the late 19th century composer-pianist, Xaver Scharwenka will be a major work on the Boston Symphony's concert programs Friday and Saturday, with Erich Leinsdorf conducting and Earl Wild as soloist.

The concerto was played six times by the Boston Symphony between 1891 and 1913, with the composer as soloist in three of the performances.

Commenting on his choice of this work, Leinsdorf remarked, "It's a good idea to hear these pieces occasionally, to look them over and discover which ones have life in them and deserve to be played. There's a great body of this music which we don't hear any longer, but which audiences once enjoyed and which can give pleasure now."

Wild, BSO click in 'lost' concerto

By HARRY NEVILLE
Associate Critic

Associate conductor Charles Wilson led the Boston Symphony yesterday afternoon in place of Erich Leinsdorf, currently recovering from one of the more exotic strains of Asian flu.

As a result of the change, Rossini's overture to "L'Italiana in Algeri" and an expanded version of Prokofiev's Scenes from "Romeo and Juliet" replaced the originally scheduled Variations, Op. 31, by Schoenberg.

For all the obviousness of Rossini's music, there are few conductors who can shape his famous crescendos or inflect his rhythm with really telling effect. Wilson proved, to be no exception, turning in a performance that was generally lacklustre.

Prokofiev on the other hand seemed to enliven his interest and imagination, for here the playing, though not absorbingly vital, took on a polish and grace that had been lacking in the Rossini.

ENERGY

The high point of the afternoon was Scharwenka's Piano Concerto No. 1 in B-flat minor, a work which had not been heard here since 1898.

This concerto is representative of a great body of once popular works — pieces that are mainly an assortment of virtuoso keyboard devices hung upon a rather tawdry formal framework.

The Scharwenka concerto offers more than most such works; It possesses considerable energy, some nice melodies, and an engaging scherzo-like middle movement.

Like similar pieces, it has retained a kind of underground popularity with piano buffs and with pianists who possess the formidable technique it demands. Such music is currently enjoying a revival of interest among the public, and one of the pianists responsible for this is Earl Wild, who played the solo part yesterday.

It is difficult to make strictures against Wild without seeming to be ungrateful for the service he has performed, but it should be said that this particular kind of music serves him better than he serves it. It is music ideally suited to his technique which, although astonishingly agile, is not so much fluent as glib.

EXCITEMENT

He manages nearly always to sound every note, and with a reasonable approximation of the composer's intentions. But his virtuosity is ersatz, and it does not really help to say that the music is ersatz too.

This is not to suggest he does not generate excitement. It is simply that the excitement is pale alongside that which pianists like Rachmaninoff got from similar music. Aside from sporadic revivals, this music will probably not take hold with the public until a generation of pianistic giants comes along.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
DEC 14 1968

Flu Break

BOSTON (UPI) — A trumpet player will make his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week because of the Hong Kong flu. Music Director Erich Leinsdorf is ill and assistant conductor Charles Wilson will take over.

Wilson rearranged the program Wednesday to include a piece requiring extra trumpets. Enter Peter Voisin.

Young Voisin will join the trumpet section with his father, Roger, a regular member of the Boston Symphony. Roger Voisin gained his first experience with the Boston orchestra by appearing with his own father, Rene.

TIMES (E)
HARTFORD, CONN.
CIRC. 134,700
DEC 12 1968 New England

Flu gives horn player a break

BOSTON (UPI) — A trumpet player will make his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week because of the Hong Kong flu. Music Director Erich Leinsdorf is ill and assistant conductor Charles Wilson will take over for the weekend concerts.

Wilson rearranged the program Wednesday to include a piece requiring extra trumpets. Enter Peter Voisin.

Young Voisin will join the trumpet section with his father, Roger, a regular member of the Boston Symphony. There is a precedent involved since Roger Voisin first gained his experience with the Boston orchestra by appearing with his own father, Rene.

Young Voisin will play at tonight's open rehearsal, the Friday and Saturday concerts and in New York's Philharmonic Hall Wednesday and Friday of next week.

TIMES (e)
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 10,450
DEC 12 1968 New England Newscli

Piano Concerto

The long-neglected first piano concerto of the late-nineteenth century Polish pianist-composer Xaver Scharwenka will be a major work on the Boston Symphony Orchestra program of Friday and Saturday. Dec. 13 and 14, the tenth of this season's Friday/Saturday pairs.

Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct. Earl Wild will be soloist.

BURLINGTON TIMES UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 4,200
DEC 5 1968 New England

TENTH PROGRAM
Friday afternoon December 13 1968 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening December 14 1968 at 8.30

Erich Leinsdorf is ill, and is therefore unable to conduct the concerts this weekend.

CHARLES WILSON conductor

ROSSINI — Overture to 'L'Italiana in Algeri' ('The Italian woman in Algiers')

SCHARWENKA — Piano concerto no. 1 in B flat minor op. 32
Allegro patetico – adagio – allegro animato
Scherzo: allegro assai
Allegro non tanto
EARL WILD

intermission

PROKOFIEV — Scenes from 'Romeo and Juliet' op. 64*

PART ONE
Introduction
Juliet, the young girl
Romeo, Mercutio and Benvolio masked
Dance of the knights
Gavotte of the departing guests
Romeo
Love dance
Dance for five couples at the festival

PART TWO
Duel and death of Tybalt
Interlude
Juliet at home
Morning serenade
Dance of the young girls with the lilies
Funeral for Juliet
Death of Juliet

Last Played Here 70 Years Ago

Scharwenka Concerto Highlight at BSO

By McLAREN HARRIS

With Erich Leinsdorf continuing his convalescence, assistant Charles Wilson stepped into the breach to conduct the weekend Symphony concerts. This necessitated another program change, which has been the rule rather than the exception lately; but that is one of the hazards of early program announcements.

Rossini's overture to "L'Italiana in Algeri" sat in for Schoenberg's Variations, Op. 31—understandable, considering the short notice usually involved. It is an overture like almost all such Rossini products ("William Tell" is the exception)—full of sunny melody, lots of harmony in thirds, woodwind color, trumpet-fanfare conclusions and standard horse-race form. The orchestra took care of it handily.

THE BIG NEWS of the day, though by no means new news, was Xaver Scharwenka's Piano Concerto in B flat minor, No. 1, which was last played here 70 years ago by pianist Moritz Rosenthal under Wilhelm Gericke. This week is Earl Wild's turn with the solo part by no mere coincidence, for Wild once studied with a pupil of Scharwenka.

At the outset and now and then throughout the progress of the concerto, one may wonder why it hasn't taken its place alongside Tchaikovsky's B flat minor Concerto and others which survived their time. The romantic thematic work is strong and with good character delineation, the harmonies well-conceived, the orchestration capable and the relationship between orchestra and pianist-hero securely in the mainstream of tradition from Liszt to Rachmaninoff, where full-blown virtuosic display was supremely adored.

BUT THE CONTEXT in which everything takes place reveals why Scharwenka, a comparative late-comer in the romantic era anyway, is more remembered for his establishment of the Berlin Conservatory and other pedagogical activities than for his music. The forms, as the program notes hint, are rather curious.

The three-movement concerto contains no slow movement; instead Scharwenka slipped an Adagio section into the first in place of the development. Such sleight-of-pen wouldn't be an altogether bad idea were it not for the weakness it imparts to the first movement's recapitulation or the fact that it doesn't quiet relieve the dullness of three essentially fast movements.

The finale's form is even more obscure, marked by random returns of the principal material in a drawn-out succession of anti-climaxes. Only the intervening Scherzo, itself th matically profuse, produces unity and direction.

THAT LACK of coherence and the solo part's descent into virtuosic hack-work on numerous occasions make Scharwenka's work less than musically exciting, but it is nonetheless entertaining in its old-style pianistic flavor of Anton Rubinstein, where thundering octaves, resounding chords and melodic sweep outweighed some considerations of absolute note-accuracy or clarity. Thus it is no derogation to Earl Wild that he played it in such a fashion — massively attacked in its heavier passages, poetically voiced in tall dynamic arches in gentler areas.

Wilson and the orchestra contributed rich-bodied complement, and the overall impression was that, though superior genius not be discovered, this bit of archive-sniffing was worthwhile.

Scenes from Prokofiev's ballet music to "Romeo and Juliet" comprised the second half — up from the original plan of nine scenes to 15 to make up for the Rossini's brevity. Unfortunately, nine is about all Prodofiev should be allowed, for although each of the sections contains its own charms, stringing the larger number together makes for some tedium.

THE HIGHLIGHTS are several: the first "Juliet," "Romeo," the Love Dance, the always captivating Morning Serenade and others. What it lacks is unity, without which its considerable length weighs heavily indeed. The orchestra gave Prokofiev satisfactory representation, though signs of fatigue crept from the trumpets; other solo work was praiseworthy.

After a week away the Symphony returns on Dec. 27-28, again under Charles Wilson, for Corelli's "Christmas" Concerto, Schubert's 5th Symphony in B flat, Stravinsky's "Jeu de Cartes" and the Mozart "Haffner" Symphony.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436
DEC 8 1968 New England

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905
DEC 8 1968 New England

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
DEC 16 1968 New England

SYMPHONY TO PERFORM SCHARWENKA CONCERTO

The long-neglected first piano concerto of the late-nineteenth century Polish pianist-composer Xaver Scharwenka will be a major work on the Boston Symphony Orchestra program of Friday and Saturday. Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct; Earl Wild will be soloist.

The program will open with Schoenberg's Variations Op. 31 and close with Scenes from "Romeo and Juliet", a suite drawn from Prokofiev's music for the ballet.

Between 1891 and 1913, the Scharwenka piano concerto No. 1 in B flat minor was played six times by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Scharwenka was soloist in three of the performances, which were conducted by Nikisch and Urack. In 1911, Scharwenka's fourth piano concerto was performed by the orchestra, also with Scharwenka as soloist. In the ensuing years, Scharwenka's music has all but disappeared from the repertory.

Commenting on his choice of the Scharwenka concerto, Erich Leinsdorf remarked, "It's a good idea to hear these pieces occasionally, to look them over and discover which ones have life in them and deserve to be played. There's a great body of this music which we don't hear any longer, but which audiences once enjoyed and which can give pleasure now."

Earl Wild, soloist in the Scharwenka concerto, studied in his native Pittsburgh with a pupil of Scharwenka. He attributes much of his special interest in the virtuoso music of the nineteenth century to this influence. Among his extensive recordings are two discs for Vanguard, "The Virtuoso Piano" and "The Daemonic Liszt." Mr. Wild has appeared with the Boston Pops Orchestra under Arthur Fiedler, most recently at Tanglewood during the summer of 1967.

Scharwenka revival at Symphony

The first piano concerto of the late 19th century composer-pianist Xaver Scharwenka will be a major work on the Boston Symphony's concert programs Friday and Saturday, with Erich Leinsdorf conducting and Earl Wild as soloist.

The concerto was played six times by the Boston Symphony between 1891 and 1913, with the composer as soloist in three of the performances.

Commenting on his choice of this work, Leinsdorf remarked, "It's a good idea to hear these pieces occasionally, to look them over and discover which ones have life in them and deserve to be played. There's a great body of this music which we don't hear any longer, but which audiences once enjoyed and which can give pleasure now."

Wild, BSO click in 'lost' concerto

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
DEC 14 1968

By HARRY NEVILLE
Associate Critic

Associate conductor Charles Wilson led the Boston Symphony yesterday afternoon in place of Erich Leinsdorf, currently recovering from one of the more exotic strains of Asian flu.

As a result of the change, Rossini's overture to "L'Italiana in Algeri" and an expanded version of Prokofiev's Scenes from "Romeo and Juliet" replaced the originally scheduled Variations, Op. 31, by Schoenberg.

For all the obviousness of Rossini's music, there are few conductors who can shape his famous crescendos or inflect his rhythm with really telling effect. Wilson proved to be no exception, turning in a performance that was generally lacklustre.

Prokofiev on the other hand seemed to enliven his interest and imagination, for here the playing, though not absorbingly vital, took on a polish and grace that had been lacking in the Rossini.

ENERGY

The high point of the afternoon was Scharwenka's Piano Concerto No. 1 in B-flat minor, a work which had not been heard here since 1898.

This concerto is representative of a great body of once popular works — pieces that are mainly an assortment of virtuoso keyboard devices hung upon a rather tawdry formal framework.

The Scharwenka concerto offers more than most such works; It possesses considerable energy, some nice melodies, and an engaging scherzo-like middle movement.

Like similar pieces, it has retained a kind of underground popularity with piano buffs and with pianists who possess the formidable technique it demands. Such music is currently enjoying a revival of interest among the public, and one of the pianists responsible for this is Earl Wild, who played the solo part yesterday.

It is difficult to make strictures against Wild without seeming to be ungrateful for the service he has performed, but it should be said that this particular kind of music serves him better than he serves it. It is music ideally suited to his technique which, although astonishingly agile, is not so much fluent as glib.

EXCITEMENT

He manages nearly always to sound every note, and with a reasonable approximation of the composer's intentions. But his virtuosity is ersatz, and it does not really help to say that the music is ersatz too.

This is not to suggest he does not generate excitement. It is simply that the excitement is pale alongside that which pianists like Rachmaninoff got from similar music. Aside from sporadic revivals, this music will probably not take hold with the public until a generation of pianistic giants comes along.

Flu Break

BOSTON (UPI) — A trumpet player will make his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week because of the Hong Kong flu. Music Director Erich Leinsdorf is ill and assistant conductor Charles Wilson will take over.

Wilson rearranged the program Wednesday to include a piece requiring extra trumpets. Enter Peter Voisin.

Young Voisin will join the trumpet section with his father, Roger, a regular member of the Boston Symphony. Roger Voisin gained his first experience with the Boston orchestra by appearing with his own father, Rene.

TIMES (E)
HARTFORD, CONN.
CIRC. 134,700
DEC 12 1968 New England

Flu gives horn player a break

BOSTON (UPI) — A trumpet player will make his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week because of the Hong Kong flu. Music Director Erich Leinsdorf is ill and assistant conductor Charles Wilson will take over for the weekend concerts.

Wilson rearranged the program Wednesday to include a piece requiring extra trumpets. Enter Peter Voisin.

Young Voisin will join the trumpet section with his father, Roger, a regular member of the Boston Symphony. There is a precedent involved since Roger Voisin first gained his experience with the Boston orchestra by appearing with his own father, Rene.

Young Voisin will play at tonight's open rehearsal, the Friday and Saturday concerts and in New York's Philharmonic Hall Wednesday and Friday of next week.

TIMES (e)
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 10,450
DEC 12 1968 New England Newscli

Piano Concerto

The long-neglected first piano concerto of the late-nineteenth century Polish pianist-composer Xaver Scharwenka will be a major work on the Boston Symphony Orchestra program of Friday and Saturday, Dec. 13 and 14, the tenth of this season's Friday/Saturday pairs.

Erich Leinsdorf, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct. Earl Wild will be soloist.

BURLINGTON TIMES UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 4,200
DEC 5 1968 New England

TENTH PROGRAM
Friday afternoon December 13 1968 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening December 14 1968 at 8.30

Erich Leinsdorf is ill, and is therefore unable to conduct the concerts this weekend.

CHARLES WILSON conductor

ROSSINI — Overture to 'L'Italiana in Algeri' ('The Italian woman in Algiers')

SCHARWENKA — Piano concerto no. 1 in B flat minor op. 32
Allegro patetico – adagio – allegro animato
Scherzo: allegro assai
Allegro non tanto
EARL WILD

intermission

PROKOFIEV — Scenes from 'Romeo and Juliet' op. 64*

PART ONE
Introduction
Juliet, the young girl
Romeo, Mercutio and Benvolio masked
Dance of the knights
Gavotte of the departing guests
Romeo
Love dance
Dance for five couples at the festival

PART TWO
Duel and death of Tybalt
Interlude
Juliet at home
Morning serenade
Dance of the young girls with the lilies
Funeral for Juliet
Death of Juliet

20.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150
DEC 16 1968
New England Newsclip

BSO

Outmoded indexes of emotion

By Allan Sly

For this week's Boston Symphony concert Charles Wilson conducted in place of Erich Leinsdorf. The program opened with Rossini's "L'Italiana in Algeri" overture, which made for easy listening, though it hardly compensated for the omission of the Schoenberg Variations, Op. 31. (If Mr. Leinsdorf offers this work later, it cannot be sooner than Jan. 11: Next week the orchestra will be on tour; on Dec. 27 and 28 Mr. Wilson again conducts, and on Jan. 3 and 4 Mr. Leinsdorf plans to give us the original version of Strauss's "Ariadne auf Naxos"—an occasion in itself.)

If the Rossini—by its vivacity and air of insouciance—whetted our appetites, they were hardly to be satisfied by Scharwenka's first piano concerto of 1877. After the Italian's clarity and southern charm, the ponderous pan-Germanicism of Scharwenka testified against its reinstatement in the repertoire. Earl Wild, making his first appearance at these concerts but already reaping the rewards of a successful career, received vociferous applause for his efforts, and to be sure he and Mr. Wilson presented the work handsomely.

In its favor is a certain quite legitimate quality of entertainment: one is enthralled by the display of virtuosity, elated as each crisis is passed, at each reinsistence on joviality, at each triumph of the hero-soloist as he survives another encounter with his friendly adversary, the orchestra. If this is basically the character of the romantic concerto this Scharwenka is among the best. But it shows hardly a glimmer of real originality, hardly a turn of phrase that identifies a particular personality — only a pose of emotional disturbance, of fashionable anxiety and turbulence, expressed in musical idioms that were never very strong vehicles when new to the language, but which are doubly enfeebled now that chords of the ninth and 13th are devalued as indexes of emotion.

Naive sentiments?

Since Arthur Nikisch and Theodore Thomas both devoted time to this work, its merit is endorsed, and admittedly some of its attractive qualities are lacking from much of our later fare. But for better or worse we can no longer be won by naïve sentiments dressed up in royal garments.

After the intermission the orchestra played a succession of 15 excerpts from Prokofiev's Romeo and Juliet ballet. Immediately we were confronted with an original, brilliant mentality—inventive, and with a keen sense of characterization. For those who could follow the details outlined in the program it was a rich dramatic experience. Taken simply as music it could be rather taxing, but obviously Mr. Leinsdorf assumed we would not hobble our imaginations in that way. The orchestra and Mr. Wilson acquitted themselves as if they felt the same affinity with this composer that most of us indeed do.

Boston Symphony (Leinsdorf)

One does not get up in front of a hundred professional orchestral musicians and play Xavier Scharwenka's decrepit Piano Concerto in B flat minor unless one has a rather colossal technique and an almost equally staggering bravado. Earl Wild's performance of it with the Boston Symphony last December 18 also, if I must say so, indicated a cynical evaluation of today's musical scene. It showed, for one thing, that Mr. Wild is aware that our concert life today exists by default, falling into the hands of the opera and piano buffs—those clowns who care not at all about artistry just so long as the craft is in order. Wild is exemplary in the craft (i.e., digital) department. One gathers that he is also cognizant of that recent phenomenon among jaded critics and listeners—the "Camp" camp who will worship any object of musical trash just so long as it's campy enough.

The only excuse I can see for performing anything so thoroughly inept would be to feed some impecunious living composer. But to paraphrase one of Sir Thomas Beecham's quips about non-English conductors, I cannot for the life of me understand why we have to turn to third-rate dead composers when we have so many living second-rate ones. In any case, Scharwenka's monument runs the gamut from bad Dvorák and good Delius to mediocre Saint-Saëns. In between we have passages that sound like discards from Liszt's E flat and Chopin's F minor Concertos. The work's content was equaled only by its threadbare instrumentation.

The scheduled presentation of Arnold Schoenberg's Variations for Orchestra was abandoned at this concert in favor of Rossini's inconsequential Italiana in Algeri Overture. Though it presented no intellectual problems, Prokofiev's Romeo and Juliet music was magnificently played by the orchestra under Leinsdorf. Here one found an altogether memorable combination of glinting brilliance, menacing passion, tender warmth, and exceptional interpretive sensitivity. Any conductor who can respond to this lovely music so adroitly can't be all bad . . . even if he does sanction a Scharwenka!

HARRIS GOLDSMITH

This review should be on p. 63; with BSO on Tour.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150
DEC 13 1968
New Eng

SOUTH BOSTON TRIBUNE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 10,250
DEC 12 1968
New England Newsclip

Joan Sutherland and Anastasios Vrenios, who will sing, and Richard Bonynge, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are donating their services when they perform Dec. 15 on the Orchestra's 146th Pension Fund program. The 1968-1969 Pension Fund Concert is at 3 p.m. in Symphony Hall.

BSO Pension Fund concert

Every year Boston Symphony puts on a concert for the benefit of the BSO Pension Fund. This year it will be given on Dec. 15, at 3 o'clock in Symphony Hall, with Joan Sutherland and Anastasios Vrenios as guest singers, and Richard Bonynge (Miss Sutherland's husband) conducting.

Symphony Orchestra ension Concert Set

Joan Sutherland and Anastasios Vrenios, who will sing, and Richard Bonynge, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are donating their services when they perform Dec. 15 on the Orchestra's 146th Pension Fund program. The 1968/1969 Pension Fund Concert is at 3 p.m. in Symphony Hall.

In making the announcement of this gracious gesture, the Directors of the Pension Fund expressed warm thanks to the artists on behalf of the Orchestra and Pensioners.

This is the first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the three artists, Joan Sutherland, the world's reigning coloratura soprano, and her husband, conductor Richard Bonynge, are specialists in the early nineteenth century which will figure prominently in their Pension Fund program.

Anastasios Vrenios, who in just a few seasons has established himself as an unusually gifted young tenor, has appeared both in opera and concert with Miss Sutherland.

Tickets, are now on sale at the Symphony Hall box office or by mail.

JOURNAL
CONCORD, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 4,200
DEC 12 1968
New England Newsclip

MINUTE MAN
LEXINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,400
DEC 12 1968
New England Newsclip

MINUTEMAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 2,400
DEC 12 1968
New England Newsclip

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3,800
DEC 12 1968
New England Newsclip

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000
MAR 1969

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 2,500
DEC 12 1968
New England Newsclip

BSO Pension Fund Concert Dec. 15th

Joan Sutherland and Anastasios Vrenios, who will sing, and Richard Bonynge, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are donating their services when they perform Dec. 15, 1968 on the Orchestra's 146th Pension Fund program. The 1968-1969 Pension Fund Concert is at 3 p.m. in Symphony Hall.

In making the announcement of this gracious gesture, the Directors of the Pension Fund expressed warm thanks to the artists on behalf of the Orchestra and Pensioners.

This is the first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the three artists, Joan Sutherland, the world's reigning coloratura soprano, and her husband, conductor Richard Bonynge, are specialists in the early nineteenth century which will figure prominently in their Pension Fund program. Anastasios Vrenios, who in just a few seasons has established himself as as unusually gifted young tenor, has appeared both in opera and concert with Miss Sutherland.

Tickets, now on sale at the Symphony Hall box office or by mail are priced at $5, $6, $8, $10, $12.50, and $15.

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 6,150
DEC 12 1968
New England Newsclip

LEDGER-TIMES
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 10,000
DEC 12 1968
New England Newsclip

CITIZEN ITEM
ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,600
DEC 12 1968
New England Newsclip

Joan Sutherland At Symphony Hall

Joan Sutherland, soprano, Anastasios Vrenios, tenor, and Richard Bonynge, conductor, will donate their services when they perform with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Sunday at 3 p.m. for the orchestra's 146th Pension Fund program.

This will be the first appearance with the orchestra for the three artists. Miss Sutherland and Bonynge, her husband, are specialists in early-19th-century opera, which will figure prominently on the program, consisting of vocal excerpts by Handel, Rossini, Auber, Verdi, Donizetti, Balfe and Bellini, and orchestra works by Mozart, Donizetti and Maillart.

Tickets from $5 to $15 are on sale at the Symphony Hall box office.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
DEC 9 1968
New England Newsclip

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

PENSION FUND CONCERT

JOAN SUTHERLAND soprano ANASTASIOS VRENIOS tenor
RICHARD BONYNGE conductor

Sunday December 15 1968 at 3 pm in Symphony Hall

Joan Sutherland and Anastasios Vrenios will sing duets from Rigoletto, Don Pasquale and Linda di Chamonix. Miss Sutherland and Mr Vrenios will also sing arias by Handel, Rossini, Auber and Balfe. The program will end with the Sleepwalking scene from Bellini's La Sonnambula. Richard Bonynge will conduct music for orchestra by Mozart, Donizetti and Maillart.

Ticket prices are $5, $6, $8, $10, $12.50 and $15.

Tickets are on sale at the box office, Symphony Hall.
(Telephone 266-1492)

Pension fund concert Dec. 15

This year's Boston Symphony pension fund concert on Dec. 15 will be a program of arias and duets sung by soprano Joan Sutherland and tenor Anastasios Vrenios. Richard Bonynge, Miss Sutherland's husband, will conduct the Boston Symphony.

Miss Sutherland will do the Sleepwalking Scene from Bellini's "La Sonnambula." She and Vrenios will be heard in duets from "Rigoletto," "Don Pasquale" and "Linda di Chamonix." There will also be arias by Handel, Rossini, Auber and Balfe, and orchestral works by Mozart, Donizetti and Maillart.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
DEC 5 1968
New England Newsclip

20.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150

DEC 16 1968

New England Newsclip

BSO

Outmoded indexes of emotion

By Allan Sly

For this week's Boston Symphony concert Charles Wilson conducted in place of Erich Leinsdorf. The program opened with Rossini's "L'Italiana in Algeri" overture, which made for easy listening, though it hardly compensated for the omission of the Schoenberg Variations, Op. 31. (If Mr. Leinsdorf offers this work later, it cannot be sooner than Jan. 11: Next week the orchestra will be on tour; on Dec. 27 and 28 Mr. Wilson again conducts, and on Jan. 3 and 4 Mr. Leinsdorf plans to give us the original version of Strauss's "Ariadne auf Naxos"—an occasion in itself.)

If the Rossini—by its vivacity and air of insouciance—whetted our appetites, they were hardly to be satisfied by Scharwenka's first piano concerto of 1877. After the Italian's clarity and southern charm, the ponderous pan-Germanicism of Scharwenka testified against its reinstatement in the repertoire. Earl Wild, making his first appearance at these concerts but already reaping the rewards of a successful career, received vociferous applause for his efforts, and to be sure he and Mr. Wilson presented the work handsomely.

In its favor is a certain quite legitimate quality of entertainment: one is enthralled by the display of virtuosity, elated as each crisis is passed, at each reinsistence on joviality, at each triumph of the hero-soloist as he survives another encounter with his friendly adversary, the orchestra. If this is basically the character of the romantic concerto this Scharwenka is among the best. But it shows hardly a glimmer of real originality, hardly a turn of phrase that identifies a particular personality — only a pose of emotional disturbance, of fashionable anxiety and turbulence, expressed in musical idioms that were never very strong vehicles when new to the language, but which are doubly enfeebled now that chords of the ninth and 13th are devalued as indexes of emotion.

Naive sentiments?

Since Arthur Nikisch and Theodore Thomas both devoted time to this work, its merit is endorsed, and admittedly some of its attractive qualities are lacking from much of our later fare. But for better or worse we can no longer be won by naïve sentiments dressed up in royal garments.

After the intermission the orchestra played a succession of 15 excerpts from Prokofiev's Romeo and Juliet ballet. Immediately we were confronted with an original, brilliant mentality—inventive, and with a keen sense of characterization. For those who could follow the details outlined in the program it was a rich dramatic experience. Taken simply as music it could be rather taxing, but obviously Mr. Leinsdorf assumed we would not hobble our imaginations in that way. The orchestra and Mr. Wilson acquitted themselves as if they felt the same affinity with this composer that most of us indeed do.

Boston Symphony (Leinsdorf)

One does not ~~get up~~ in front of a hundred professional orchestral musicians and play Xavier Scharwenka's decrepit Piano Concerto in B flat minor unless one has a rather colossal technique and an almost equally staggering bravado. Earl Wild's performance of it with the Boston Symphony last December 18 also, if I must say so, indicated a cynical evaluation of today's musical scene. It showed, for one thing, that Mr. Wild is aware that our concert life today exists by default, falling into the hands of the opera and piano buffs—those clowns who care not at all about artistry just so long as the craft is in order. Wild is exemplary in the craft (i.e., digital) department. One gathers that he is also cognizant of that recent phenomenon among jaded critics and listeners—the "Camp" camp who will worship any object of musical trash just so long as it's campy enough.

The only excuse I can see for performing anything so thoroughly inept would be to feed some impecunious living composer. But to paraphrase one of Sir Thomas Beecham's quips about non-English conductors, I cannot for the life of me understand why we have to turn to third-rate dead composers when we have so many living second-rate ones. In any case, Scharwenka's monument runs the gamut from bad Dvorák and good Delius to mediocre Saint-Saëns. In between we have passages that sound like discards from Liszt's E flat and Chopin's F minor Concertos. The work's content was equaled only by its threadbare instrumentation.

The scheduled presentation of Arnold Schoenberg's Variations for Orchestra was abandoned at this concert in favor of Rossini's inconsequential Italiana in Algeri Overture. Though it presented no intellectual problems, Prokofiev's Romeo and Juliet music was magnificently played by the orchestra under Leinsdorf. Here one found an altogether memorable combination of glinting brilliance, menacing passion, tender warmth, and exceptional interpretive sensitivity. Any conductor who can respond to this lovely music so adroitly can't be all bad . . . even if he does sanction a Scharwenka!

HARRIS GOLDSMITH

This review should be on p. 63; with BSO on Tour.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150

DEC 13 1968

New England

BSO Pension Fund concert

Every year Boston Symphony puts on a concert for the benefit of the BSO Pension Fund. This year it will be given on Dec. 15, at 3 o'clock in Symphony Hall, with Joan Sutherland and Anastasios Vrenios as guest singers, and Richard Bonynge (Miss Sutherland's husband) conducting.

mphony Orchestra ension Concert Set

Joan Sutherland and Anastasios Vrenios, who will sing, and Richard Bonynge, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are donating their services when they perform Dec. 15 on the Orchestra's 146th Pension Fund program. The 1968/1969 Pension Fund Concert is at 3 p.m. in Symphony Hall.

In making the announcement of this gracious gesture, the Directors of the Pension Fund expressed warm thanks to the artists on behalf of the Orchestra and Pensioners.

This is the first appearance wit the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the three artists. Joan Sutherland, the world's reigning coloratura soprano, and her husband, conductor Richard Bonynge, are specialists in the early nineteenth century which will figure prominently in their Pension Fund program.

Anastasios Vrenios, who in just a few seasons has established himself as an unusually gifted young tenor, has appeared both in opera and concert with Miss Sutherland.

Tickets, are now on sale at the Symphony Hall box office or by mail.

JOURNAL
CONCORD, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 4,200

DEC 12 1968

New England Newsclip

Joan Sutherland At Symphony Hall

Joan Sutherland, soprano, Anastasios Vrenios, tenor, and Richard Bonynge, conductor, will donate their services when they perform with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Sunday at 3 p.m. for the orchestra's 146th Pension Fund program.

This will be the first appearance with the orchestra for the three artists. Miss Sutherland and Bonynge, her husband, are specialists in early-19th-century opera, which will figure prominently on the program, consisting of vocal excerpts by Handel, Rosini, Auber, Verdi, Donizetti, Balfe and Bellini, and orchestra works by Mozart, Donizetti and Maillart.

Tickets from $5 to $15 are on sale at the Symphony Hall box office.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

DEC 9 1968

New England Newsclip

MINUTE MAN
LEXINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,400

DEC 12 1968

New England Newsclip

MINUTEMAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 2,400

DEC 12 1968

New England Newsclip

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3,800

DEC 12 1968

New England Newsclip

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000

MAR 1969

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 2,500

DEC 12 1968

New England Newsclip

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF Music Director

PENSION FUND CONCERT

JOAN SUTHERLAND soprano ANASTASIOS VRENIOS tenor
RICHARD BONYNGE conductor

Sunday December 15 1968 at 3 pm in Symphony Hall

Joan Sutherland and Anastasios Vrenios will sing duets from Rigoletto, Don Pasquale and Linda di Chamonix. Miss Sutherland and Mr Vrenios will also sing arias by Handel, Rossini, Auber and Balfe. The program will end with the Sleepwalking scene from Bellini's La Sonnambula. Richard Bonynge will conduct music for orchestra by Mozart, Donizetti and Maillart.

Ticket prices are $5, $6, $8, $10, $12.50 and $15.

Tickets are on sale at the box office, Symphony Hall.
(Telephone 266-1492)

BSO Pension Fund Concert Dec. 15th

Joan Sutherland and Anastasios Vrenios, who will sing, and Richard Bonynge, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are donating their services when they perform December 15, 1968 on the Orchestra's 146th Pension Fund program. The 1968-1969 Pension Fund Concert is at 3 p.m. in Symphony Hall.

In making the announcement of this gracious gesture, the Directors of the Pension Fund expressed warm thanks to the artists on behalf of the Orchestra and Pensioners.

This is the first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the three artists. Joan Sutherland, the world's reigning coloratura soprano, and her husband, conductor Richard Bonynge, are specialists in the early nineteenth century which will figure prominently in their Pension Fund program. Anastasios Vrenios, who in just a few seasons has established himself as as unusually gifted young tenor, has appeared both in opera and concert with Miss Sutherland.

Tickets, now on sale at the Symphony Hall box office or by mail are priced at $5, $6, $8, $10, $12.50, and $15.

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. [illegible]

DEC 12 1968

New England Newsclip

LEDGER-TIMES
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 10,000

DEC 12 1968

New England Newsclip

CITIZEN ITEM
ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. [illegible]

DEC 12 1968

New England Newsclip

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

DEC 5 1968

New England Newsclip

Pension fund concert Dec. 15

This year's Boston Symphony pension fund concert on Dec. 15 will be a program of arias and duets sung by soprano Joan Sutherland and tenor Anastasios Vrenios. Richard Bonynge, Miss Sutherland's husband, will conduct the Boston Symphony.

Miss Sutherland will do the Sleepwalking Scene from Bellini's "La Sonnambula." She and Vrenios will be heard in duets from "Rigoletto," "Don Pasquale" and "Linda di Chamonix." There will also be arias by Handel, Rossini, Auber and Balfe, and orchestral works by Mozart, Donizetti and Maillart.

Joan Sutherland and Anastasios Vrenios, who will sing, and Richard Bonynge, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are donating their services at the orchestra's 146th Pension Fund concert on Sunday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

SOUTH BOSTON TRIBUNE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 10,250

DEC 12 1968

New England Newsclip

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
RICHARD BONYNGE conductor
with
JOAN SUTHERLAND soprano
ANASTASIOS VRENIOS tenor

PROGRAM

MOZART 1756-1791	Divertimento in D for strings K. 136 Allegro Andante Presto
HANDEL 1685-1759	'With plaintive notes' from 'Samson' 'Da tempeste' from 'Giulio Cesare' JOAN SUTHERLAND
ROSSINI 1792-1868	'La speranza sua soave' from 'Semiramide' ANASTASIOS VRENIOS
DONIZETTI 1797-1848	Overture to 'Roberto Devereux'
AUBER 1782-1871	'Ferme tes yeux' from 'La Muette de Portici' ANASTASIOS VRENIOS
VERDI 1813-1901	'È il sol dell' anima' from 'Rigoletto' JOAN SUTHERLAND and ANASTASIOS VRENIOS
	intermission
DONIZETTI	'Tornami a dir che m'ami' from 'Don Pasquale' 'Da quel di' from 'Linda di Chamounix' JOAN SUTHERLAND and ANASTASIOS VRENIOS
MAILLART 1817-1871	Overture to 'Les dragons de Villars'
BALFE 1808-1870	'When other lips' from 'The Bohemian Girl' ANASTASIOS VRENIOS
BELLINI 1801-1835	The sleepwalking scene from 'La Sonnambula' JOAN SUTHERLAND

Baldwin Piano RCA Records

The Sound of Music

Queen of Bel Canto

By Peter M. Knapp

JOAN SUTHERLAND
. . . Still on the throne

Register another triumph for Joan Sutherland, this one at the 146th Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Sunday afternoon at Symphony Hall.

The titian-haired diva, with husband Richard Bonynge on the podium and joined by the young tenor Anastasios Vrenios, trilled and cascaded her way through a variety of bel canto offerings to benefit the nation's oldest symphony orchestra pension program. All three artists donated their services.

In a program that for its variety equalled an old-time music hall bill of fare, it was Miss Sutherland's glorious singing of the sleepwalking scene from Bellini's "La Sonnambula" ("Ah, non credea mirarti . . . Ah! non giunge") that properly had the audience on its cheering feet. The opera is one of Miss Sutherland's specialties, and she is singing it at the Metropolitan Opera this season.

Miss Sutherland is virtually unrivalled in the bel canto repertoire, and though one has heard it before, one still marvels at the power and range of her supple soprano, the purity of her line, the incredible evenness of her trills and scales, and the embellishments and roulades that are so effortlessly produced.

She did take time to warm up — Handel's lovely "With plaintive notes" ("Samson"), with its soft series of trills, was somewhat stiff for her, and she wandered off pitch in the third stanza of the following "Da tempeste" ("Giulio Cesare"). But after that, it was the Queen of Bel Canto in regal form.

The Understatement

Vrenios, dark-haired, good-looking and somewhat shorter than his vocal partner, sang Alfredo to Miss Sutherland's Violetta in last spring's American National Opera Company production of "La Traviata" here. He has a pleasant, lyrical tenor with a sweetish tinge, through only moderate power. Fortunately, Miss Sutherland was considerate not to overwhelm him most of the time — and at any rate it takes considerable courage for any tenor to share the stage with her.

There are few tenors around able to handle the florid intricacies of Rossini arias, and Venios' attempts with "La speranza sua soave" ("Semiramide") only emphasized the point. His lower register is none too robust, and his register shifts — particularly the adjustment to falsetto — were uneven.

Yet once away from Rossini, Vrenios turned in some fine singing in such elaborately sentimental bel canto arias as Auber's "Ferme tes yeux" ("La Muette de Portici") Balfe's "When other lips" ("The Bohemian Girl") and the duets with Miss Sutherland — Verdi's "E il sol dell'anima" ("Rigoletto"), and especially two well-done Donizetti duets, "Tornami a dir che m' ami ("Don Pasquale") and "Da quel di" ("Linda di Chamounix").

Less Satisfactory

Thats enough music to fill any program. But there was more from Bonynge and the Boston Symphony. It is apparently a family policy now that when Miss Sutherland sings, Mr. Bonynge conducts, and though this works reasonably well when his wife is singing, Bonynge's conducting of orchestral works is less satisfactory.

His leadership of Mozart's early Divertimento in D for strings, K. 136, though, was a pleasant surprise — drawing a light, lean sound from the strings in a graceful reading. While relics are often fun, the overtures to Donizetti's "Robert Devereux" and Maillart's "Les dragons de Villars" are best forgotten.

Musical Vaudeville

Both are embarrassing grab-bags of musical odds and ends, veering from chintzy sentimentia to drum-and-trumpet cannon music, and the strains of "America" in the former. Even the musicians were inclined to snicker at such musical vaudeville, though in Verdi, Donizetti and Bellini they had enough to do keeping up with Bonynge's continual tempo adjustments.

Sutherland trills for pension fund

By HARRY NEVILLE
Globe Critic

Sunday afternoon's Symphony Hall concert by Joan Sutherland and Co. was undeniably a first-rate spectacle of sorts. About the only conceivable refinement would have been a side show of 19th century operatic memorabilia — perhaps some faded posters of Malibran, Grisi and the like.

The occasion was the Boston Symphony's annual pension fund concert, for which Miss Sutherland, conductor Richard Bonynge and tenor Anastasios Vrenios had generously donated their services.

The Boston Symphony contributed too. When not busy with the task of accompanying, it played a few non-vocal selections under the direction of Bonynge, who conducted with a grace one would like to have heard communicated to the music.

Vrenios was the unknown quantity for most listeners, and he turned out to be a very light tenor with an engagingly awkeard stage presence. His voice is pleasant but hardly striking. Conceivably he could achieve success in a repertory similar to that of the late Tito Schipa, but he would first have to acquire a mastery of phrasing not now his.

Joe Sutherland was unusually subdued during most of the program. By the end, however, in the sleepwalking scene from "La Sonnambula," she was in top form and gave her admirers exactly what they had come to hear — vocalism which, of its very special kind, is seldom equalled today. Her often noted faults of diction were much in evidence, but that seemed not particularly bothersome to an audience determined to vent its adulation.

If MISS Sutherland is, as he publicity and her fans would have us believe, a virtual re-incarnation of the great divas of the past, there is also much that appeals to a strictly contemporary phenomenon of taste — the cult of opera-as-camp.

She embodies at once all that is most glorious and most effete in the latter day revival of bel canto. Her really extraordinary technique is curiously disembodied — unsullied as it were, by any convincing notion of passion. Listening to her, one might easily be disabused of the idea of opera for the masses. This is not basic provender for the music lover; it sustains only that giddiest of consumers, the opera buff.

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Bonynge conducting, with soprano Joan Sutherland and tenor Anastasios Vrenois, soloists. Mozart, Divertimento, K. 136; Handel, "With laintive Notes" and "Da Tempeste;" Rossini, "La Speranza Sua Soave;" Donizetti, overture to "Roberto Devereux;" "Tornami a dir che m'ami" and "Da quel di;" Auber, "Ferme tes yeux;" Verdi, "E il sol dell'anima"; Maillart, overture to "Les dragons de Villars;" Balfe, "When other lips;" Bellini, sleepwalking scene from "La Sonnambula." Sunday afternoon at Symphony Hall.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
DEC 16 1968
New England Newsclip

music...

Sutherland and Vrenios at Symphony

By Steven Shladover

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Sunday afternoon Pension Fund Concert at Symphony Hall provided Joan Sutherland with the opportunity to make her first appearance with the orchestra. She was joined by conductor Richard Bonynge, her husband, and Anastasios Vrenios, tenor, in a program of eighteenth and nineteenth century "fun" music. The program was unabashedly light weight, and no pretensions were made about seriousness, with the result that the concert provided a pleasant afternoon but not much more in the way of musical experience.

Miss Sutherland's first appearance on the stage was cause for an enthusiastic ovation. She began with two arias by Handel, "With Plaintive Notes" from "Samson" and "Da Tempeste" from "Giulio Cesare". The first aria, a rather subdued piece, found Miss Sutherland's singing tentative and her pitch uncertain.

She redeemed herself to a certain extent in the "Da Tempeste", one of the glories of Baroque opera. This beautiful and florid piece received a heavily-ornamented and exciting rendition. It was rather distressing, though, to hear Sutherland, the leading coloratura soprano of our time, slurring notes in her runs, trills and arpeggios. Although her fioriture is not as clean as it should be, her vocal weight and the resonant overtones of her voice are still unique.

Mr. Vrenios made his first appearance in the aria, "La speranza sua soave" from Rossini's "Semiramide". His voice proved to be small and light, and it was quite difficult to hear him over the orchestra. He showed agility in dealing with the elaborate figures, but his voice was not easily produced and he frequently showed poor intonation.

His second performance, the aria, "Ferme tes yeux" from Auber's "La Muette de Portici", was somewhat more successful, since it was less dramatic and less demanding than the Rossini aria. Mr. Vrenios simply does not have the power to be a true bel canto tenor, which means that his unusually high range and ability to hold soft notes for extended periods of time can not be fully appreciated.

Mr. Vrenios joined Miss Sutherland for three duets in the middle of the program. The first one, "E il sol dell'anima" from "Rigoletto", wasdisappointing, and received a rather drab performance characterized by poor vocal ensemble. It was not easy to hear either performer over Verdi's normal-size orchestra, a fact which immediately cast a pall over the proceedings. While Mr. Vrenios was apparently too weak to carry the role of the Duke, Miss Sutherland seemed to be coasting along, not really trying very hard, and not accomplishing much either.

The other two duets, from Donizetti's "Don Pasquale" and "Linda di Chamounix", were extremely well done. Both singers sounded stronger, perhaps because this was immediately after the intermission. The vocal ensemble was good, and Mr. Bonynge seemed to keep the orchestra more subdued than before. Miss Sutherland was trying harder and pulled off some good vocal fireworks, and Mr. Vrenios also provided some beautiful singing, which was satisfying even though it lacked dramatic power.

The concert concluded with an incomparable performance by Miss Sutherland of the sleepwalking scene from Bellini's "La Sonnambula", one of the most beautiful and thrilling scenes in the bel canto repertoire. This was the one really exciting performance of the afternoon, and it gave Miss Sutherland ample opportunities to show off her vocal arsenal. One could not have asked for more in a performance of this selection, and the audience recognized this, rising to its feet to applaud before the orchestra had finished the final notes.

Joan Sutherland's Star Fading

By GEORGE GELLES, Music Critic

Joan Sutherland's star is fading. Miss Sutherland, the drawing card for this year's Boston Symphony Pension Fund Concert, appeared Sunday afternoon with the would-be Irish tenor Anastasios Vrenios and her husband, the well-tailored time-beater Richard Bonynge on the podium.

It would have been unthinkable a few years ago, but Miss Sutherland didn't sell out Symphony Hall, nor was her performance very good.

Sutherland's high notes are her fortune, and hearing them, delivered with ringing tone and fine intonation, sent the house wild. But this is not enough to make a finished performer, and in many other ways Sutherland was efficient.

There were, first, the familiar weaknesses, the impossibility of understanding much of what she was singing, for her handling of foreign languages is barbaric, and the sloppy way she scooped into notes, though this got better as the afternoon wore on.

There was, as well, no sophistication of musical phrasing and a terribly weak word-sense, that is, a realization of what words mean and how they should be inflected.

Vrenios, with his sweet, weak little voice, was unsuited for the mixed, mostly 19th Century operatic bag that he and Sutherland brought. He was constantly forcing his high register, both to get the notes and to make himself audible over his partner, and was partly successful in both.

Bonynge, leading the BSO, incongruously opened the show with a Mozart Divertimento, K. 136, and interrupted the flow of arias with two of the noisiest overtures I've ever heard (by Donizetti and Maillart). His podium manner was that of the fop, his conducting amateurish.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873
DEC 17 1968
New England Newsclip

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 62,736
DEC 17 1968
New England

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
RICHARD BONYNGE conductor
with
JOAN SUTHERLAND soprano
ANASTASIOS VRENIOS tenor

PROGRAM

MOZART 1756-1791	Divertimento in D for strings K. 136 Allegro Andante Presto
HANDEL 1685-1759	'With plaintive notes' from 'Samson' 'Da tempeste' from 'Giulio Cesare' JOAN SUTHERLAND
ROSSINI 1792-1868	'La speranza sua soave' from 'Semiramide' ANASTASIOS VRENIOS
DONIZETTI 1797-1848	Overture to 'Roberto Devereux'
AUBER 1782-1871	'Ferme tes yeux' from 'La Muette de Portici' ANASTASIOS VRENIOS
VERDI 1813-1901	'È il sol dell' anima' from 'Rigoletto' JOAN SUTHERLAND and ANASTASIOS VRENIOS
	intermission
DONIZETTI	'Tornami a dir che m'ami' from 'Don Pasquale' 'Da quel di' from 'Linda di Chamounix' JOAN SUTHERLAND and ANASTASIOS VRENIOS
MAILLART 1817-1871	Overture to 'Les dragons de Villars'
BALFE 1808-1870	'When other lips' from 'The Bohemian Girl' ANASTASIOS VRENIOS
BELLINI 1801-1835	The sleepwalking scene from 'La Sonnambula' JOAN SUTHERLAND

Baldwin Piano RCA Records

music...

Sutherland and Vrenios at Symphony

By Steven Shladover

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Sunday afternoon Pension Fund Concert at Symphony Hall provided Joan Sutherland with the opportunity to make her first appearance with the orchestra. She was joined by conductor Richard Bonynge, her husband, and Anastasios Vrenios, tenor, in a program of eighteenth and nineteenth century "fun" music. The program was unabashedly light weight, and no pretensions were made about seriousness, with the result that the concert provided a pleasant afternoon but not much more in the way of musical experience.

Miss Sutherland's first appearance on the stage was cause for an enthusiastic ovation. She began with two arias by Handel, "With Plaintive Notes" from "Samson" and "Da Tempeste" from "Giulio Cesare". The first aria, a rather subdued piece, found Miss Sutherland's singing tentative and her pitch uncertain.

She redeemed herself to a certain extent in the "Da Tempeste", one of the glories of Baroque opera. This beautiful and florid piece received a heavily-ornamented and exciting rendition. It was rather distressing, though, to hear Sutherland, the leading coloratura soprano of our time, slurring notes in her runs, trills and arpeggios. Although her fioriture is not as clean as it should be, her vocal weight and the resonant overtones of her voice are still unique.

Mr. Vrenios made his first appearance in the aria, "La speranza sua soave" from Rossini's "Semiramide". His voice proved to be small and light, and it was quite difficult to hear him over the orchestra. He showed agility in dealing with the elaborate figures, but his voice was not easily produced and he frequently showed poor intonation.

His second performance, the aria, "Ferme tes yeux" from Auber's "La Muette de Portici", was somewhat more successful, since it was less dramatic and less demanding than the Rossini aria. Mr. Vrenios simply does not have the power to be a true bel canto tenor, which means that his unusually high range and ability to hold soft notes for extended periods of time can not be fully appreciated.

Mr. Vrenios joined Miss Sutherland for three duets in the middle of the program. The first one, "E il sol dell'anima" from "Rigoletto", was disappointing, and received a rather drab performance characterized by poor vocal ensemble. It was not easy to hear either performer over Verdi's normal-size orchestra, a fact which immediately cast a pall over the proceedings. While Mr. Vrenios was apparently too weak to carry the role of the Duke, Miss Sutherland seemed to be coasting along, not really trying very hard, and not accomplishing much either.

The other two duets, from Donizetti's "Don Pasquale" and "Linda di Chamounix", were extremely well done. Both singers sounded stronger, perhaps because this was immediately after the intermission. The vocal ensemble was good, and Mr. Bonynge seemed to keep the orchestra more subdued than before. Miss Sutherland was trying harder and pulled off some good vocal fireworks, and Mr. Vrenios also provided some beautiful singing, which was satisfying even though it lacked dramatic power.

The concert concluded with an incomparable performance by Miss Sutherland of the sleepwalking scene from Bellini's "La Sonnambula", one of the most beautiful and thrilling scenes in the bel canto repertoire. This was the one really exciting performance of the afternoon, and it gave Miss Sutherland ample opportunities to show off her vocal arsenal. One could not have asked for more in a performance of this selection, and the audience recognized this, rising to its feet to applaud before the orchestra had finished the final notes.

The Sound of Music

Queen of Bel Canto

By Peter M. Knapp

JOAN SUTHERLAND
. . . Still on the throne

Register another triumph for Joan Sutherland, this one at the 146th Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Sunday afternoon at Symphony Hall.

The titian-haired diva, with husband Richard Bonynge on the podium and joined by the young tenor Anastasios Vrenios, trilled and cascaded her way through a variety of bel canto offerings to benefit the nation's oldest symphony orchestra pension program. All three artists donated their services.

In a program that for its variety equalled an old-time music hall bill of fare, it was Miss Sutherland's glorious singing of the sleepwalking scene from Bellini's "La Sonnambula" ("Ah, non credea mirarti . . . Ah! non giunge") that properly had the audience on its cheering feet. The opera is one of Miss Sutherland's specialties, and she is singing it at the Metropolitan Opera this season.

Miss Sutherland is virtually unrivalled in the bel canto repertoire, and though one has heard it before, one still marvels at the power and range of her supple soprano, the purity of her line, the incredible evenness of her trills and scales, and the embellishments and roulades that are so effortlessly produced.

She did take time to warm up — Handel's lovely "With plaintive notes" ("Samson"), with its soft series of trills, was somewhat stiff for her, and she wandered off pitch in the third stanza of the following "Da tempeste" ("Giulio Cesare"). But after that, it was the Queen of Bel Canto in regal form.

The Understatement

Vrenios, dark-haired, good-looking and somewhat shorter than his vocal partner, sang Alfredo to Miss Sutherland's Violetta in last spring's American National Opera Company production of "La Traviata" here. He has a pleasant, lyrical tenor with a sweetish tinge, through only moderate power. Fortunately, Miss Sutherland was considerate not to overwhelm him most of the time — and at any rate it takes considerable courage for any tenor to share the stage with her.

There are few tenors around able to handle the florid intricacies of Rossini arias, and Venios' attempts with "La speranza sua soave" ("Semiramide") only emphasized the point. His lower register is none too robust, and his register shifts — particularly the adjustment to falsetto — were uneven.

Yet once away from Rossini, Vrenios turned in some fine singing in such elaborately sentimental bel canto arias as Auber's "Ferme tes yeux" ("La Muette de Portici") Balfe's "When other lips" ("The Bohemian Girl")and the duets with Miss Sutherland — Verdi's "E il sol dell'anima" ("Rigoletto"), and especially two well-done Donizetti duets, "Tornami a dir che m' ami ("Don Pasquale") and "Da quel di" ("Linda di Chamounix".

Less Satisfactory

Thats enough music to fill any program. But there was more from Bonynge and the Boston Symphony. It is apparently a family policy now that when Miss Sutherland sings, Mr. Bonynge conducts, and though this works reasonably well when his wife is singing, Bonynge's conducting of orchestral works is less satisfactory.

His leadership of Mozart's early Divertimento in D for strings, K. 136, though, was a pleasant surprise — drawing a light, lean sound from the strings in a graceful reading. While relics are often fun, the overtures to Donizetti's "Robert Devereux" and Maillart's "Les dragons de Villars" are best forgotten.

Musical Vaudeville

Both are embarrassing grab-bags of musical odds and ends, veering from chintzy sentimentia to drum-and-trumpet cannon music, and the strains of "America" in the former. Even the musicians were inclined to snicker at such musical vaudeville, though in Verdi, Donizetti and Bellini they had enough to do keeping up with Bonynge's continual tempo adjustments.

21.

Sutherland trills for pension fund

By HARRY NEVILLE
Globe Critic

Sunday afternoon's Symphony Hall concert by Joan Sutherland and Co. was undeniably a first-rate spectacle of sorts. About the only conceivable refinement would have been a side show of 19th century operatic memorabilia — perhaps some faded posters of Malibran, Grisi and the like.

The occasion was the Boston Symphony's annual pension fund concert, for which Miss Sutherland, conductor Richard Bonynge and tenor Anastasios Vrenios had generously donated their services.

The Boston Symphony contributed too. When not busy with the task of accompanying, it played a few non-vocal selections under the direction of Bonynge, who conducted with a grace one would like to have heard communicated to the music.

Vrenios was the unknown quantity for most listeners, and he turned out to be a very light tenor with an engagingly awkeard stage presence. His voice is pleasant but hardly striking. Conceivably he could achieve success in a repertory similar to that of the late Tito Schipa, but he would first have to acquire a mastery of phrasing not now his.

Joe Sutherland was unusually subdued during most of the program. By the end, however, in the sleepwalking scene from "La Sonnambula," she was in top form and gave her admirers exactly what they had come to hear — vocalism which, of its very special kind, is seldom equalled today. Her often noted faults of diction were much in evidence, but that seemed not particularly bothersome to an audience determined to vent its adulation.

If MISS Sutherland is, as he publicity and her fans would have us believe, a virtual re-incarnation of the great divas of the past, there is also much that appeals to a strictly contemporary phenomenon of taste — the cult of opera-as-camp.

She embodies at once all that is most glorious and most effete in the latter day revival of bel canto. Her really extraordinary technique is curiously disembodied — unsullied as it were, by any convincing notion of passion. Listening to her, one might easily be disabused of the idea of opera for the masses. This is not basic provender for the music lover; it sustains only that giddiest of consumers, the opera buff.

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Bonynge conducting, with soprano Joan Sutherland and tenor Anastasios Vrenois, soloists. Mozart, Divertimento, K. 136; Handel, "With laintive Notes" and "Da Tempeste;" Rossini, "La Speranza Sua Soave;" Donizetti, overture to "Roberto Devereux;" "Tornami a dir che m'ami" and "Da quel di;" Auber, "Ferme tes yeux;" Verdi, "È il soil dell'anima"; Maillart, overture to "Les dragons de Vyllars;" Balfe, "When other lips;" Bellini, sleepwalking scene from "La Sonnambula." Sunday afternoon at Symphony Hall.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
DEC 16 1968
New England Newsclip

Joan Sutherland's Star Fading

By GEORGE GELLES, Music Critic

Joan Sutherland's star is fading. Miss Sutherland, the drawing card for this year's Boston Symphony Pension Fund Concert, appeared Sunday afternoon with the would-be Irish tenor Anastasios Vrenios and her husband, the well-tailored timebeater Richard Bonynge on the podium.

It would have been unthinkable a few years ago, but Miss Sutherland didn't sell out Symphony Hall, nor was her performance very good.

Sutherland's high notes are her fortune, and hearing them, delivered with ringing tone and fine intonation, sent the house wild. But this is not enough to make a finished performer, and in many other ways Sutherland was efficient.

There were, first, the familiar weaknesses, the impossibility of understanding much of what she was singing, for her handling of foreign languages is barbaric, and the sloppy way she scooped into notes, though this got better as the afternoon wore on.

There was, as well, no sophistication of musical phrasing and a terribly weak word-sense. that is, a realization of what words mean and how they should be inflected.

Vrenios, with his sweet, weak little voice, was unsuited for the mixed, mostly 19th Century operatic bag that he and Sutherland brought. He was constantly forcing his high register, both to get the notes and to make himself audible over his partner, and was partly successful in both.

Bonynge, leading the BSO, incongruously opened the show with a Mozart Divertimento, K. 136, and interrupted the flow of arias with two of the noisiest overtures I've ever heard (by Donizetti and Maillart). His podium manner was that of the fop, his conducting amateurish,

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873
DEC 17 1968
New England Newsclip

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 62,736
DEC 17 1968
New England

22.

Boston Symphony Benefit

Soprano Features Concert

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

BOSTON — Joan Sutherland, soprano, Richard Bonynge, conductor, and Anastasios Vrenios, tenor, are no strangers to audiences at Opera Company of Boston performances, but yesterday marked a debut for each with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The gala concert, for which these artists graciously donated their services, was the 146th for the benefit of Boston Symphony Pension Institution, the oldest (1903) among American orchestras.

Gazette Review

Tremendous Ovations

Miss Sutherland excited the near-capacity audience in Symphony Hall to tremendous ovations. Bonynge and Vrenios were applauded lustily. The concert, consisting largely of early 19th century music, was right down the alley of all types of listeners.

Bonynge, an alert conductor of moderate motions and precise though poetic readings, brought to light two charming and dashing overtures, seldom heard, by Donizetti and Maillard, for large orchestra. And worked neatly with 35 players in a Mozart Divertimento for Strings in D, and a group of less than 20 in Miss Sutherland's arias from Handel's "Samson" and "Julius Caesar."

Intense Excitement

Dazzling coloraturua was added to Miss Sutherland's golden basic voice in the second Handel aria. After her other solo appearance, the Sleepwalking Scene from Bellini's "La Sonnambula," you wou' think the Boston stage was the "Met," so inense and prolonged was the excitement.

Vrenios had luscious tone and skilled technique in arias from Rossini's "Semiramide" and Balfe's "The Bohemian Girl." His lovellest legato quality was heard in "Close Your Eyes" from Auber's "The Mute of Portici."

Miss Sutherland shared honors with Vrenios in duets from Verdi's "Rigoletto," also Donizetti's "Don Pasquale" and "Linda di Chamounix." Though the tenor at times lacked volume to match the famous soprano's easy tone-production, the voices blended well and the duets were popular with the audience.

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,543
DEC 16 1968 New England Newsclip

YOUR WORLD OF OPERA

By WILLIAM D. MIRANDA

BSO PENSION FUND CONCERT

Each year the Boston Symphony puts together an exciting event of special interest for its pension fund concert. Sometimes its a great instrumentalist such as Rubenstein to do famous concerti. Last year Jack Benny gave us a thoroughly entertaining afternoon with his violin. This year the choice was of suitable musical excitement, a Joan Sutherland recital with husband Richard Bonynge at the helm.

Unfortunately the realization fell far short of the expectation. Miss Sutherland was throughout the afternoon at a surprising lacklustre worst, of the several performances she has given in Boston. Her Handel excerpts from Samson and Caesar effectively reembalmed those two heroes completely though her duets sung with the young and handsome Anastasios Vrenios were somewhat more enjoyable but rather pedestrian fare for such a famous coloratura. The choices included the love duet from Rigoletto which wanted a bit of fervor, the melting serenade and tryst duet from Don Pasquale's final scene and another from Linda De Chamounix were more in the artists bel canto style. Miss Sutherland managed to muster an exciting Sonnambula finale, an opera she was currently singing at the Met.

On the other hand, Mr. Vrenios seemed to make a good impression. His voice is clean, tasteful and well produced and he showed us some fine technique for the exacting Semiramide aria (a better rendition than was heard when Miss Sutherland recorded the opera or when she sang it in Boston). His other two choices resurrected two favorite Victorian operas, Auber's Muette de Portici and Balfe's Bohemian Girl. These showed that while Mr. Vrenios has the purity to be a fine bel canto tenor he still lacks the tiny golden drop of warmth that makes the fine leggiero great. Such singers as Valletti, Alva and Gedda have that drop and with it, Mr. Vrenios might well join their company.

The salvation of the afternoon's entertainment was the spirited conducting of Maestro Bonynge. He opened with a Mozart String Divertimento played with clarity as if to say "I can do great music as well." His conducting of the overtures to Roberto Devereux and Maillart's Dragons of Villars was shot through with enthusiasm and gentle tolerance, as one might defer to a maiden great aunt that one loved very much with the full realization that she needed a catalyst to make her appearance in acceptable society. Mr. Bonynge's conducting clearly says that he knows this isn't great music, but that it deserves a hearing on occasion just for fun. Such a conductor should make more guest appearances with the B.S.O. He has style and dash, qualities not always present with some of the guest conductor choices.

If the pension fund concert on December 15 was therefore a success it was not for anticipated reasons. Those who attend concerts and operas should always be prepared for unexpected thrills and disappointments and nothing will dismay them.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
DEC 16 1968 New England Newsclip

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000
JAN 9 1969 New England

At Symphony

Showcase Of Opera Tidbits

The Pension Fund concert by the Boston Symphony packed them into Symphony Hall yesterday as Joan Sutherland, soprano, Anastasios Vrenios, tenor, and Richard Bonynge, conductor, put together a showcase of operatic tidbits, mostly from works which rarely, if ever, see the light of a stage anymore.

THE FAMILIAR ENTRIES included two duets, "Eil sol dell'anima" from Verdi's "Rigoletto" and "Tornami a dir che m'ami," plus the preceding tenor serenade, from Donizetti's "Don Pasquale." The other duet was a piece of relative obscurity, "Da quel di" from Donizetti's "Linda di Chaminoux."

Miss Sutherland's solo contributions were two Handel arias, "With plaintive notes" from "Samson" and "Da tempeste" from "Giulio Cesare," and the sleepwalking scene from Bellini's "Sonnambula," while for his solo material Vrenios went even further afield: "La speranza sua soave" from Rossini's "Semiramide," "Ferme tes yeux" from Daniel-Francois Auber's "La Muette de Portici" and "When other lips" from Irishman Michael Balfe's "The Bohemian Girl."

Please don't ask me to repeat all that. As things are the works, sometimes even the composers, carry little weight in the current operatic world. But the excerpts, when lifted from their largely dull environments and gathered into one place, make for plenty of glitter and were quickly taken to heart by yesterday's audience.

Both singers were in essentially fine form, although that has a different meaning in each case. Excepting a couple of slips Miss Sutherland sang strongly, convincingly, ornamenting the "Samson" aria nicely and making good dramatic shape of the scene from "Sonnambula." The many roulades, which constituted no small part of her afternoon's work, were done with veteran accomplishment.

VRENIOS' TENOR, and the lyric use he made of it, could be wellnigh enchanting. The Auber and Balfe excerpts owe their beauty to his sensitive handling, and his agile vocal acrobatics with Rossini's "LaSperanza" were clean. He is, however, no real partner for Miss Sutherland because of the gulf between them in vocal strength.

McLAREN HARRIS

LEDGER-TIMES
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 10,000
DEC 26 1968 New England Newsclip

PENSION FUND CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's 146th Pension Fund Concert took place on Sunday December 15. The Orchestra, conducted by Richard Bonynge, played music by Mozart, Donizetti and Maillart; Joan Sutherland and Anastasios Vrenios sang arias and duets by Handel, Rossini, Auber, Verdi, Donizetti and Balfe. Miss Sutherland ended the program with the sleepwaking scene from Bellini's La Sonnambula.

Subscribers from Milton, headed by Mrs Edward Bowditch Watson, gave red carnations which were worn by the players, Trustees, members of the staff, ushers and program boys. Bouquets were also presented to the guest artists.

Thanks to the generosity of Miss Sutherland, Mr Bonynge and Mr Vrenios, who very kindly donated their services, the Pension Fund benefited by the sum of $17,000.

Symphony To Be Led By Wilson

Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the season's eleventh pair of weekend concerts on Friday at 2 and Saturday at 8:30 p.m.

Two symphonies are included in his program, Schubert's 5th and Mozart's 35th, "The Haffner." A seasonal note is the inclusion of Corelli's "Christmas Concerto." Stravinsky's "Jeu de cartes" completes the program.

Mr. Wilson's most recent appearance as conductor of the Orchestra was on Dec. 14 of this year, when on only a few hours' notice he substituted for Erich Leinsdorf, who was ill with flu.

In addition to his conducting of the orchestra this season, he will be heard as organ soloist in Walter Piston's Prelude and allegro for organ and strings, to be played in honor of Piston's 75th birthday. He is also noted as an opera conductor, conducting regularly at the New York City Opera.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436
DEC 22 1968 New England Newsclip

FREE PRESS
MELROSE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,000
DEC 19 1968 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Has Pair Of Concerts Dec. 27-28

Charles Wilson, assistant conduetor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the season's eleventh pair of Friday Saturday concerts on Dec. 27 at 2 o'clock and Dec. 28 at 8:30 p.m.

Two symphonies are included in his program, Schubert's fifth and Mozart's thirty-fifth, "The Haffner." A seasonal note is the inclusion of Corelli's "Christmas Concerto". Stravinsky's Jeu de cartes completes the program.

Mr. Wilson's most recent appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was on Dec. 5 of this year, when on only a few hours' notice he substituted for Erich Leinsdorf, who was ill with flu. He received a standing ovation from audience, orchestra, and chorus for his conducting of two works, Bach's "Wedding Cantata, " which he conducted from the harpsichord, and Brahms' "German Requiem" Op. 45. In addition to his conducting of the orchestra this season, he will be heard as organ soloist in Walter Piston's Prelude and allegro for organ and strings, to be played in honor of Mr. Piston's 75th birthday. He is also noted as an opera conductor, conducting regularly at the New York City Opera.

Symphony Orchestra Schedules Concerts

Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the season's eleventh pair of Friday/Saturday concerts on Dec. 27 at 2 p.m. and Dec. 28 at 8:30 p.m.

Two symphonies are included in his program, Schubert's fifth and Mozart's thirty-fifth, "The Haffner." A seasonal note is the inclusion of Corelli's "Christmas Concerto". Stravinsky's "Jeu de cartes" completes the program.

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 2,500
DEC 19 1968 New England Newsclip

BURLINGTON TIMES UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 4,200
DEC 19 1968 New England Newsclip

JOURNAL
CONCORD, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 4,200
DEC 19 1968 New England

Symphony touring

Boston Symphony, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, will tour to Hartford, New York City, and Brooklyn during the week beginning Dec. 16. Earl Wild, Claude Frank, and Felix Viscuglia will be soloists for the week.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150
047
DEC 11 1968

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3,800
DEC 19 1968 New England Newsclip

MINUTEMAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 2,400
DEC 19 1968 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Benefit

Soprano Features Concert

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazete Music Critic

BOSTON — Joan Sutherland, soprano, Richard Bonynge, conductor, and Anastasios Vrenios, tenor, are no strangers to audiences at Opera Company of Boston performances, but yesterday marked a debut for each with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The gala concert, for which these artists graciously donated their services, was the 146th for the benefit of Boston Symphony Pension Institution, the oldest (1903) among American orchestras.

Gazette Review

Tremendous Ovations

Miss Sutherland excited the near-capacity audience in Symphony Hall to tremendous ovations. Bonynge and Vrenios were applauded lustily. The concert, consisting largely of early 19th century music, was right down the alley of all types of listeners.

Bonynge, an alert conductor of moderate motions and precise though poetic readings, brought to light two charming and dashing overtures, seldom heard, by Donizetti and Maillard, for large orchestra, and worked neatly with 35 players in a Mozart Divertimento for Strings in D, and a group of less than 20 in Miss Sutherland's arias from Handel's "Samson" and "Julius Caesar."

Intense Excitement

Dazzling coloraturua was added to Miss Sutherland's golden basic voice in the second Handel aria. After her other solo appearance, the Sleepwalking Scene from Bellini's "La Sonnambula," you wou'd think the Boston stage was the "Met," so inense and prolonged was the excitement.

Vrenios had luscious tone and skilled technique in arias from Rossini's "Semiramide" and Balfe's "The Bohemian Girl." His loveliest legato quality was heard in "Close Your Eyes" from Auber's "The Mute of Portici."

Miss Sutherland shared honors with Vrenios in duets from Verdi's "Rigoletto," also Donizetti's "Don Pasquale" and "Linda di Chamounix." Though the tenor at times lacked volume to match the famous soprano's easy tone-production, the voices blended well and the duets were popular with the audience.

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,543

DEC 16 1968 New England Newsclip

YOUR WORLD OF OPERA

By WILLIAM D. MIRANDA

BSO PENSION FUND CONCERT

Each year the Boston Symphony puts together an exciting event of special interest for its pension fund concert. Sometimes its a great instrumentalist such as Rubenstein to do famous concerti. Last year Jack Benny gave us a thoroughly entertaining afternoon with his violin. This year the choice was of suitable musical excitement, a Joan Sutherland recital with husband Richard Bonynge at the helm.

Unfortunately the realization fell far short of the expectation. Miss Sutherland was throughout the afternoon at a surprising lacklustre worst, of the several performances she has given in Boston. Her Handel excerpts from Samson and Caesar effectively reembalmed those two heroes completely though her duets sung with the young and handsome Anastasios Vrenios were somewhat more enjoyable but rather pedestrian fare for such a famous coloratura. The choices included the love duet from Rigoletto which wanted a bit of fervor, the melting serenade and tryst duet from Don Pasquale's final scene and another from Linda De Chamounix were more in the artists bel canto style. Miss Sutherland managed to muster an exciting Sonnambula finale, an opera she was currently singing at the Met.

On the other hand, Mr. Vrenios seemed to make a good impression. His voice is clean, tasteful and well produced and he showed us some fine technique for the exacting Semiramide aria (a better rendition than was heard when Miss Sutherland recorded the opera or when she sang it in Boston). His other two choices resurrected two favorite Victorian operas, Auber's Muette de Portici and Balfe's Bohemian Girl. These showed that while Mr. Vrenios has the purity to be a fine bel canto tenor he still lacks the tiny golden drop of warmth that makes the fine leggiero great. Such singers as Valletti, Alva and Gedda have that drop and with it, Mr. Vrenios might well join their company.

The salvation of the afternoon's entertainment was the spirited conducting of Maestro Bonynge. He opened with a Mozart String Divertimento played with clarity as if to say "I can do great music as well." His conducting of the overtures to Roberto Devereux and Maillart's Dragons of Villars was shot through with enthusiasm and gentle tolerance, as one might defer to a maiden great aunt that one loved very much with the full realization that she needed a catalyst to make her appearance in acceptable society. Mr. Bonynge's conducting clearly says that he knows this isn't great music, but that it deserves a hearing on occasion just for fun. Such a conductor should make more guest appearances with the B.S.O. He has style and dash, qualities not always present with some of the guest conductor choices.

If the pension fund concert on December 15 was therefore a success it was not for anticipated reasons. Those who attend concerts and operas should always be prepared for unexpected thrills and disappointments and nothing will dismay them.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

DEC 16 1968 New England Newsclip

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

JAN 9 1969 New England

At Symphony

Showcase Of Opera Tidbits

The Pension Fund concert by the Boston Symphony packed them into Symphony Hall yesterday as Joan Sutherland, soprano, Anastasios Vrenios, tenor, and Richard Bonynge, conductor, put together a showcase of operatic tidbits, mostly from works which rarely, if ever, see the light of a stage anymore.

THE FAMILIAR ENTRIES included two duets, "Eil sol dell'anima" from Verdi's "Rigoletto" and "Tornami a dir che m'ami," plus the preceding tenor serenade, from Donizetti's "Don Pasquale." The other duet was a piece of relative obscurity, "Da quel di" from Donizetti's "Linda di Chaminoux."

Miss Sutherland's solo contributions were two Handel arias, "With plaintive notes" from "Samson" and "Da tempeste" from "Giulio Cesare," and the sleepwalking scene from Bellini's "Sonnambula," while for his solo material Vrenios went even further afield: "La speranza sua soave" from Rossini's "Semiramide," "Ferme tes yeux" from Daniel-Francois Auber's "La Muette de Portici" and "When other lips" from Irishman Michael Balfe's "The Bohemian Girl."

Please don't ask me to repeat all that. As things are the works, sometimes even the composers, carry little weight in the current operatic world. But the excerpts, when lifted from their largely dull environments and gathered into one place, make for plenty of glitter and were quickly taken to heart by yesterday's audience.

Both singers were in essentially fine form, although that has a different meaning in each case. Excepting a couple of slips Miss Sutherland sang strongly, convincingly, ornamenting the "Samson" aria nicely and making good dramatic shape of the scene from "Sonnambula." The many roulades, which constituted no small part of her afternoon's work, were done with veteran accomplishment.

VRENIOS' TENOR, and the lyric use he made of it, could be wellnigh enchanting. The Auber and Balfe excerpts owe their beauty to his sensitive handling, and his agile vocal acrobatics with Rossini's "LaSperanza" were clean. He is, however, no real partner for Miss Sutherland because of the gulf between them in vocal strength.

McLAREN HARRIS

LEDGER-TIMES
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 10,000

DEC 26 1968 New England Newsclip

PENSION FUND CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's 146th Pension Fund Concert took place on Sunday December 15. The Orchestra, conducted by Richard Bonynge, played music by Mozart, Donizetti and Maillart; Joan Sutherland and Anastasios Vrenios sang arias and duets by Handel, Rossini, Auber, Verdi, Donizetti and Balfe. Miss Sutherland ended the program with the sleepwaking scene from Bellini's La Sonnambula.

Subscribers from Milton, headed by Mrs Edward Bowditch Watson, gave red carnations which were worn by the players, Trustees, members of the staff, ushers and program boys. Bouquets were also presented to the guest artists.

Thanks to the generosity of Miss Sutherland, Mr Bonynge and Mr Vrenios, who very kindly donated their services, the Pension Fund benefited by the sum of $17,000.

Symphony To Be Led By Wilson

Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the season's eleventh pair of weekend concerts on Friday at 2 and Saturday at 8:30 p.m.

Two symphonies are included in his program, Schubert's 5th and Mozart's 35th, "The Haffner." A seasonal note is the inclusion of Corelli's "Christmas Concerto." Stravinsky's "Jeu de cartes" completes the program.

Mr. Wilson's most recent appearance as conductor of the Orchestra was on Dec. 14 of this year, when on only a few hours' notice he substituted for Erich Leinsdorf, who was ill with flu.

In addition to his conducting of the orchestra this season, he will be heard as organ soloist in Walter Piston's Prelude and allegro for organ and strings, to be played in honor of Piston's 75th birthday. He is also noted as an opera conductor, conducting regularly at the New York City Opera.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436

DEC 22 1968 New England Newsclip

FREE PRESS
MELROSE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,000

DEC 19 1968 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Has Pair Of Concerts Dec. 27-28

Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the season's eleventh pair of Friday Saturday concerts on Dec. 27 at 2 o'clock and Dec. 28 at 8:30 p.m.

Two symphonies are included in his program, Schubert's fifth and Mozart's thirty-fifth, "The Haffner." A seasonal note is the inclusion of Corelli's "Christmas Concerto". Stravinsky's Jeu de cartes completes the program.

Mr. Wilson's most recent appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was on Dec. 5 of this year, when on only a few hours' notice he substituted for Erich Leinsdorf, who was ill with flu. He received a standing ovation from audience, orchestra, and chorus for his conducting of two works, Bach's "Wedding Cantata, " which he conducted from the harpsichord, and Brahms' "German Requiem" Op. 45. In addition to his conducting of the orchestra this season, he will be heard as organ soloist in Walter Piston's Prelude and allegro for organ and strings, to be played in honor of Mr. Piston's 75th birthday. He is also noted as an opera conductor, conducting regularly at the New York City Opera.

Symphony Orchestra Schedules Concerts

Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the season's eleventh pair of Friday/Saturday concerts on Dec. 27 at 2 p.m. and Dec. 28 at 8:30 p.m.

Two symphonies are included in his program, Schubert's fifth and Mozart's thirty-fifth, "The Haffner." A seasonal note is the inclusion of Corelli's "Christmas Concerto". Stravinsky's "Jeu de cartes" completes the program.

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 2,500

DEC 19 1968 New England Newsclip

BURLINGTON TIMES UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 4,200

DEC 19 1968 New England Newsclip

JOURNAL
CONCORD, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 4,200

DEC 19 1968 New England

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3,800

DEC 19 1968 New England Newsclip

MINUTEMAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 2,400

DEC 19 1968 New England Newsclip

Symphony touring

Boston Symphony, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, will tour to Hartford, New York City, and Brooklyn during the week beginning Dec. 16. Earl Wild, Claude Frank, and Felix Viscuglia will be soloists for the week.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150
047
DEC 11 1968

ELEVENTH PROGRAM
Friday afternoon December 27 1968 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening December 28 1968 at 8.30

CHARLES WILSON conductor

CORELLI — Concerto grosso op. 6 no. 8 'The Christmas'
Vivace – grave – allegro
Adagio – allegro – adagio
Vivace
Allegro
Pastorale

CONCERTINO JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN violin
ALFRED KRIPS violin
MARTIN HOHERMAN cello
CONTINUO ROBERT LEVIN harpsichord

SCHUBERT — Symphony no. 5 in B flat
Allegro
Andante con moto
Menuetto: allegro molto
Allegro vivace

intermission

STRAVINSKY — Jeu de cartes (1937)*

MOZART — Symphony no. 35 in D K. 385 'The Haffner'
Allegro con spirito
Andante
Menuetto
Presto

Credibility Gap Between Composers, Orchestras

By GEORGE GELLES, Music Critic

When it comes to the symphonies of Mozart and Haydn, the credibility gap between what these men wrote and what most modern scores tell us is wide.

The "Haffner" Symphony, Mozart's 35th, which the Boston Symphony played yesterday afternoon under Charles Wilson, illustrates well this sad state of of affairs.

The Symphony (K. 385) began life in 1782 as a serenade, hastily written to celebrate the elevation to the nobility of Sigmund Haffner the Younger (though this is not the well known "Haffner Serenade", composed six years earlier for the wedding of Sigmund's sister). As with other occasional pieces, the serenade was refashioned; a year after its composition, Mozart disgarded the March and one of the Minuets, added flutes and clarinets to strengthen and diversify the wind choir, and had his four movement Symphony.

SCORE TRAVELED WIDELY

After his death, the score traveled widely and is new in New York; and it is our good fortune that the Oxford University Press has just published a facsimile, fascinating and enormously useful, making possible, indeed necessary, a comparision with the currently used edition.

To be brief, the differences are many. The editor of the accepted version has completely misunderstood and mininterpreted literally hundreds of details of articulation and phrasing, which of course, bear directly on the surface flow of the music. This is the score, with not a single page unblemished, that was heard yesterday in Symphony Hall.

Moderation was the word in Wilson's readings of the "Haffner" and the Schubert "Fifth," the afternoon's other symphony. And although there were things to admire in his work—its general neatness and sensibility in matters of phrasing—there was a drabness about it too, with tempi, dynamics, gestures all underemphasized.

FAUL WASN'T WILSON'S

If Stravinsky's marvelous ballet score "Jeu de Cartes" didn't come off with total success, I'm not sure the fault was all Wilson's. His conducting at the start was pointed and alert, but as the piece wore on tension slackened and the BSO men grew unwantedly generous in their supply of wrong notes and false entrances. It was a well-intentioned performance that might well come across at Saturday night's repeat.

Corelli's "Christmas" Concerto (Opus VIII, No. 6) opened the afternoon, and as misconceived readings go—played with thick, rich-articulated sound on modern instruments—this one went well. It's holiday cheer, all right, but it might have been cheerier.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873
DEC 28 1968
New England Newsclip

Fine Performance of 'Christmas' Concert

By McLAREN HARRIS

Holiday fare at the Symphony this week consists of bright-eyed creations by Corelli, Schubert, Stravinsky and Mozart, conducted by assistant Charles Wilson, who has logged enough podium hours so far this season, both scheduled and unscheduled, to qualify him for at least a bronze baton.

Arcangelo Corelli's "Christmas" Concerto is the most familiar of many concerti grossi by this giant of the Italian baroque. Serge Koussevitzky introduced it to Symphony audiences in 1925 and it became one of his seasonal favorites, but since his departure it hadn't appeared again until yesterday; Bruno Walter last conducted it here almost 22 years ago.

Wilson and the orchestra gave it a felicitous performance, bringing out the elegant satin-sheen of string tone, avoiding overly-heavy contrasts and preserving an air of intimacy with the reduced ensemble. The strings, however, were sufficiently robust to hide Robert Levin's harpsichord almost completely (the latter's weakness was the fault). Otherwise the spirit and textures held intact, the Pastoral being especially charming; the playing of the concertino—Joseph Silverstein and Alfred Krips, violins, and Martin Hoherman, cello—was lightly vigorous.

SCHUBERT'S FIFTH Symphony in B flat has the disarming trait of sounding, even more than Beethoven's First, as if it opens at the first ending of a repeat instead of at the actual beginning. It is a product of a 19-year-old whose imagination in thematic writing caused his early symphonies to be mistaken repeatedly for those of Haydn and Mozart. Only certain constructional facets, notably episodic and transitional material, reveal immaturity.

It received another well-proportioned reading from an orchestra of essentially classic numbers. True, there were a few surprises in the quicker movements—the final Allegro was conservatively paced and the horns threatened to make a shambles of the Menuetto—but the melodic work was graceful and romantically tender, particularly the Andante, without becoming maudlin.

FOR ADVENTURE, again of a conservative nature, there was Stravinsky's "Jeu de Cartes," a ballet score of 1937 involving a game of poker in which the joker, an arrogant sort of fellow in the ballet, manages to win every hand until he comes up against a royal flush. That's a piece of tomfoolery if ever there was one, even on stage, and in concert the music gets along better if the listener can forget about the scenario.

In that light, "Jeu de Cartes" forms a kind of divertimento in three parts or "deals," each headed by an introduction to represent shuffling and dealing the cards. During the several other dances and variations Stravinsky's slips in tantalizing phrases from certain well-known works—the Allegretto from Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Rossini's "Barber of Seville," Ravel's "La Valse" and other borrowings.

It is a transparently-orchestrated, spritely score, though lacking the pungence in harmony and rhythm of some earlier offerings; the performance, too, could have used more wit, more abruptness, more explosive qualities.

MOZART'S "HAFFNER" Symphony in D went extremely well through all four movements as Wilson kept each section in bright forward motion, setting a gentle pulse and shaping the Andante with neither hurry nor dawdling, putting a healthy bite into the Menuetto and plenty of dash in the finale. The last held the only flaw, when the violins, except almost solely for concertmaster Silverstein, lost their bearings momentarily. It didn't obscure the effects of one of Wilson's most polished efforts to date.

Next week Erich Leinsdorf returns with soloists including Beverly Sills, Claire Watson, Benita Valente, John Reardon and others for a concert performance of Strauss' "Ariadne auf Naxos."

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
DEC 28 1968
New England

Wilson conducts

Holiday music?

By Allan Sly

The Boston Symphony this weekend again spotlighted Charles Wilson, assistant conductor. Some subscribers stayed away; those who attended found much to reward them, but a candid account of the proceedings would have to admit some puzzlement. Corelli's Christmas Concerto, a work thoroughly familiar to amateurs and students, is well loved, but hardly of Symphony Hall stature. The harpsichord was inaudible one-third of the way back, and Mr. Silverstein's little cadenzas, elegant as they were, sounded like 1968 rather than 1688. The serene, classical Italian discourse tended to relegate itself to the function of a wall or entry decoration like a Della Robbia wreath; if it is to reach the heart it needs infusing with something that Mr. Wilson withholds.

Apollo generation

That he withheld such a quality also from the Schubert Symphony No. 5 suggests the impropriety of even asking for it. The Apollo generation approaches the older classics with superlative competence and emotional reserve, even disdain, or so it appears. How else is one to explain an antiseptic Schubert? The Viennese glow was present only in a black-and-white reflection.

This was even partly so, later on, in the Mozart Haffner Symphony, though after the Stravinsky Jeu de cartes Mr. Wilson permitted himself more spiritual animation. Moreover the orchestral palette in this work is more full-bodied, and the mature Mozart outclasses the boy Schubert at 19. Yet when three works out of four leave nearly half the stage unpopulated, the question arises whether, in these days, the smaller masterpieces might not sound better under different circumstances — easily accessible in these days of summer festivals, university and conservatory presentations, amateur gatherings, and the like. Besides, these works of relatively fragile texture tend to emphasize the orchestra's present problems.

A regular listener to the B.S.O. misses some prominent players, sees some unknown ones. Doubtless such problems arise everywhere, but need they be put on display? The woodwind infelicities, for example, are now seen to consist chiefly of a wide variance of vibrato style between certain soloists; a good ensemble is hardly attainable in these terms.

More turgid days

None of the foregoing is meant to point the finger at Mr. Wilson. He has come to inherit a complex of things that undermined the success of his program this week. And many of his audience tend to compare his cool musicianship with recollections of more turgid days. Resolving these communication anomalies is a healthy exercise in itself.

The highest praise is due conductor and orchestra for their traversal of Stravinsky's Jeu de cartes. If not a history-making performance, it still made excellent listening. In such active, ingenious scores, things fall into place and there is nothing to worry about—or almost nothing. The Jeu de cartes was just first-rate fun. Mr. Wilson's years in opera paid off handsomely. I even suspect he enjoys formulating answers to the Sphinx more than he does vocalizing. Next Christmas I hope he gives us, instead of the Corelli, Stravinsky's debatable version of Bach's Vom Himmel Hoch variations. This would inject an adult element lacking from this year's holiday celebrations at Symphony Hall.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150
DEC 30 1968
New England Newsclip

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
DEC 28 1968
New England Newsclip

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 196,923
DEC 28 1968
New England Newsclip

Holiday spirit at symphony

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

Charles Wilson, the Boston Symphony's assistant conductor, led the orchestra's concert yesterday afternoon. Both his program and Erich Leinsdorf's next week-end — a concert performance of Strauss's "Ariadne auf Naxos" — involve music for small orchestra, making it possible for each player to catch a week's mid-season vacation.

Wilson began with Corelli's Christmas Concerto, not as much of a seasonal standby as you might think — the Boston Symphony had not done it in over 20 years — and continued with music that was amiable — the Schubert 5th — gay — Stravinsky's "Card Game" — and festive — Mozart's Haffner Symphony.

I remember the 1947 broadcast of the Christmas Concerto quite well. Bruno Walter conducted it, and he used most, if not all, the available strings, took broad tempi, and read the music as straight as possible.

Wilson belongs to a generation whose more thoughtful musicians are likely to be educated in the principles of Baroque style, and he gave his performance with just 13 strings and harpsichord, took things generally swiftly and lightly, put in quite a few embellishments, and encouraged concertmaster Joseph Silverstein at several points to make little excursions to enrich the cadences.

The two interpretations differed from one another in quite another way. Walter's performance represented a commitment to a personal view, and however wrong—in a certain sense, it was—it thrived on the strength of its conviction, and of course on Walter's musicality, so that, after all this time, I still recall it fondly as well as vividly.

Wilson's, for all of his considerable musicality, the resources of knowledge, taste, and grace, and with the good playing, was neutral. It had quality and it engaged the attention, but not hard.

That tended to be true of most of the concert. Wilson's basic competence as a musician and conductor, his intelligence, his cultivated taste, were at all times in evidence.

He did not, however, assert himself, neither with respect to the music nor with respect to the orchestra. He never moved into a piece and took it over, and nothing assumed a sharp profile or personal style.

As for the orchestra — any orchestra — the presence on the podium of the assistant conductor generally becomes an occasion for sitting back and taking things easy.

In the Corelli and the Schubert, most of the playing was refined, in tune, and generally in clean; after intermission, though, there was mostly that sort of raucous and inattentive playing that orchestras will serve up to a conductor about whom they have discovered that he will let them get away with it.

ELEVENTH PROGRAM
Friday afternoon December 27 1968 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening December 28 1968 at 8.30

CHARLES WILSON conductor

CORELLI — Concerto grosso op. 6 no. 8 'The Christmas'
Vivace – grave – allegro
Adagio – allegro – adagio
Vivace
Allegro
Pastorale

CONCERTINO JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN violin
ALFRED KRIPS violin
MARTIN HOHERMAN cello
CONTINUO ROBERT LEVIN harpsichord

SCHUBERT — Symphony no. 5 in B flat
Allegro
Andante con moto
Menuetto: allegro molto
Allegro vivace

intermission

STRAVINSKY — Jeu de cartes (1937)*

MOZART — Symphony no. 35 in D K. 385 'The Haffner'
Allegro con spirito
Andante
Menuetto
Presto

Credibility Gap Between Composers, Orchestras

By GEORGE GELLES, Music Critic

When it comes to the symphonies of Mozart and Haydn, the credibility gap between what these men wrote and what most modern scores tell us is wide.

The "Haffner" Symphony, Mozart's 35th, which the Boston Symphony played yesterday afternoon under Charles Wilson, illustrates well this sad state of of affairs.

The Symphony (K. 385) began life in 1782 as a serenade, hastily written to celebrate the elevation to the nobility of Sigmund Haffner the Younger (though this is not the well known "Haffner Serenade", composed six years earlier for the wedding of Sigmund's sister). As with other occasional pieces, the serenade was refashioned; a year after its composition, Mozart disgarded the March and one of the Minuets, added flutes and clarinets to strengthen and diversify the wind choir, and had his four movement Symphony.

SCORE TRAVELED WIDELY

After his death, the score traveled widely and is new in New York; and it is our good fortune that the Oxford University Press has just published a facsimile, fascinating and enormously useful, making possible, indeed necessary, a comparision with the currently used edition.

To be brief, the differences are many. The editor of the accepted version has completely misunderstood and mininterpreted literally hundreds of details of articulation and phrasing, which of course, bear directly on the surface flow of the music. This is the score, with not a single page unblemished, that was heard yesterday in Symphony Hall.

Moderation was the word in Wilson's readings of the "Haffner" and the Schubert "Fifth," the afternoon's other symphony. And although there were things to admire in his work—its general neatness and sensibility in matters of phrasing—there was a drabness about it too, with tempi, dynamics, gestures all underemphasized.

FAUL WASN'T WILSON'S

If Stravinsky's marvelous ballet score "Jeu de Cartes" didn't come off with total success, I'm not sure the fault was all Wilson's. His conducting at the start was pointed and alert, but as the piece wore on tension slackened and the BSO men grew unwantedly generous in their supply of wrong notes and false entrances. It was a well-intentioned performance that might well come across at Saturday night's repeat.

Corelli's "Christmas" Concerto (Opus VIII, No. 6) opened the afternoon, and as misconceived readings go—played with thick, rich-articulated sound on modern instruments—this one went well. It's holiday cheer, all right, but it might have been cheerier.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873
DEC 28 1968
New England Newsclip

Wilson conducts

Holiday music?

By Allan Sly

The Boston Symphony this weekend again spotlighted Charles Wilson, assistant conductor. Some subscribers stayed away; those who attended found much to reward them, but a candid account of the proceedings would have to admit some puzzlement. Corelli's Christmas Concerto, a work thoroughly familiar to amateurs and students, is well loved, but hardly of Symphony Hall stature. The harpsichord was inaudible one-third of the way back, and Mr. Silverstein's little cadenzas, elegant as they were, sounded like 1968 rather than 1688. The serene, classical Italian discourse tended to relegate itself to the function of a wall or entry decoration like a Della Robbia wreath; if it is to reach the heart it needs infusing with something that Mr. Wilson withholds.

Apollo generation

That he withheld such a quality also from the Schubert Symphony No. 5 suggests the impropriety of even asking for it. The Apollo generation approaches the older classics with superlative competence and emotional reserve, even disdain, or so it appears. How else is one to explain an antiseptic Schubert? The Viennese glow was present only in a black-and-white reflection.

This was even partly so, later on, in the Mozart Haffner Symphony, though after the Stravinsky Jeu de cartes Mr. Wilson permitted himself more spiritual animation. Moreover the orchestral palette in this work is more full-bodied, and the mature Mozart outclasses the boy Schubert at 19. Yet when three works out of four leave nearly half the stage unpopulated, the question arises whether, in these days, the smaller masterpieces might not sound better under different circumstances — easily accessible in these days of summer festivals, university and conservatory presentations, amateur gatherings, and the like. Besides, these works of relatively fragile texture tend to emphasize the orchestra's present problems.

A regular listener to the B.S.O. misses some prominent players, sees some unknown ones. Doubtless such problems arise everywhere, but need they be put on display? The woodwind infelicities, for example, are now seen to consist chiefly of a wide variance of vibrato style between certain soloists; a good ensemble is hardly attainable in these terms.

More turgid days

None of the foregoing is meant to point the finger at Mr. Wilson. He has come to inherit a complex of things that undermined the success of his program this week. And many of his audience tend to compare his cool musicianship with recollections of more turgid days. Resolving these communication anomalies is a healthy exercise in itself.

The highest praise is due conductor and orchestra for their traversal of Stravinsky's Jeu de cartes. If not a history-making performance, it still made excellent listening. In such active, ingenious scores, things fall into place and there is nothing to worry about—or almost nothing. The Jeu de cartes was just first-rate fun. Mr. Wilson's years in opera paid off handsomely. I even suspect he enjoys formulating answers to the Sphinx more than he does vocalizing. Next Christmas I hope he gives us, instead of the Corelli, Stravinsky's debatable version of Bach's Vom Himmel Hoch variations. This would inject an adult element lacking from this year's holiday celebrations at Symphony Hall.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150
DEC 30 1968
New England Newsclip

Fine Performance of 'Christmas' Concert

By McLAREN HARRIS

Holiday fare at the Symphony this week consists of bright-eyed creations by Corelli, Schubert, Stravinsky and Mozart, conducted by assistant Charles Wilson, who has logged enough podium hours so far this season, both scheduled and unscheduled, to qualify him for at least a bronze baton.

Arcangelo Corelli's "Christmas" Concerto is the most familiar of many concerti grossi by this giant of the Italian baroque. Serge Koussevitzky introduced it to Symphony audiences in 1925 and it became one of his seasonal favorites, but since his departure it hadn't appeared again until yesterday; Bruno Walter last conducted it here almost 22 years ago.

Wilson and the orchestra gave it a felicitous performance, bringing out the elegant satin-sheen of string tone, avoiding overly-heavy contrasts and preserving an air of intimacy with the reduced ensemble. The strings, however, were sufficiently robust to hide Robert Levin's harpsichord almost completely (the latter's weakness was the fault). Otherwise the spirit and textures held intact, the Pastoral being especially charming; the playing of the concertino—Joseph Silverstein and Alfred Krips, violins, and Martin Hoherman, cello—was lightly vigorous.

SCHUBERT'S FIFTH Symphony in B flat has the disarming trait of sounding, even more than Beethoven's First, as if it opens at the first ending of a repeat instead of at the actual beginning. It is a product of a 19-year-old whose imagination in thematic writing caused his early symphonies to be mistaken, repeatedly for those of Haydn and Mozart. Only certain constructional facets, notably episodic and transitional material, reveal immaturity.

It received another well-proportioned reading from an orchestra of essentially classic numbers. True, there were a few surprises in the quicker movements—the final Allegro was conservatively paced and the horns threatened to make a shambles of the Menuetto—but the melodic work was graceful and romantically tender, particularly the Andante, without becoming maudlin.

FOR ADVENTURE, again of a conservative nature, there was Stravinsky's "Jeu de Cartes," a ballet score of 1937 involving a game of poker in which the joker, an arrogant sort of fellow in the ballet, manages to win every hand until he comes up against a royal flush. That's a piece of tomfoolery if ever there was one, even on stage, and in concert the music gets along better if the listener can forget about the scenario.

In that light "Jeu de Cartes" forms a kind of divertimento in three parts or "deals," each headed by an introduction to represent shuffling and dealing the cards. During the several other dances and variations Stravinsky's slips in tantalizing phrases from certain well-known works—the Allegretto from Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Rossini's "Barber of Seville," Ravel's "La Valse" and other borrowings.

It is a transparently-orchestrated, spritely score, though lacking the pungence in harmony and rhythm of some earlier offerings; the performance, too, could have used more wit, more abruptness, more explosive qualities.

MOZART'S "HAFFNER" Symphony in D went extremely well through all four movements as Wilson kept each section in bright forward motion, setting a gentle pulse and shaping the Andante with neither hurry nor dawdling, putting a healthy bite into the Menuetto and plenty of dash in the finale. The last held the only flaw, when the violins, except almost solely for concertmaster Silverstein, lost their bearings momentarily. It didn't obscure the effects of one of Wilson's most polished efforts to date.

Next week Erich Leinsdorf returns with soloists including Beverly Sills, Claire Watson, Benita Valente, John Reardon and others for a concert performance of Strauss' "Ariadne auf Naxos."

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
DEC 28 1968
New England

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
DEC 28 1968
New England Newsclip

EVENING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 196,923
DEC 28 1968
New England Newsclip

Holiday spirit at symphony

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

Charles Wilson, the Boston Symphony's assistant conductor, led the orchestra's concert yesterday afternoon. Both his program and Erich Leinsdorf's next week-end — a concert performance of Strauss's "Ariadne auf Naxos" — involve music for small orchestra, making it possible for each player to catch a week's mid-season vacation.

Wilson began with Corelli's Christmas Concerto, not as much of a seasonal standby as you might think — the Boston Symphony had not done it in over 20 years — and continued with music that was amiable — the Schubert 5th — gay — Stravinsky's "Card Game" — and festive — Mozart's Haffner Symphony.

I remember the 1947 broadcast of the Christmas Concerto quite well. Bruno Walter conducted it, and he used most, if not all, the available strings, took broad tempi, and read the music as straight as possible.

Wilson belongs to a generation whose more thoughtful musicians are likely to be educated in the principles of Baroque style, and he gave his performance with just 13 strings and harpsichord, took things generally swiftly and lightly, put in quite a few embellishments, and encouraged concertmaster Joseph Silverstein at several points to make little excursions to enrich the cadences.

The two interpretations differed from one another in quite another way. Walter's performance represented a commitment to a personal view, and however wrong—in a certain sense, it was—it thrived on the strength of its conviction, and of course on Walter's musicality, so that, after all this time, I still recall it fondly as well as vividly.

Wilson's, for all of his considerable musicality, the resources of knowledge, taste, and grace, and with the good playing, was neutral. It had quality and it engaged the attention, but not hard.

That tended to be true of most of the concert. Wilson's basic competence as a musician and conductor, his intelligence, his cultivated taste, were at all times in evidence.

He did not, however, assert himself, neither with respect to the music nor with respect to the orchestra. He never moved into a piece and took it over, and nothing assumed a sharp profile or personal style.

As for the orchestra — any orchestra — the presence on the podium of the assistant conductor generally becomes an occasion for sitting back and taking things easy.

In the Corelli and the Schubert, most of the playing was refined, in tune, and generally in clean; after intermission, though, there was mostly that sort of raucous and inattentive playing that orchestras will serve up to a conductor about whom they have discovered that he will let them get away with it.

24.

1968: Music's Positives and Negatives

By McLAREN HARRIS

New Year's Day on the music world's fiscal calendar is the first of September, but it's difficult to stir up much sentiment for reminiscence at that time of year, so now we pause at the traditional moment, piecing halves of two seasons together and recalling those events which engraved themselves on our memory with their outstanding characteristics.

Such characteristics, be warned, may be positive or negative, good or bad, amusing or annoying. And without further delay, with regard only for general chronology, here they are:

Jan. 28: The Celebrity Series recital by soprano Judith Raskin, whose superlative work with Lieder by Schubert, Mendelssohn, Franz, Wolf and Strauss qualified her as a marvel of both concert and operatic worlds.

Feb. 11: The Boston Symphony's Pension Fund concert, seen in the oblique light of Jack Benny's violin virtuosity.

Feb. 27: Marilyn Horne vocally seductive, physically curious "Carmen" for the Opera Company of Boston.

Feb. 29: The New England Conservatory Orchestra performance of Roberto Gerhard's "Collages," an orchestra-and-tape work in which an accidental nudging of the volume knob resulted in a concussion nearly pulverizing a Jordan Hall audience.

March 7: Teresa Stich-Randall's finale for the 40-year-old Morning Musicales, which then lowered its flag at the Statler Hilton, only to whisk the pennant up the pole again at the Sheraton-Plaza for a 41st season.

March 11: The Opera Company of Boston's "La Traviata" and its lone jewel, Joan Sutherland, who endured a floor-bounce during a resplendent performance.

March 23: The Boston Symphony's and Erich Leinsdorf's loquent partnersip in Haydn's 24th, Dallapiccola's "Tartiniana" and Mahler's 1st.

April 7: The return after 16 years of Vladimir Horowitz, whose greater merit as pianist than as musician hardly disappointed the faithful.

April 8: The inaugural concert of the Boston Philharmonia and the first, we hope, in a long history.

April 23: The Cappella Coloniensis performance at Jordan Hall, whose early-music authenticity went far beyond the intellectual to the totally real.

April 25: William Steinberg's appointment as Boston Symphony music director beginning in 1969, which gave only pause to the speculation.

April 26: The Metropolitan Opera's "Carmen" with Grace Bumbry as brightest among its vocal jewels in a pallid setting.

May 15: The American National Opera Company is revealed as bankrupt with debts totalling $840,000.

July 15: The beginning of a long, hot, humid and noisy summer in Sanders Theater. It happens every year. I know Sanders is cheap, but music isn't.

Oct. 26: The Boston Symphony's memorable performance of Brahms' Third Symphony under Colin Davis. Tongues flap once again.

Oct. 27: Dietrich Fisher-Dieskau and Norman Shetler perform Schubert's "Die schoene Mullerin," another Celebrity Series highlight.

Nov. 6: The death of Charles Munch, a man of gentle manner, benevolent countenance and sensitive musicianship, two weeks after his final visit to Symphony Hall with the Orchestre de Paris.

Dec. 6: Boston Symphony performances of works by Scriabin and Mozart reveal Pole Georg Semkow as a conductor after whom orchestras may hunger.

Dec. 9: Sarah Caldwell and forces give a cheer to U.S. astronauts and former NASA director James Webb and a farewell to President and Mrs. Johnson with Offenbach's "Voyage to the Moon" at the White House.

Dec. 18: Beverly Sills' Morning Musicales appearance, where singing, sound effects and backstage tea-service made a wild, woolly and wonderful affair.

Dec. 21: The launching of the moon-orbiting Appollo 8 containing astronaunts Borman, Lovell and Anders. This isn't musical in the strict sense, but I think it belongs on anybody's calendar.

Herald Traveler 12-29-68

Music tunes in classic remarks

NEW YORK (AP) — In classical music, 1968 was a year to cause the exclamation, "It seems like only yesterday!!!"

It seems like only yesterday that Leonard Bernstein was a boy genius, an infant terrible. In 1968, he celebrated his 50th birthday and started his last season conducting the Philharmonic, before retiring to a sports arena.

Among the premieres of the year were "Eleventh Symphony" by Roy Harris, 70, "Sixth Symphony" by Howard Hanson, 72, "Eighth Symphony" by Roger Sessions, 71, all by the New York Philharmonic;

"Piano Concerto No. 2" by Benjamin Lees, 44, by the Boston Symphony and pianist Gary Graffman, who termed the work "major;" "Symphony No. 1" by Oliver Knussen, 15, the composer conducting the London Symphony. He was called very promising.

... the city's 250th anniversary ... conductor Werner Torkanowsky turned it down as unworthy and played Milhaud's 1923 "La Creation du Monde."

In the avant-garde, Stanley Silver, 30, music director of the Lincoln Center Repertory Theater, saw his pop opera "Elephant Steps" premiered at Tanglewood. It sounded like a radio with dials being twisted fast.

A Los Angeles Philharmonic tympanist ...

CHRONICLE-TELEGRAM
ELYRIA, O.
P.M. - CIRC. 29,095

JAN-5--69 047

THE PORTSMOUTH TIMES
PORTSMOUTH, O.
P.M. - CIRC. 26,055

JAN-4--69 047

THE NEWS-HERALD
CONNEAUT, O.
P.M. - CIRC. 5,030

DEC-31-68

Music

A 'knockdown' and new B.S.O. boss

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

JANUARY — Outstanding concerts of the month included Judith Raskin's Lieder recital with pianist George Schick and the guest appearance of Seiji Ozawa with the Boston Symphony.

FEBRUARY — Jack Benny appeared at the Boston Symphony's Pension Fund and, according to Globe Critic David Noble, found in Erich Leinsdorf his best straight man since Don Wilson. Friends of the BSO were grieved at the accidental death of the orchestra's cymbal player, Dad Thompson. Violinist Denes Zsigmondy and his wife, pianist Anneliese Nissen, gave an extraordinary recital at MIT; a little later, the Cantata Singers enjoyed a great success with Leon Kirchner as guest conductor.

MARCH — The De Cordova Museum began a concert series called "Space, Time and Sound — Music Since 1945." New England Conservatory concerts introduced Roberto Gerhard's "Collages" and also offered an unusually fresh "Emperor Concerto" with pianist Russell Sherman, Frederik Prausnitz conducting both times. Sarah Caldwell's "Traviata" had an unlooked for dramatic fillip when tenor Anastasios Vrenios accidentally knocked down his substantial leading lady, Joan Sutherland. There was less excitement when the two sang for the BSO Pension Fund concert in December, indeed, incredibly enough, Sutherland's name was not enough to sell out Symphony Hall.

APRIL — The big news this month was that William Steinberg, music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony, would take over Erich Leinsdorf's post at the Boston Symphony from 1969 to 1972. The Globe learned about it on the 24th, and Symphony Hall admitted it the next day. The Boston Philharmonia, a newly founded chamber orches-

STEINBERG
Continued on Page A-26

Opera Company at White House

★ STEINBERG

Continued from Page A-24

tra organized as a players' cooperative, made a successful debut with the Milwaukee Symphony's Kenneth Schermerhorn as guest conductor. Vladimir Horowitz gave his first recital here since 1952, and Verdi's "Luisa Miller" was the most unusual and interesting of the Metropolitan Opera's offerings on its annual visit.

MAY — Robert Levin, a Harvard senior, did an amazing job of completing an unfinished Mozart Concerto and a Quintet, the project being part of his thesis, and also made a strong impression as a pianist in the "new" concerto, a familiar one, and in a Sonata, all done at a Sanders Theater concert.

JUNE — Philosopher Herbert Marcuse was commencement speaker for the New England Conservatory. His message: "Roll over, Beethoven. Rock is here."

JULY — The Esplanade Orchestra played in Roxbury's Franklin Park, not without some disturbance.

AUGUST — An unfamiliar original version of Schumann's Piano Concerto was played by Malcolm Frager at Tanglewood; a fascinating feature of two specially interesting concerts conducted by Claudio Spies for the Harvard Summer School was the first performance anywhere of Stravinsky's first four aborted tries at "Les Noces."

SEPTEMBER — On the day of the Boston Symphony's seasonal opening, it was announced that Henry B. Cabot had retired as the orchestra's president, and that he was succeeded by Talcott M. Banks, well known to the Boston music world for his tenure as president of the Boston Opera Assn.

OCTOBER — Colin Davis, conductor of London's B.B.C. Symphony, again was impressive as the B.S.O.'s guest conductor, as he had been two seasons earlier, and he still was being talked about as a possible eventual successor to the incoming William Steinberg.

NOVEMBER — Charles Munch, the B.S.O.'s music director from 1949 to 1962, died in Richmond, Va. He was 77. He was on tour with the Orchestra de Paris with which he had appeared in Boston just two weeks earlier. His successor here, Erich Leinsdorf, referred to him as "a delightful and luminous man and musician." Munch was given a state funeral in Paris at which the word Boston was not mentioned.

DECEMBER — Sarah Caldwell's Opera Company of Boston was invited to the White House for a repeat performance of Offenbach's "Voyage to the Moon." The occasion: A dinner in honor of the astronauts, of course. The conductor jigsaw puzzle stayed in the news. One piece fell into place when the Chicago Symphony announced that Georg Solti would succeed Jean Martinon, something that had been known unofficially for some time; on the other hand, Munch's death left an important post unfilled, and Howard Mitchell and Max Rudolf announced their attention of leaving their respective orchestras in Washington, D.C., and Cincinnati.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905

DEC 29 1968 New England Newsclip

SOCIETY

by Miriam Tod

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 62,736

DEC 31 1968 New England Newsclip

As an old year draws to its close there is a tendency to look back over the 12 months just past and live again the events that happened during that time.

So it was with the social world. The past year was an interesting one in that there was a variety of social events covering a wide spectrum. Each month had at least one big outstanding event, and some more than one. As has happened in other years some of these affairs clashed by happening on the same date, making Boston's somewhat traditional staid social scene more like New York's frantic one where it is commonplace for three or four balls to be held simultaneously.

The year led off with January's big "Opera Ball" at the Hotel Somerset. It was hoped that the then Mrs. John Kennedy would attend the costume affair, but this was not to be. The ball raised funds for the Opera Company of Boston which opened its 1968 season the next month.

February's excitement socially was the visit of Jack Benny as guest artist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Pension Concert at Symphony Hall, and the party held afterwards for him at the Hotel Somerset. The superb collection of Mr. and Mrs. Leigh Block of Chicago, which had taken them 26 years to acquire, opened at the Museum of Fine Arts with a big and formal reception for which the Ladies Committee of the museum did its usual perfect job.

March meant the opening of the New England Flower ... at Suffolk Downs and the black tie preview and din... for the benefit of the Massachusetts Horticultur... ing Fund. A welcome affair, indeed, it ne... a big dinner given at the Sheraton Pl... Club for the British Ambassad... Dean.

April's big even... luncheon and ... the first ... an...

Claire Watson

. . . soprano, will sing with the Boston Symphony on Jan. 3 and 4 in Strauss's "Ariadne auf Naxos."

Monitor 12-30-68

TWELFTH PROGRAM

Friday afternoon January 3 1969 at 2 o'clock

Saturday evening January 4 1969 at 8.30

and open rehearsal Thursday evening January 2 1969 at 7.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

RICHARD STRAUSS

ARIADNE AUF NAXOS

(original version of 1912)

opera in one act

libretto by Hugo von Hofmannsthal

first performed in Stuttgart October 25 1912

Characters (in order of singing)

Najade	BENITA VALENTE	soprano
Dryade	EUNICE ALBERTS	contralto
Echo	CAROLE BOGARD	soprano
Ariadne	CLAIRE WATSON	soprano
Harlekin	JOHN REARDON	baritone
Zerbinetta	BEVERLY SILLS	soprano
Truffaldin	MALCOLM SMITH	bass
Brighella	JOHN FERRANTE	tenor
Scaramuccio	JAMES BILLINGS	tenor
Bacchus	ROBERT NAGY	tenor
M. Jourdain	ANDREW RAEBURN	speaking part

FIRST PERFORMANCE IN THE UNITED STATES

There will be no intermission

A translation of the libretto starts on page 744

BSO GIVES FIRST U.S. PERFORMANCES

'Ariadne' Rewarding Event

By McLAREN HARRIS

It is not necessarily true, to judge by the enthusiastic reception by yesterday's Symphony audience (somewhat extraordinary for Fridays), that one's most noble efforts must go unheralded. And it can hardly be denied that the weekend performances of Richard Strauss' "Ariadne auf Naxos" by the orchestra and a battery of 10 soloists under Erich Leinsdorf represent one of the most noble and rewarding events of the Symphony season.

These are the first United States performances of the original "Ariadne" as written for inclusion in "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" as adapted by Strauss and Hugo von Hoffmansthal from Moliere. A quasi-explanatory prologue, sung at the beginning of the revised "Ariadne" (now performed alone) was spoken in the original and is thus omitted here. The revision dropped a solo by Zerbinetta and, probably out of a search for poetic fulfillment, the concluding ensemble by Zerbinetta and the clowns.

SEEMINGLY EVERYTHING about "Ariadne" contains a paradox, from the dramatic conflict thrust upon it, to the manner in which opposites are reconciled, also including (if we accept the convincing thesis of program annotator William Mann) Hoffmansthal's conception of his own and Strauss' roles in the collaboration. Even the result is paradoxical. "Ariadne" was envsioned as trivial, but emerged as profound; it appear as a mixture of nobility and frivolity, of gentility and vulgarity, where the situations are parallel, yet perpendicular.

The basic theme of "Ariadne" is serious — the tale from Greek mythology about the Cretan princess, abandoned by Theseus on the island of Naxos, whose tragedy and desolation is transformed into love for the god Bacchus. In the Moliere adaptation the "gentilhomme," Jourdain, wished to stage "Ariadne" followed by a comic intermezzo, but decided as a last-minute expedient to combine the two.

In the combination the comedy is represented by the flighty Zerbinetta and her four lovers, whose slipping from one affair to another is accomplished as easily as changing underwear. Their shallowness is cast against the depth of Ariadne's despair and transformation, and the coexistence of these opposite attitudes is effected, in the words of the program, by one thread: mutual incomprehension.

THIS COULD AS well have been the author's view of himself and the composer: Hoffmansthal giving his creative strengths to the profound facets of the work, Strauss demonstrating his affinity for the lighter, more-entertaining-than-moving portions as evidenced by the spectacular aria, "Grossmaechtige Prinzessin," for Zerbinetta.

Strauss, however, did not let his inspiration fall short for any part of the score. His music, close to "Rosenkavalier" in both time and style, is far beyond mere setting of words — lightly brilliant and good-naturedly mocking during Zerbinetta's amorous encounters, an idealized but sincere passion in Ariadne's (and later, Bacchus') lines. With a modest orchestra reflecting its original design for small theater the music is harmonious yet not statically so, melodically captivating yet far-reaching in register and phrase-structure, everywhere delicate but nowhere frail.

"ARIADNE" IS ALSO immensely difficult, I should think, either to sing in part or to sustain as a whole. The singing complement, in nearly all respects, was superior. Beverly Sills and Claire Watson did beautiful work as Zerbinetta and Ariadne, Miss Sills tingling spines with "Grossmaechtiger Prinzessin," Miss Watson vocally resplendent and dramatic without being histrionic.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
JAN 4 1969 New England Newsclip

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
JAN 4 1969 New England Newsclip

1912 Opera Gets U.S.A. Premiere

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

The idea behind "Ariadne auf Naxos" is charming. In his German adaptation of Moliere's "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," Hugo von Hofmannsthal has M. Jourdain seek to impress his guests by offering them first a serious opera on the subject of the abandoned Ariadne, then a harlequinade, and finally firewords in the garden. The timetable for the evening gets out of hand, though, and the host, wanting to be sure the fireworks get their due, and bolstered by the conjunction of his wealth and his intellectual innocence, orders that the two theatrical entertainments be performed simultaneously.

Strauss wrote incidental music for the play and a one-act opera to follow it. Most producers were appalled at the expense of engaging a company of actors and one of singers for the same evening. Though this original Bourgeois-Ariadne sequence has had its champions — Sir Thomas Beecham was a notable one — audiences generally did not take to the mixed double bill either.

The indidental music for the play survives as a concert suite, but the "Ariadne" opera was thoroughly revised. In 1916, four years after the premiere of the first version, a new "Ariadne auf Naxos" was produced, with Moliere-Hofmannsthal and M. Jourdain scrapped altogether, and with a new musical prologue added.

The 1916 "Ariadne" is the one we know from performances in the opera house and from recordings. The 1912 version was given its American premiere in concert performance at yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert.

The original "Ariadne" seems to me superior to the later one in two respects. The ending is more attractive, because instead of still another boiling up (as William Mann has it) of the cheap and feeble Bacchus-Ariadne love music, we get first the ironic commentary of Zerbinetta — Ariadne was after all just a girl waiting for a new boy-friend to show up — and then a wistful curtain speech of M. Jourdain's, amusingly punctuated by the orchestra. I also prefer the original version, longer and higher, of Zerbinetta's "Grossmaechtige Prinzessin." The musical interest of this bravura show-stopper is not considerable in either opera, but the sportive appeal is rather greater in the first version.

While I was grateful to have had the opportunity of actually hearing the 1912 "Ariadne" once, the experience left me convinced that the work gained more in its revision than it lost. Strauss made some much-needed cuts — Zerbinetta's second aria, "Prinzessin! Welchen Botenlohn," is mercilessly long and tedious — but what is much more important is what he and von Hofmannsthal gave us in the Prologue, the charming figure of the young composer and the touching episode, one of the best things in any of the Strauss operas, when he and Zerbinetta find each other's hearts just for a moment.

Really, though I am not completely convinced by either "Ariadne." In the curtain speech that Andrew Raeburn wrote for M. Jourdain — one quite different from and much broader than von Hofmannsthal's — we were told, after protestations that it was all rather confusing, that we would be quite sure of "Ariadne's" being a masterpiece if we knew it had been written by Mozart.

But that is evasive and not quite fair. If we found an imaginary Mozart "Ariadne" a masterpiece, it would be not because of our knowledge of who wrote it, but because Mozart probably could and would have made it a masterpiece. Strauss, handicapped in any event by not being quite in sympathy with what seemed to him a rather precious scheme of his librettist's, was too limited a composer to make a masterpiece of "Ariadne."

The score has many lovely and many charming pages. The Overture explores a pensive chromaticism that we can meet decades later in "Metamorphosen" and "Capriccio." The music for the two women — Ariadne, humorless but radiently sincere, and Zerbinetta, gay and flirtatious with just an edge of sadness — is for the most part vividly perceived psychologically and it creates believable, three dimensional characters.

By contrast, much of what the nymphs and the comedians are given to sing is merely pretty in a characterless way, and some of it trails off into mindless note-singing Bacchus, a sort of baby Heldentenor, has a laborously tumefied music in which even Strauss's craft goes to pieces as the chamber sounds strident and insufficient, like a Palm Court ensemble struggling with "Elektra."

A witty stage production will carry "Ariadne" over its weaknesses where a concert reading will not. I would suggest also that a work that is so self-consciously a style exercise and so very campy in essence, needs a particularly elegant performance, and the one given yesterday was rather lacking in sparkle and niceness of polish.

There were, to be sure, a few accidents, but the main trouble was that except in the passages where a strong dance beat marked the time, the rhythm was awash in a way that reduced most of the music to a shapeless and unarticulated treacle river.

Claire Watson sang the title role very beautifully indeed, with a full and relaxed soprano, with warmth of temperament as well as of sound, and with fine word sense. It was a pleasure to hear singing so deeply felt, so intelligent, and so rich in sensuous appeal.

Beverly Sills sang Zerbinetta's part musically and brilliantly (though she did not attempt the two high F sharps), but I suspect Zerbinetta needs a stage on which to expand for real projection of her personality. The nymphs, Benita Valente, Eunice Alberts, and Carole Bogard, were excellent, especially when all three voices were as clear as Miss Bogard's was from the very beginning.

Because of their stage placement in relation to where I sat, I could not hear the quartet of clowns quite clearly enough. Robert Nagy, the Bacchus, was loud. Andrew Raeburn, with a coating of lower middle class accent most delicately applied, read Jourdain's speech charmingly enough to account for a good bit of the applause at the final (imaginary) curtain.

First Strauss 'Ariadne'

The Boston Symphony will give the American premiere of the first version of Richard Strauss' opera "Ariadne auf Naxos" Friday at 2 and Saturday at 8:30, with a repeat performance Jan. 7. The concert version, to be conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, will be staged by grouping the singers on Symphony Hall platforms, and there will be narration by Andrew Raeburn.

Soprano Claire Watson will have the title role and tenor Robert Nagy will sing the god Bacchus who rescues and comforts her. The Grecian figures of Najade, Dryade and Echo will be sung by soprano Benita Valente, alto Eunice Alberts and soprano Carole Bogard, respectively. Soprano Beverly Sills will appear as Zerbinette will be Harlekin (baritone and the commedia dell' tone John Reardon), Scaramuccio (tenor James Billings), Truffaldin (basso Malcolm Smith) and Brighella (tenor John Ferrante).

The one-set opera was premiered in Stuttgart Oct. 25, 1912. It served as the final act to an adaptation of the two-act "Le bourgeois gentilhomme" by Moliere which preceded it on the evening's bill. Strauss' scheme was to present "Ariadne" in lieu of the ballet which Jourdain, the Moliere hero, a nouveau riche, promised his noble guests.

Strauss Original

The original 1912 version of Richard Strauss's Opera "Ariadne auf Naxos" will be the only work on the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Friday and Saturday programs of Jan. 3 and 4.

The work will be conducted by the Orchestra's Music Director, Erich Leinsdorf, with a cast including Claire Watson and Beverly Sills, sopranos, Robert Nagy, tenor, and John Reardon, baritone.

Also to be heard in this American premiere will be Benita Valente and Carole Bogard, sopranos, Eunice Alberts, contralto, John Ferrante and James Billings, tenors and Malcolm Smith, bass. The spoken part of Monsieur Jourdain will be read by Andrew Raeburn.

JOURNAL
CONCORD, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 4,200
JAN 2 1969 New England Newsclip

BURLINGTON TIMES UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 4,200
JAN 2 1969 New England Newsclip

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 2,500
JAN 2 1969 New England Newsclip

MINUTEMAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 2,400
JAN 2 1969 New England Newsclip

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3,800
JAN 2 1969 New England Newsclip

Strauss Opera

Boston in 'Ariadne'

By ALAN BRANIGAN
Staff Correspondent

NEW YORK — A symphony orchestra playing an opera? A great idea, if the orchestra is the Boston Symphony and the opera is Richard Strauss' "Ariadne auf Naxos," which has come into wide favor within the last few years.

Strauss wrote this as a chamber opera prescribing only about 40 musicians and less than a dozen singers. The composer's brilliance and inventiveness, however, crammed more sound, drama and thrills into his little masterwork than some others can do with a cast of hundreds.

"Ariadne" proved to be a total success Saturday night at Carnegie Hall, when Erich Leinsdorf, obviously in love with the work, set it forth with subtle colorings, a perfect balance of parts and a mixture of suave sonal attributes fitted to the elegant music at hand. The capacity audience was completely bowled over and at the end, for the first time in our experience, every listener stood up and shouted. Even the Boston's musicians joined the handclapping for the singers.

In one unusual set of circumstances, applause broke out at the conclusion of an aria by Claire Watson. Leinsdorf brushed this aside and went on with the music. But then came the conclusion of the famous aria by Zerbinetta, sung by Beverly Sills, and there was a storm of applause from the thousands of Sills admirers. The conductor lowered his hands and let the appaluse rage on for a good five minutes before resuming.

Miss Sills had, by all odds, the most spectacular role in the 90-minute opera, particularly in the aria that begins "Allmighty Princess." This is a tour de force, a stringing together of vocal pyrotechnics that would dismay most sopranos. Miss Sills went through all of it, with its fantastic range and dramatic scale passages, in flawless fashion, her silvery tones never showing the slightest sign of strain. It was the best singing of the season, in our experience.

Dramatic Singing

Miss Watson, cast as Ariadne, made her New York debut in the role, after becoming a sensational success on European stage. She is a dramatic soprano of the highest quality, with ringing high notes and lovely tones. Perhaps one day she will be an Isolde to treasure. She has already done minor Wagner roles with success. Her scene near the conclusion with Robert Nagy, tenor, capped the whole beautiful structure.

The Strauss performance was the first time in New York for the original 1912 version, in which a youthful Maria Jeritza sang the title role. It was a remarkable, enchanting work in as it took form under Leinsdorf's painstaking direction, revealing Strauss in the many moods for which he later became a widely beloved creator. It has folkish trios, which were beautifully sung; two scenes, presumably by a Pierrot troupe, which ideally captured the spirit of the dance and a constant stream of delicious instrumental ideas. All of it was rendered in a true Viennese spirit by Leinsdorf, himself a native of that enchanting municipality.

There was even a suggestion of staging with singers entering upon and leaving the stage at the right times. The women singers wore Grecian gowns and the men appeared in white jackets and of all things turtleneck sweaters.

Evening News
NEWARK, N. J.
D. 278,235 SUN. 423,157
JAN 20 1969

TWELFTH PROGRAM

Friday afternoon January 3 1969 at 2 o'clock

Saturday evening January 4 1969 at 8.30

and open rehearsal Thursday evening January 2 1969 at 7.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

RICHARD STRAUSS

ARIADNE AUF NAXOS

(original version of 1912)

opera in one act

libretto by Hugo von Hofmannsthal

first performed in Stuttgart October 25 1912

Characters (in order of singing)

Najade	BENITA VALENTE	soprano
Dryade	EUNICE ALBERTS	contralto
Echo	CAROLE BOGARD	soprano
Ariadne	CLAIRE WATSON	soprano
Harlekin	JOHN REARDON	baritone
Zerbinetta	BEVERLY SILLS	soprano
Truffaldin	MALCOLM SMITH	bass
Brighella	JOHN FERRANTE	tenor
Scaramuccio	JAMES BILLINGS	tenor
Bacchus	ROBERT NAGY	tenor
M. Jourdain	ANDREW RAEBURN	speaking part

FIRST PERFORMANCE IN THE UNITED STATES

There will be no intermission

A translation of the libretto starts on page 744

BSO GIVES FIRST U.S. PERFORMANCES

'Ariadne' Rewarding Event

By McLAREN HARRIS

It is not necessarily true, to judge by the enthusiastic reception by yesterday's Symphony audience (somewhat extraordinary for Fridays), that one's most noble efforts must go unheralded. And it can hardly be denied that the weekend performances of Richard Strauss' "Ariadne auf Naxos" by the orchestra and a battery of 10 soloists under Erich Leinsdorf represent one of the most noble and rewarding events of the Symphony season.

These are the first United States performances of the original "Ariadne" as written for incluson in "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" as adapted by Strauss and Hugo von Hoffmansthal from Moliere. A quasi-explanatory prologue, sung at the beginning of the revised "Ariadne" (now performed alone) was spoken in the original and is thus omitted here. The revision dropped a solo by Zerbinetta and, probably out of a search for poetic fulfillment, the concluding ensemble by Zerbinetta and the clowns.

SEEMINGLY EVERYTHING about "Ariadne" contains a paradox, from the dramatic conflict thrust upon it, to the manner in which opposites are reconciled, also including (if we accept the convincing thesis of program annotator William Mann) Hoffmansthal's conception of his own and Strauss' roles in the collaboration. Even the result is paradoxical. "Ariadne" was envsioned as trivial, but emerged as profound; it appear as a mixture of nobility and frivolity, of gentility and vulgarity, where the situations are parallel, yet perpendicular.

The basic theme of "Ariadne" is serious — the tale from Greek mythology about the Cretan princess, abandoned by Theseus on the island of Naxos, whose tragedy and desolation is transformed into love for the god Bacchus. In the Moliere adaptation the "gentilhomme," Jourdain, wished to stage "Ariadne" followed by a comic intermezzo, but decided as a last-minute expedient to combine the two.

In the combination the comedy is represented by the flighty Zerbinetta and her four lovers, whose slipping from one affair to another is accomplished as easily as changing underwear. Their shallowness is cast against the depth of Ariadne's despair and transformation, and the coexistence of these opposite attitudes is effected, in the words of the program, by one thread: mutual incomprehension.

THIS COULD AS well have been the author's view of himself and the composer: Hoffmansthal giving his creative strengths to the profound facets of the work, Strauss demonstrating his affinity for the lighter, more-entertaining-than-moving portions as evidenced by the spectacular aria, "Grossmaechtige Prinzessin," for Zerbinetta.

Strauss, however, did not let his inspiration fall short for any part of the score. His music, close to "Rosenkavalier" in both time and style, is far beyond mere setting of words — lightly brilliant and good-naturedly mocking during Zerbinetta's amorous encounters, an idealized but sincere passion in Ariadne's (and later, Bacchus') lines. With a modest orchestra reflecting its original design for small theater the music is harmonious yet not statically so, melodically captivating yet far-reaching in register and phrase-structure, everywhere delicate but nowhere frail.

"ARIADNE" IS ALSO immensely difficult, I should think, either to sing in part or to sustain as a whole. The singing complement, in nearly all respects, was superior. Beverly Sills and Claire Watson did beautiful work as Zerbinetta and Ariadne, Miss Sills tingling spines with "Grossmaechtiger Prinzessin," Miss Watson vocally resplendent and dramatic without being histrionic.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
JAN 4 1969
New England Newsclip

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
JAN 4 1969
New England Newsclip

1912 Opera Gets U.S.A. Premiere

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

The idea behind "Ariadne auf Naxos" is charming. In his German adaptation of Moliere's "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," Hugo von Hofmannsthal has M. Jourdain seek to impress his guests by offering them first a serious opera on the subject of the abandoned Ariadne, then a harlequinade, and finally firewords in the garden. The timetable for the evening gets out of hand, though, and the host, wanting to be sure the fireworks get their due, and bolstered by the conjunction of his wealth and his intellectual innocence, orders that the two theatrical entertainments be performed simultaneously.

Strauss wrote incidental music for the play and a one-act opera to follow it. Most producers were appalled at the expense of engaging a company of actors and one of singers for the same evening. Though this original Bourgeois-Ariadne sequence has had its champions — Sir Thomas Beecham was a notable one — audiences generally did not take to the mixed double bill either.

The indidental music for the play survives as a concert suite, but the "Ariadne" opera was thoroughly revised. In 1916, four years after the premiere of the first version, a new "Ariadne auf Naxos" was produced, with Moliere-Hofmannsthal and M. Jourdain scrapped altogether, and with a new musical prologue added.

The 1916 "Ariadne" is the one we know from performances in the opera house and from recordings. The 1912 version was given its Amerian premiere in concert performance at yesterday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert.

The original "Ariadne" seems to me superior to the later one in two respects. The ending is more attractive, because instead of still another boiling up (as William Mann has it) of the cheap and feeble Bacchus-Ariadne love music, we get first the ironic commentary of Zerbinetta — Ariadne was after all just a girl waiting for a new boy-friend to show up — and then a wistful curtain speech of M. Jourdain's, amusingly punctuated by the orchestra. I also prefer the original version, longer and higher, of Zerbinetta's "Grossmaechtige Prinzessin." The musical interest of this bravura show-stopper is not considerable in either opera, but the sportive appeal is rather greater in the first version.

While I was grateful to have had the opportunity of actually hearing the 1912 "Ariadne" once, the experience left me convinced that the work gained more in its revision than it lost. Strauss made some much-needed cuts — Zerbinetta's second aria, "Prinzessin! Welchen Botenlohn," is mercilessly long and tedious — but what is much more important is what he and von Hofmannsthal gave us in the Prologue, the charming figure of the young composer and the touching episode, one of the best things in any of the Strauss operas, when he and Zerbinetta find each other's hearts just for a moment.

Really, though I am not completely convinced by either "Ariadne." In the curtain speech that Andrew Raeburn wrote for M. Jourdain — one quite different from and much broader than von Hofmannsthal's — we were told, after protestations that it was all rather confusing, that we would be quite sure of "Ariadne's" being a masterpiece if we knew it had been written by Mozart.

But that is evasive and not quite fair. If we found an imaginary Mozart "Ariadne" a masterpiece, it would be not because of our knowledge of who wrote it, but because Mozart probably could and would have made it a masterpiece. Strauss, handicapped in any event by not being quite in sympathy with what seemed to him a rather precious scheme of his librettist's, was too limited a composer to make a masterpiece of "Ariadne."

The score has many lovely and many charming pages. The Overture explores a pensive chromaticism that we can meet decades later in "Metamorphosen" and "Capriccio." The music for the two women — Ariadne, humorless but radiently sincere, and Zerbinetta, gay and flirtatious with just an edge of sadness — is for the most part vividly perceived psychologically and it creates believable, three dimensional characters.

By contrast, much of what the nymphs and the comedians are given to sing is merely pretty in a characterless way, and some of it trails off into mindless note-singing Bacchus, a sort of baby Heldentenor, has a laborously tumefied music in which even Strauss's craft goes to pieces as the chamber sounds strident and insufficient, like a Palm Court ensemble struggling with "Elektra."

A witty stage production will carry "Ariadne" over its weaknesses where a concert reading will not. I would suggest also that a work that is so self-consciously a style exercise and so very campy in essence, needs a particularly elegant performance, and the one given yesterday was rather lacking in sparkle and niceness of polish.

There were, to be sure, a few accidents, but the main trouble was that except in the passages where a strong dance beat marked the time, the rhythm was awash in a way that reduced most of the music to a shapeless and unarticulated treacle river.

Claire Watson sang the title role very beautifully indeed, with a full and relaxed soprano, with warmth of temperament as well as of sound, and with fine word sense. It was a pleasure to hear singing so deeply felt, so intelligent, and so rich in sensuous appeal.

Beverly Sills sang Zerbinetta's part musically and brilliantly (though she did not attempt the two high F sharps), but I suspect Zerbinetta needs a stage on which to expand for real projection of her personality. The nymphs, Benita Valente, Eunice Alberts, and Carole Bogard, were excellent, especially when all three voices were as clear as Miss Bogard's was from the very beginning.

Because of their stage placement in relation to where I sat, I could not hear the quartet of clowns quite clearly enough. Robert Nagy, the Bacchus, was loud. Andrew Raeburn, with a coating of lower middle class accent most delicately applied, read Jourdain's speech charmingly enough to account for a good bit of the applause at the final (imaginary) curtain.

First Strauss 'Ariadne'

The Boston Symphony will give the American premiere of the first version of Richard Strauss' opera "Ariadne auf Naxos" Friday at 2 and Saturday at 8:30, with a repeat performance Jan. 7. The concert version, to be conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, will be staged by grouping the singers on Symphony Hall platforms, and there will be narration by Andrew Raeburn.

Soprano Claire Watson will have the title role and tenor Robert Nagy will sing the god Bacchus who rescues and comforts her. The Grecian figures of Najade, Dryade and Echo will be sung by soprano Benita Valente, alto Eunice Alberts and soprano Carole Bogard, respectively. Soprano Beverly Sills will appear as Zerbiarte will be Harlekin (barinetta and the commedia dell' tone John Reardon), Scaramuccio (tenor James Billings), Truffaldin (basso Malcolm Smith) and Brighella (tenor John Ferrante).

The one-set opera was premiered in Stuttgart Oct. 25, 1912. It served as the final act to an adaptation of the two-act "Le bourgeois gentilhomme" by Moliere which preceded it on the evening's bill. Strauss' scheme was to present "Ariadne" in lieu of the ballet which Jourdain, the Moliere hero, a nouveau riche, promised his noble guests.

Strauss Original

The original 1912 version of Richard Strauss's Opera "Ariadne auf Naxos" will be the only work on the Boston Symphony Orchestra's ~~Friday and~~ Saturday programs of Jan. 3 and 4.

The work will be conducted by the Orchestra's Music Director, Erich Leinsdorf, with a cast including Claire Watson and Beverly Sills, sopranos, Robert Nagy, tenor, and John Reardon, baritone.

Also to be heard in this American premiere will be Benita Valente and Carole Bogard, sopranos, Eunice Alberts, contralto, John Ferrante and James Billings, tenors and Malcolm Smith, bass. The spoken part of Monsieur Jourdain will be read by Andrew ~~Raeburn.~~

JOURNAL
CONCORD, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 4,200
JAN 2 1969
New England Newsclip

BURLINGTON TIMES UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 4,200
JAN 2 1969
New England Newsclip

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 2,500
JAN 2 1969
New England Newsclip

MINUTEMAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 2,400
JAN 2 1969
New England Newsclip

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3,800
JAN 2 1969
New England Newsclip

Strauss Opera

Boston in 'Ariadne'

By ALAN BRANIGAN
Staff Correspondent

NEW YORK — A symphony orchestra playing an opera? A great idea, if the orchestra is the Boston Symphony and the opera is Richard Strauss' "Ariadne auf Naxos," which has come into wide favor within the last few years.

Strauss wrote this as a chamber opera prescribing only about 40 musicians and less than a dozen singers. The composer's brilliance and inventiveness, however, crammed more sound, drama and thrills into his little masterwork than some others can do with a cast of hundreds.

"Ariadne" proved to be a total success Saturday night at Carnegie Hall, when Erich Leinsdorf, obviously in love with the work, set it forth with subtle colorings, a perfect balance of arts and a mixture of suave sonal attributes fitted to the elegant music at hand. The capacity audience was completely bowled over and at the end, for the first time in our experience, every listener stood up and shouted. Even the Boston's musicians joined the handclapping for the singers.

In one unusual set of circumstances, applause broke out at the conclusion of an aria by Claire Watson. Leinsdorf brushed this aside and went on with the music. But then came the conclusion of the famous aria by Zerbinetta, sung by Beverly Sills, and there was a storm of applause from the thousands of Sills admirers. The conductor lowered his hands and let the appaluse rage on for a good five minutes before resuming.

Miss Sills had, by all odds, the most spectacular role in the 90-minute opera, particularly in the aria that begins "Almighty Princess." This is a tour de force, a stringing together of vocal pyrotechnics that would dismay most sopranos. Miss Sills went through all of it, with its fantastic range and dramatic scale passages, in flawless fashion, her silvery tones never showing the slightest sign of strain. It was the best singing of the season, in our experience.

Dramatic Singing

Miss Watson, cast as Ariadne, made her New York debut in the role, after becoming a sensational success on European stage. She is a dramatic soprano of the highest quality, with ringing high notes and lovely tones. Perhaps one day she will be an Isolde to treasure. She has already done minor Wagner roles with success. Her scene near the conclusion with Robert Nagy, tenor, capped the whole beautiful structure.

The Strauss performance was the first time in New York for the original 1912 version, in which a youthful Maria Jeritza sang the title role. It was a remarkable, enchanting work in as it took form under Leinsdorf's painstaking direction, revealing Strauss in the many moods for which he later became a widely beloved creator. It has folkish trios, which were beautifully sung; two scenes, presumably by a Pierrot troupe, which ideally captured the spirit of the dance and a constant stream of delicious instrumental ideas. All of it was rendered in a true Viennese spirit by Leinsdorf, himself a native of that enchanting municipality.

There was even a suggestion of staging with singers entering upon and leaving the stage at the right times. The women singers wore Grecian gowns and the men appeared in white jackets and of all things turtleneck sweaters.

Evening News
NEWARK, N. J.
D. 278,235 SUN 423,157
JAN 20 1969

26.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

JAN 9 1969 New England Newsclip

Beverly Sills Stars In BSO Telecast Jan. 7

Soprano Beverly Sills stars in Strauss' "Ariadne auf Naxos" with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday, Jan. 7 at 8:30 p.m. on Channel 2, in a Boston Symphony color telecast, broadcast simultaneously in stereo by WGBH Radio (89.7 FM) direct from Symphony Hall, with Erich Leinsdorf conducting.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

DEC 26 1968 New England

VISITORS GUIDEPOST
BOSTON, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY

JAN 3 1969 New England Newsclip

music

Boston Symphony Orchestra—Erich Leinsdorf conducts Strauss' Ariadne auf Naxos Jan. 3, 4, and 7; Jan. 9, Charles Wilson conducts works by Strauss, Britten and Sibelius; Jan. 10 & 11, Erich Leinsdorf conducts, Andre Watts is featured pianist and Charles Wilson, organist; Jan. 14, Charles Wilson conducts works by Strauss, Britten and Sibelius; Jan. 21, Leinsdorf conducts, Andre Watts, pianist and Charles Wilson, organist; Jan. 23, 24, 25 & 28 Georges Pretre conducts works by Lalo, Sibelius, Messiaen and Ravel; Jan. 30, 31, Feb. 1, 4, and 6 George Pretre conducts works by Bizet and Berlioz; Feb. - & 8, Pierre Boulez conducts works by Haydn, Stravinsky, Debussy and Berg. For times and ticket information phone Symphony Hall at 266-1492.

Opera Company [illegible] perform

Boston Symphony

Performs 'Ariadne' of Strauss

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

Erich Leinsdorf added a gala touch to his last season with the Boston Symphony by extraordinary performance of Strauss' Ariadne auf Naxos last Friday and Saturday. A concert version is well suited to this opera: von Hofmannsthal, the librettist, was short on plot and long on an expressionistic projection of feeling, and Strauss was the right composer to give sensory body to poetry that would otherwise be romantic mish-mash.

Like Mozart, his musical god, Strauss found his center in opera and in the once-removed opera of program music; and the more recent techniques of Wagner and Berlioz encouraged him to expand instrumental and vocal vocabulary for the sake of immediacy. By the time he was 48 his command of instrumental color and expressive phraseology had extended the Wagnerian idea to the limits of sensibility. In conceiving the music for Ariadne he was a free agent, able to relax from such ultimates as the Hero's Life and play with the surrealistic contradictions of Ariadne.

Van Hofmannsthal presented Strauss with an Ariadne who had helped Theseus to search the Cretan maze and kill the Minotaur, and then found herself deserted by the hero on the barren island of Naxos. Now hold onto that. Eventually Bacchus will appear (How did he know about her and why give a damn?) and Ariadne will revive. Meanwhile the whole drama is meshed with a troup of Commedia dell'arte that also has to perform for Jordain's guests. (You will remember him from Moliere's Le Bourgois Gentilhomme for which Strauss wrote incidental music and which was intended to preceed the short opera — as if Ariadne was a contemporary off-shoot from Moliere's scintillating satire.)

Poor Jordain can't arrange the timing otherwise than by having simultaneous performance of the serious and comic groups. And so the fantastic counterpoint of a dramatic-musical situation that bounces the clown-comedy of dancey tunes off the straight-laced seriousness of von Hoffmannsthal's Greek derivation.

And lest we take it all too seriously, in spite of deserted Ariadne's pathos, M. Jordain, who has been quietly sitting at the side of the stage, bemused by the fantastic results of his own arrangement, turns out to be a god-from-the-machine (in layman's clothes) to rescue us from our own response, a Bernard Shavian trickery to make the audience laugh at itself.

What might be subtitled "The Death and Transfiguration (by Bacchus) of Ariadne" has not been able to squelch the impromtu comedians, and Jordain's guarrulous remarks at the climax make a delicious anti-climax punctuated meekly by the orchestra that then dashes into a wow ending as the curtains (should) close. It sounds impossible but it isn't.

It requires a sensitive chamber orchestra, like that of the Boston, ten fine singers, and one character who just sits for an hour and then speaks (as M. Joudain) a bewildered comment at the climax, as if a lonesome chorus suggesting the cultural fun all this has afforded. Like Bernard Shaw, Moliere reincarnated by Strauss pricks his own bubble. The comment was neatly rephrased to needle a Boston audience.

The triumph of Leindorfs resulted from his evident ability to choose and handle good operatic forces. He was completely in charge without repressing — rather releasing the effectiveness of the score and the performers.

The Friday concert was good; the Saturday one inspired, — so much so that the conductor seemed to anticipate and assist every moment of sound in just proportion of interrelation and expressive intent.

Not having heard Ariadne (in any version) I was delighted to recognize again the Strauss way of developing a song out of the flow of dramatic movement, orchestral and solo voices making a development only to be matched by Mahler.

For all Strauss's statement that he didn't want his music "to be always beautiful," it is, in 1969, a bland harmonic diet. And why not? For one who really listens there is lyricism and drama in a great tradition going back to Mozart, and extraordinary skill in orchestration and vocalism. The chamber orchestra, which opens the work with a string quartet sound (as if by Reger) can, in moments of high tension, give the illusion of a full Wagnerian ensemble.

Strauss, like Mahler, learned his orchestra by the practical experience of conducting, granted that his horn-playing father, who had advised Wagner about the horn call in Seigfried, set him going. In Ariadne the visceral sensationalism of Til and Salome is used with discretion, though he can still at a climax make the slouching statues of Symphony Hall vibrate on their pedestals with only chamber orchestra and ten singers.

I could fill another column on the singers. They are all fairly young, but seasoned — all Americans and basically educated in this country, now known in opera and oratorio abroad as well as across the U.S. They deserve the biographies in the program book. What the book doesn't say is that the present roster of American singers has established a new plateau of intelligence and musicianship. Remembering what I heard in the early years of the century, the great days of the Met, there were some astonishing vocal organs but also a prevailing ignorance and dim wits. Singers had to be coached all through their champagne careers. And the most famous coloraturas not only would miss in pitch (tin ears) but toss off figurations like trained seals with little sense of the emotive reasons for such extravagance.

Beverly Sills knows what she is singing about — can hit the notes clean but also dramatize coruscations so that movement can be clouded or impulsive or cool. Her figurations are gestures and she was well cast in the role of Zerbinetta. Incidentally, this first (1912) version allows her more to do, and she does it without losing a hair on her witty red head, easily able to dominate, with coloratura flim-flam, her four clowney lovers, no slouches themselves at resonant harmony. (A couple of their concerted tunes should be extracted for male glee clubs.)

Appropriate as Miss Sills is for her role, just as singing, there is a busyness with tone — a flirting with phrase, that is sometimes precious. Claire Watson, as Ariadne, was in beautiful contrast — a voice clean and warm (like another instrument in the strings and winds) and when there was need, an unleashing of power that seemed to lift the orchestra and audience right off the floor. One could fall in love with that voice (what was wrong with Theseus?) I wish I could say the same for Robert Nagy's Bacchus. There was comparable power and high notes to shiver the chandeliers, but all squeezed, as if one extruded shaving cream. He looks and sings like a "heavy" in the old comedies. I'm sure he reaches the top balcony at the Met. For all the others, thanks, not forgetting Andrew Raeburn, who has been around as program editor for a few years and has at last found a use for his delightful Oxford accent.

Early-on Ariadne sings, "It is a shame to be deranged as I am — Mad but wise, yes!" Yes, but no shame as presented by Leinsdorf and his forces.

Leinsdorf 'Demotes' Symphony

By DELOS SMITH

NEW YORK (UPI)—When Erich Leinsdorf demoted the mighty Boston Symphony to an opera orchestra accompanying singers he revealed his heart is warming to an old love and may never again attune itself to Boston.

He did it last week, and in Boston, too. One of the world's most renowned symphonic instruments was required to devote two concerts to providing background for 10 singers in a run-through of Richard Strauss' first version of his opera, "Ariadne auf Naxos."

It was Leinsdorf's prerogative. He is music director of the Boston Symphony and will be until next summer's end when his resignation becomes effective. And it could have been answer enough for those supporters of the orchestra who had been hoping he would reconsider and also an answer to the question concerning his conductorial future.

Resigned From Met

When Leinsdorf took over the Boston Symphony in 1962 he had even more reputation as an opera conductor than as a symphony conductor. Indeed, he resigned a top artistic post at the Metropolitan Opera to take the Boston job, and no one will doubt the Met or any other opera house would be happy to have him.

But symphony conductors with established international reputations are scarce these days, as the trustees of the New York Philharmonic will tell you. They're still struggling with choosing a successor to their departing music director, Leonard Bernstein.

For that reason if none other some supporters of the Boston Symphony had been hoping Leinsdorf could be persuaded to stay on. He resigned because he considered the work - load too heavy and the hope was that the work-load could be negotiated.

These supporters had been made unhappy by the trustees' decision to replace him with William Steinberg, director of the Pittsburgh Symphony. Not because Steinberg lacks international reputation but because he wouldn't give up his Pittsburgh post and intends to be music director of two symphony orchestras simultaneously.

Pride Hurt

Boston still has its pride. To old-line traditional Bostonians it is humiliating to share a music director with any orchestra, particularly one which was non-existent when the Boston Symphony was already famous.

Whatever the meaning, eyebrows shot up all over operatic and symphonic circles when Leinsdorf hired 10 opera singers and used the Boston Symphony to make an operatic point of little interest to symphonic audiences.

The point is that Strauss abandoned a felicitous scoring when he expanded his first version of "Adriadne auf Naxos" into the opera which remains viable in the opera house to this very day. The first version was not viable. It was originally conceived and performed as a stunt and probably hadn't been performed anywhere for some 50 years until Leinsdorf dusted it off.

Meanwhile, Bernstein, the other "big name" symphony conductor who will be at liberty at the end of this music season, remains an enigma. He is sharing the New York Philharmonic's podium during his last season as music director with six other conductors.

COSHOCTON TRIBUNE
COSHOCTON, O.
P.M. & SUN. - CIRC. 10,392

JAN-5--69

Original of 'Ariadne' Hit Under Leinsdorf

By GEORGE GELLES
Music Critic

"Ariadne ouf Naxos" was the third collaboration between Richard Strauss and the poet Hugo von Hofmannsthal, and their most problematical. The original 1912 version, which was given an excellent American premiere yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony and soloists under Erich Leinsdorf, was a failure with the German public, but after a quick and successful reworking it became the 1916 "Ariadne" still seen in opera houses today.

"Ariadne I" failed in not realizing the rather grandiose scheme of Hofmannsthal. "What it is about," he wrote Strauss, "is one of the straight-forward and stupendous problems of life: fidelity; whether to hold fast to that which is lost, to cling to it even unto death — or to live, to live on, to transform oneself, to sacrifice the integrity of the soul and yet in this transmutation to preserve one's essence . . ."

This was the problem facing Ariadne, daughter of Minos, who fell in love with Theseus, helped him to slay her half-brother the Minotaur, found herself on the island of Naxos unexplicably deserted by him, and finally capitulated to Bacchus.

For dramatic contrast, Hofmannsthal inhabited Naxos with a quintet of commedia dell' arte players, four men led by the frivolous coloratura Zerbinetta, and blended this comic strain with the myth; but in planning "Ariadne I" as pendant and focal point to Moliere's "Bourgeois Gentilhomme," Hofmannsthal went too far; the Molier suffered repeatedly from mediocre performances and was replaced in the revision with a dramatically less exacting "Prologue."

There were a few musical changes made as well, the most important of them an additional confrontation between Zerbinetta and Ariadne, just before Bacchus appears, and an altered ending, in which Zerbinetta and the players elaborate her line near the close of "Ariadne II": "Kommt der neue Gott gegangen . . ."

The best performance of the afternoon came from Leinsdorf, who kept the score flowing smoothly, pacing it well towards the Ariadne-Bacchus duet; the playing he got from the strings was somewhat better than that from the winds, and the instrumental portions in general might have been more sharply rendered, but it was a fine job.

Performances from the ten soloists were never less than very good, and those from Beverly Sills (Zerbinetta), Benita Valente (Najade), Eunice Alberts (Dryade), Claire Watson (Ariadne), and Robert Nagy (Bacchus) were excellent.

The slam-bang ending is far effective than that to "Ariadne II," and for sitting on stage until the last minute only to recite some silly lines that should never have been included, Andrew Raeburn, who recited them well, is convicted of guilt by association.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

JAN 4 1969 New England Newsclip

Music in '69

B.S.O. list awaited

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

Last week, we looked back at 1968. This week, we try to look ahead into 1969.

At some point, probably early in the Summer, the Boston Symphony will publish its list of guest conductors for the 1969-70 season. Among those conductors may be the man who takes over the orchestra after William Steinberg, now under contract to be music director from 1969 to 1972, though, of course, we won't know it until later.

At any rate, the Boston Symphony's guest lists during Steinberg years should be watched closely, not only because they will include the name of someone who perhaps will go far toward determining Boston's musical climate for many years, but also because they will tell us something about the temper of the Symphony's trustees and their vision about the future of the orchestra.

If the names are mostly those of celebrities of the profession's glamour boys, and of its established routiniers, it will mean "business as usual." If, on the other hand, the lists were to include men like Gustav Meier (Yale University), Gerhard Samuel (Oakland Symphony), or Michael Tilson Thomas (Young Musicians Foundation Orchestra, Los Angeles), it would suggest that the trustees are willing to consider qualities other than fame, that they are ready to acknowledge that we are in the last third of the 20th century, and that they plan to give real thrust to the campaign, one that ought to be of much concern to them, to attract a young and a continuing audience.

So far we know two of the 1969-70 guest conductors. Erich Leinsdorf will take 14 concerts in November and December, and Colin Davis will be here for two weeks. Rumors about Davis as a possible candidate have been persistent. But in England musicians insisted that Davis's real longing was for the music directorship of the Covent Garden Opera, London. Then, in the last days of 1968, there came the news that Davis would leave his post at the B.B.C. to succeed Georg Solti, who is moving to the Chicago Symphony, at Covent Garden, beginning in the Fall of 1969. And that, I imagine, closes the Davis-BSO issue, at least for the moment.

The year should bring some interesting new music. Some of the important premieres, in the order of their occurence, include Milton Babbitt's "Relata II" (Bernstein, New York Philharmonic), Elliott Carter's Concerto for Orchestra (same performers), Krysztof Penderecki's opera, "The Devils," after the John Whiting play (Santa Fe Opera), and Gunther Schuller's children's opera, "The Fisherman and his Wife," with a John Updike libretto after Grimm (tentatively scheduled for production by the Opera Company of Boston around Christmas).

New to America is Roger Sessions' opera, "Montezuma," to be given by the Opera Company of Boston in May. Other matters of operatic interest include the New England Conservatory's February production of Debussy's "Pelleas et Melisande" and the one by the Opera Company of Boston of Verdi's "Macbeth." Both will be done in their original version, the Debussy for the first time anywhere, and the Verdi apparently for the first time in America in over 100 years. When this column appears in print, Erich Leinsdorf will have just conducted the American premiere of the original version of Strauss' "Ariadne auf Naxos" at a couple of B.S.O. concerts.

The first news of Summer plans comes from the Dartmouth College Congregation of the Arts. Three composers will be in residence for two weeks each, the Italian Luigi Dallapiccola, the American Roger Sessions, and Roberto Gerhard, Spanish, but living in England since 1936. Among the instrumental faculty at the Congregation will be the hornist Barry Tuckwell and the cellist Sigfried Palm. The Dartmouth Congregation, which also will include repertory and experimental theater, art exhibitions and a film series, will run from June 30 to Aug. 23.

From Dartmouth, also comes the news that Mario di Bonaventura, founder and director of the Congregation of the Arts, has been awarded the Arnold Bax Memorial Award for Conducting and, for his services to Polish Music in the United States, the "Amicus Poloniae" badge of Poland Illustrated Magazine.

Colby College, Waterville, Me., announces that the Hungarian Quartet will be faculty-in-residence for the 6th consecutive year in July and August. No official word from Tanglewood yet, but in a recent lecture at Princeton, Erich Leinsdorf mentioned that he would conduct a semi-staged perfomance of Berg's "Wozzeck" with the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra.

Bostonians starved for good song recitals will be cheered to learn that the Mason-Peabody Foundation is planning an all vocal series for its 1969-70 season.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905

JAN 5 1969 New England Newsclip

26.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

JAN 9 1969 New England Newsclip

Beverly Sills Stars In BSO Telecast Jan. 7

Soprano Beverly Sills stars in Strauss' "Ariadne auf Naxos" with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday, Jan. 7 at 8:30 p.m. on Channel 2, in a Boston Symphony color telecast, broadcast simultaneously in stereo by WGBH Radio (89.7 FM) direct from Symphony Hall, with Erich Leinsdorf conducting.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

DEC 26 1968 New England

VISITORS GUIDEPOST
BOSTON, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY

JAN 3 1969 New England Newsclip

music

Boston Symphony Orchestra—Erich Leinsdorf ~~conducts Strauss' Ariadne auf~~ Naxos Jan. 3, 4, and 7; Jan. 9, Charles Wilson conducts works by Strauss, Britten and Sibelius; Jan. 10 & 11, Erich Leinsdorf conducts, Andre Watts is featured pianist and Charles Wilson, organist; Jan. 14, Charles Wilson conducts works by Strauss, Britten and Sibelius; Jan. 21, Leinsdorf conducts, Andre Watts, pianist and Charles Wilson, organist; Jan. 23, 24, 25 & 28 Georges Pretre conducts works by Lalo, Sibelius, Messiaen and Ravel; Jan. 30, 31, Feb. 1, 4, and 6 George Pretre conducts works by Bizet and Berlioz; Feb. - & 8, Pierre Boulez conducts works by Haydn, Stravinsky, Debussy and Berg. For times and ticket information phone Symphony Hall at 266-1492.

Opera Company - perform-

Boston Symphony

Performs 'Ariadne' of Strauss

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

Erich Leinsdorf added a gala touch to his last season with the Boston Symphony by extraordinary performance of Strauss' Ariadne auf Naxos last Friday and Saturday. A concert version is well suited to this opera: von Hofmannsthal, the librettist, was short on plot and long on an expressionistic projection of feeling, and Strauss was the right composer to give sensory body to poetry that would otherwise be romantic mish-mash.

Like Mozart, his musical god, Strauss found his center in opera and in the once-removed opera of program music; and the more recent techniques of Wagner and Berlioz encouraged him to expand instrumental and vocal vocabulary for the sake of immediacy. By the time he was 48 his command of instrumental color and expressive phraseology had extended the Wagnerian idea to the limits of sensibility. In conceiving the music for Ariadne he was a free agent, able to relax from such ultimates as the Hero's Life and play with the surrealistic contradictions of Ariadne.

Van Hofmannsthal presented Strauss with an Ariadne who had helped Theseus to search the Cretan maze and kill the Minotaur, and then found herself deserted by the hero on the barren island of Naxos. Now hold onto that. Eventually Bacchus will appear (How did he know about her and why give a damn?) and Ariadne will revive. Meanwhile the whole drama is meshed with a troup of Commedia dell'arte that also has to perform for Jordain's guests. (You will remember him from Moliere's Le Bourgois Gentilhomme for which Strauss wrote incidental music and which was intended to preceed the short opera — as if Ariadne was a contemporary off-shoot from Moliere's scintillating satire.)

Poor Jordain can't arrange the timing otherwise than by having simultaneous performance of the serious and comic groups. And so the fantastic counterpoint of a dramatic-musical situation that bounces the clown-comedy of dancey tunes off the straight-laced seriousness of von Hoffmannsthal's Greek derivation.

And lest we take it all too seriously, in spite of deserted Ariadne's pathos, M. Jordain, who has been quietly sitting at the side of the stage, bemused by the fantastic results of his own arrangement, turns out to be a god-from-the-machine (in layman's clothes) to rescue us from our own response, a Bernard Shavian trickery to make the audience laugh at itself.

What might be subtitled "The Death and Transfiguration (by Bacchus) of Ariadne" has not been able to squelch the impromtu comedians, and Jordain's guarrulous remarks at the climax make a delicious anti-climax punctuated meekly by the orchestra that then dashes into a wow ending as the curtains (should) close. It sounds impossible but it isn't.

It requires a sensitive chamber orchestra, like that of the Boston, ten fine singers, and one character who just sits for an hour and then speaks (as M. Joudain) a bewildered comment at the climax, as if a lonesome chorus suggesting the cultural fun all this has afforded. Like Bernard Shaw, Moliere reincarnated by Strauss pricks his own bubble. The comment was neatly rephrased to needle a Boston audience.

The triumph of Leindorfs resulted from his evident ability to choose and handle good operatic forces. He was completely in charge without repressing — rather releasing the effectiveness of the score and the performers.

The Friday concert was good; the Saturday one inspired, — so much so that the conductor seemed to anticipate and assist every moment of sound in just proportion of interrelation and expressive intent.

Not having heard Ariadne (in any version) I was delighted to recognize again the Strauss way of developing a song out of the flow of dramatic movement, orchestral and solo voices making a development only to be matched by Mahler.

For all Strauss's statement that he didn't want his music "to be always beautiful," it is, in 1969, a bland harmonic diet. And why not? For one who really listens there is lyricism and drama in a great tradition going back to Mozart, and extraordinary skill in orchestration and vocalism. The chamber orchestra, which opens the work with a string quartet sound (as if by Reger) can, in moments of high tension, give the illusion of a full Wagnerian ensemble.

Strauss, like Mahler, learned his orchestra by the practical experience of conducting, granted that his horn-playing father, who had advised Wagner about the horn call in Seigfried, set him going. In Ariadne the visceral sensationalism of Til and Salome is used with discretion, though he can still at a climax make the slouching statues of Symphony Hall vibrate on their pedestals with only chamber orchestra and ten singers.

I could fill another column on the singers. They are all fairly young, but seasoned — all Americans and basically educated in this country, now known in opera and oratorio abroad as well as across the U.S. They deserve the biographies in the program book. What the book doesn't say is that the present roster of American singers has established a new plateau of intelligence and musicianship. Remembering what I heard in the early years of the century, the great days of the Met, there were some astonishing vocal organs but also a prevailing ignorance and dim wits. Singers had to be coached all through their champagne careers. And the most famous coloraturas not only would miss in pitch (tin ears) but toss off figurations like trained seals with little sense of the emotive reasons for such extravagance.

Beverly Sills knows what she is singing about — can hit the notes clean but also dramatize coruscations so that movement can be clouded or impulsive or cool. Her figurations are gestures and she was well cast in the role of Zerbinetta. Incidentally, this first (1912) version allows her more to do, and she does it without losing a hair on her witty red head, easily able to dominate, with coloratura flim-flam, her four clowney lovers, no slouches themselves at resonant harmony. (A couple of their concerted tunes should be extracted for male glee clubs.)

Appropriate as Miss Sills is for her role, just as singing, there is a busyness with tone — a flirting with phrase, that is sometimes precious. Claire Watson, as Ariadne, was in beautiful contrast — a voice clean and warm (like another instrument in the strings and winds) and when there was need, an unleashing of power that seemed to lift the orchestra and audience right off the floor. One could fall in love with that voice (what was wrong with Theseus?) I wish I could say the same for Robert Nagy's Bacchus. There was comparable power and high notes to shiver the chandeliers, but all squeezed, as if one extruded shaving cream. He looks and sings like a "heavy" in the old comedies. I'm sure he reaches the top balcony at the Met. For all the others, thanks, not forgetting Andrew Raeburn, who has been around as program editor for a few years and has at last found a use for his delightful Oxford accent.

Early-on Ariadne sings, "It is a shame to be deranged as I am — Mad but wise, yes!" Yes, but no shame as presented by Leinsdorf and his forces.

Leinsdorf 'Demotes' Symphony

By DELOS SMITH

NEW YORK (UPI)—When Erich Leinsdorf demoted the mighty Boston Symphony to an opera orchestra accompanying singers he revealed his heart is warming to an old love and may never again attune itself to Boston.

He did it last week, and in Boston, too. One of the world's most renowned symphonic instruments was required to devote two concerts to providing background for 10 singers in a run-through of Richard Strauss' first version of his opera, "Ariadne auf Naxos."

It was Leinsdorf's prerogative. He is music director of the Boston Symphony and will be until next summer's end when his resignation becomes effective. And it could have been answer enough for those supporters of the orchestra who had been hoping he would reconsider and also an answer to the question concerning his conductorial future.

Resigned From Met

When Leinsdorf took over the Boston Symphony in 1962 he had even more reputation as an opera conductor than as a symphony conductor. Indeed, he resigned a top artistic post at the Metropolitan Opera to take the Boston job, and no one will doubt the Met or any other opera house would be happy to have him.

But symphony conductors with established international reputations are scarce these days, as the trustees of the New York Philharmonic will tell you. They're still struggling with choosing a successor to their departing music director, Leonard Bernstein.

For that reason if none other some supporters of the Boston Symphony had been hoping Leinsdorf could be persuaded to stay on. He resigned because he considered the work - load too heavy and the hope was that the work-load could be negotiated.

These supporters had been made unhappy by the trustees' decision to replace him with William Steinberg, director of the Pittsburgh Symphony. Not because Steinberg lacks international reputation but because he wouldn't give up his Pittsburgh post and intends to be music director of two symphony orchestras simultaneously.

Pride Hurt

Boston still has its pride. To old-line traditional Bostonians it is humiliating to share a music director with any orchestra, particularly one which was non-existent when the Boston Symphony was already famous.

Whatever the meaning, eyebrows shot up all over operatic and symphonic circles when Leinsdorf hired 10 opera singers and used the Boston Symphony to make an operatic point of little interest to symphonic audiences.

The point is that Strauss abandoned a felicitous scoring when he expanded his first version of "Adriadne auf Naxos" into the opera which remains viable in the opera house to this very day. The first version was not viable. It was originally conceived and performed as a stunt and probably hadn't been performed anywhere for some 50 years until Leinsdorf dusted it off.

Meanwhile, Bernstein, the other "big name" symphony conductor who will be at liberty at the end of this music season, remains an enigma. He is sharing the New York Philharmonic's podium during his last season as music director with six other conductors.

Original of 'Ariadne' Hit Under Leinsdorf

By GEORGE GELLES
Music Critic

"Ariadne ouf Naxos" was the third collaboration between Richard Strauss and the poet Hugo von Hofmannsthal, and their most problematical. The original 1912 version, which was given an excellent American premiere yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony and soloists under Erich Leinsdorf, was a failure with the German public, but after a quick and successful reworking it became the 1916 "Ariadne" still seen in opera houses today.

"Ariadne I" failed in not realizing the rather grandiose scheme of Hofmannsthal. "What it is about," he wrote Strauss, "is one of the straight-forward and stupendous problems of life: fidelity; whether to hold fast to that which is lost, to cling to it even unto death — or to live, to live on, to transform oneself, to sacrifice the integrity of the soul and yet in this transmutation to preserve one's essence . . ."

This was the problem facing Ariadne, daughter of Minos, who fell in love with Theseus, helped him to slay her half-brother the Minotaur, found herself on the island of Naxos unexplicably deserted by him, and finally capitulated to Bacchus.

For dramatic contrast, Hofmannsthal inhabited Naxos with a quintet of commedia dell' arte players, four men led by the frivolous coloratura Zerbinetta, and blended this comic strain with the myth; but in planning "Ariadne I" as pendant and focal point to Moliere's "Bourgeois Gentilhomme," Hofmannsthal went too far; the Molier suffered repeatedly from mediocre performances and was replaced in the revision with a dramatically less exacting "Prologue."

There were a few musical changes made as well, the most important of them an additional confrontation between Zerbinetta and Ariadne, just before Bacchus appears, and an altered ending, in which Zerbinetta and the players elaborate her line near the close of "Ariadne II": "Kommt der neue Gott gegangen . . ."

The best performance of the afternoon came from Leinsdorf, who kept the score flowing smoothly, pacing it well towards the Ariadne-Bacchus duet; the playing he got from the strings was somewhat better than that from the winds, and the instrumental portions in general might have been more sharply rendered, but it was a fine job.

Performances from the ten soloists were never less than very good, and those from Beverly Sills (Zerbinetta), Benita Valente (Najade), Eunice Alberts (Dryade), Claire Watson (Ariadne), and Robert Nagy (Bacchus) were excellent.

The slam-bang ending is far effective than that to "Ariadne II," and for sitting on stage until the last minute only to recite some silly lines that should never have been included, Andrew Raeburn, who recited them well, is convicted of guilt by association.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

JAN 4 1969 New England Newsclip

Music in '69

B.S.O. list awaited

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

Last week, we looked back at 1968. This week, we try to look ahead into 1969.

At some point, probably early in the Summer, the Boston Symphony will publish its list of guest conductors for the 1969-70 season. Among those conductors may be the man who takes over the orchestra after William Steinberg, now under contract to be music director from 1969 to 1972, though, of course, we won't know it until later.

At any rate, the Boston Symphony's guest lists during Steinberg years should be watched closely, not only because they will include the name of someone who perhaps will go far toward determining Boston's musical climate for many years, but also because they will tell us something about the temper of the Symphony's trustees and their vision about the future of the orchestra.

If the names are mostly those of celebrities of the profession's glamour boys, and of its established routiniers, it will mean "business as usual." If, on the other hand, the lists were to include men like Gustav Meier (Yale University), Gerhard Samuel (Oakland Symphony), or Michael Tilson Thomas (Young Musicians Foundation Orchestra, Los Angeles), it would suggest that the trustees are willing to consider qualities other than fame, that they are ready to acknowledge that we are in the last third of the 20th century, and that they plan to give real thrust to the campaign, one that ought to be of much concern to them, to attract a young and a continuing audience.

So far we know two of the 1969-70 guest conductors. Erich Leinsdorf will take 14 concerts in November and December, and Colin Davis will be here for two weeks. Rumors about Davis as a possible candidate have been persistent. But in England musicians insisted that Davis's real longing was for the music directorship of the Covent Garden Opera, London. Then, in the last days of 1968, there came the news that Davis would leave his post at the B.B.C. to succeed Georg Solti, who is moving to the Chicago Symphony, at Covent Garden, beginning in the Fall of 1969. And that, I imagine, closes the Davis-BSO issue, at least for the moment.

The year should bring some interesting new music. Some of the important premieres, in the order of their occurence, include Milton Babbitt's "Relata II" (Bernstein, New York Philharmonic), Elliott Carter's Concerto for Orchestra (same performers), Krysztof Penderecki's opera, "The Devils," after the John Whiting play (Santa Fe Opera), and Gunther Schuller's children's opera, "The Fisherman and his Wife," with a John Updike libretto after Grimm (tentatively scheduled for production by the Opera Company of Boston around Christmas).

New to America is Roger Sessions' opera, "Montezuma," to be given by the Opera Company of Boston in May. Other matters of operatic interest include the New England Conservatory's February production of Debussy's "Pelleas et Melisande" and the one by the Opera Company of Boston of Verdi's "Macbeth." Both will be done in their original version, the Debussy for the first time anywhere, and the Verdi apparently for the first time in America in over 100 years. When this column appears in print, Erich Leinsdorf will have just conducted the American premiere of the original version of Strauss' "Ariadne auf Naxos" at a couple of B.S.O. concerts.

The first news of Summer plans comes from the Dartmouth College Congregation of the Arts. Three composers will be in residence for two weeks each, the Italian Luigi Dallapiccola, the American Roger Sessions, and Roberto Gerhard, Spanish, but living in England since 1936. Among the instrumental faculty at the Congregation will be the hornist Barry Tuckwell and the cellist Sigfried Palm. The Dartmouth Congregation, which also will include repertory and experimental theater, art exhibitions and a film series, will run from June 30 to Aug. 23.

From Dartmouth, also comes the news that Mario di Bonaventura, founder and director of the Congregation of the Arts, has been awarded the Arnold Bax Memorial Award for Conducting and, for his services to Polish Music in the United States, the "Amicus Poloniae" badge of Poland Illustrated Magazine.

Colby College, Waterville, Me., announces that the Hungarian Quartet will be faculty-in-residence for the 6th consecutive year in July and August. No official word from Tanglewood yet, but in a recent lecture at Princeton, Erich Leinsdorf mentioned that he would conduct a semi-staged perfomance of Berg's "Wozzeck" with the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra.

Bostonians starved for good song recitals will be cheered to learn that the Mason-Peabody Foundation is planning an all vocal series for its 1969-70 season.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905

JAN 5 1969 New England Newsclip

27.

CAMBRIDGE SERIES

THIRD PROGRAM
Tuesday evening January 7 1969 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

RICHARD STRAUSS
ARIADNE AUF NAXOS
(original version of 1912)
opera in one act

libretto by Hugo von Hofmannsthal
first performed in Stuttgart October 25 1912

Characters (in order of singing)

Najade	BENITA VALENTE	soprano
Dryade	EUNICE ALBERTS	contralto
Echo	CAROLE BOGARD	soprano
Ariadne	CLAIRE WATSON	soprano
Harlekin	JOHN REARDON	baritone
Zerbinetta	BEVERLY SILLS	soprano
Truffaldin	MALCOLM SMITH	bass
Brighella	JOHN FERRANTE	tenor
Scaramuccio	JAMES BILLINGS	tenor
Bacchus	ROBERT NAGY	tenor
M. Jourdain	ANDREW RAEBURN	speaking part

There will be no intermission

A translation of the libretto starts on page 40

Tel. 942-4881 Bangor Daily News, Friday, January 10, 1969 13

Nearly Perfect Cast Delights In 'Ariadne'

By ROBERT H. NEWALL

BOSTON. — One of my imperishable musical experiences will always be the concert performance this week of Strauss's "most modern" work, "Ariadne," revishingly and excitingly sung by a very nearly perfect cast and played by the Boston Symphony, reduced to chamber size, such a group as almost never is found in an opera house.

Despite the reduction — and Strauss was uncommonly fond of using orchestras of heroic proportions, thus out-Wagnering Wagner — Erich Leinsdorf drew out effects from the most quietly suave to the cyclonic intensity that greets Bacchus. Never have I heard Leinsdorf conduct more ingratiatingly or more sympathetically. It was, in short, one of those legendary evenings when musical electricity crackled through Symphony Hall — when all the pieces fell smartly into place.

"Ariadne" is not so profound, perhaps, as "Die Frau ohne Schatten," but like all Strauss' 15 stage works, it has much to say about Woman. On the one side, there is the tortured Ariadne, deserted by Theseus and longing for oblivion. And there is the capricious Zerbinetta, who, if she can't be near the one she loves, loves the one she's near. Ariadne is the ideal Woman; Zerbinetta is fickle and delightfully human. Commenting upon Ariadne's lamentable condition is a trio of three more women: Najade, Dryade and Echo.

Significantly, in the commedia dell'arte sequence (the plot within a plot scheme) Zerbinetta's badinage is chiefly directed toward four men: Harlekin, Truffaldin, Brighella and Scaramuccio.

With his preoccupation with Woman, Strauss wrote his most inspired passages for the female voice. In all of his canon there is no music for men such as we have in that glorious trio that ends "Der Rosenkavalier," Salome's apostrophe, the duet between Arabella and Zenka, the crazed exposulations of Elektra. Here in "Ariadne" there are devilishly difficult coloratura fireworks for Zerbinetta — not to mention the marvelously catapulting phrases of Ariadne herself. Bacchus, of course, is assigned material of a Wagnerian cast, but nowhere is it so completely captivating as the music the composer wrote for his women.

Ironically, Clair Watson, a New Yorker, is far better known in Munich and London than in her native country, but possibly now that she has been heard in Boston, she may be wooed from across the Atlantic more often. Because Strauss so insistently pushes Ariadne's music, Miss Watson ever and again became a little shrill, but for the most part she unleashed floods of buttered tone. But she always regarded the text so that her conception was one of exceptional exaltation and womanly nobility.

Obviously relishing the conquettry of her part, Beverly Sills, with magnificent intonation and awesome technique, made Zerbinetta the right blend of flirtation, femininity and warmth that Strauss must have intended.

For Najade, Dryade and Echo the Misses Benita Valente, Eunice Alberts and Carole Bogard distinguished themselves handsomely. Singing better than ever, Miss Bogard has a light-textured, full-bodied lyric admirably fitted to this music. And Miss Alberts, who sang at the University of Maine a season of two ago in the Verdi Requiem, gave valuable support with that luscious contralto of hers.

Among the men John Reardon was easily the most outstanding as Harlekin. Giving as much hint of action as a concert version will allow, he added zest and piquancy to all his scenes. The voice, robust and nicely grained, was always well-focussed and produced. As Bacchus, Robert Nagy sometimes forced his sizeable tenor to a wobble. It is edged in steel anyway, and a too-aggressive thrust can only upset it and make the sound unpleasant. The other men — John Ferrante, Malcolm Smith, and James Billings — were all entirely adequate.

Designed as a one - act opera, "Ariadne" suffered no contusions ro hemrrhages when presented even in a cut performance like this. Everything was handled with impeccable taste and with a strong regard for the Strauss idiom.

THURSDAY A SERIES

THIRD PROGRAM
Thursday evening January 9 1969 at 8.30

CHARLES WILSON conductor

STRAUSS	Don Juan op. 20
STRAVINSKY	Jeu de cartes (1937)*
intermission
SIBELIUS	Symphony no. 2 in D major op. 43

Allegretto
Tempo andante ma rubato
Vivacissimo – lento e suave
Finale: allegro moderato

B.S.O.: Piston's 75th, Andre Watts local debut

A birthday—composer Walter Piston's 75th—and a debut—pianist Andre Watts—will be observed on the Boston Symphony programs Friday at 2 and Saturday at 8:30. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct.

Piston, who is Walter Naumberg professor of music emeritus at Harvard, will have his Prelude and Allegro for organ and strings played. Berj Zamkochian will be organ soloist.

The young American pianist Andre Watts will close the program with the Franck Symphonic Variations and the E flat major Piano Concerto of Liszt. Watts also will play with the Botson Symphony at New York's Philharmonic Hall later in January.

The orchestra will give two other 8:30 concerts this week. Tuesday, there will be a repeat of the original 1912 Strauss opera "Ariadne auf Naxos," Leinsdorf conducting. Sopranos Claire Watson and Beverly Sills, tenor Robert Nagy and baritone John Reardon are the leading soloists. The program will be televised on Ch. 2.

Thursday, assistant conductor Charles Wilson's program will consist of the Strauss "Don Juan," Stravinsky's "Jeu de cartes" and the Sibelius Symphony No. 2.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905
JAN 5 1969
New England Newsclip

Watts to Play With Symphony

The young American pianist Andre Watts will play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time on Friday and Saturday. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct with Mr. Watts as soloist in both the Concerto in E flat by Franz Liszt and the Symphonic Variations by Cesar Franck.

The program will open with Walter Piston's Prelude and Allegro for Organ and Strings, played to honor the distinguished American composer on his 75th birthday. The Boston Symphony Orchestra's regular organist, Berj Zamkochian, will be organ soloist.

Also on the program is Beethoven's Symphony No. 6, 'The Pastorale.'

Andre Watts, since his debut only a few seasons ago, has become one of the most popular and sought-after of young artists. He now gives an extensive series of recitals annually, appears with major orchestras, and makes records. Mr. Watts will also play with the Boston Symphony in Philharmonic Hall, Lincoln Center, later in January.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give two other concerts in Symphony Hall during the week. On Tuesday Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the third performance of Strauss's "Ariadne auf Naxos" with a cast including Claire Watson, Beverly Sills, Robert Nagy, and John Reardon. This is Strauss's original version of 1912, which Mr. Leinsdorf and the Orchestra are giving its American premiere.

On Thursday Charles Wilson will conduct music of Strauss, Stravinsky, and Sibelius.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436
JAN 5 1969
New England Newsclip

CAMBRIDGE SERIES

THIRD PROGRAM
Tuesday evening January 7 1969 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

RICHARD STRAUSS
ARIADNE AUF NAXOS
(original version of 1912)
opera in one act

libretto by Hugo von Hofmannsthal
first performed in Stuttgart October 25 1912

Characters (in order of singing)

Najade	BENITA VALENTE	soprano
Dryade	EUNICE ALBERTS	contralto
Echo	CAROLE BOGARD	soprano
Ariadne	CLAIRE WATSON	soprano
Harlekin	JOHN REARDON	baritone
Zerbinetta	BEVERLY SILLS	soprano
Truffaldin	MALCOLM SMITH	bass
Brighella	JOHN FERRANTE	tenor
Scaramuccio	JAMES BILLINGS	tenor
Bacchus	ROBERT NAGY	tenor
M. Jourdain	ANDREW RAEBURN	speaking part

There will be no intermission

A translation of the libretto starts on page 40

Nearly Perfect Cast Delights In 'Ariadne'

By ROBERT H. NEWALL

BOSTON — One of my imperishable musical experiences will always be the concert performance this week of Strauss's "most modern" work, "Ariadne," revishingly and excitingly sung by a very nearly perfect cast and played by the Boston Symphony, reduced to chamber size, such a group as almost never is found in an opera house.

Despite the reduction — and Strauss was uncommonly fond of using orchestras of heroic proportions, thus out-Wagnering Wagner — Erich Leinsdorf drew out effects from the most quietly suave to the cyclonic intensity that greets Bacchus. Never have I heard Leinsdorf conduct more ingratiatingly or more sympathetically. It was, in short, one of those legendary evenings when musical electricity crackled through Symphony Hall — when all the pieces fell smartly into place.

"Ariadne" is not so profound, perhaps, as "Die Frau ohne Schatten," but like all Strauss' 15 stage works, it has much to say about Woman. On the one side, there is the tortured Ariadne, deserted by Theseus and longing for oblivion. And there is the capricious Zerbinetta, who, if she can't be near the one she loves, loves the one she's near. Ariadne is the ideal Woman; Zerbinetta is fickle and delightfully human. Commenting upon Ariadne's lamentable condition is a trio of three more women: Najade, Dryade and Echo.

Significantly, in the commedia dell'arte sequence (the plot within a plot scheme) Zerbinetta's badinage is chiefly directed toward four men: Harlekin, Truffaldin, Brighella and Scaramuccio.

With his preoccupation with Woman, Strauss wrote his most inspired passages for the female voice. In all of his canon there is no music for men such as we have in that glorious trio that ends "Der Rosenkavalier," Salome's apostrophe, the duet between Arabella and Zenka, the crazed exposulations of Elektra. Here in "Ariadne" there are devilishly difficult coloratura fireworks for Zerbinetta — not to mention the marvelously catapulting phrases of Ariadne herself. Bacchus, of course, is assigned material of a Wagnerian cast, but nowhere is it so completely captivating as the music the composer wrote for his women.

Ironically, Clair Watson, a New Yorker, is far better known in Munich and London than in her native country, but possibly now that she has been heard in Boston, she may be wooed from across the Atlantic more often. Because Strauss so insistently pushes Ariadne's music, Miss Watson ever and again became a little shrill, but for the most part she unleashed floods of buttered tone. But she always regarded the text so that her conception was one of exceptional exaltation and womanly nobility.

Obviously relishing the conquettry of her part, Beverly Sills, with magnificent intonation and awesome technique, made Zerbinetta the right blend of flirtation, femininity and warmth that Strauss must have intended.

For Najade, Dryade and Echo the Misses Benita Valente, Eunice Alberts and Carole Bogard distinguished themselves handsomely. Singing better than ever, Miss Bogard has a light-textured, full-bodied lyric admirably fitted to this music. And Miss Alberts, who sang at the University of Maine a season of two ago in the Verdi Requiem, gave valuable support with that luscious contralto of hers.

Among the men John Reardon was easily the most outstanding as Harlekin. Giving as much hint of action as a concert version will allow, he added zest and piquancy to all his scenes. The voice, robust and nicely grained, was always well-focussed and produced. As Bacchus, Robert Nagy sometimes forced his sizeable tenor to a wobble. It is edged in steel anyway, and a too-aggressive thrust can only upset it and make the sound unpleasant. The other men — John Ferrante, Malcolm Smith, and James Billings — were all entirely adequate.

Designed as a one-act opera, "Ariadne" suffered no contusions ro hemrrhages when presented even in a cut performance like this. Everything was handled with impeccable taste and with a strong regard for the Strauss idiom.

B.S.O.: Piston's 75th, Andre Watts local debut

A birthday—composer Walter Piston's 75th—and a debut—pianist Andre Watts—will be observed on the Boston Symphony programs Friday at 2 and Saturday at 8:30. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct.

Piston, who is Walter Naumberg professor of music emeritus at Harvard, will have his Prelude and Allegro for organ and strings played. Berj Zamkochian will be organ soloist.

The young American pianist Andre Watts will close the program with the Franck Symphonic Variations and the E flat major Piano Concerto of Liszt. Watts also will play with the Botson Symphony at New York's Philharmonic Hall later in January.

The orchestra will give two other 8:30 concerts this week. Tuesday, there will be a repeat of the original 1912 Strauss opera "Ariadne auf Naxos," Leinsdorf conducting. Sopranos Claire Watson and Beverly Sills, tenor Robert Nagy and baritone John Reardon are the leading soloists. The program will be televised on Ch. 2.

Thursday, assistant conductor Charles Wilson's program will consist of the Strauss "Don Juan," Stravinsky's "Jeu de cartes" and the Sibelius Symphony No. 2.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905
JAN 5 1969
New England Newsclip

Watts to Play With Symphony

The young American pianist Andre Watts will play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time on Friday and Saturday. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct with Mr. Watts as soloist in both the Concerto in E flat by Franz Liszt and the Symphonic Variations by Cesar Franck.

The program will open with Walter Piston's Prelude and Allegro for Organ and Strings, played to honor the distinguished American composer on his 75th birthday. The Boston Symphony Orchestra's regular organist, Berj Zamkochian, will be organ soloist.

Also on the program is Beethoven's Symphony No. 6, 'The Pastorale.'

Andre Watts, since his debut only a few seasons ago, has become one of the most popular and sought-after of young artists. He now gives an extensive series of recitals annually, appears with major orchestras, and makes records. Mr. Watts will also play with the Boston Symphony in Philharmonic Hall, Lincoln Center, later in January.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give two other concerts in Symphony Hall during the week. On Tuesday Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the third performance of Strauss's "Ariadne auf Naxos" with a cast including Claire Watson, Beverly Sills, Robert Nagy, and John Reardon. This is Strauss's original version of 1912, which Mr. Leinsdorf and the Orchestra are giving its American premiere.

On Thursday Charles Wilson will conduct music of Strauss, Stravinsky, and Sibelius.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436
JAN 5 1969
New England Newsclip

27.

THURSDAY A SERIES

THIRD PROGRAM
Thursday evening January 9 1969 at 8.30

CHARLES WILSON conductor

STRAUSS	Don Juan op. 20
STRAVINSKY	Jeu de cartes (1937)*
intermission
SIBELIUS	Symphony no. 2 in D major op. 43 Allegretto Tempo andante ma rubato Vivacissimo – lento e suave Finale: allegro moderato 28.

THIRTEENTH PROGRAM
Friday afternoon January 10 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening January 11 1969 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

PISTON — Prelude and allegro for organ and strings
BERJ ZAMKOCHIAN
in celebration of Walter Piston's 75th birthday

BEETHOVEN — Symphony no. 6 in F op. 68 'The Pastoral'
Awakening of happy feelings on reaching the countryside: allegro ma non troppo
At the brook's edge: andante molto mosso
Festive gathering of the country people: allegro
Thunderstorm: allegro
Shepherd's song — happy and thankful feelings after the storm: allegretto

intermission

FRANCK — Symphonic variations for piano and orchestra
ANDRÉ WATTS

LISZT — Piano concerto no. 1 in E flat
ANDRÉ WATTS

Watts Plays 'Magnificently'

By HARRY NEVILLE
Globe Staff

Pianist Andre Watts was the soloist Friday afternoon with the Boston Symphony in a performance of Liszt's First Concerto so good as to shatter any reserve that might be a part of one's critical pose. He played magnificently, and Liszt's overperformed, much abused war-horse came to life with a freshness that, for most people, it had long ago lost.

This is the work through which, in his debut a few years ago with Leonard Bernstein and the N.Y. Philharmonic, Watts first achieved national attention.

That performance was subsequently issued on record, and it is pleasant to be able to report that Watts' playing has lost none of the fervor it had on that occasion.

His view of the music, however, does seem to have undergone some changes — all improvements over what was, even then, an immensely exciting performance.

Watts has "matured," as we critics are fond of saying, and the change can most readily be seen in his handling of the bravura passages.

Whereas earlier these had assumed almost an independent life of their own, they are now superbly integrated with the more reflective solo passages and with the orchestral accompaniment.

The result is a continuity one had begun to doubt the concerto ever possessed.

Conductor Leinsdorf and his players must also be cited for their part in this genuinely collaborative effort. The orchestral playing was first-rate — attuned to the soloist's requirements in every respect.

Watts' playing of Franck's Symphonic Variations was not quite on the same level. The work is, of course, vastly different from the Liszt concerto, and it may be that Watts' temperament does not yet suit it.

His pianism here was impeccable, but phrasing — particularly in rubato passages — was not always convincing. Tempo transitions also presented some problems.

The afternoon was a good one for Leinsdorf and the orchestra. They gave an excellent account of Beethoven's "Pastorale" Symphony—a reading that sustained interest from beginning to end, which is not an altogether easy or common feat.

The storm of the fourth movement might have been a little stormier, and the brook was jerky in getting started (Why those accents on the third note of the triplets?), but these are decidely minor quibbles. It was a pleasure to hear a performance in which architectural qualities were so much respected, with nearly every nuance evolving from a consideration of its place in the total framework.

At the beginning of the program Berj Zamkochian appeared as soloist in Walter Piston's Prelude and Allegro for organ and strings.

It was the Boston Symphony's 75th birthday tribute to that esteemed composer, who was present

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
JAN 11 1969
New England Newsclip

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

Watts wins acclaim in BSO bow

By Allan Sly

The Boston Symphony was in top form again on the weekend with Erich Leinsdorf in firm control. As a birthday greeting to Walter Piston they opened with his Prelude and Allegro for organ and strings—a warm; eloquent, and later animated discourse featuring Berj Zamkochian as soloist.

The Beethoven Sixth followed, in a highly distinguished performance. The orchestra sounded all-of-a-piece and responsive to Mr. Leinsdorf's fresh conception of the work — fast paced, lithe, nervous, multifaceted, urgent, vital—modern and compelling.

Mirror to youth

After the break André Watts came very much to the fore in the Franck Symphonic Variations and the Liszt E-flat concerto. Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra matched him in virtuosity and élan, catching and throwing the ball back to him with never a fumble.

It was great sport. It was also deeply affecting, as maturity and experience held up as it were a mirror to youthful fire and zest. Liszt and Franck would have loved it. Virtuoso music such as this comes into its own when so presented.

Mr. Watts's shining talent was clearly perceived on Friday in the very opening phrase of the Franck, bearing, as it were, a load of subjective yearning that epitomized modern man's malaise; later to be transformed into joyous affirmation—in this performance, ecstatic jubilation, indeed. Similarly all the familiar turns of phrase in the Liszt breathed a new life, and we surveyed all the chivalry, bravura, tenderness, and exaltation of the romantic age as though for the first time.

Rare moments

Whether the word genius is properly used in describing an artist's performance is debatable; but Mr. Watts comes very close to earning that distinction, on the evidence of these two performances. They are not the whole of music by any means, but while they were the matter in hand one forgot that anything else existed.

Such moments come rarely, and when they do, an audience explodes with acclaim, as it did on this occasion.

Watts Not Ready For His BSO Debut

By GEORGE GELLES, Music Critic

Andre Watts was one of Leonard Bernstein's recent "finds," Janis Ian the other, and it's worth noting that both these young performers have enormous extra-musical considerations in their favor; Miss Ian is misunderstood because she is "Society's Child," pianist Watts is a Negro. Both have talent, undeniably, but Watts was not by any means ready for his Boston Symphony debut, which he made at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon under Erich Leinsdorf's baton.

He has the equipment of many young players: lots of technique and a feeling for how pieces are meant to go. But he needs more than this: a rhythmic sense that will keep pieces from meandering, an ability to evoke the poetry of the music, and a dazzle to make his prodigious technique more than five-finger exercises.

In sensibility he is other than the Romantic virtuoso, and neither Liszt's First Concerto nor Franck's "Symphonic Variations" had the brilliance, the warmth to make it more than half-baked.

Unlike Watts, who fussed with phrases to no purpose, Leinsdorf fussed with the "Pastorale"—Beethoven's Sixth Symphony— with much cunning, adding ritards here and there (the very opening phrase of the first movement, for example, or just before the second theme wah heard); yet the reading wasn't on the whole convincing and never showed the relevanceof these nuances. There was also some notably imprecise work from the violins and some ugly oboe playing.

To end on a happier note;

Walter Piston celebrates his 75th birthday a week from Monday, and to Mark the occasion, Leinsdorf led the composer's "Prelude and allegro for organ and strings", with Berj Zamkochian the soloist.

Written in the early Fourties, the piece has two part,s the first elegiac, recalling both Grieg and Barber, the second a set of variations on a theme.

Though in many respects it clearly passes, the "Prelude" was good to hear, for it represents a huge body of work — that of Piston, Sessions, Berger, Fine, Copland, Schuman and many other American composers —that conductors today leave in almost total and disgraceful neglect.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873
JAN 11 1969
New England Newsclip

ANDRE WATTS, young American pianist, will perform Franck's Symphonic Variations and the Liszt Piano Concerto No. 1 with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony on Friday and Saturday at Symphony Hall.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
JAN 8 1969
New England Newsclip

music...

Watts debut with Symphony

By Steven Shladover

This weekend's Boston Symphony Orchestra program featured the debut with the orchestra of the brilliant young American pianist Andre Watts. Mr. Watts performed the Cesar Franck "Symphonic Variations" and the Liszt First Piano Concerto, with Erich Leinsdorf on the podium. Ironically, the musical highlight of the evening was the orchestra's performance of the Beethoven Symphony No. 6 in F, Op. 68, the 'Pastoral.'

The program opened with Walter Piston's "Prelude and Allegro for Organ and Strings," performed in celebration of the composer's 75th birthday. This short and beautiful piece was very agreeably presented, with special praise deserved by Berj Zamkochian, the organist. He brought some wonderful sounds out of the Symphony Hall organ, an instrument which should be used more frequently in the orchestra's programs.

The Beethoven "Pastoral" Symphony brought the first half of the concert to a close on a very high level. Maestro Leinsdorf's conception of this work represents a strong, straightforward and extremely careful approach. The close attention he paid to instrumental balances led to a lucid performance, which brought the symphony into sharp focus. He received outstanding performances from the first-chair woodwind players, but the horn tone, in the absence of James Stagliano, the first horn player, was not what it should have been.

Although the musical phrases and crescendi and decrescendi were perfectly contoured, all was not rosy in this "Pastoral." The first movement was driven too hard in many places, with an undue emphasis on speed and crispness, at the expense of lyricism. These problems, as well as a tendency towards a metronomic beat plagued the Leinsdorf conception again in the third and fifth movements. The second movement was presented so exquisitely as to outweigh these flaws. There being no reason to hurry in this movement, Leinsdorf settled down and lavished his attention on dynamic balances and the woodwind solos in the score. The bird call near the end for flute, oboe and clarinet was particularly outstanding. The storm sequence of the fourth movement was also brilliantly realized, with dramatic intensity being more fully conveyed than it is in most performances.

Mr. Watts made his first appearance at the keyboard after the intermission for the Franck "Symphonic Variations." It is impossible to evaluate this performance because Leinsdorf caused Watts to start off with an insurmountable handicap: inaudibility. The orchestra was playing considerably louder than is normal for a concerto performance, and this was much too loud in the "Variations," which do not call for the production of a huge piano sound.

The program concluded with the Liszt Piano Concerto No. 1, the work with which Mr. Watts first gained his fame. As a general complaint, it must be noted that the orchestra was again too loud for the piano to be heard to best advantage. This being a virtuoso showpiece, though, Mr. Watts was willing to offer the orchestra more dynamic competition than he did in the Franck. He showed a fine command of virtuoso keyboard technique, although the performance was not without finger-slips. His skillful and expressive handling of the passages played with the orchestra showed that he obviously knows this concerto like the back of his hand. However, he applied much too much rubato in the quiet solo parts. He chose to linger painstakingly over each note, dissecting and analyzing, as well as taking undue liberties with the rhythmic structure of the work. This approach, when juxtaposed with the frantically-paced orchestral tuttis, led to a schizophrenic performance which was not satisfying.

It is possible that Mr. Watts has played this Liszt concerto too frequently and has come to know it too well, with the result that he attaches as much importance to its details as one would normally expect in a Brahms or Beethoven concerto. This piece, not being in a class with those more profound works, this approach does not work well. The details in the Liszt are simply not significant or interesting enough to stand up under this kind of penetrating inspection.

Mr. Watts' interpretation of the Liszt was a disappointment when viewed in the light of his superb recording of the work made several years ago. It seems that his view of the work has evolved to the point where it can at best be called idiosyncratic and at worst, eccentric. Despite this, it must be conceded that the audience loved it and responded more enthusiastically than is customary for the staid Saturday night subscription crowd at Symphony Hall.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150
JAN 13 1969
New England Newsclip

Bright Assurance of Pianist Watts Adds to Symphony

SYMPHONY REVIEW

By McLAREN HARRIS

Yesterday's Symphony audience appeared happy to have back such old friends as Piston, Beethoven, Franck and Liszt. Indeed, they did make up an agreeable program, and not least due to what pianist Andre Watts accomplished with Franck's Symphonic Variations and Liszt's First Piano Concerto.

I must admit to some trepidation whenever I spot the Liszt concerto on an upcoming program, for I half expect it, and my ears, to be pounded to pieces by a soloist who must envision himself as a sort of hero struggling up the slopes of Mt. Everest or rounding the moon and figuratively running his own coat of arms up the pole when his mission is completed.

SERIOUS MUSICIANS are none of this, certainly, and Watts is a most serious young man. And he is anything but a pounder. His technique is one of bright assurance, of agile strength; he is not afraid of romantic language and does not pall before it, but neither does he make any attempt to subdue it. Chords were balanced and linear streams of notes were clearly articulated. There was no leaning on the pedal, no blurring the substance with crashing octaves like machinegun fire; his accuracy is such that there was no need for either.

Liszt's First Concerto was not a test of Watts' sublime powers of interpretation, perhaps, but it does involve a high degree of control, both dynamic and metric. Watts knew where its strengths lie, reserving pure bravura for really climactic moments and not pasting it over the whole picture. Passages in between were refreshingly light and gentle—the notes cleanly touched and fluid in motion. It was the sort of contrast and direction which supports the logic of Liszt's scheme as well as its inner beauties.

The perspective in the Franck was altogether different, as it should be. The piano-orchestra discussion is more intellectual or more introspective than heroic in conflict. Watts was ready and willing to engage the orchestra but again did not overplay his part. There was a hint of impatience on his part approaching the final section, as if he was not satisfied with Erich Leinsdorf's tempo, but on the whole the piano-orchestra relationship was solid and satisfactory.

WE SEEM TO GO through certain cycles as regards interpretation of the Viennese classical symphony. During the era of Toscanini there was dash, even fire, in the quick movements; then for a decade or two came the more placid readings inspired by Bechan, Walter and Furtwaengler. Now the tempos seem to be creeping forward once again. Not that I'm complaining about Leinsdorf's tempos yesterday in Beethoven's "Pastorale" Symphony No. 6; the movements were brightly-paced but short of the point of hurry — save for the headlong coda of the Scherzo, which turned into an anti-climatic blur. Instrumentally it was less than perfection, with the upper and lower strings not always in agreement as to the precise moment of the beat and certain examples of tonal insecurity showing in the woodwinds. It was yet an acceptable, if not totally assured rendition.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
JAN 11 1969
New England Newsclip

28.

THIRTEENTH PROGRAM
Friday afternoon January 10 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening January 11 1969 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

PISTON — Prelude and allegro for organ and strings
BERJ ZAMKOCHIAN
in celebration of Walter Piston's 75th birthday

BEETHOVEN — Symphony no. 6 in F op. 68 'The Pastoral'
Awakening of happy feelings on reaching the countryside: allegro ma non troppo
At the brook's edge: andante molto mosso
Festive gathering of the country people: allegro
Thunderstorm: allegro
Shepherd's song — happy and thankful feelings after the storm: allegretto

intermission

FRANCK — Symphonic variations for piano and orchestra
ANDRÉ WATTS

LISZT — Piano concerto no. 1 in E flat
ANDRÉ WATTS

Watts Plays 'Magnificently'

By HARRY NEVILLE
Globe Staff

Pianist Andre Watts was the soloist Friday afternoon with the Boston Symphony in a performance of Liszt's First Concerto so good as to shatter any reserve that might be a part of one's critical pose. He played magnificently, and Liszt's overperformed, much abused war-horse came to life with a freshness that, for most people, it had long ago lost.

This is the work through which, in his debut a few years ago with Leonard Bernstein and the N.Y. Philharmonic, Watts first achieved national attention.

That performance was subsequently issued on record, and it is pleasant to be able to report that Watts' playing has lost none of the fervor it had on that occasion.

His view of the music, however, does seem to have undergone some changes — all improvements over what was, even then, an immensely exciting performance.

Watts has "matured," as we critics are fond of saying, and the change can most readily be seen in his handling of the bravura passages.

Whereas earlier these had assumed almost an independent life of their own, they are now superbly integrated with the more reflective solo passages and with the orchestral accompaniment.

The result is a continuity one had begun to doubt the concerto ever possessed.

Conductor Leinsdorf and his players must also be cited for their part in this genuinely collaborative effort. The orchestral playing was first-rate — attuned to the soloist's requirements in every respect.

Watts' playing of Franck's Symphonic Variations was not quite on the same level. The work is, of course, vastly different from the Liszt concerto, and it may be that Watts' temperament does not yet suit it.

His pianism here was impeccable, but phrasing — particularly in rubato passages — was not always convincing. Tempo transitions also presented some problems.

The afternoon was a good one for Leinsdorf and the orchestra. They gave an excellent account of Beethoven's "Pastorale" Symphony—a reading that sustained interest from beginning to end, which is not an altogether easy or common feat.

The storm of the fourth movement might have been a little stormier, and the brook was jerky in getting started (Why those accents on the third note of the triplets?), but these are decidely minor quibbles. It was a pleasure to hear a performance in which architectural qualities were so much respected, with nearly every nuance evolving from a consideration of its place in the total framework.

At the beginning of the program Berj Zamkochian appeared as soloist in Walter Piston's Prelude and Allegro for organ and strings.

It was the Boston Symphony's 75th birthday tribute to that esteemed composer, who was present

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

JAN 11 1969 — New England Newsclip

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

Watts wins acclaim in BSO bow

By Allan Sly

The Boston Symphony was in top form again on the weekend with Erich Leinsdorf in firm control. As a birthday greeting to Walter Piston they opened with his Prelude and Allegro for organ and strings—a warm, eloquent, and later animated discourse featuring Berj Zamkochian as soloist.

The Beethoven Sixth followed, in a highly distinguished performance. The orchestra sounded all-of-a-piece and responsive to Mr. Leinsdorf's fresh conception of the work — fast paced, lithe, nervous, multifaceted, urgent, vital—modern and compelling.

Mirror to youth

After the break André Watts came very much to the fore in the Franck Symphonic Variations and the Liszt E-flat concerto. Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra matched him in virtuosity and élan, catching and throwing the ball back to him with never a fumble.

It was great sport. It was also deeply affecting, as maturity and experience held up as it were a mirror to youthful fire and zest. Liszt and Franck would have loved it. Virtuoso music such as this comes into its own when so presented.

Mr. Watts's shining talent was clearly perceived on Friday in the very opening phrase of the Franck, bearing, as it were, a load of subjective yearning that epitomized modern man's malaise, later to be transformed into joyous affirmation—in this performance, ecstatic jubilation, indeed. Similarly all the familiar turns of phrase in the Liszt breathed a new life, and we surveyed all the chivalry, bravura, tenderness, and exaltation of the romantic age as though for the first time.

Rare moments

Whether the word genius is properly used in describing an artist's performance is debatable; but Mr. Watts comes very close to earning that distinction, on the evidence of these two performances. They are not the whole of music by any means, but while they were the matter in hand one forgot that anything else existed.

Such moments come rarely, and when they do, an audience explodes with acclaim, as it did on this occasion.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150

JAN 13 1969 — New England Newsclip

Watts Not Ready For His BSO Debut

By GEORGE GELLES, Music Critic

Andre Watts was one of Leonard Bernstein's recent "finds," Janis Ian the other, and it's worth noting that both these young performers have enormous extra-musical considerations in their favor; Miss Ian is misunderstood because she is "Society's Child," pianist Watts is a Negro. Both have talent, undeniably, but Watts was not by any means ready for his Boston Symphony debut, which he made at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon under Erich Leinsdorf's baton.

He has the equipment of many young players: lots of technique and a feeling for how pieces are meant to go. But he needs more than this: a rhythmic sense that will keep pieces from meandering, an ability to evoke the poetry of the music, and a dazzle to make his prodigious technique more than five-finger exercises.

In sensibiity he is other than the Romantic virtuoso, and neither Liszt's First Concerto nor Franck's "Symphonic Variations" had the brilliance, the warmth to make it more than half-baked.

Unlike Watts, who fussed with phrases to no purpose, Leinsdorf fussed with the "Pastorale"—Beethoven's Sixth Symphony— with much cunning, adding ritards here and there (the very opening phrase of the first movement, for example, or just before the second theme wah heard); yet the reading wasn't on the whole convincing and never showed the relevanceof these nuances. There was also some notably imprecise work from the violins and some ugly oboe playing.

To end on a happier note;

Walter Piston celebrates his 75th birthday a week from Monday, and to Mark the occasion, Leinsdorf led the composer's "Prelude and allegro for organ and strings", with Berj Zamkochian the soloist.

Written in the early Fourties, the piece has two part,s the first elegiac, recalling both Grieg and Barber, the second a set of variations on a theme.

Though in many respects it clearly passes, the "Prelude" was good to hear, for it represents a huge body of work — that of Piston, Sessions, Berger, Fine, Copland, Schuman and many other American composers —that conductors today leave in almost total and disgraceful neglect.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

JAN 11 1969 — New England Newsclip

ANDRE WATTS, young American pianist, will perform Franck's Symphonic Variations and the Liszt Piano Concerto No. 1 with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony on Friday and Saturday at Symphony Hall.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

JAN 8 1969 — New England Newsclip

music...

Watts debut with Symphony

By Steven Shladover

This weekend's Boston Symphony Orchestra program featured the debut with the orchestra of the brilliant young American pianist Andre Watts. Mr. Watts performed the Cesar Franck "Symphonic Variations" and the Liszt First Piano Concerto, with Erich Leinsdorf on the podium. Ironically, the musical highlight of the evening was the orchestra's performance of the Beethoven Symphony No. 6 in F, Op. 68, the 'Pastoral.'

The program opened with Walter Piston's "Prelude and Allegro for Organ and Strings," performed in celebration of the composer's 75th birthday. This short and beautiful piece was very agreeably presented, with special praise deserved by Berj Zamkochian, the organist. He brought some wonderful sounds out of the Symphony Hall organ, an instrument which should be used more frequently in the orchestra's programs.

The Beethoven "Pastoral" Symphony brought the first half of the concert to a close on a very high level. Maestro Leinsdorf's conception of this work represents a strong, straightforward and extremely careful approach. The close attention he paid to instrumental balances led to a lucid performance, which brought the symphony into sharp focus. He received outstanding performances from the first-chair woodwind players, but the horn tone, in the absence of James Stagliano, the first horn player, was not what it should have been.

Although the musical phrases and crescendi and decrescendi were perfectly contoured, all was not rosy in this "Pastoral." The first movement was driven too hard in many places, with an undue emphasis on speed and crispness, at the expense of lyricism. These problems, as well as a tendency towards a metronomic beat plagued the Leinsdorf conception again in the third and fifth movements. The second movement was driven too hard in many places, with an undue emphasis on speed and crispness, at the expense of lyricism. These problems, as well as a tendency towards a metronomic beat plagued the Leinsdorf conception again in the third and fifth movements. The second movement was presented so exquisitely as to outweigh these flaws. There being no reason to hurry in this movement, Leinsdorf settled down and lavished his attention on dynamic balances and the woodwind solos in the score. The bird call near the end for flute, oboe and clarinet was particularly outstanding. The storm sequence of the fourth movement was also brilliantly realized, with dramatic intensity being more fully conveyed than it is in most performances.

Mr. Watts made his first appearance at the keyboard after the intermission for the Franck "Symphonic Variations." It is impossible to evaluate this performance because Leinsdorf caused Watts to start off with an insurmountable handicap: inaudibility. The orchestra was playing considerably louder than is normal for a concerto performance, and this was much too loud in the "Variations," which do not call for the production of a huge piano sound.

The program concluded with the Liszt Piano Concerto No. 1, the work with which Mr. Watts first gained his fame. As a general complaint, it must be noted that the orchestra was again too loud for the piano to be heard to best advantage. This being a virtuoso showpiece, though, Mr. Watts was willing to offer the orchestra more dynamic competition than he did in the Franck. He showed a fine command of virtuoso keyboard technique, although the performance was not without finger-slips. His skillful and expressive handling of the passages played with the orchestra showed that he obviously knows this concerto like the back of his hand. However, he applied much too much rubato in the quiet solo parts. He chose to linger painstakingly over each note, dissecting and analyzing, as well as taking undue liberties with the rhythmic structure of the work. This approach, when juxtaposed with the frantically-paced orchestral tuttis, led to a schizophrenic performance which was not satisfying.

It is possible that Mr. Watts has played this Liszt concerto too frequently and has come to know it too well, with the result that he attaches as much importance to its details as one would normally expect in a Brahms or Beethoven concerto. This piece, not being in a class with those more profound works, this approach does not work well. The details in the Liszt are simply not significant or interesting enough to stand up under this kind of penetrating inspection.

Mr. Watts' interpretation of the Liszt was a disappointment when viewed in the light of his superb recording of the work made several years ago. It seems that his view of the work has evolved to the point where it can at best be called idiosyncratic and at worst, eccentric. Despite this, it must be conceded that the audience loved it and responded more enthusiastically than is customary for the staid Saturday night subscription crowd at Symphony Hall.

Bright Assurance of Pianist Watts Adds to Symphony

By McLAREN HARRIS

SYMPHONY REVIEW

Yesterday's Symphony audience appeared happy to have back such old friends as Piston, Beethoven, Franck and Liszt. Indeed, they did make up an agreeable program, and not least due to what pianist Andre Watts accomplished with Franck's Symphonic Variations and Liszt's First Piano Concerto.

I must admit to some trepidation whenever I spot the Liszt concerto on an upcoming program, for I half expect it, and my ears, to be pounded to pieces by a soloist who must envision himself as a sort of hero struggling up the slopes of Mt. Everest or rounding the moon and figuratively running his own coat of arms up the pole when his mission is completed.

SERIOUS MUSICIANS are none of this, certainly, and Watts is a most serious young man. And he is anything but a pounder. His technique is one of bright assurance, of agile strength; he is not afraid of romantic language and does not pall before it, but neither does he make any attempt to subdue it. Chords were balanced and linear streams of notes were clearly articulated. There was no leaning on the pedal, no blurring the substance with crashing octaves like machinegun fire; his accuracy is such that there was no need for either.

Liszt's First Concerto was not a test of Watts' sublime powers of interpretation, perhaps, but it does involve a high degree of control, both dynamic and metric. Watts knew where its strengths lie, reserving pure bravura for really climactic moments and not pasting it over the whole picture. Passages in between were refreshingly light and gentle—the notes cleanly touched and fluid in motion. It was the sort of contrast and direction which supports the logic of Liszt's scheme as well as its inner beauties.

The perspective in the Franck was altogether different, as it should be. The piano-orchestra discussion is more intellectual or more introspective than heroic in conflict. Watts was ready and willing to engage the orchestra but again did not overplay his part. There was a hint of impatience on his part approaching the final section, as if he was not satisfied with Erich Leinsdorf's tempo, but on the whole the piano-orchestra relationship was solid and satisfactory.

WE SEEM TO GO through certain cycles as regards interpretation of the Viennese classical symphony. During the era of Toscanini there was dash, even fire, in the quick movements; then for a decade or two came the more placid readings inspired by Bechan, Walter and Furtwaengler. Now the tempos seem to be creeping forward once again. Not that I'm complaining about Leinsdorf's tempos yesterday in Beethoven's "Pastorale" Symphony No. 6; the movements were brightly-paced but short of the point of hurry — save for the headlong coda of the Scherzo, which turned into an anti-climatic blur. Instrumentally it was less than perfection, with the upper and lower strings not always in agreement as to the precise moment of the beat and certain examples of tonal insecurity showing in the woodwinds. It was yet an acceptable, if not totally assured rendition.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

JAN 11 1969 — New England Newsclip

TUESDAY B SERIES

FOURTH PROGRAM
Tuesday evening January 14 1969 at 7.30

CHARLES WILSON conductor

STRAUSS — Don Juan op. 20

STRAVINSKY — Jeu de cartes (1937)*

intermission

SIBELIUS — Symphony no. 2 in D major op. 43
Allegretto
Tempo andante ma rubato
Vivacissimo – lento e suave
Finale: allegro moderato

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 8,450
JAN 2 1969 New England Newsclip

CITIZEN ITEM
ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 7,600
JAN 2 1969 New England Newsclip

BSO in FM Stereo

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's associate conductor Charles Wilson directs the orchestra on Tuesday, January 14 at 7:30 p.m. in a concert broadcast by WGBH-FM live and in stereo.

The program opens with Richard Strauss' tone poem "Don Juan", followed by Stravinsky's "Jeu de cartes". After intermission the Symphony Hall concert concludes with the Symphony No. 2 in D, Op. 43 by Jean Sibelius.

A Note on Conductor Charles Wilson

Charles Wilson, the assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, who directed the group in last Tuesday's concert, is a young man of promise although he has not as yet achieved full control of his musicians and of his interpretations. I know from hearing his work in the past that he conducts Sibelius with clarity, vigor, and musicianly understanding —and he continued these admirable qualities on Tuesday with a splendid performance of Sibelius' "Symphony No. 2."

In Richard Strauss' great tone poem, however, "Don Juan," Mr. Wilson's reading lacked fire and passion, was sometimes fuzzy in phrasing, and did not always build well to emotional climaxes. Nevertheless, Mr. Wilson is gaining valuable experience from his occasional conducting duties with the orchestra; it takes time, patience, and considerable trial and error to make a complete conductor.

SUNDAY STANDARD TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 58,446
JAN 19 1969 New England Newsclip

Dias Review

Wilson Leads Boston Symphony

Charles Wilson, the youthful assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was in charge of musical matters last night in Symphony Hall for the fourth program in the current Tuesday "B" Series. For the concert Mr. Wilson chose Richard Strauss' popular tone poem, "Don Juan"; Stravinsky's music for the 1937 ballet, "Jeu de Cartes," and Sibelius' "Symphony No. 2 in D Major, Opus 43."

I have heard more thrilling performances of "Don Juan" than Mr. Wilson and the orchestra gave us last night. There is glorious music in this Strauss work, some lovely themes, and a good deal of fire and passion. Yet, somehow or other, Mr. Wilson's reading seemed rather tame, and although Ralph Gomberg performed the famous oboe solo in fine style, the over-all result was lacking in clarity of phrasing and in rising to emotional climaxes.

As for the Stravinsky "Jeu de Cartes," it contains some charming though perhaps inconsequential music — a sprightly little waltz, a couple of lively marches, some appealingly grotesque dances, and some echoes of various composers ranging from Beethoven to Rossini, Ravel, and Richard Strauss. It is an easily assimilated work, and Mr. Wilson and his ensemble played it with proper gaiety and lightness of touch.

Unquestionably, the best performance of the concert and the best reading was the Sibelius. I have heard Mr. Wilson conduct Sibelius before, and he seems to have an understanding of and an affinity for the Finnish composer.

The symphony itself is a sort of transitional work — harking back to the classical style but also giving evidence (especially in its writing for the woodwinds) of things to come in the later symphonies. It is occasionally long-winded, but it has much of interest, notably the remarkable Finale which offers some marvelous melody and a conclusion that at its best can almost lift one from his seat. Both Mr. Wilson and the orchestra did nobly by the work and consequently rescued the concert from the doldrums.

The next program of the series will be performed on February 11, with Pierre Boulez as guest conductor.

STANDARD-TIMES (e)
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 68,850
JAN 15 1969 New England Newsclip

Discology

Messiaen in review

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

Some of the Boston Symphony subscribers who will hear Georges Pretre conduct Olivier Messiaen's "Chronochromie" next weekend will remember the premiere of the "Turangalila" Symphony, which Leonard Bernstein conducted in December 1949. "Turangalila" is largely forgotten, but Messiaen, whose name was hardly known 20 years ago except perhaps among organists and a few professionals aware of the European avant-garde, has, through his activities as composer, theorist and teacher (of Boulez and Stockhausen, among others), emerged as one of the most influential figures in post-war music.

If we take the records of his music that have appeared recently in chronological order of composition, we come first to the 1935 set of nine organ pieces, "La Nativite du Seigneur," recorded in Westminster Abbey by Simon Preston (Argo). In a work that is characteristically informed by imaginative symbolism and a superb sense of instrumental possibilities, Messiaen rather uncertainly treads the line between fragrant mysticism and corn.

In 1940 Messiaen was a prisoner in Satlag VIII-A near Goerlitz, Silesia, and by then, when he wrote the "Quartet for the End of Time," whose title alludes to Chapter 10 of the Apocalypse, he had gone a long way toward finding a language of his own. At its best, this quartet for violin, clarinet, cello, and piano, whose eight movements take about 50 minutes, contains things good as the "Crystal Liturgy" with its contrast between the very present clarinet and the distant violin figurations, or the "Dance of Fury," full of rhythmic momentum. Some of it is rather obvious and in a style blatantly meant to be recognized as "religious," though some of these movement are effective, too, like the Isolde-and-the-Swan cello solo called "Laud to the Eternity of Jesus." There is a strong sense of personality, and the Quartet, which gets an impressive performance under Messiaen's supervision, is worth exploring (Music Guild).

"Turangalila," which gets a brilliantly effective performance by Seiji Ozawa and the Toronto Symphony (RCA), has its moments, too: the fifth of its ten love-celebrating movements, "The Joy of the Stars' Blood," is good "West Side Story;" "The Garden of Love's Sleep" is soothing, lush Massenet; the penultimate "Turangalila 3" is a strong and original piece in which a concertante style is carried to a state of extraordinary density. Altogether, though, I have little hope for the 75 hysterical, self-indulgent, over-written minutes of "Turangalila." The fourth side of the album has Takemitsu's "November Steps." The 20 minutes of atmosphere are rather much, but there are arresting details along the way, and the subtle, breathtakingly skillful playing of the two Oriental instruments, the biwa (something like a large lute) and the shakuhachi (an end-blown bamboo flute) is entrancing. No flutist should miss this.

"Cinq Rechants" (1948), five pieces for 12 solo voices on texts of Messiaen's own in a mixture of French and a made up Sanskrit-like language, are a postcript to "Turangalila," with enforced economy. It is imaginative, sometimes obvious in details, and it is included on an interesting record by the John Alldis Choir, who also sing four Bruckner motets, Debussy's charming part songs on verse by Charles d'Orleans, and Schoenberg's "Friede auf Erden." Texts are given, but no translations (Argo).

A record I recommend more than any of these is one on which Boulez conducts excellent performances of Messiaen's "Colors of the Celestial City" (1963) and "Et Exspecto Resurrectionem Mortuorum" (1964) (CBS). "Colors" strikes me as a commplace piece of splashy music, fun as noise, but only intermittently interesting. "Et Exspecto" is bigger and stronger. It consists of five meditations on biblical texts, scored for a large ensemble of woodwind, brass, and metallic percussion. Messiaen's mastery of theatrical gesture is compelling: the placing of explosions and of silences, the massive walls of sound, the juxtaposition of static postures with sudden nervous flurries of bird chatter, is imagined with keen sense for effect. No doubt, "Et Exspecto," like most of Messiaen's work, is more powerful as theater than as dialetic, and the sonority is more intersting than the substance. Still, something about his originality and a certain magnificense to his simplicity is impressive, and "Et Exspecto" makes it statement with immense conviction.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905
JAN 19 1969 New England Newsclip

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000
JAN 2 1969 New England Newsclip

BSO IN STEREO

Boston Symphony Orchestra associate conductor Charles Wilson directs the orchestra on Tuesday, Jan. 14 at 7:30 p.m. in a concert broadcast by WGBH-FM live and in stereo. Program includes Richard Strauss "Don Juan", Stravinsky's "Jeu de cartes" and Sibelius' Symphony No. 2 in D.

TUESDAY A SERIES

FIFTH PROGRAM
Tuesday evening January 21 1969 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

PISTON — Prelude and allegro for organ and strings
BERJ ZAMKOCHIAN
in celebration of Walter Piston's 75th birthday

SCHARWENKA — Piano concerto no. 1 in B flat minor op. 32
Allegro patetico – adagio – allegro animato
Scherzo: allegro assai
Allegro non tanto
EARL WILD

intermission

PROKOFIEV — Scenes from 'Romeo and Juliet' op. 64*

PART ONE
Introduction
Juliet, the young girl
Romeo, Mercutio and Benvolio masked
Dance of the knights
Gavotte of the departing guests
Romeo
Love dance
Dance for five couples at the festival

PART TWO
Duel and death of Tybalt
Interlude
Juliet at home
Morning serenade
Dance of the young girls with the lilies
Funeral for Juliet
Death of Juliet

Conductor, Pianist on WAMC-FM

American pianist Earl Wild and French conductor Georges Pretre will join the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week for two concerts to be broadcast live on WAMC-FM (90.3 mc.).

Tomorrow at 8:30 p.m. Wild will be soloist with the orchestra in a concert heard from Symphony Hall in Boston. Conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, the program opens with Prelude and Allegro for Organ and Strings by Piston, followed by Scharwenka's Piano Concerto in B flat minor, Op. 32, with Wild as soloist. After intermission will come scenes from Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet."

On Friday at 2 p.m., Georges Pretre will be guest conductor in another Boston Symphony concert, also broadcast live. For this program Pretre has chosen Overture to Lalo's opera "Le Roi d'Ys," Symphony No. 5 by Sibelius, Chronochromie by Messiaen and Ravel's La Valse.

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 54,006
JAN 20 1969

BSO on WGBH-FM

Pianist Earl Wilde and French conductor Georges Pretre will join the Boston Symphony Orchestra next week for three concerts to be broadcast live on WGBH Radio (89.7 FM).

On Tuesday, Jan. 21, 8:30 p.m., pianist Wilde will be soloist with the orchestra in a concert heard direct from Symphony Hall in stereo. Conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, program opens with Prelude and Allegro for Organ and Strings by Piston, followed by Scharwenka's Piano Concerto in B flat minor Op. 32 with Mr. Wilde as soloist. After intermission will come scenes from Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet".

On Friday, Jan. 24 at 2 p.m., Georges Pretre will be guest conductor with the Boston Symphony in another concert, also broadcast live and in stereo by WGBH-FM. Program includes Overture to Lalo's opera "Le Roi d'Ys", Symphony No. 5 by Sibelius, Chronochromie by Messian and Ravel's La Valse. Concert will be repeated Saturday, Jan. 25 at 8:30 p.m. and WGBH will broadcast it live.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000
JAN 9 1969 New England Newsclip

TUESDAY B SERIES

FOURTH PROGRAM
Tuesday evening January 14 1969 at 7.30

CHARLES WILSON conductor

STRAUSS — Don Juan op. 20

STRAVINSKY — Jeu de cartes (1937)*

intermission

SIBELIUS — Symphony no. 2 in D major op. 43
Allegretto
Tempo andante ma rubato
Vivacissimo – lento e suave
Finale: allegro moderato

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 8,450

JAN 2 1969 — New England Newsclip

CITIZEN ITEM
ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 7,600

JAN 2 1969 — New England Newsclip

BSO in FM Stereo

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's associate conductor Charles Wilson directs the orchestra on Tuesday, January 14 at 7:30 p.m. in a concert broadcast by WGBH-FM live and in stereo.

The program opens with Richard Strauss' tone poem "Don Juan", followed by Stravinsky's "Jeu de cartes". After intermission the Symphony Hall concert concludes with the Symphony No. 2 in D, Op. 43 by Jean Sibelius.

A Note on Conductor Charles Wilson

Charles Wilson, the assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, who directed the group in last Tuesday's concert, is a young man of promise although he has not as yet achieved full control of his musicians and of his interpretations. I know from hearing his work in the past that he conducts Sibelius with clarity, vigor, and musicianly understanding —and he continued these admirable qualities on Tuesday with a splendid performance of Sibelius' "Symphony No. 2."

In Richard Strauss' great tone poem, however, "Don Juan," Mr. Wilson's reading lacked fire and passion, was sometimes fuzzy in phrasing, and did not always build well to emotional climaxes. Nevertheless, Mr. Wilson is gaining valuable experience from his occasional conducting duties with the orchestra; it takes time, patience, and considerable trial and error to make a complete conductor.

SUNDAY STANDARD TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 58,446

JAN 19 1969 — New England Newsclip

Dias Review

Wilson Leads Boston Symphony

Charles Wilson, the youthful assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was in charge of musical matters last night in Symphony Hall for the fourth program in the current Tuesday "B" Series. For the concert Mr. Wilson chose Richard Strauss' popular tone poem, "Don Juan"; Stravinsky's music for the 1937 ballet, "Jeu de Cartes," and Sibelius' "Symphony No. 2 in D Major, Opus 43."

I have heard more thrilling performances of "Don Juan" than Mr. Wilson and the orchestra gave us last night. There is glorious music in this Strauss work, some lovely themes, and a good deal of fire and passion. Yet, somehow or other, Mr. Wilson's reading seemed rather tame, and although Ralph Gomberg performed the famous oboe solo in fine style, the over-all result was lacking in clarity of phrasing and in rising to emotional climaxes.

As for the Stravinsky "Jeu de Cartes," it contains some charming though perhaps inconsequential music — a sprightly little waltz, a couple of lively marches, some appealingly grotesque dances, and some echoes of various composers ranging from Beethoven to Rossini, Ravel, and Richard Strauss. It is an easily assimilated work, and Mr. Wilson and his ensemble played it with proper gaiety and lightness of touch.

Unquestionably, the best performance of the concert and the best reading was the Sibelius. I have heard Mr. Wilson conduct Sibelius before, and he seems to have an understanding of and an affinity for the Finnish composer.

The symphony itself is a sort of transitional work — harking back to the classical style but also giving evidence (especially in its writing for the woodwinds) of things to come in the later symphonies. It is occasionally long-winded, but it has much of interest, notably the remarkable Finale which offers some marvelous melody and a conclusion that at its best can almost lift one from his seat. Both Mr. Wilson and the orchestra did nobly by the work and consequently rescued the concert from the doldrums.

The next program of the series will be performed on February 11, with Pierre Boulez as guest conductor.

STANDARD-TIMES (e)
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 68,850

JAN 15 1969 — New England Newsclip

Discology

Messiaen in review

By MICHAEL STEINBERG

Some of the Boston Symphony subscribers who will hear Georges Pretre conduct Olivier Messiaen's "Chronochromie" next weekend will remember the premiere of the "Turangalila" Symphony, which Leonard Bernstein conducted in December 1949. "Turangalila" is largely forgotten, but Messiaen, whose name was hardly known 20 years ago except perhaps among organists and a few professionals aware of the European avant-garde, has, through his activities as composer, theorist and teacher (of Boulez and Stockhausen, among others), emerged as one of the most influential figures in post-war music.

If we take the records of his music that have appeared recently in chronological order of composition, we come first to the 1935 set of nine organ pieces, "La Nativite du Seigneur," recorded in Westminster Abbey by Simon Preston (Argo). In a work that is characteristically informed by imaginative symbolism and a superb sense of instrumental possibilities, Messiaen rather uncertainly treads the line between fragrant mysticism and corn.

In 1940 Messiaen was a prisoner in Satlag VIII-A near Goerlitz, Silesia, and by then, when he wrote the "Quartet for the End of Time," whose title alludes to Chapter 10 of the Apocalypse, he had gone a long way toward finding a language of his own. At its best, this quartet for violin, clarinet, cello, and piano, whose eight movements take about 50 minutes, contains things good as the "Crystal Liturgy" with its contrast between the very present clarinet and the distant violin figurations, or the "Dance of Fury," full of rhythmic momentum. Some of it is rather obvious and in a style blatantly meant to be recognized as "religious," though some of these movement are effective, too, like the Isolde-and-the-Swan cello solo called "Laud to the Eternity of Jesus." There is a strong sense of personality, and the Quartet, which gets an impressive performance under Messiaen's supervision, is worth exploring (Music Guild).

"Turangalila," which gets a brilliantly effective performance by Seiji Ozawa and the Toronto Symphony (RCA), has its moments, too: the fifth of its ten love-celebrating movements, "The Joy of the Stars' Blood," is good "West Side Story;" "The Garden of Love's Sleep" is soothing, lush Massenet; the penultimate "Turangalila 3" is a strong and original piece in which a concertante style is carried to a state of extraordinary density. Altogether, though, I have little hope for the 75 hysterical, self-indulgent, over-written minutes of "Turangalila." The fourth side of the album has Takemitsu's "November Steps." The 20 minutes of atmosphere are rather much, but there are arresting details along the way, and the subtle, breathtakingly skillful playing of the two Oriental instruments, the biwa (something like a large lute) and the shakuhachi (an end-blown bamboo flute) is entrancing. No flutist should miss this.

"Cinq Rechants" (1948), five pieces for 12 solo voices on texts of Messiaen's own in a mixture of French and a made up Sanskrit-like language, are a postcript to "Turangalila," with enforced economy. It is imaginative, sometimes obvious in details, and it is included on an interesting record by the John Alldis Choir, who also sing four Bruckner motets, Debussy's charming part songs on verse by Charles d'Orleans, and Schoenberg's "Friede auf Erden." Texts are given, but no translations (Argo).

A record I recommend more than any of these is one on which Boulez conducts excellent performances of Messiaen's "Colors of the Celestial City" (1963) and "Et Exspecto Resurrectionem Mortuorum" (1964) (CBS). "Colors" strikes me as a commplace piece of splashy music, fun as noise, but only intermittently interesting. "Et Exspecto" is bigger and stronger. It consists of five meditations on biblical texts, scored for a large ensemble of woodwind, brass, and metallic percussion. Messiaen's mastery of theatrical gesture is compelling: the placing of explosions and of silences, the massive walls of sound, the juxtaposition of static postures with sudden nervous flurries of bird chatter, is imagined with keen sense for effect. No doubt, "Et Exspecto," like most of Messiaen's work, is more powerful as theater than as dialetic, and the sonority is more intersting than the substance. Still, something about his originality and a certain magnificense to his simplicity is impressive, and "Et Exspecto" makes it statement with immense conviction.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905

JAN 19 1969 — New England Newsclip

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

JAN 2 1969 — New England Newsclip

BSO IN STEREO

Boston Symphony Orchestra associate conductor Charles Wilson directs the orchestra on Tuesday, Jan. 14 at 7:30 p.m. in a concert broadcast by WGBH-FM live and in stereo. Program includes Richard Strauss "Don Juan", Stravinsky's "Jeu de cartes" and Sibelius' Symphony No. 2 in D.

29.

TUESDAY A SERIES

FIFTH PROGRAM
Tuesday evening January 21 1969 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

PISTON — Prelude and allegro for organ and strings
BERJ ZAMKOCHIAN
in celebration of Walter Piston's 75th birthday

SCHARWENKA — Piano concerto no. 1 in B flat minor op. 32
Allegro patetico – adagio – allegro animato
Scherzo: allegro assai
Allegro non tanto
EARL WILD

intermission

PROKOFIEV — Scenes from 'Romeo and Juliet' op. 64*

PART ONE
Introduction
Juliet, the young girl
Romeo, Mercutio and Benvolio masked
Dance of the knights
Gavotte of the departing guests
Romeo
Love dance
Dance for five couples at the festival

PART TWO
Duel and death of Tybalt
Interlude
Juliet at home
Morning serenade
Dance of the young girls with the lilies
Funeral for Juliet
Death of Juliet

Conductor, Pianist on WAMC-FM

American pianist Earl Wild and French conductor Georges Pretre will join the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week for two concerts to be broadcast live on WAMC-FM (90.3 mc.).

Tomorrow at 8:30 p.m. Wild will be soloist with the orchestra in a concert heard from Symphony Hall in Boston. Conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, the program opens with Prelude and Allegro for Organ and Strings by Piston, followed by Scharwenka's Piano Concerto in B flat minor, Op. 32, with Wild as soloist. After intermission will come scenes from Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet."

On Friday at 2 p.m., Georges Pretre will be guest conductor in another Boston Symphony concert, also broadcast live. For this program Pretre has chosen Overture to Lalo's opera "Le Roi d'Ys," Symphony No. 5 by Sibelius, Chronochromie by Messiaen and Ravel's La Valse.

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 54,006

JAN 20 1969

BSO on WGBH-FM

Pianist Earl Wilde and French conductor Georges Pretre will join the Boston Symphony Orchestra next week for three concerts to be broadcast live on WGBH Radio (89.7 FM).

On Tuesday, Jan. 21, 8:30 p.m., pianist Wilde will be soloist with the orchestra in a concert heard direct from Symphony Hall in stereo. Conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, program opens with Prelude and Allegro for Organ and Strings by Piston, followed by Scharwenka's Piano Concerto in B flat minor Op. 32 with Mr. Wilde as soloist. After intermission will come scenes from Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet".

On Friday, Jan. 24 at 2 p.m., Georges Pretre will be guest conductor with the Boston Symphony in another concert, also broadcast live and in stereo by WGBH-FM. Program includes Overture to Lalo's opera "Le Roi d'Ys", Symphony No. 5 by Sibelius, Chronochromie by Messian and Ravel's La Valse. Concert will be repeated Saturday, Jan. 25 at 8:30 p.m. and WGBH will broadcast it live.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

JAN 9 1969 — New England Newsclip

30.

Georges Pretre

. . . will appear as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for two weeks beginning tonight in Providence, R.I., and in Boston on Friday.

BSO: meeting Prêtre's every musical whim

By Allan Sly

The Boston Symphony's guest conductor last week and this, George Georges Prêtre, can now add Boston to his growing collection of cities visited and vanquished, for who could resist such a torrential talent and such a Vulcan of virtuosity? He inflames every phrase, supercharges every dynamic. Compared to his Ravel's La Valse the burning of Rome would seem just a tidy little blaze; Lalo's "Le roi d'Ys" overture mirrored utter catastrophe; the Sibelius Fifth Symphony stormed the very citadel of existence; the Messiaen Chronochromie will make the millennium, when it comes, seem like anticlimax.

How does he achieve these results? The orchestra played louder, and softer, than one has ever heard it; faster, and slower; more vehemently, and more subjectively. To a man they met his every whim, evidently reading his face at times, or the shrug of a shoulder, while the gallery read the gyrations of his torso or even the play of his back muscles. Such showmanship startles but when it occurs, it keeps our musical establishment in public favor and therefore viable; complacency and hypocrisy fly out the window and the miracle of renewal sweeps like a new broom.

Not yet knowing how Mr. Prêtre would interpret the classics, we do know him as a podium wizard, and will never again be fooled by the incongruity of his cool entrance, quiet as a diplomat, neat as a banker, fit as a quarterback. Conducting all but the Messiaen from memory, he offered himself to the occasion as in a spectator sport, but make no mistake, the orchestra recognizes in him a mastery of the musical language that far outstrips any pedestrian, verbal description.

Messiaen has emerged as one of today's most powerful and original composers. It was a great privilege for Boston to hear the recent (1960) Chronochromie; Klaus Roy's fine thesis on it, in a more-than-usually challenging program book, need not deter one from just reveling in some of the most intriguing sounds ever made by human agency. Whoever dreamed of hearing a Lesser Whitethroat and the Montezuma Oropendola paced by a Balinese gamelan in the Back Bay? I confess to have missed the famous semicolon in the Epode, but I am confident Mr. Prêtre observed it faithfully.

Next week he will honor the memory of Berlioz by conducting the Symphonie Fantastique, preceded by Bizet's Symphony in C.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150

JAN 23 1969

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150

JAN ~~DEC~~ 27 1968

FOURTEENTH PROGRAM
Friday afternoon January 24 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening January 25 1969 at 8.30

GEORGES PRÊTRE conductor

LALO	Overture to 'Le roi d'Ys'
SIBELIUS	Symphony no. 5 in E flat op. 82 Tempo molto moderato – allegro moderato, ma poco a poco stretto Andante mosso, quasi allegretto Allegro molto
intermission
MESSIAEN	'Chronochromie' for large orchestra (1960) Introduction – strophe 1 – antistrophe 1 – strophe 2 – antistrophe 2 – épôde – coda first performance in Boston
RAVEL	'La Valse' — choreographic poem*

Pretre Conducts Symphony

Messiaen Work Is Stunning

By McLAREN HARRIS

Sibelius is the only non-French composer among the six represented on the two Symphony programs which Georges Pretre conducts this week and next, but the most unusual element of either program has to be "Chronochromie," a sort of large orchestral aviary composed in 1960 by Oliver Messiaen.

The gulf between "Chronochromie" and Sibelius' Symphony No. 5 is more rightfully described as a chasm, but yesterday's program—in plan, anyway—was a balanced affair, the Sibelius preceded by Edouard Lalo's overture to "Le roi d'Ys" in the first half and the Messiaen followed by Ravel's "La Valse" to conclude.

IN VIEW OF its relative neglect the Lalo overture turned out surprisingly bright in spirit and melody (Charles Munch conducted it here in 1950). Its lyric sections and contrasting, effectively-orchestrated fanfares are opera-related (one cannot say opera-based, for the overture was composed 12 years before the opera!), and notwithstanding the short career of the opera itself (one season, 1922, at the Met) the overture makes an attractive opener.

Under Pretre the playing was clear, detailed and, in line with the popular notion of Gallic temperament, dynamically mercuric. The pianissimos were indeed hushed, the fortissimos overpowering, and such was his style for the remainder of the afternoon.

The Sibelius Fifth Symphony in E flat, however, does not lend itself to black-and-white contrasts easily, rather unfolding in waves of melodic fragments, episodic material, gradual crescendos of volume and pyramids of orchestral color. But although not abruptly juxtaposed, the great dynamic reaches were there: the energy (in volume as well as kinetic) of the first movement's conclusion as opposed to the whisper of its beginning, the high-peaked dynamic arch of the second movement and the climax of the finale.

THE SCORE'S lyricism appeared well-conceived in pace, but did not emerge with the liquid motion it needs; some of the onus lies with the orchestral playing, not always quite on center in attack or coordination—especially those concluding tutti chords which Pretre attempted to prolong slightly and which ended up splattering on the pavement, as it were. The final indignity came from a violinist who fell in the hole between the last two chords (for an orchestral player, that kind of offense is about the best ticket I can conceive for a trip to Coventry).

I have no comparative basis for judging Messiaen's "Chronochromie," but it would appear to thrive on the brand of dynamism Pretre affords. This seven-sectioned work, however, is a bit beyond accurate verbal description, to say nothing of judgment. It is at once the most complex and simple of creations; even an untrained ear will hear what it is meant to hear, no more and no less, and what makes the work so apparently inscrutable is the account of Messiaen's methods of its composition.

He has taken 32 gradations of note duration, arranged them in selected orders to sound as random as possible and assigned them to instruments of well-defined tone color, notably woodwind and definite-pitch percussion. They are played in melodic patterns representing many specific bird-calls (and Messiaen can identify every one of them, from the French Icterine Warbler to the Montezuma Oropendola). The rhythmic orders—permutations, Messiaen calls them—are played separately, fragmented or superimposed on each other.

IN OTHER WORDS, he has used strict methods of organization to achieve an opposite result: a sound apparently as totally removed from organization as are the sounds of nature, and that is exactly his intent. These movements symbolize, quite unashamedly, bird-choruses. A rather chaotic Introduction and similar Coda enclose definite-form pairs of "Strophe" and "Antistrophe" and an "Epode" of 18 distinct string parts reminiscent of 4 a.m. on a summer morning. We are not expected to perceive its organization or even separate bird-calls, but simply to absorb its aural sensations and interpretation of nature. It is a staggeringly difficult work to perform and I am tempted to say, perhaps without knowing any better, that the Symphony's job was stunningly virtuosic. "Chronochromie" must be heard to be appreciated.

Pretre strived for more dynamic effect in the concluding "La Valse" and the result was a bit violent — from opening nothingness to a final tremendous clatter which threatened to — but did not — break its orchestral bonds. Its surrealism was, if you will, too real.

Next week Georges Pretre continues as guest conductor with Bizet's Symphony in C major and Berlioz' Symphonie Fantastique.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

JAN 25 1969 New England Newsclip

The new fares better than old

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

Friday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert brought a fairly new piece and a fairly new conductor. The piece was Olivier Messiaen's "Chronochromie," written in 1960 and getting its first Boston performances this weekend; the conductor was the 44 year-old Frenchman, Georges Pretre, making his Boston concert debut, though he did conduct a "Trovatore" here for the Metropolitan Opera in 1966.

"Chronochromie" can be translated as "the color of time," by which Messiaen means that he uses color — timbre primarily, though he also seems to include pitch in the concept — to underline and clarify the rhythm, the divisions of time.

The rhythm of "Chronochromie" is sometimes complicated in that many different subdivisions of the beat are superimposed on one another, though in such passages the beat itself is apt to be regular. Conversely, when the meter changes most often, the whole orchestra breathes and moves together. The colors are bright and vivid, thickly laid on, with the sounds of glockenspiel, xylophone, and marimba prominent, and a bit top-heavy.

An engaging feature of "Chronochromie," and one it shares with several Messiaen scores of the last 15 years, is that the melodic material draws heavily on bird-song. Almost 40 species are composed into the score, the most remarkable tour-de-force of bird portraiture occurring in the section called "Epode" (which follows strophe and antistrophe just like in Greek dramatic verse), where 12 violins, 4 violas, and 2 cellos produce an almost unpunctuated dawn chorus. On the recording of "Chronochromie," the sound of the Epode is too close and loud and shrill, but with the more diffuse acoustics of Symphony Hall, the effect was quite lovely.

Messiaen always threatens to be complicated. The apparatus awes, and the composer's grandiloquently humorless program notes are calculated to make the listener feel just a little bit unworthy. After all that, though, the music turns out rather simple. It is characteristically static and not always free from corn. "Chronochromie" is not without those faults, but it is less impaired by them than most of Messiaen's works.

Georges Pretre is two conductors. "Chronochromie," whose third public performance he conducted (Besançon, 1961) and which he introduced to this country (Cleveland, 1967), is so difficult that the public safety demands from the conductor the utmost in to-the-point efficiency and clarity, and no nonsense. This, together with his knowledge of and experience with the score, is just what Pretre delivered, and the performance of "Chronochromie" was for the most part very good indeed.

In the more familiar music — Lalo's "Roi d'Ys" Overture," the Sibelius 5th, and Ravel's "La Valse" — Pretre was a shameless show-off. Rather than conducting for the orchestra, as he did in the Messiaen, he staged a divertissement for the audience, miming the affect of the music, but enduring bravely the ecstasies and pains that threatened to overwhelm him. It is well that "La Valse" is no longer than it is: another three minutes of sound-track, and M. Pretre might have found himself liable to arrest.

The performances of Lalo, Sibelius, and Ravel that accompanied these orgiastic celebrations moved from one exaggeration to the next, blown apart by extreme and musically unmotivated outbursts, and made incoherent by the irrational and violent dislocations of tempo. Lalo's little thesaurus of 19th century dramatic and orchestral devices suffered least; Ravel's finely built poem came closest to being destroyed.

The orchestra played more loudly and more softly than in a long time, and generally gave evidence of being unusually wide awake. I, too, found myself in a state of alarmed attention during most of the concert. I would not want to commit myself to a case that being irritated to near-flipping is really better than being bored to the same point: it does make a change, though.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

JAN 25 1969 New England Newsclip

Pretre to Conduct Boston Symphony

The French conductor Georges Pretre will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for two week beginning with the third of this season's concerts at the Veterans Memorial Auditorium in Providence, R.I. Mr. Pretre's Symphony Hall debut will occur with the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

For his program, Mr. Pretre has chosen the Sibelius Symphony no. 5 and Ravel's "La Valse" as major works, with Lalo's to "Le Roi d'Ys" to open the program. He will conduct the first Boston Symphony Orchestra performance of the contemporary French composer Olivier Messiaen's "Chronochromie," a seven-movement piece which he has performed widely and which he gave its American premiere.

On Tuesday at 8:30 Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the fifth of the Tuesday "A" series concerts, including Walter Piston's Prelude and allegro for organ and strings, played in honor of the composer's 75th birthday. The program also includes Scharwenka's Piano Concerto no. 1 with Earl Wild as soloist.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436

JAN 19 1969 New England Newsclip

Top Hub Show Is BSO Led by Georges Pretre

By GEORGE GELLES, Music Critic

The Boston Symphony has the best show in town this weekend — guest conductor Georges Pretre, who fills Symphony Hall with more ham than it has seen since 'Delicatessen Night' at Pops.

If yesterday afternoon was typical, as I'm sure it was, here's a small sample of what to expect: in Ravel's "La Valse," for example, Pretre virtually acts out the dramatic progression of the score. When the music grows, so does he. When it ebbs, he gives a gasp and does some faltering footwork, hand to heart, all without missing a beat: It's a pathetic put-on, rivaled only by Garbo's "Camille."

Pretre is as much showman as he is musician, and theatrical gestures are shot through his performances. He seems to be his own biggest fan, though, and for all his flare, there's a narcissism about him that's 'that' thick. But if you disregard the shenanigans, the musician you find is quite sound and able, and very much like the late Dr. Munch.

The novelty of the afternoon was Olivier Messiaen's "Chronochromie", Messiaen has admitted the in luence of "my mother, the poetess Cecile Sauvage; my wife, the composer Claire Delbos; Shakespeare, Claudel, Reverdy and Eluard, Hello and Dom Columbia Marmion (dare I speak of the Holy Schiptures, which contain the only Truth?); birds, Russian music, the great Pelleas and Melisande of Claude Debussy; plaonsong, Hindu rhythms, the mountains of Dauphine, and, finally, all that pertains to stained glass windows and rainbows."

This is quite an order, and indicates, I think, both the novelty and the preciosity of the music, the sophistication of sources and the simple-mindedness, all in one. Chronochromie is ornithographic wallpaper. In seven sections, written with enormous complexity, it uses bird-calls from France, Sweden, Japan and Mexico; and if it starts by being cute and new, it winds up boring. The performance was led cleanly and played reasonably, though the Audubon Society should give the percussion battery their award of merit for distinguished work.

The spectre of Munch popped up at the start of the concert. The curtain-raiser Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d' Ys"—was last played by the BSO under Munch in 1960. From one section to another. Pretre's work was good. Rhythms were articulated cleanly and frenzies were whipped up appropriately; but I missed a sense of the total shape of the piece, and a feeling of direction. Playing was spirited, and the cello solo by Jules Eskin was creamy.

As for the Sibelius Fifth Symphony, I really don't know why it was played. The audience repeatedly finds Sibelius the least subtle soporific since the blackjack regardless of performance and dozing is widespread. Programming this season shows some remarkably progressive faces, but Sibelius' is not one of them.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

JAN 25 1969 New England Newsclip

30.

Georges Pretre

. . . will appear as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for two weeks beginning tonight in Providence, R.I., and in Boston on Friday.

BSO: meeting Prêtre's every musical whim

By Allan Sly

The Boston Symphony's guest conductor last week and this, George Georges Prêtre, can now add Boston to his growing collection of cities visited and vanquished, for who could resist such a torrential talent and such a Vulcan of virtuosity? He inflames every phrase, supercharges every dynamic. Compared to his Ravel's La Valse the burning of Rome would seem just a tidy little blaze; Lalo's "Le roi d'Ys" overture mirrored utter catastrophe; the Sibelius Fifth Symphony stormed the very citadel of existence; the Messiaen Chronochromie will make the millennium, when it comes, seem like anticlimax.

How does he achieve these results?. The orchestra played louder, and softer, than one has ever heard it; faster, and slower; more vehemently, and more subjectively. To a man they met his every whim, evidently reading his face at times, or the shrug of a shoulder, while the gallery read the gyrations of his torso or even the play of his back muscles. Such showmanship startles but when it occurs, it keeps our musical establishment in public favor and therefore viable; complacency and hypocrisy fly out the window and the miracle of renewal sweeps like a new broom.

Not yet knowing how Mr. Prêtre would interpret the classics, we do know him as a podium wizard, and will never again be fooled by the incongruity of his cool entrance, quiet as a diplomat, neat as a banker, fit as a quarterback. Conducting all but the Messiaen from memory, he offered himself to the occasion as in a spectator sport, but make no mistake, the orchestra recognizes in him a mastery of the musical language that far outstrips any pedestrian, verbal description.

Messiaen has emerged as one of today's most powerful and original composers. It was a great privilege for Boston to hear the recent (1960) Chronochromie; Klaus Roy's fine thesis on it, in a more-than-usually challenging program book, need not deter one from just reveling in some of the most intriguing sounds ever made by human agency. Whoever dreamed of hearing a Lesser Whitethroat and the Montezuma Oropendola paced by a Balinese gamelan in the Back Bay? I confess to have missed the famous semicolon in the Epode, but I am confident Mr. Prêtre observed it faithfully.

Next week he will honor the memory of Berlioz by conducting the Symphonie Fantastique, preceded by Bizet's Symphony in C.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150

JAN 23 1969

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150

JAN ~~DEC~~ 27 1968

FOURTEENTH PROGRAM
Friday afternoon January 24 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening January 25 1969 at 8.30

GEORGES PRÊTRE conductor

LALO	Overture to 'Le roi d'Ys'
SIBELIUS	Symphony no. 5 in E flat op. 82 Tempo molto moderato – allegro moderato, ma poco a poco stretto Andante mosso, quasi allegretto Allegro molto
intermission
MESSIAEN	'Chronochromie' for large orchestra (1960) Introduction – strophe 1 – antistrophe 1 – strophe 2 – antistrophe 2 – épôde – coda first performance in Boston
RAVEL	'La Valse' — choreographic poem*

Pretre Conducts Symphony

Messiaen Work Is Stunning

By McLAREN HARRIS

Sibelius is the only non-French composer among the six represented on the two Symphony programs which Georges Pretre conducts this week and next, but the most unusual element of either program has to be "Chronochromie," a sort of large orchestral aviary composed in 1960 by Oliver Messiaen.

The gulf between "Chronochromie" and Sibelius' Symphony No. 5 is more rightfully described as a chasm, but yesterday's program—in plan, anyway—was a balanced affair, the Sibelius preceded by Edouard Lalo's overture to "Le roi d'Ys" in the first half and the Messiaen followed by Ravel's "La Valse" to conclude.

IN VIEW OF its relative neglect the Lalo overture turned out surprisingly bright in spirit and melody (Charles Munch conducted it here in 1950). Its lyric sections and contrasting, effectively-orchestrated fanfares are opera-related (one cannot say opera-based, for the overture was composed 12 years before the opera!), and notwithstanding the short career of the opera itself (one season, 1922, at the Met) the overture makes an attractive opener.

Under Pretre the playing was clear, detailed and, in line with the popular notion of Gallic temperament, dynamically mercuric. The pianissimos were indeed hushed, the fortissimos overpowering, and such was his style for the remainder of the afternoon.

The Sibelius Fifth Symphony in E flat, however, does not lend itself to black-and-white contrasts easily, rather unfolding in waves of melodic fragments, episodic material, gradual crescendos of volume and pyramids of orchestral color. But although not abruptly juxtaposed, the great dynamic reaches were there: the energy (in volume as well as kinetic) of the first movement's conclusion as opposed to the whisper of its beginning, the high-peaked dynamic arch of the second movement and the climax of the finale.

THE SCORE'S lyricism appeared well-conceived in pace, but did not emerge with the liquid motion it needs; some of the onus lies with the orchestral playing, not always quite on center in attack or coordination—especially those concluding tutti chords which Pretre attempted to prolong slightly and which ended up splattering on the pavement, as it were. The final indignity came from a violinist who fell in the hole between the last two chords (for an orchestral player, that kind of offense is about the best ticket I can conceive for a trip to Coventry).

I have no comparative basis for judging Messiaen's "Chronochromie," but it would appear to thrive on the brand of dynamism Pretre affords. This seven-sectioned work, however, is a bit beyond accurate verbal description, to say nothing of judgment. It is at once the most complex and simple of creations; even an untrained ear will hear what it is meant to hear, no more and no less, and what makes the work so apparently inscrutable is the account of Messiaen's methods of its composition.

He has taken 32 gradations of note duration, arranged them in selected orders to sound as random as possible and assigned them to instruments of well-defined tone color, notably woodwind and definite-pitch percussion. They are played in melodic patterns representing many specific bird-calls (and Messiaen can identify every one of them, from the French Icterine Warbler to the Montezuma Oropendola). The rhythmic orders—permutations, Messiaen calls them—are played separately, fragmented or superimposed on each other.

IN OTHER WORDS, he has used strict methods of organization to achieve an opposite result: a sound apparently as totally removed from organization as are the sounds of nature, and that is exactly his intent. These movements symbolize, quite unashamedly, bird-choruses. A rather chaotic Introduction and similar Coda enclose definite-form pairs of "Strophe" and "Antistrophe" and an "Epode" of 18 distinct string parts reminiscent of 4 a.m. on a summer morning. We are not expected to perceive its organization or even separate bird-calls, but simply to absorb its aural sensations and interpretation of nature. It is a staggeringly difficult work to perform and I am tempted to say, perhaps without knowing any better, that the Symphony's job was stunningly virtuosic. "Chronochromie" must be heard to be appreciated.

Pretre strived for more dynamic effect in the concluding "La Valse" and the result was a bit violent — from opening nothingness to a final tremendous clatter which threatened to — but did not — break its orchestral bonds. Its surrealism was, if you will, too real.

Next week Georges Pretre continues as guest conductor with Bizet's Symphony in C major and Berlioz' Symphonie Fantastique.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

JAN 25 1969 New England Newsclip

The new fares better than old

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

Friday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert brought a fairly new piece and a fairly new conductor. The piece was Olivier Messiaen's "Chronochromie," written in 1960 and getting its first Boston performances this weekend; the conductor was the 44 year-old Frenchman, Georges Pretre, making his Boston concert debut, though he did conduct a "Trovatore" here for the Metropolitan Opera in 1966.

"Chronochromie" can be translated as "the color of time," by which Messiaen means that he uses color — timbre primarily, though he also seems to include pitch in the concept — to underline and clarify the rhythm, the divisions of time.

The rhythm of "Chronochromie" is sometimes complicated in that many different subdivisions of the beat are superimposed on one another, though in such passages the beat itself is apt to be regular. Conversely, when the meter changes most often, the whole orchestra breathes and moves together. The colors are bright and vivid, thickly laid on, with the sounds of glockenspiel, xylophone, and marimba prominent, and a bit top-heavy.

An engaging feature of "Chronochromie," and one it shares with several Messiaen scores of the last 15 years, is that the melodic material draws heavily on bird-song. Almost 40 species are composed into the score, the most remarkable tour-de-force of bird portraiture occurring in the section called "Epode" (which follows strophe and antistrophe just like in Greek dramatic verse), where 12 violins, 4 violas, and 2 cellos produce an almost unpunctuated dawn chorus. On the recording of "Chronochromie," the sound of the Epode is too close and loud and shrill, but with the more diffuse acoustics of Symphony Hall, the effect was quite lovely.

Messiaen always threatens to be complicated. The apparatus awes, and the composer's grandiloquently humorless program notes are calculated to make the listener feel just a little bit unworthy. After all that, though, the music turns out rather simple. It is characteristically static and not always free from corn. "Chronochromie" is not without those faults, but it is less impaired by them than most of Messiaen's works.

Georges Pretre is two conductors. "Chronochromie," whose third public performance he conducted (Besancon, 1961) and which he introduced to this country (Cleveland, 1967), is so difficult that the public safety demands from the conductor the utmost in to-the-point efficiency and clarity, and no nonsense. This, together with his knowledge of and experience with the score, is just what Pretre delivered, and the performance of "Chronochromie" was for the most part very good indeed.

In the more familiar music — Lalo's "Roi d'Ys" Overture," the Sibelius 5th, and Ravel's "La Valse" — Pretre was a shameless show-off. Rather than conducting for the orchestra, as he did in the Messiaen, he staged a divertissement for the audience, miming the affect of the music, but enduring bravely the ecstasies and pains that threatened to overwhelm him. It is well that "La Valse" is no longer than it is: another three minutes of sound-track, and M. Pretre might have found himself liable to arrest.

The performances of Lalo, Sibelius, and Ravel that accompanied these orgiastic celebrations moved from one exaggeration to the next, blown apart by extreme and musically unmotivated outbursts, and made incoherent by the irrational and violent dislocations of tempo. Lalo's little thesaurus of 19th century dramatic and orchestral devices suffered least; Ravel's finely built poem came closest to being destroyed.

The orchestra played more loudly and more softly than in a long time, and generally gave evidence of being unusually wide awake. I, too, found myself in a state of alarmed attention during most of the concert. I would not want to commit myself to a case that being irritated to near-flipping is really better than being bored to the same point: it does make a change, though.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

JAN 25 1969 New England Newsclip

Pretre to Conduct Boston Symphony

The French conductor Georges Pretre will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for two week beginning with the third of this season's concerts at the Veterans Memorial Auditorium in Providence, R.I. Mr. Pretre's Symphony Hall debut will occur with the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

For his program, Mr. Pretre has chosen the Sibelius Symphony no. 5 and Ravel's "La Valse" as major works, with Lalo's to "Le Roi d'Ys" to open the program. He will conduct the first Boston Symphony Orchestra performance of the contemporary French composer Olivier Messiaen's "Chronochromie," a seven-movement piece which he has performed widely and which he gave its American premiere.

On Tuesday at 8:30 Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the fifth of the Tuesday "A" series concerts, including Walter Piston's Prelude and allegro for organ and strings, played in honor of the composer's 75th birthday. The program also includes Scharwenka's Piano Concerto no. 1 with Earl Wild as soloist.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436

JAN 19 1969 New England Newsclip

Top Hub Show Is BSO Led by Georges Pretre

By GEORGE GELLES, Music Critic

The Boston Symphony has the best show in town this weekend — guest conductor Georges Pretre, who fills Symphony Hall with more ham than it has seen since 'Delicatessen Night' at Pops.

If yesterday afternoon was typical, as I'm sure it was, here's a small sample of what to expect: in Ravel's "La Valse," for example, Pretre virtually acts out the dramatic progression of the score. When the music grows, so does he. When it ebbs, he gives a gasp and does some faltering footwork, hand to heart, all without missing a beat. It's a pathetic put-on, rivaled only by Garbo's "Camille."

Pretre is as much showman as he is musician, and theatrical gestures are shot through his performances. He seems to be his own biggest fan, though; and for all his flare, there's a narcissism about him that's 'that' thick. But if you disregard the shenanigans, the musician you find is quite sound and able, and very much like the late Dr. Munch.

The novelty of the afternoon was Olivier Messiaen's "Chronochromie". Messiaen has admitted the influence of "my mother, the poetess Cecile Sauvage; my wife, the composer Claire Delbos; Shakespeare, Claudel, Reverdy and Eluard, Hello and Dom Columbia Marmion (dare I speak of the Holy Schiptures, which contain the only Truth?); birds, Russian music, the great Pelleas and Melisande of Claude Debussy; plainsong, Hindu rhythms, the mountains of Dauphine, and, finally, all that pertains to stained glass windows and rainbows."

This is quite an order, and indicates, I think, both the novelty and the preciosity of the music, the sophistication of sources and the simple-mindedness, all in one. Chronochromie is ornithographic wallpaper. In seven sections, written with enormous complexity, it uses bird-calls from France, Sweden, Japan and Mexico; and if it starts by being cute and new, it winds up boring. The performance was led cleanly and played reasonably, though the Audubon Society should give the percussion battery their award of merit for distinguished work.

The spectre of Munch popped up at the start of the concert. The curtain-raiser Lalo's overture to "Le Roi d' Ys"—was last played by the BSO under Munch in 1960. From one section to another. Pretre's work was good. Rhythms were articulated cleanly and frenzies were whipped up appropriately; but I missed a sense of the total shape of the piece, and a feeling of direction. Playing was spirited, and the cello solo by Jules Eskin was creamy.

As for the Sibelius Fifth Symphony, I really don't know why it was played. The audience repeatedly finds Sibelius the least subtle soporific since the blackjack regardless of performance and dozing is widespread. Programming this season shows some remarkably progressive faces, but Sibelius' is not one of them.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

JAN 25 1969 New England Newsclip

CAMBRIDGE SERIES

FOURTH PROGRAM
Tuesday evening January 28 1969 at 8.30

GEORGES PRÊTRE conductor

LALO — Overture to 'Le roi d'Ys'

SIBELIUS — Symphony no. 5 in E flat op. 82
Tempo molto moderato – allegro moderato, ma poco a poco stretto
Andante mosso, quasi allegretto
Allegro molto

intermission

MESSIAEN — 'Chronochromie' for large orchestra (1960)
Introduction – strophe 1 – antistrophe 1 – strophe 2 – antistrophe 2 – épôde – coda

RAVEL — 'La Valse' — choreographic poem*

THE CONDUCTOR

GEORGES PRÊTRE was born in France in 1924. He studied at the Douai Conservatory, then moved to Paris at the age of fourteen where he enrolled in the Conservatory there. He graduated in 1944 with first prize. After further studies with André Cluytens, he made his professional debut in Marseilles, conducting 'Samson and Delila'. For three seasons he stayed in Marseilles, then moved to other French opera houses and became musical director at Toulouse. In 1956 he made his debut at the Opéra comique, was soon engaged by all the major orchestras in Paris, and appeared as guest in Belgium, Switzerland, Germany, Portugal and Italy.

He made his debut in the United States in 1959 at the Chicago Lyric Opera, and returned in the autumn of 1963 when he conducted the San Francisco Opera and the touring Royal Philharmonic Orchestra. Early the following year he conducted a concert performance in Carnegie Hall of The Carmelites by the American Opera Society in memory of Francis Poulenc.

Meanwhile he appeared at the Vienna Festival conducting the State Opera, of which he was appointed a permanent conductor, and gave concerts with the Berlin Philharmonic and Vienna Philharmonic Orchestras, as well as fulfilling other engagements throughout Europe.

Georges Prêtre has returned several times to the United States. He has conducted many of the major orchestras, including the Philadelphia, the Cleveland, the Chicago Symphony and the San Francisco Symphony, and has appeared with the Metropolitan Opera. He has recorded for Angel and RCA. Georges Prêtre makes his debut with the Boston Symphony at these concerts.

Bird song theme in Messiaen work

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Staff

"The next voice you hear will be that of the Swedish osprey." One might thus introduce "Chronochromie," the work by Olivier Messiaen which Georges Pretre will conduct at the Boston Symphony concerts of Friday, Saturday, and Tuesday, Jan. 28.

Since the 1950s, the song of birds has played a big role in the music of the 60-year-old French composer. Messiaen does not use recorded bird songs as Respighi does in "The Pines of Rome;" neither does he strive for realistic imitations of the kind Ravel introduces in "Daphnis and Chloe." He does exactly catch the rhythms and contours of their calls, and the characteristic patterns of phrase repetition and extension. He is, on the other hand, free with octave registers so that his birds can sing both high and low: with timbres, so that they appear in the borrowed voices of French horn, glockenspiel, flute, bass clarinet, or whatever pleases him; and texture, so that a single bird may sing truly solo or in a dense, gaily dissonant eight-part harmony.

There are two kinds of what Messiaen calls "sonorous material" in "Chronochromie." Birds (from France, Japan, Mexico, and Sweden, with each painstakingly pointed out in the score at its entrance) account for most of the melodic material, and in a similar vein Messiaen includes some translations of waterfalls and mountain streams as transcribed in the French Alps.

The temporal events are ordered according to a system of permutations perfomed on a repertory of 32 different durations from 32d note to whole note. By very rough analogy one might say that Messiaen chooses rhythms a bit as a 12-tone composer chooses pitches.

And the title? "Chronos" means "time;" "chroma" "color." "Chronochromie" is an invented word that could be rendered as "Color of Time." Messiaen, according to familiar classical procedures, uses pitch and timbre to underline and color the rhythmic durations; thus, as he says, "color clarifies the divisions of time."

"Chronochromie" is a single movement that takes just over 20 minutes to play. In Messiaen, such a movement never unfolds by a process of organic development with emphasis on the relation of parts and on how they grow one from another. Rather, he presents you with a series of boxes of material that are laid down side by side, to produce an effect that is static rather than forward-moving, and characterized often by abrupt discontinuities.

"Chronochromie," of which a good recording exists by Antal Dorati and the BBC Symphony, is divided into seven major boxes:

Introduction: broken-textured and highly varied in timbre and texture.

Strophe I: continuous in texture, dense, and without meter changes.

Antistrophe I: staccato and thoroughly birdy at first, but with a slow hymn-like melody moving through the strings later, making a complete change of mood and sound. The terms "strophe" and "antistrophe" are borrowed from Greek dramatic verse, and represent something like statement and answer, associated with the movement of the chorus across the stage in one direction and then back again.

Strophe II: a new composition on the same material as Strophe I. The two strophes, perhaps by way of compensation for their density, are by far the shortest sections of "Chronochromie," running about a minute and a half each.

Antistrophe II: a new composition on the material of Antistrophe I, but rather longer.

Epode: another term from Greek drama, meaning the section of verse that follows the strophe-antistrophe pairing. Scored for 18 solo strings, this virtually unpunctuated section is a kind of dawn chorus, entirely composed of the songs of 22 birds, representing 12 different species.

Coda: a counterpart to the Introduction, drawing on the same material though combined with music from elsewhere in the piece, and ending, quite literally, in silence, five slow, measured beats of it.

For all Messiaen's fondness for complicated musical apparatus, complicated (even high-falutin background) ideas, and for a highly variegated and jumpy surface, his colorful music is essentially simple and direct. The listener needs to adjust his gait, and "Chronochromie" is likely then to emerge as an engaging, brilliant sounding, nature tone poem.

Finally, here, in order of initial appearanee, is the "Chronochromie" cast: osprey, Japanese flycatcher, Japanese blackbird, Narcissus flycatcher, Japanese bushwarbler, white-tailed eagle; marsh warbler, wren, titmouse, Icterine warbler, blackcap, nuthatch; song thrush, skylark, Ani, Attila, Montezuma Oropendola, tropical mocking-bird, grey saltator, slate-colored solitaire, Mexican blue mocking-bird.

Then blackbird, garden warbler, robin redbreast, nightingale, goldfinch, Gray's thrush; yellow ortolan, chiff-chaff, russet warbler, whitethroat, chaffinch, greenfinch, oriole, linnet; bespectacled Zosterops, Japanese cuckoo, and Japanese blue flycatcher.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
JAN 22 1969
New England Newsclip

THURSDAY B SERIES

FIRST PROGRAM
Thursday evening January 30 1969 at 8.30

GEORGES PRÊTRE conductor

BIZET — Symphony no. 1 in C
Allegro vivo
Adagio
Allegro vivace – trio
Allegro vivace

intermission

BERLIOZ — Symphonie fantastique op. 14a*
Day dreams; passions
Largo – allegro agitato e appassionato assai
A ball
Waltz: allegro non troppo
Scene in the fields
Adagio
March to the scaffold
Allegretto non troppo
Dream of a witches' sabbath
Larghetto – allegro

BSO ON FM

Georges Pretre will be guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three concerts to be broadcast live by WGBH-FM this week. On Tuesday, Jan. 28 at 8:30 p.m. he will lead the orchestra in Overture to Lalo's "Le Roi d'Ys," Symphony No. 5 by Sibelius, Chronochromie by Messiaen and Ravel's La Valse. The following Friday (Jan. 31) at 2 p.m. and Saturday (Feb. 1) at 8:30 p.m. he has chosen Symphony No. 1 by Bizet and Symphonie Fantastique by Berlioz.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000
JAN 16 1969
New England Newsclip

DURANGO, COLO.
HERALD
D. 5,500
JAN 28 1969

Editorial

Brief eastern holiday

We had a provocative and stimulating time last week in Boston and New York. The weather was so mild that while Purgatory had to call off its ski meet last weekend because of a super-abundance of snow, [illegible] were shut down be-by her devoted husband. [illegible] she able to double-loop it around her waist.

Musicians and artists as well as other leading figures of the day were her constant companions and what she learned from them is obviously apparent in her house.

The Boston Symphony is among the best in America. Founded in 1881 (its formation was strongly supported by Mrs. Gardner and her friends) it has long enjoyed a reputation for superior musicianship. Now it's looking for a new conductor.

The afternoon I attended one of the regular Friday series the man in the podium was French, George Pretre, born in 1924. He was a vigorous leader. On the program was the Sibelius Symphony No. 5, not particularly in favor these days (a careful listening shows why), and an overture composed by another Frenchman, Lalo, in the late 19th century which was tuneful and gay. Ravel's "La Vase," which was given a far more serious rendering than that which we have on a phonograph record at home, concluded the program.

Pretre clearly believes that Ravel was not trying to write light-hearted waltz music like Richard Strauss. Instead he had the condition of times, the turbulent, chaotic post-world war I period in Europe very much on his mind. I want to listen to our record again, trying to hear more of this facet of the composition.

But the work that drew the most attention and discussion came right after the intermission: Olivier Messiaen's 'Chronochromie.' Messiaen was born in 1908 (also French) and is said to have exerted tremendous influence on today's young composers. Basis of the music is the sound various birds make and instrumentation is about as unusual as that displayed here last week by the Pro Musica group. The composition follows no familiar lines and it was entirely possible for a non-expert to lose completely his place in the program. (I did.)

'Chronochromie' comes from the Greek: Kronos — time, and Kroma — Color and Messiaen is concerned with the sounds that to him color and time blend into humanistic and naturalistic considerations of the sounds of birds and sounds of water.

The home of the Boston Symphony is marvelous. The hall is longer and narrower than many so that on the sides of the balconies seats do not face the stage but instead face the far wall. In an upstairs gallery was a display of the art work done by symphony patrons — obviously a talented group.

In New York the show that was attracting the attention was at the Metropolitan Museum and [illegible] on My Mind.' (See AP story on this [illegible]

CAMBRIDGE SERIES

FOURTH PROGRAM
Tuesday evening January 28 1969 at 8.30

GEORGES PRÊTRE conductor

LALO — Overture to 'Le roi d'Ys'

SIBELIUS — Symphony no. 5 in E flat op. 82
Tempo molto moderato – allegro moderato, ma poco a poco stretto
Andante mosso, quasi allegretto
Allegro molto

intermission

MESSIAEN — 'Chronochromie' for large orchestra (1960)
Introduction – strophe 1 – antistrophe 1 – strophe 2 – antistrophe 2 – épôde – coda

RAVEL — 'La Valse' — choreographic poem*

THE CONDUCTOR

GEORGES PRÊTRE was born in France in 1924. He studied at the Douai Conservatory, then moved to Paris at the age of fourteen where he enrolled in the Conservatory there. He graduated in 1944 with first prize. After further studies with André Cluytens, he made his professional debut in Marseilles, conducting 'Samson and Delila'. For three seasons he stayed in Marseilles, then moved to other French opera houses and became musical director at Toulouse. In 1956 he made his debut at the Opéra comique, was soon engaged by all the major orchestras in Paris, and appeared as guest in Belgium, Switzerland, Germany, Portugal and Italy.

He made his debut in the United States in 1959 at the Chicago Lyric Opera, and returned in the autumn of 1963 when he conducted the San Francisco Opera and the touring Royal Philharmonic Orchestra. Early the following year he conducted a concert performance in Carnegie Hall of The Carmelites by the American Opera Society in memory of Francis Poulenc.

Meanwhile he appeared at the Vienna Festival conducting the State Opera, of which he was appointed a permanent conductor, and gave concerts with the Berlin Philharmonic and Vienna Philharmonic Orchestras, as well as fulfilling other engagements throughout Europe.

Georges Prêtre has returned several times to the United States. He has conducted many of the major orchestras, including the Philadelphia, the Cleveland, the Chicago Symphony and the San Francisco Symphony, and has appeared with the Metropolitan Opera. He has recorded for Angel and RCA. Georges Prêtre makes his debut with the Boston Symphony at these concerts.

Bird song theme in Messiaen work

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Staff

"The next voice you hear will be that of the Swedish osprey." One might thus introduce "Chronochromie," the work by Olivier Messiaen which Georges Pretre will conduct at the Boston Symphony concerts of Friday, Saturday, and Tuesday, Jan. 28.

Since the 1950s, the song of birds has played a big role in the music of the 60-year-old French composer. Messiaen does not use recorded bird songs as Respighi does in "The Pines of Rome;" neither does he strive for realistic imitations of the kind Ravel introduces in "Daphnis and Chloe." He does exactly catch the rhythms and contours of their calls, and the characteristic patterns of phrase repetition and extension. He is, on the other hand, free with octave registers so that his birds can sing both high and low: with timbres, so that they appear in the borrowed voices of French horn, glockenspiel, flute, bass clarinet, or whatever pleases him; and texture, so that a single bird may sing truly solo or in a dense, gaily dissonant eight-part harmony.

There are two kinds of what Messiaen calls "sonorous material" in "Chronochromie." Birds (from France, Japan, Mexico, and Sweden, with each painstakingly pointed out in the score at its entrance) account for most of the melodic material, and in a similar vein Messiaen includes some translations of waterfalls and mountain streams as transcribed in the French Alps.

The temporal events are ordered accordng to a system of permutations perfomed on a repertory of 32 different durations from 32d note to whole note. By very rough analogy one might say that Messiaen chooses rhythms a bit as a 12-tone composer chooses pitches.

And the title? "Chronos" means "time;" "chroma" "color." "Chronochromie" is an invented word that could be rendered as "Color of Time." Messiaen, according to familiar classical procedures, uses pitch and timbre to underline and color the rhythmic durations; thus, as he says, "color clarifies the divisions of time."

"Chronochromie" is a single movement that takes just over 20 minutes to play. In Messiaen, such a movement never unfolds by a process of organic development with emphasis on the relation of parts and on how they grow one from another. Rather, he presents you with a series of boxes of material that are laid down side by side, to produce an effect that is static rather than forward-moving, and characterized often by abrupt discontinuities.

"Chronochromie," of which a good recording exists by Antal Dorati and the BBC Symphony, is divided into seven major boxes:

Introduction: broken-textured and highly varied in timbre and texture.

Strophe I: continuous in texture, dense, and without meter changes.

Antistrophe I: staccato and thoroughly birdy at first, but with a slow hymn-like melody moving through the strings later, making a complete change of mood and sound. The terms "strophe" and "antistrophe" are borrowed from Greek dramatic verse, and represent something like statement and answer, associated with the movement of the chorus across the stage in one direction and then back again.

Strophe II: a new composition on the same material as Strophe I. The two strophes, perhaps by way of compensation for their density, are by far the shortest sections of "Chronochromie," running about a minute and a half each.

Antistrophe II: a new composition on the material of Antistrophe I, but rather longer.

Epode: another term from Greek drama, meaning the section of verse that follows the strophe-antistrophe pairing. Scored for 18 solo strings, this virtually unpunctuated section is a kind of dawn chorus, entirely composed of the songs of 22 birds, representing 12 different species.

Coda: a counterpart to the Introduction, drawing on the same material though combined with music from elsewhere in the piece, and ending, quite literally, in silence, five slow, measured beats of it.

For all Messiaen's fondness for complicated musical apparatus, complicated (even high-falutin background) ideas, and for a highly variegated and jumpy surface, his colorful music is essentially simple and direct. The listener needs to adjust his gait, and "Chronochromie" is likely then to emerge as an engaging, brilliant sounding, nature tone poem.

Finally, here, in order of initial appearance, is the "Chronochromie" cast: osprey, Japanese flycatcher, Japanese blackbird, Narcissus flycatcher, Japanese bushwarbler, white-tailed eagle; marsh warbler, wren, titmouse, Icterine warbler, blackcap, nuthatch; song thrush, skylark, Ani, Attila, Montezuma Oropendola, tropical mocking-bird, grey saltator, slate-colored solitaire, Mexican blue mockingbird.

Then blackbird, garden warbler, robin redbreast, nightingale, goldfinch, Gray's thrush; yellow ortolan, chiff-chaff, russet warbler, whitethroat, chaffinch, greenfinch, oriole, linnet; bespectacled Zosterops, Japanese cuckoo, and Japanese blue flycatcher.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

JAN 22 1969 New England Newsclip

THURSDAY B SERIES

FIRST PROGRAM
Thursday evening January 30 1969 at 8.30

GEORGES PRÊTRE conductor

BIZET — Symphony no. 1 in C
Allegro vivo
Adagio
Allegro vivace – trio
Allegro vivace

intermission

BERLIOZ — Symphonie fantastique op. 14a*
Day dreams; passions
Largo – allegro agitato e appassionato assai
A ball
Waltz: allegro non troppo
Scene in the fields
Adagio
March to the scaffold
Allegretto non troppo
Dream of a witches' sabbath
Larghetto – allegro

BSO ON FM

Georges Pretre will be guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three concerts to be broadcast live by WGBH-FM this week. On Tuesday, Jan. 28 at 8:30 p.m. he will lead the orchestra in Overture to Lalo's "Le Roi d'Ys," Symphony No. 5 by Sibelius. Chronochromie by Messiaen and Ravel's La Valse. The following Friday (Jan. 31) at 2 p.m. and Saturday (Feb. 1) at 8:30 p.m. he has chosen Symphony No. 1 by Bizet and Symphonie Fantastique by Berlioz.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

JAN 16 1969 New England Newsclip

DURANGO, COLO.
HERALD
D. 5,500

JAN 28 1969

Editorial

Brief eastern holiday

We had a provocative and stimulating time last week in Boston and New York. The weather was so mild that while Purgatory had to call off its ski meet last weekend because of a super-abundance of snow, [illegible] resorts were shut down be-by her devoted husband. [illegible] she able to double-loop it around her waist.

Musicians and artists as well as other leading figures of the day were her constant companions and what she learned from them is obviously apparent in her house.

The Boston Symphony is among the best in America. Founded in 1881 (its formation was strongly supported by Mrs. Gardner and her friends) it has long enjoyed a reputation for superior musicianship. Now it's looking for a new conductor.

The afternoon I attended one of the regular Friday series the man in the podium was French, George Pretre, born in 1924. He was a vigorous leader. On the program was the Sibelius Symphony No. 5, not particularly in favor these days (a careful listening shows why), and an overture composed by another Frenchman, Lalo, in the late 19th century which was tuneful and gay. Ravel's "La Vase," which was given a far more serious rendering than that which we have on a phonograph record at home, concluded the program.

Pretre clearly believes that Ravel was not trying to write light-hearted waltz music like Richard Strauss. Instead he had the condition of times, the turbulent, chaotic post-world war I period in Europe very much on his mind. I want to listen to our record again, trying to hear more of this facet of the composition.

But the work that drew the most attention and discussion came right after the intermission: Olivier Messiaen's 'Chronochromie.' Messiaen was born in 1908 (also French) and is said to have exerted tremendous influence on today's young composers. Basis of the music is the sound various birds make and instrumentation is about as unusual as that displayed here last week by the Pro Musica group. The composition follows no familiar lines and it was entirely possible for a non-expert to lose completely his place in the program. (I did.)

'Chronochromie' comes from the Greek: Kronos — time, and Kroma — Color and Messiaen is concerned with the sounds that to him color and time blend into humanistic and naturalistic considerations of the sounds of birds and sounds of water.

The home of the Boston Symphony is marvelous. The hall is longer and narrower than many so that on the sides of the balconies seats do not face the stage but instead face the far wall. In an upstairs gallery was a display of the art work done by symphony patrons — obviously a talented group.

In New York the show that was attracting the attention was at the Metropolitan Museum and [illegible] on My Mind.' (See AP story on this [illegible] in photo-

32.

FIFTEENTH PROGRAM
Friday afternoon January 31 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening February 1 1969 at 8.30

GEORGES PRÊTRE conductor

BIZET — Symphony no. 1 in C
- Allegro vivo
- Adagio
- Allegro vivace – trio
- Allegro vivace

intermission

BERLIOZ — Symphonie fantastique op. 14a*
- Day dreams; passions
  - Largo – allegro agitato e appassionato assai
- A ball
  - Waltz: allegro non troppo
- Scene in the fields
  - Adagio
- March to the scaffold
  - Allegretto non troppo
- Dream of a witches' sabbath
  - Larghetto – allegro

Bizet, Berlioz

Prêtre at BSO

By Craig Stinson

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Georges Prêtre's guest direction, has played almost nothing but French music for the past two weeks. Such nationalistic exclusiveness on Mr. Prêtre's part might be something to complain about, were it not for the relative scarcity of French works on Erich Leinsdorf's programs and for the fact that Mr. Prêtre did turn out to be an exceptionally persuasive musical diplomat.

One feels obliged to point out, however, that a centennial hommage à Berlioz would have been more meaningful had Mr. Prêtre chosen almost any other work than the "Symphonie Fantastique." And that the Bizet Symphony in C, the other half of Friday's program, has quite possibly attained a degree of celebrity now that exceeds its just desserts.

The symphony, which Bizet composed at the age of 17, has become a program annotator's delight, since it sat around for 80 years gathering the dust of the Paris Conservatoire, before its first performance in 1935. The question of whether it owes more to Schubert or Gounod has taken up quite a bit of space on record jackets and in program booklets, the answer according to the latest research being that it scrupulously follows the model of Gounod's Symphony in D (though the latter, in turn, is heavily indebted to Schubert).

These arguments, however, sidestep the fact that the symphony, while it furnishes evidence of Bizet's thorough understanding of his predecessors, is not a very mature work. The second movement is more interesting and original than the other three; but even there, its voluptuous lyricism is interrupted by a gauche fugato, in blind imitation of the Gounod Symphony.

Mr. Prêtre conducted the Bizet and the Berlioz in a manner that revealed both care for smooth, well-balanced sonority and a tempestuous personal style. In the slow movement of the Bizet and the "Scène aux Champs" from the Berlioz, he achieved a luxuriant string sound that is not altogether characteristic of our orchestra. His fast movements he took as fast as the ear would bear, but seldom with any sacrifice of clarity.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150
FEB 3 1969
New England Newsclip

Pretre Exaggerates Certain Features to His Liking

By McLAREN HARRIS

However much his styles of interpretation may differ with one's own taste there is something to be said in favor of Georges Pretre: he is what is known as a "rugged individualist," and it can be argued that among conductors that quality is something of a rarity.

At least one prominent music critic has suggested that one of the things wrong with the music business today is a lack of identity, as well as all the interest and controversy it entails, among musical personalities. Most conductors currently active appear to be in search of an interpretive norm common to all, a phenomenon in part spawned by recordings and radio which make comparisons instantly available. Everything, as a result, begins to sound like every other.

SYMPHONY REVIEW

But Pretre is not of this mold. He tends to exaggerate certain features to his liking — dynamics, as noted last week, and in yesterday's Symphony program of Bizet and Berlioz, tempo. One may observe that there is no lengthy historical precedent for interpreting Bizet's C major Symphony, as it has been known only since 1935, a period far less than half as long as the 80 years it lay unperformed. Yet, it is an easily-fathomed work, classic in form and clear in intent, and in some ways Pretre violated the rules of common sense which govern its expression.

The first movement was taken at a spirited pace, but not excessively so, and it was not Pretre's fault that the violins took nearly a quarter of the movement to congeal. The Adagio, which bordered on Andante, was still spacious enough for expansive lyricism; the fugato was clearly voiced. The Scherzo, however, leapt away somewhat breathlessly and the finale was even faster, now at a velocity which began to interfere with the articulation of some of the melodic figures. That did not stop Pretre from urging one final burst of speed in the concluding bars, which went by in a virtual blur.

This practice was to pop up again, annoyingly, in Berlioz' Symphonie Fantastique, but on the whole Pretre made this a brilliant effort at redemption. Berlioz' five-movement symphonic marvel, as much as any other work in orchestral literature, serves up great opportunities for conductors' individual tastes, from the tempo of the waltz, through how to treat the timpani work in th March to the Scaffold, to the special timbres of bells tolling for the Witches' Sabbath.

In the main, however, Pretre was not nearly so close to the extremes as one might have expected. His tempos were, except for a couple of instances I'll get to in a moment, on the conservative side. The Waltz began with a beautiful, relaxed lilt; the Scene in the Country was wholly pastoral and unhurried down to the last breath of the English horn lines, exquisitely played by Laurence Thorstenberg; the March to the Scaffold was taken at a sensible quickstep.

There were other things I learned from this reading: the dimension added by the side drum (minus snares) to the rolling cadence opening the March, and the cuttingly sardonic laughter in the finale's caricature of the idee fixe, emphasized by rhythmic accents.

These things told of Pretre's conviction in his own ideas and his ability, along with the orchestra's, to carry them through. But on two occasions, at the ends of the Waltz and the Sabbath, he felt compelled to install those destructive accelerandos which did no more than wrench the moods from our consciousness and waste the energy accumulated to those points. His last mistake was to call for the timpani roll to continue through the final chord; timpanic thunder has absolutely no place in that sound, which should ring like burnished brass.

The orchestral work in the Berlioz was also fantastic, and by that I mean superb.

Next week Pierre Boulez will be guest conductor in Haydn's Sinfonia Concertante, Op. 84 (Silverstein, Eskin, Gomberg, Walt), Debussy's "Jeux," Stravinsky's Symphonies of wind instruments and Four studies for orchestra and Berg's Three pieces for orchestra, Op. 6.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
FEB 1 1969
New England Newsclip

Accent to BSO's French

By HARRY NEVILLE

French conductor Georges Pretre led the Boston Symphony yesterday in an all-French program, with Bizet's youthful Symphony in C occupying the first half and Berlioz' Symphonie Fantastique the remainder

What seemed most striking about Pretre's approach to these works was the absence, to a very great extent of the musical virtues — luminosity and clarity — we are inclined to identify as typically French.

In their place we got a perhaps overlarge dosage of the nervous excitement on which American audiences thrive — Symphony Hall subscribers to the contrary notwithstanding.

These qualities are not mutually exclusive, but in Pretre's case the excitement he generates is often at the expense of such matters as rhythmic precision, textural clarity and beauty of tone.

TONAL CONTROL

He is fond, for example, of the kind of overwhelming climax in which quality of sound — particularly in the brasses — is completely sacrificed to volume.

It is true he was less guilty of this fault yesterday than in the concert of a week ago, when he seemed to have misgauged completely the accoustics of Symphony Hall. But he might have gone still further in the direction of tonal control while yet making his dynamic points.

The Berlioz nevertheless emerged as exciting which for this work is certainly an acceptable criterion of one kind of successful performance.

The constant tempo shifts were especially well gauged, and the general outline was plotted so that one always had the sense of a logical progression.

On the negative side, balances were often poorly adjusted, with woodwinds and inner strings nearly always losing out in such instances.

The third movement English horn and oboe solos suffered from rather pedestrian phrasing.

Bizet's Symphony in C received what must have been one of its quickest runthroughs ever. It is essentially a classically conceived work and there ought to be some sense of serenity and repose about it.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
FEB 1 1969
New England Newsclip

Pretre Shows Flaws With Concert Baton

By GEORGE GELLES, Music Critic

I'm glad that Georges Pretre was kept around as Boston Symphony guest conductor for a second week, because his program yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall was a far more series affair than was last week's; the pieces then were chosen for their obvious theatricality—the "Roi d'Ys" overture and "La Valse", for instance—and they allowed for excesses more readily than did the two works heard this week. Both were symphonies, Bizet's clasically proportioned "First in C" and Berlioz's "Fantastique", both demanded disciplined, intelligent conducting, and both showed that Pretre is as empty as the day is long.

The most serious among Pretre's flaws was the inability to keep a tempo. iWth each new phrase the pace was somewhat modified, and the results, time after time, were shapeless.

There were at least a half dozen points when the orchestra badly needed co-ordination, and one can't wholly blame the player for being so at sea, for it must be maddening and fruitless t lk fr sund, lgical, basically musical guidance frm Pretre. His cnducting ws whimsical in its mindlessness and easily discouraged attention and respect.

There's not much point going deeply into details; let me say only that the Bizet suffered not only from this instability as to tempo, but was rushed and under-articulated as well.

The Berlioz had neither the first movement repeat, nor (what can be heard on Colin Davis' recording) the cornet part that the composer added to the "Bal"; the first of these details is quite important, the second less so, but both would have borne witness to a more than superficial concern with the scores.

There was still a good deal of acting on the podium, which I spoke last week. In a square-jawed way, Pretre resembles Jean Paul Belmondo, and like the screen's great anti-hero, he tries to be devilishly sexy for his audiences; combining this with extra-fast tempi and unrestrainedly loud playing at climaxes, Pretre makes his point. But in trying to think of what He's given the Symphony after two weeks tenure, I noticed a dynamic indication in the Berlioz that sums it up: "quais niente", almost nothing.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873
FEB 1 1969
New England Newsclip

FIFTEENTH PROGRAM
Friday afternoon January 31 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening February 1 1969 at 8.30

GEORGES PRÊTRE conductor

BIZET — Symphony no. 1 in C
- Allegro vivo
- Adagio
- Allegro vivace – trio
- Allegro vivace

intermission

BERLIOZ — Symphonie fantastique op. 14a*
- Day dreams; passions
  - Largo – allegro agitato e appassionato assai
- A ball
  - Waltz: allegro non troppo
- Scene in the fields
  - Adagio
- March to the scaffold
  - Allegretto non troppo
- Dream of a witches' sabbath
  - Larghetto – allegro

Bizet, Berlioz

Prêtre at BSO

By Craig Stinson

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Georges Prêtre's guest direction, has played almost nothing but French music for the past two weeks. Such nationalistic exclusiveness on Mr. Prêtre's part might be something to complain about, were it not for the relative scarcity of French works on Erich Leinsdorf's programs and for the fact that Mr. Prêtre did turn out to be an exceptionally persuasive musical diplomat.

One feels obliged to point out, however, that a centennial hommage à Berlioz would have been more meaningful had Mr. Prêtre chosen almost any other work than the "Symphonie Fantastique." And that the Bizet Symphony in C, the other half of Friday's program, has quite possibly attained a degree of celebrity now that exceeds its just desserts.

The symphony, which Bizet composed at the age of 17, has become a program annotator's delight, since it sat around for 80 years gathering the dust of the Paris Conservatoire, before its first performance in 1935. The question of whether it owes more to Schubert or Gounod has taken up quite a bit of space on record jackets and in program booklets, the answer according to the latest research being that it scrupulously follows the model of Gounod's Symphony in D (though the latter, in turn, is heavily indebted to Schubert).

These arguments, however, sidestep the fact that the symphony, while it furnishes evidence of Bizet's thorough understanding of his predecessors, is not a very mature work. The second movement is more interesting and original than the other three; but even there, its voluptuous lyricism is interrupted by a gauche fugato, in blind imitation of the Gounod Symphony.

Mr. Prêtre conducted the Bizet and the Berlioz in a manner that revealed both care for smooth, well-balanced sonority and a tempestuous personal style. In the slow movement of the Bizet and the "Scène aux Champs" from the Berlioz, he achieved a luxuriant string sound that is not altogether characteristic of our orchestra. His fast movements he took as fast as the ear would bear, but seldom with any sacrifice of clarity.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150

FEB 3 1969 New England Newsclip

Pretre Exaggerates Certain Features to His Liking

SYMPHONY REVIEW

By McLAREN HARRIS

However much his styles of interpretation may differ with one's own taste there is something to be said in favor of Georges Pretre: he is what is known as a "rugged individualist," and it can be argued that among conductors that quality is something of a rarity.

At least one prominent music critic has suggested that one of the things wrong with the music business today is a lack of identity, as well as all the interest and controversy it entails, among musical personalities. Most conductors currently active appear to be in search of an interpretive norm common to all, a phenomenon in part spawned by recordings and radio which make comparisons instantly available. Everything, as a result, begins to sound like every other.

But Pretre is not of this mold. He tends to exaggerate certain features to his liking — dynamics, as noted last week, and in yesterday's Symphony program of Bizet and Berlioz, tempo. One may observe that there is no lengthy historical precedent for interpreting Bizet's C major Symphony,* as it has been known only since 1935, a period far less than half as long as the 80 years it lay unperformed. Yet, it is an easily-fathomed work, classic in form and clear in intent, and in some ways Pretre violated the rules of common sense which govern its expression.

The first movement was taken at a spirited pace, but not excessively so, and it was not Pretre's fault that the violins took nearly a quarter of the movement to congeal. The Adagio, which bordered on Andante, was still spacious enough for expansive lyricism; the fugato was clearly voiced. The Scherzo, however, leapt away somewhat breathlessly and the finale was even faster, now at a velocity which began to interfere with the articulation of some of the melodic figures. That did not stop Pretre from urging one final burst of speed in the concluding bars, which went by in a virtual blur.

This practice was to pop up again, annoyingly, in Berlioz' Symphonie Fantastique, but on the whole Pretre made this a brilliant effort at redemption. Berlioz' five-movement symphonic marvel, as much as any other work in orchestral literature, serves up great opportunities for conductors' individual tastes, from the tempo of the waltz, through how to treat the timpani work in th March to the Scaffold, to the special timbres of bells tolling for the Witches' Sabbath.

In the main, however, Pretre was not nearly so close to the extremes as one might have expected. His tempos were, except for a couple of instances I'll get to in a moment, on the conservative side. The Waltz began with a beautiful, relaxed lilt; the Scene in the Country was wholly pastoral and unhurried down to the last breath of the English horn lines, exquisitely played by Laurence Thorstenberg; the March to the Scaffold was taken at a sensible quickstep.

There were other things I learned from this reading: the dimension added by the side drum (minus snares) to the rolling cadence opening the March, and the cuttingly sardonic laughter in the finale's caricature of the idee fixe, emphasized by rhythmic accents.

These things told of Pretre's conviction in his own ideas and his ability, along with the orchestra's, to carry them through. But on two occasions, at the ends of the Waltz and the Sabbath, he felt compelled to install those destructive acceferandos which did no more than wrench the moods from our consciousness and waste the energy accumulated to those points. His last mistake was to call for the timpani roll to continue through the final chord; timpanic thunder has absolutely no place in that sound, which should ring like burnished brass.

The orchestral work in the Berlioz was also fantastic, and by that I mean superb.

Next week Pierre Boulez will be guest conductor in Haydn's Sinfonia Concertante, Op. 84 (Silverstein, Eskin, Gomberg, Walt), Debussy's "Jeux," Stravinsky's Symphonies of wind instruments and Four studies for orchestra and Berg's Three pieces for orchestra, Op. 6.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

FEB 1 1969 New England Newsclip

Accent to BSO's French

By HARRY NEVILLE

French conductor Georges Pretre led the Boston Symphony yesterday in an all-French program, with Bizet's youthful Symphony in C occupying the first half and Berlioz' Symphonie Fantastique the remainder

What seemed most striking about Pretre's approach to these works was the absence, to a very great extent, of the musical virtues — luminosity and clarity — we are inclined to identify as typically French.

In their place we got a perhaps overlarge dosage of the nervous excitement on which American audiences thrive — Symphony Hall subscribers to the contrary notwithstanding.

These qualities are not mutually exclusive, but in Pretre's case the excitement he generates is often at the expense of such matters as rhythmic precision, textural clarity and beauty of tone.

TONAL CONTROL

He is fond, for example, of the kind of overwhelming climax in which quality of sound — particularly in the brasses — is completely sacrificed to volume.

It is true he was less guilty of this fault yesterday than in the concert of a week ago, when he seemed to have misgauged completely the accoustics of Symphony Hall. But he might have gone still further in the direction of tonal control while yet making his dynamic points.

The Berlioz nevertheless emerged as exciting which for this work is certainly an acceptable criterion of one kind of successful performance.

The constant tempo shifts were especially well gauged, and the general outline was plotted so that one always had the sense of a logical progression.

On the negative side, balances were often poorly adjusted, with woodwinds and inner strings nearly always losing out in such instances.

The third movement English horn and oboe solos suffered from rather pedestrian phrasing.

Bizet's Symphony in C received what must have been one of its quickest run-throughs ever. It is essentially a classically conceived work and there ought to be some sense of serenity and repose about it.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

FEB 1 1969 New England Newsclip

Pretre Shows Flaws With Concert Baton

By GEORGE GELLES, Music Critic

I'm glad that Georges Pretre was kept around as Boston Symphony guest conductor for a second week, because his program yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall was a far more series affair than was last week's; the pieces then were chosen for their obvious theatricality—the "Roi d'Ys" overture and "La Valse", for instance—and they allowed for excesses more readily than did the two works heard this week. Both were symphonies, Bizet's clasically proportioned "First in C" and Berlioz's "Fantastique", both demanded disciplined, intelligent conducting, and both showed that Pretre is as empty as the day is long.

The most serious among Pretre's flaws was the inability to keep a tempo. iWth each new phrase the pace was somewhat modified, and the results, time after time, were shapeless.

There were at least a half dozen points when the orchestra badly needed co-ordination, and one can't wholly blame the player for being so at sea, for it must be maddening and fruitless t lk fr sund. lgical, basically musical guidance frm Pretre. His cnducting ws whimsical in its mindlessness and easily discouraged attention and respect.

There's not much point going deeply into details; let me say only that the Bizet suffered not only from this instability as to tempo, but was rushed and under-articulated as well.

The Berlioz had neither the first movement repeat, nor (what can be heard on Colin Davis' recording) the cornet part that the composer added to the "Bal"; the first of these details is quite important, the second less so, but both would have borne witness to a more than superficial concern with the scores.

There was still a good deal of acting on the podium, which I spoke last week. In a square-jawed way, Pretre resembles Jean Paul Belmondo, and like the screen's great anti-hero, he tries to be devilishly sexy for his audiences; combining this with extra-fast tempi and unrestrainedly loud playing at climaxes, Pretre makes his point. But in trying to think of what He's given the Symphony after two weeks tenure, I noticed a dynamic indication in the Berlioz that sums it up: "quais niente", almost nothing.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

FEB 1 1969 New England Newsclip

TUESDAY A SERIES

SIXTH PROGRAM
Tuesday evening February 4 1969 at 8.30

GEORGES PRÊTRE conductor

BIZET — Symphony no. 1 in C
- Allegro vivo
- Adagio
- Allegro vivace – trio
- Allegro vivace

intermission

BERLIOZ — Symphonie fantastique op. 14a*
- Day dreams; passions
  - Largo – allegro agitato e appassionato assai
- A ball
  - Waltz: allegro non troppo
- Scene in the fields
  - Adagio
- March to the scaffold
  - Allegretto non troppo
- Dream of a witches' sabbath
  - Larghetto – allegro

THURSDAY A SERIES

FOURTH PROGRAM
Thursday evening February 6 1969 at 8.30

GEORGES PRÊTRE conductor

BIZET — Symphony no. 1 in C
- Allegro vivo
- Adagio
- Allegro vivace – trio
- Allegro vivace

intermission

BERLIOZ — Symphonie fantastique op. 14a*
- Day dreams; passions
  - Largo – allegro agitato e appassionato assai
- A ball
  - Waltz: allegro non troppo
- Scene in the fields
  - Adagio
- March to the scaffold
  - Allegretto non troppo
- Dream of a witches' sabbath
  - Larghetto – allegro

THE CONDUCTOR

PIERRE BOULEZ, whose appointment as Conductor of the BBC Symphony Orchestra in 1971 was recently announced, was born in 1925 at Montbrison in the Loire district of France. His father wanted him to be an engineer, but he was determined to make music his career, and went to Paris where he enrolled at the Conservatoire. He studied with Olivier Messiaen, and after winning a first prize in harmony, he left, disgusted by the retrogressive policies of the musical directorate. Privately he studied with Andrée Vaurabourg, Arthur Honegger's wife.

At the end of the war a series of concerts was presented at the Théâtre des Champs-Elysées of music by Stravinsky. During one of these Pierre Boulez led a demonstration against the conservatism of the music. It was one of the noisiest interruptions Paris had experienced since the première of Le sacre du printemps in the same theatre thirty-three years earlier.

In 1946 Pierre Boulez became a pupil of René Leibowitz, from whom he learned classic twelve-tone technique. Through Mme Honegger he met Jean-Louis Barrault, who had just started his new company at the Théâtre Marigny. Barrault gave him a job as arranger and conductor of incidental music, and their association lasted for ten years.

During that time Mr Boulez continued his attacks on the state of French music, and the establishment retaliated by keeping his music off the government controlled radio for fifteen years. With Barrault's help, he founded in 1953 the 'Concerts Marigny' (later known as the 'Domaine musicale'), which became 'the center, the crucible, the brain of avant-garde French music' and the fashionable focal point of the anti-Establishment.

In 1959 Pierre Boulez left France and settled in Baden-Baden, where he now has his home, to be 'composer-in-residence'. His sponsor was Heinrich Strobel, the influential director of the South West German Radio. Mr Boulez is now conductor of the Radio Orchestra at Baden-Baden.

The composer's list of works includes a cantata, Le visage nuptial (1946-50); a work for voice and orchestra called Le soleil des eaux (1948); a string quartet or Livre pour quatour (1949); three piano sonatas (1946, 1948, 1957); the chamber cantata for voice and small ensemble, with texts by René Char, Le marteau sans maître (1953-54); Polyphonie X for 18 instruments (1951); Structures for two pianos (Livre I, 1952; Livre II, 1961); Poésie pour pouvoir, on verses of Henri Michaux (1958), in which electronic music joins that of voices and instruments; and Pli selon pli — portrait de Mallarmé. His Doubles was first performed in Paris in 1958; expanded to a larger work called Figures, doubles, prismes, it received its first American performances at Mr Boulez's guest appearances in Cleveland in March 1965. During his stay in that city, the composer began a new work, called Éclat, which he directs in the film in which his total activities are featured, from the NET series 'The Creative Person'.

During recent years Mr Boulez has been more and more active as a conductor, and has directed many of the world's major orchestras, the Philharmonics of Berlin and Vienna, the Concertgebouw, the BBC Symphony among them. He has appeared regularly at many festivals, including those at Donaueschingen, Darmstadt, Baden-Baden, Cologne, Hamburg and Ojai in California. He is one of two Frenchmen to have conducted Wagner at the Bayreuth Festival, and in 1963 directed the première at the Paris Opéra of Berg's Wozzeck.

Pierre Boulez first visited the USA in 1952 when the Barrault Company was on tour. Five years later he returned to conduct a Monday Evening Concert at the University of Southern California, and was a visiting lecturer in music at Harvard University in 1963. During the same year he lectured and directed his own music at Hunter College, New York. His first appearance with a major American orchestra took place at Cleveland in March 1965. Later this season Pierre Boulez will return to Cleveland and will also conduct the Chicago Symphony and New York Philharmonic Orchestras. He makes his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at these concerts. Mr Boulez has made many recordings for Columbia Records.

MONITOR [e]
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150
FEB 5 1969

Boulez in Boston

French conductor Pierre Boulez will be the guest director of the Boston Symphony on Friday and Saturday, Feb. 7 and 8. His program will include works of Haydn, Debussy, Stravinsky, and Berg. On Tuesday, Feb. 11, a concert conducted by Mr. Boulez will be televised.

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY MASS.
FEB 6 1969
New England Newsclip

BURLINGTON TIMES UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 4,200
FEB 6 1969
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony

Pierre Boulez, who in the last few years has emerged as one of France's and the world's leading conductors, will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the sixteenth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts, Feb. 7 and 8. He will conduct the Orchestra for two weeks, including a concert to be telecast on Tuesday, Feb. 11, the Orchestra's fourth TV appearance of the season.

JOURNAL
CONCORD, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 4,200
FEB 6 1969
New England Newsclip

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3,800
FEB 6 1969
New England Newsclip

Boulez to Conduct Boston Symphony

Pierre Boulez, who in the last few years has emerged as one of France's and the world's leading conductors, will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the sixteenth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts. He will conduct the orchestra for two weeks, including a concert to be telecast on Tuesday, Feb. 11.

Mr. Boulez has selected a program including Haydn's Sinfonia concertante in B flat, op. 84, with the following soloists: Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Sherman Walt, bassoon; Joseph Silverstein, violin; and Jules Eskin, cello. Debussy's "Jeux" and music of Stravinsky and Berg complete the program.

Although now only in his early forties, Pierre Boulez has been in the forefront of contemporary music activities for nearly twenty years, both as composer and conductor. He recently accepted the position of principal guest conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra.

George Pretre will also appear as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, completing his engagement with the concerts of Tuesday and Thursday.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436
FEB 2 1969
New England Newsclip

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905
FEB 2 1969
New England Newsclip

Boulez mounts B.S.O. podium

Pierre Boulez, leading French composer and conductor, will appear as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony for this week's Friday and Saturday concerts. One of the most influential of contemporary composers, Boulez has become more and more active as a conductor during recent years, and is now principal guest conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra.

The program will include music by Berg and Stravinsky, Debussy's "Jeux," and Haydn's Sinfonia Concertante in B-flat, with four principal players of the orchestra as soloists.

TUESDAY A SERIES

SIXTH PROGRAM
Tuesday evening February 4 1969 at 8.30

GEORGES PRÊTRE conductor

BIZET — Symphony no. 1 in C
- Allegro vivo
- Adagio
- Allegro vivace – trio
- Allegro vivace

intermission

BERLIOZ — Symphonie fantastique op. 14a*
- Day dreams; passions
  Largo – allegro agitato e appassionato assai
- A ball
  Waltz: allegro non troppo
- Scene in the fields
  Adagio
- March to the scaffold
  Allegretto non troppo
- Dream of a witches' sabbath
  Larghetto – allegro

THURSDAY A SERIES

FOURTH PROGRAM
Thursday evening February 6 1969 at 8.30

GEORGES PRÊTRE conductor

BIZET — Symphony no. 1 in C
- Allegro vivo
- Adagio
- Allegro vivace – trio
- Allegro vivace

intermission

BERLIOZ — Symphonie fantastique op. 14a*
- Day dreams; passions
  Largo – allegro agitato e appassionato assai
- A ball
  Waltz: allegro non troppo
- Scene in the fields
  Adagio
- March to the scaffold
  Allegretto non troppo
- Dream of a witches' sabbath
  Larghetto – allegro

THE CONDUCTOR

PIERRE BOULEZ, whose appointment as Conductor of the BBC Symphony Orchestra in 1971 was recently announced, was born in 1925 at Montbrison in the Loire district of France. His father wanted him to be an engineer, but he was determined to make music his career, and went to Paris where he enrolled at the Conservatoire. He studied with Olivier Messiaen, and after winning a first prize in harmony, he left, disgusted by the retrogressive policies of the musical directorate. Privately he studied with Andrée Vaurabourg, Arthur Honegger's wife.

At the end of the war a series of concerts was presented at the Théâtre des Champs-Elysées of music by Stravinsky. During one of these Pierre Boulez led a demonstration against the conservatism of the music. It was one of the noisiest interruptions Paris had experienced since the première of Le sacre du printemps in the same theatre thirty-three years earlier.

In 1946 Pierre Boulez became a pupil of René Leibowitz, from whom he learned classic twelve-tone technique. Through Mme Honegger he met Jean-Louis Barrault, who had just started his new company at the Théâtre Marigny. Barrault gave him a job as arranger and conductor of incidental music, and their association lasted for ten years.

During that time Mr Boulez continued his attacks on the state of French music, and the establishment retaliated by keeping his music off the government controlled radio for fifteen years. With Barrault's help, he founded in 1953 the 'Concerts Marigny' (later known as the 'Domaine musicale'), which became 'the center, the crucible, the brain of avant-garde French music' and the fashionable focal point of the anti-Establishment.

In 1959 Pierre Boulez left France and settled in Baden-Baden, where he now has his home, to be 'composer-in-residence'. His sponsor was Heinrich Strobel, the influential director of the South West German Radio. Mr Boulez is now conductor of the Radio Orchestra at Baden-Baden.

The composer's list of works includes a cantata, Le visage nuptial (1946-50); a work for voice and orchestra called Le soleil des eaux (1948); a string quartet or Livre pour quatour (1949); three piano sonatas (1946, 1948, 1957); the chamber cantata for voice and small ensemble, with texts by René Char, Le marteau sans maître (1953-54); Polyphonie X for 18 instruments (1951); Structures for two pianos (Livre I, 1952; Livre II, 1961); Poésie pour pouvoir, on verses of Henri Michaux (1958), in which electronic music joins that of voices and instruments; and Pli selon pli — portrait de Mallarmé. His Doubles was first performed in Paris in 1958; expanded to a larger work called Figures, doubles, prismes, it received its first American performances at Mr Boulez's guest appearances in Cleveland in March 1965. During his stay in that city, the composer began a new work, called Éclat, which he directs in the film in which his total activities are featured, from the NET series 'The Creative Person'.

During recent years Mr Boulez has been more and more active as a conductor, and has directed many of the world's major orchestras, the Philharmonics of Berlin and Vienna, the Concertgebouw, the BBC Symphony among them. He has appeared regularly at many festivals, including those at Donaueschingen, Darmstadt, Baden-Baden, Cologne, Hamburg and Ojai in California. He is one of two Frenchmen to have conducted Wagner at the Bayreuth Festival, and in 1963 directed the première at the Paris Opéra of Berg's Wozzeck.

Pierre Boulez first visited the USA in 1952 when the Barrault Company was on tour. Five years later he returned to conduct a Monday Evening Concert at the University of Southern California, and was a visiting lecturer in music at Harvard University in 1963. During the same year he lectured and directed his own music at Hunter College, New York. His first appearance with a major American orchestra took place at Cleveland in March 1965. Later this season Pierre Boulez will return to Cleveland and will also conduct the Chicago Symphony and New York Philharmonic Orchestras. He makes his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at these concerts. Mr Boulez has made many recordings for Columbia Records.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150
FEB 5 1969

Boulez in Boston

French conductor Pierre Boulez will be the guest director of the Boston Symphony on Friday and Saturday, Feb. 7 and 8. His program will include works of Haydn, Debussy, Stravinsky, and Berg. On Tuesday, Feb. 11, a concert conducted by Mr. Boulez will be televised.

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
FEB 6 1969 New England Newsclip

BURLINGTON TIMES UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 4,200
FEB 6 1969 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony

Pierre Boulez, who in the last few years has emerged as one of France's and the world's leading conductors, will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the sixteenth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts, Feb. 7 and 8. He will conduct the Orchestra for two weeks, including a concert to be telecast on Tuesday, Feb. 11, the Orchestra's fourth TV appearance of the season.

JOURNAL
CONCORD, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 4,200
FEB 6 1969 New England Newsclip

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 3,800
FEB 6 1969 New England Newsclip

Boulez to Conduct Boston Symphony

Pierre Boulez, who in the last few years has emerged as one of France's and the world's leading conductors, will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the sixteenth pair of Friday/Saturday concerts. He will conduct the orchestra for two weeks, including a concert to be telecast on Tuesday, Feb. 11.

Mr. Boulez has selected a program including Haydn's Sinfonia concertante in B flat, op. 84, with the following soloists: Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Sherman Walt, bassoon; Joseph Silverstein, violin; and Jules Eskin, cello. Debussy's "Jeux" and music of Stravinsky and Berg complete the program.

Although now only in his early forties, Pierre Boulez has been in the forefront of contemporary music activities for nearly twenty years, both as composer and conductor. He recently accepted the position of principal guest conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra.

George Pretre will also appear as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, completing his engagement with the concerts of Tuesday and Thursday.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436
FEB 2 1969 New England Newsclip

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905
FEB 2 1969 New England Newsclip

Boulez mounts B.S.O. podium

Pierre Boulez, leading French composer and conductor, will appear as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony for this week's Friday and Saturday concerts. One of the most influential of contemporary composers, Boulez has become more and more active as a conductor during recent years, and is now principal guest conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra.

The program will include music by Berg and Stravinsky, Debussy's "Jeux," and Haydn's Sinfonia Concertante in B-flat, with four principal players of the orchestra as soloists.

34.

BSO: debuts for Boulez, Stravinsky, and Berg

By Craig Stinson

It is amazing what a symphony orchestra can accomplish in a week's time, providing that the man in charge is a master rehearser with inflexible standards, who commands the total respect of his players. The last of these qualifications is perhaps the most rarely fulfilled, especially where American orchestras are concerned. One of the most impressive facts, therefore, about Pierre Boulez as a conductor, is that wherever he goes, he apparently gets the best from his players and he has never suffered any orchestral sabotage — the all-too-normal fate of guest conductors in this country.

His concert with the Boston Symphony on Friday afternoon was a paragon of what an orchestra concert can be. Boulez selected a program that was challenging both to players and audience, and which also, apart from the opening work by Haydn, possessed a painlessly enlightening coherence with regard to style. The last four-fifths of the program—consisting of Debussy's "Jeux," Stravinsky's Four Etudes for Orchestra and "Symphonies of Wind Instruments," and the Berg Three Pieces for Orchestra, Op. 6—constituted a partial survey of the most important works from the years just prior to and during the First World War, a period of enormous significance for the development of music in this century.

Two of the works, moreover, were Boston premieres. Strange as it may seem, considering their age, The Berg Op. 6 and the Stravinsky Etudes had never been played in this town before.

The rest of the program too consisted of works that should be standard repertory items, but aren't. Debussy's ballet "Jeux," for example, we have been lucky enough to hear once or twice because the BSO has had French conductors. But "Jeux" may well be Debussy's most influential score (partly because of the way it maintains coherence through a kind of "additive" process, abandoning the 18th- and 19th-century ideal of architectural symmetry), and it should be heard at least as often as "La Mer" or "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun." That it is not so often performed is due partly to the fact that its premiere came in 1913 just two weeks before that of the "Rite of Spring," by which it was completely overshadowed, but more essentially to the fact that Debussy's later works are quite different from his familiar early ones, and make greater demands upon the public.

Key piece

Much the same might be said about the Stravinsky "Symphonies of Wind Instruments" and even the Haydn Sinfonia Concertante for oboe, bassoon, violin, and cello. The former is a key piece in Stravinsky's development, but only rarely played. The latter, a masterpiece from Haydn's years in London, is a difficult thing to put on a symphony program because it requires four virtuoso soloists who play well together.

The fact that all these things were on the program, however, would have meant very little had they not been conducted and played with consummate skill. Boulez the conductor, like Boulez the composer, is the embodiment of long-standing French ideals of clarity and objectivity. His Haydn (in which Ralph Gomberg, Sherman Walt, Joseph Silverstein, and Jules Eskin were excellent soloists) was a model of classical translucence—neither overorchestrated nor phrased in the customary, though incorrect, romantic manner.

The 20th-century pieces, in Boulez's hands, achieved the same ideals of clarity and translucence. The Berg, in fact, may have come off with greater luminosity than its composer had planned for it. According to a note in the program booklet, Boulez has altered Berg's orchestra in minor ways in a few places in order to clarify certain melodic lines. His changes have perhaps reduced the work's sometimes oppressive textural opaqueness, but do not seem to have reduced its dramatic effect.

SIXTEENTH PROGRAM
Friday afternoon February 7 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening February 8 1969 at 8.30

PIERRE BOULEZ conductor

HAYDN — Sinfonia concertante in B flat for oboe, bassoon, violin and cello op. 84
Allegro
Andante
Allegro con spirito

RALPH GOMBERG oboe
SHERMAN WALT bassoon
JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN violin
JULES ESKIN cello

DEBUSSY — Jeux – poème dansé (1912)

intermission

STRAVINSKY — Symphonies of wind instruments

STRAVINSKY — Four studies for orchestra
Dance
Eccentric
Canticle
Madrid
first performance in Boston

BERG — Three pieces for orchestra op. 6
Präludium (Prelude)
Reigers (Rounds)
Marsch (March)
first performance in Boston

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150
FEB 8 1969
New England Newsclip

Brilliance of Boulez makes BSO shine

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Staff Writer

The ARTS

Pierre Boulez conducted a Boston Symphony concert for the first time yesterday afternoon. His performances interested and pleased the audience, which stood to applaud and cheer him at the end, and he was most demonstratively applauded by the orchestra.

Orchestras really like to be made to play beautifully, and at least some of the plaBoulez got the thngyiat playing that Boulez got the orchestra to do — particularly in Debussy's "Jeux" — was astonishing for its radiant and subtly variegated sonority; its transparence, its continuing wakefulness; and its rhythmic animation.

Boulez has the accurate ear, the physical coordination, and the personal force, that go into the making of a great virtuoso conductor.

NO FACES

The part of the operation that is visible in concert is exceedingly quiet. The beat is plain, firm — designed to allow maximum flexibility between the fixed points of the meter. The position of the hands indicates articulation and expression.

Boulez makes no faces and he does not dance. He does not address himself to the audience, but listening correcting, encouraging, approving, he devotes himself to making it as easy as possible for the players to do their job.

He shows extraordinary knowledge of the scores he conducts, a highly analytical turn of mind, and the kind of musicality both deep and delightful, that makes every phrase shapely. His work as an interpreter is responsible and serious.

At almost each point something fascinating or exciting or enchanting emerges by way of execution of detail, and that aspect of performance is apt to be stronger than the projection of large form. The illumination of the moment is more compelling than the sense of direction, of forward motion.

"Jeux," whose form is so unconventional — that is, so unschematic and so independent of the tradition of forward motion by means of development — and whose life resides so much in the play of textures, came out marvelously.

The performance was quite different from the beautiful one Gunther Schuller conducted at the New England Conservatory just before Christmas: where Schuller had extracted maximal variety and range from this singularly economic score, Boulez made the restraint and the chastity of Debussy's writing the very point of the experience, and worked only with the subtlest differentiations and inflections of pace and dynamics.

The first two of Alban Berg's Three Pieces, Op. 6, were superbly effective, too, in Boulez's wonderfully clarifying performances, and this in spite of the limitations in certain players that they showed up.

The third piece, though — which Berg calls "March" — I cannot hear Boulez's way. There seems to me an irreconcilable conflict between the forward impulses of the Mahlerian gestures and the texture-oriented stasis that Boulez imposed on the music.

POP-POP-POP

Stravinsky's delightful miniatures, Four Studies, went with rhythmic wit and a nice sense of orchestral fun.

The Symphonies of Wind Instruments, however, were somehow shapeless — it is an exceedingly difficult piece to conduct, and one that is hardly ever at all well performed — and often uncertain and unconfident even in the playing of the details.

The performance of Haydn's Sinfonia Concertante was tiny and staccato like Rampal going pop-pop-pop at a Handel Sonata. The playing by the four soloists and the orchestra was exquisite in terms of such an approach, but it really was irrelevant to Haydn.

It was a peculiar concert, one of curious musical limitations, and one also of really astonishing accomplishments. It was an enormously interesting afternoon.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Pierre Boulez conducting Haydn: Sinfonia concertante in B flat, with Ralph Gomberg, oboe, Sherman Walt, bassoon, Joseph Silverstein, violin, and Jules Eskin, cello; Debussy: Jeux; Stravinsky: Symphonies of Wind Instruments and Four Studies for Orchestra; Berg: Three Pieces for Orchestra, Op. 6. Yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

Boulez Debut Impresses With Orchestral Balance

By GEORGE GELLES, Music Critic

Pierre Boulez is an extraordinary conductor, and his Boston Symphony debut, yesterday afternoon, at Symphony Hall, was very impressive, even though I feel somewhat cheated.

Let me take the good things first, and there were many. Everything I've heard of Boulez's work so far makes me think that his ear is the most sensitive around. Orchestral balance is struck beautifully and beautifully maintained. His phrasing is also eminently sensible, and the rhythmic unity he sustains, the shape of pieces, is always very convincing.

I thought the best performances those in the middle of the program, which, incidentally, is the most difficult the Symphony men will see this season. The more one hears "Jeux", the more one realizes that it is quite the finest of Debussy's orchestral scores, the most refined in conception and most subtle in scoring. Far more than the earlier, more popular pieces, "Jeux" is a featuring study of light and shading and nuance, and its demands on any conductor are prodigious. The performance was supple and flowing, altogether very good (and very much like Boulez's recording of the piece).

Boulez has done an about-face vis a vis Stravinsky, changing from the most ardent of his detractors right after the war to one of his most eloquent exponents, both in performance and in writing. Certainly his readings of the "Symphonies of Wind Instruments" and the "Four Etudes" (written between 1914 and '29) were both extremely good. It was also good to hear the pieces back to back, because they represent sides of Stravinsky that are not that often encountered but both enormously attractive.

The Haydn "Sinfonia Concertante" that opened the program had the virtues of which I spoke above, but was also, to my ears, too smooth and lacking teeth. It was a very pretty and refined way of playing 18th Century music, but one that, I think, never gets to the heart of the matter. Of the soloists—Joseph Silverstein, violin; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Jules Eskin, cello and Sherman Walt, bassoon, the playing of Silverstein was especially sweet and very nice.

I feel cheated, as I said, because the Berg "Three Pieces", his Opus 6, made very little sense to me, and only because I couldn't hear adequately from my seat, which I hate to grumble about again. The pieces are growly and darkly scored; they are as subtle, as richly imaginative as "Jeux", though the Debussy is far more transparent and doesn't present the same auditory problems.

So I won't go into the Berg, nor into the several instances of mediocre orchestral playing. I'm less concerned that I missed hearing what was probably an excellent performance, than I am that the lady sitting next to me, and many of her friends around us, thought the pieces were meaningless. Not having heard them properly, they of course, were; but the fault was the hall's not Berg's.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873
FEB 8 1969
New England Newsclip

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
FEB 8 1969
New England Newsclip

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
FEB 8 1969
New England Newsclip

Conductor Pierre Boulez Was in Full Command from Haydn to Berg

By McLAREN HARRIS

Judging from yesterday's Symphony concert, the BBC Symphony Orchestra should be in for more gainful years when Pierre Boulez assumes duties in London in 1971. The current program ran a quick gamut from Haydn to Berg, and nowhere did there appear a point where there wasn't utter sureness about Boulez' command.

The Haydn work was the three-movement Sinfonia concertante in B flat for oboe, bassoon, violin and cello, Op. 84, last played here 19 years ago. It is neither the best of its genre nor of Haydn, but it is nonetheless pleasant and gives both variety and an opportunity for Ralph Gomberg, Sherman Walt, Joseph Silverstein and Jules Eskin to match instrumental wits, which they did with sufficient aplomb.

Debussy's "Jeux" is a work of a different tone color, even total conception. It is music for a naive, rather silly piece of choreography set on a tennis court at twilight. A young man arrives, then two girls; he woos one, then the other, finally both together. At last their idyllic caprice is broken by the intrusion of another tennis ball, and they disappear.

I HAVE NEVER seen "Jeux" performed as ballet, but again I have never been able to take the work to heart as pure music. Its tonal imagery is weak, its musical structure ill-defined. The things it does have are dynamic shape and textural variety, and these Boulez emphasized—not obviously or jaggedly, but carefully to preserve continuity and direction. The crescendo toward the end was steadily, excitingly built, then dissipated as a cloud of steam. The orchestra followed his directions adeptely.

The second half was the more rewarding from an orchestral standpoint, for that is what Stravinsky's Symphonies of wind instruments, the Four Studies for orchestra and Berg's Three Pieces for orchestra, Op. 6, are all about: orchestration and sonority.

This is not their entire issue, of course; Stravinsky's Four Studies, enlarged from his Three Pieces for string quartet, are also character pieces, the first a brief ostinato- like theme for peasant bagpipes, the second in jerky, asymmetric motion of a slightly awkward clown, the third (Canticle) in quasi-chant style with resonant polyharmony, the fourth (Madrid) with Latin-flavor themes, clever and intentionally contrived (it was originally for pianola).

COUNTERPOINT plays a major role in these pieces as well, perhaps especially in the Berg, but the Three Pieces and Stravinsky's Symphonies are adventures as well in sound, the combination and contrast of timbres. Berg uses the orchestra of Mahler, in great size and with soloistic economy, providing a wealth of tonal possibilities in transparent, largely linear schemes of varying complexity; rhythm, too, is a major structural element. Stravinsky contrasts timbres of brass and woodwind choirs in several thematic settings, concluding with a chorale intoned with dual harmonic centers, parallel but never converging.

Boulez is an unabashed exponent of the modern, and he is an eminently able one. There was logic to these works and there was tonal beauty. The orchestra's work was satisfactory, not superlative, but it was well-guided, and the reception, considered the unfamiliarity of the Stravinsky studies and the Berg pieces, was unusually warm.

Boston Symphony On Ch. 2 Feb. 11

The fourth live Boston Symphony Orchestra color telecast of the season will be on Channel 2 Tuesday, Feb. 11 at 7:30 p.m. - one hour earlier than usual.

Noted French conductor Pierre Boulez has been invited to direct the concert which will be broadcast simultaneously in stereo by WGBH radio, 89.7 FM.

M. Boulez has chosen Haydn's Sinfonia Concertante in B flat, Op. 84 with four members of the Boston Symphony as soloists: Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Sherman Walt, bassoon; Joseph Silverstein, violin; and Jules Eskin, cello. It will be followed by Debussy's dance poem "Jeux" and two works by Igor Stravinsky, Symphonies of Wind Instruments and Four Studies for Orchestra.

The program will conclude with Alban Berg's Three Pieces for Orchestra. Op. 6. Boulez, one of Europe's most distinguished conductors, has directed many major European orchestras and is regular conductor of the Southwest German Radio Orchestra.

The concert is being produced for television by Symphony producer Jordan Whitelaw and directed by William Cosel.

FREE PRESS
MELROSE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,000
JAN 30 1969

34.

BSO: debuts for Boulez, Stravinsky, and Berg

By Craig Stinson

It is amazing what a symphony orchestra can accomplish in a week's time, providing that the man in charge is a master rehearser with inflexible standards, who commands the total respect of his players. The last of these qualifications is perhaps the most rarely fulfilled, especially where American orchestras are concerned. One of the most impressive facts, therefore, about Pierre Boulez as a conductor, is that wherever he goes, he apparently gets the best from his players and he has never suffered any orchestral sabotage — the all-too-normal fate of guest conductors in this country.

His concert with the Boston Symphony on Friday afternoon was a paragon of what an orchestra concert can be. Boulez selected a program that was challengimg both to players and audience, and which also, apart from the opening work by Haydn, possessed a painlessly enlightening coherence with regard to style. The last four-fifths of the program—consisting of Debussy's "Jeux," Stravinsky's Four Etudes for Orchestra and "Symphonies of Wind Instruments," and the Berg Three Pieces for Orchestra, Op. 6—constituted a partial survey of the most important works from the years just prior to and during the First World War, a period of enormous significance for the development of music in this century.

Two of the works, moreover, were Boston premieres. Strange as it may seem, considering their age, The Berg Op. 6 and the Stravinsky Etudes had never been played in this town before.

The rest of the program too consisted of works that should be standard repertory items, but aren't. Debussy's ballet "Jeux," for example, we have been lucky enough to hear once or twice because the BSO has had French conductors. But "Jeux" may well be Debussy's most influential score (partly because of the way it maintains coherence through a kind of "additive" process, abandoning the 18th- and 19th-century ideal of architectural symmetry), and it should be heard at least as often as "La Mer" or "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun." That it is not so often performed is due partly to the fact that its premiere came in 1913 just two weeks before that of the "Rite of Spring," by which it was completely overshadowed, but more essentially to the fact that Debussy's later works are quite different from his familiar early ones, and make greater demands upon the public.

Key piece

Much the same might be said about the Stravinsky "Symphonies of Wind Instruments" and even the Haydn Sinfonia Concertante for oboe, bassoon, violin, and cello. The former is a key piece in Stravinsky's development, but only rarely played. The latter, a masterpiece from Haydn's years in London, is a difficult thing to put on a symphony program because it requires four virtuoso soloists who play well together.

The fact that all these things were on the program, however, would have meant very little had they not been conducted and played with consummate skill. Boulez the conductor, like Boulez the composer, is the embodiment of long-standing French ideals of clarity and objectivity. His Haydn (in which Ralph Gomberg, Sherman Walt, Joseph Silverstein, and Jules Eskin were excellent soloists) was a model of classical translucence—neither overorchestrated nor phrased in the customary, though incorrect, romantic manner.

The 20th-century pieces, in Boulez's hands, achieved the same ideals of clarity and translucence. The Berg, in fact, may have come off with greater luminosity than its composer had planned for it. According to a note in the program booklet, Boulez has altered Berg's orchestra in minor ways in a few places in order to clarify certain melodic lines. His changes have perhaps reduced the work's sometimes oppressive textural opaqueness, but do not seem to have reduced its dramatic effect.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150

FEB 8 1969 New England Newsclip

SIXTEENTH PROGRAM
Friday afternoon February 7 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening February 8 1969 at 8.30

PIERRE BOULEZ conductor

HAYDN — Sinfonia concertante in B flat for oboe, bassoon, violin and cello op. 84
Allegro
Andante
Allegro con spirito
RALPH GOMBERG oboe
SHERMAN WALT bassoon
JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN violin
JULES ESKIN cello

DEBUSSY — Jeux – poème dansé (1912)

intermission

STRAVINSKY — Symphonies of wind instruments

STRAVINSKY — Four studies for orchestra
Dance
Eccentric
Canticle
Madrid
first performance in Boston

BERG — Three pieces for orchestra op. 6
Präludium (Prelude)
Reigers (Rounds)
Marsch (March)
first performance in Boston

Brilliance of Boulez makes BSO shine

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Staff Writer

The ARTS

Pierre Boulez conducted a Boston Symphony concert for the first time yesterday afternoon. His performances interested and pleased the audience, which stood to applaud and cheer him at the end, and he was most demonstratively applauded by the orchestra.

Orchestras really like to be made to play beautifully, and at least some of the plaBoulez got the thngyiat playing that Boulez got the orchestra to do — particularly in Debussy's "Jeux" — was astonishing for its radiant and subtly variegated sonority; its transparence, its continuing wakefulness; and its rhythmic animation.

Boulez has the accurate ear, the physical coordination, and the personal force, that go into the making of a great virtuoso conductor.

NO FACES

The part of the operation that is visible in concert is exceedingly quiet. The beat is plain, firm — designed to allow maximum flexibility between the fixed points of the meter. The position of the hands indicates articulation and expression.

Boulez makes no faces and he does not dance. He does not address himself to the audience, but listening correcting, encouraging, approving, he devotes himself to making it as easy as possible for the players to do their job.

He shows extraordinary knowledge of the scores he conducts, a highly analytical turn of mind, and the kind of musicality both deep and delightful, that makes every phrase shapely. His work as an interpreter is responsible and serious.

At almost each point something fascinating or exciting or enchanting emerges by way of execution of detail, and that aspect of performance is apt to be stronger than the projection of large form. The illumination of the moment is more compelling than the sense of direction, of forward motion.

"Jeux," whose form is so unconventional — that is, so unschematic and so independent of the tradition of forward motion by means of development — and whose life resides so much in the play of textures, came out marvelously.

The performance was quite different from the beautiful one Gunther Schuller conducted at the New England Conservatory just before Christmas: where Schuller had extracted maximal variety and range from this singularly economic score, Boulez made the restraint and the chastity of Debussy's writing the very point of the experience, and worked only with the subtlest differentiations and inflections of pace and dynamics.

The first two of Alban Berg's Three Pieces, Op. 6, were superbly effective, too, in Boulez's wonderfully clarifying performances, and this in spite of the limitations in certain players that they showed up.

The third piece, though — which Berg calls "March" — I cannot hear Boulez's way. There seems to me an irreconcilable conflict between the forward impulses of the Mahlerian gestures and the texture-oriented stasis that Boulez imposed on the music.

POP-POP-POP

Stravinsky's delightful miniatures, Four Studies, went with rhythmic wit and a nice sense of orchestral fun.

The Symphonies of Wind Instruments, however, were somehow shapeless — it is an exceedingly difficult piece to conduct, and one that is hardly ever at all well performed — and often uncertain and unconfident even in the playing of the details.

The performance of Haydn's Sinfonia Concertante was tiny and staccato like Rampal going pop-pop-pop at a Handel Sonata. The playing by the four soloists and the orchestra was exquisite in terms of such an approach, but it really was irrelevant to Haydn.

It was a peculiar concert, one of curious musical limitations, and one also of really astonishing accomplishments. It was an enormously interesting afternoon.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Pierre Boulez conducting Haydn: Sinfonia concertante in B flat, with Ralph Gomberg, oboe, Sherman Walt, bassoon, Joseph Silverstein, violin, and Jules Eskin, cello; Debussy: Jeux; Stravinsky: Symphonies of Wind Instruments and Four Studies for Orchestra; Berg: Three Pieces for Orchestra, Op. 6. Yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

Boulez Debut Impresses With Orchestral Balance

By GEORGE GELLES, Music Critic

Pierre Boulez is an extraordinary conductor, and his Boston Symphony debut, yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall, was very impressive, even though I feel somewhat cheated.

Let me take the good things first, and there were many. Everything I've heard of Boulez's work so far makes me think that his ear is the most sensitive around. Orchestral balance is struck beautifully and beautifully maintained. His phrasing is also eminently sensible, and the rhythmic unity he sustains, the shape of pieces, is always very convincing.

I thought the best performances those in the middle of the program, which, incidentally, is the most difficult the Symphony men will see this season. The more one hears "Jeux", the more one realizes that it is quite the finest of Debussy's orchestral scores, the most refined in conception and most subtle in scoring. Far more than the earlier, more popular pieces, "Jeux" is a featuring study of light and shading and nuance, and its demands on any conductor are prodigious. The performance was supple and flowing, altogether very good (and very much like Boulez's recording of the piece).

Boulez has done an about-face vis a vis Stravinsky, changing from the most ardent of his detractors right after the war to one of his most eloquent exponents, both in performance and in writing. Certainly his readings of the "Symphonies of Wind Instruments" and the "Four Etudes" (written between 1914 and '29) were both extremely good. It was also good to hear the pieces back to back, because they represent sides of Stravinsky that are not that ofter encountered but both enormously attractive.

The Haydn "Sinfornia Concertante" that opened the proram had the virtues of which I spoke above, but was also, to my ears, too smooth and lacking teeth. It was a very pretty and refined way of playing 18th Century music, but one that, I think, never gets to the heart of the matter. Of the soloists—Joseph Silverstein, violin; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Jules Eskin, cello and Sherman Walt, bassoon, the playing of Silverstein was especially sweet and very nice.

I feel cheated, as I said, because the Berg "Three Pieces", his Opus 6, made very little sense to me, and only because I couldn't hear adequately from my seat, which I hate to grumble about again. The pieces are growly and darkly scored; they are as subtle, as richly imaginative as "Jeux", though the Debussy is far more transparent and doesn't present the same auditory problems.

So I won't go into the Berg, nor into the several instances of mediocre orchestral playing. I'm less concerned that I missed hearing what was probably an excellent performance, than I am that the lady sitting next to me, and many of her friends around us, thought the pieces were meaningless. Not having heard them properly, they of course, were; but the fault was the hall's not Berg's.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

FEB 8 1969 New England Newsclip

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

FEB 8 1969 New England Newsclip

Conductor Pierre Boulez Was in Full Command from Haydn to Berg

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

FEB 8 1969 New England Newsclip

By McLAREN HARRIS

Judging from yesterday's Symphony concert, the BBC Symphony Orchestra should be in for more gainful years when Pierre Boulez assumes duties in London in 1971. The current program ran a quick gamut from Haydn to Berg, and nowhere did there appear a point where there wasn't utter sureness about Boulez' command.

The Haydn work was the three-movement Sinfonia concertante in B flat for oboe, bassoon, violin and cello, Op. 84, last played here 19 years ago. It is neither the best of its genre nor of Haydn, but it is nonetheless pleasant and gives both variety and an opportunity for Ralph Gomberg, Sherman Walt, Joseph Silverstein and Jules Eskin to match instrumental wits, which they did with sufficient aplomb.

Debussy's "Jeux" is a work of a different tone color, even total conception. It is music for a naive, rather silly piece of choreography set on a tennis court at twilight. A young man arrives, then two girls; he woos one, then the other, finally both together. At last their idyllic caprice is broken by the intrusion of another tennis ball, and they disappear.

I HAVE NEVER seen "Jeux" performed as ballet, but again I have never been able to take the work to heart as pure music. Its tonal imagery is weak, its musical structure ill-defined. The things it does have are dynamic shape and textural variety, and these Boulez emphasized—not obviously or jaggedly, but carefully to preserve continuity and direction. The crescendo toward the end was steadily, excitingly built, then dissipated as a cloud of team. The orchestra followed his directions adeptely.

The second half was the more rewarding from an orchestral standpoint, for that is what Stravinsky's Symphonies of wind instruments, the Four Studies for orchestra and Berg's Three Pieces for orchestra, Op. 6, are all about: orchestration and sonority.

This is not their entire issue, of course; Stravinsky's Four Studies, enlarged from his Three Pieces for string quartet, are also character pieces, the first a brief ostinato- like theme for peasant bagpipes, the second in jerky, asymmetric motion of a slightly awkward clown, the third (Canticle) in quasi-chant style with resonant polyharmony, the fourth (Madrid) with Latin-flavor themes, clever and intentionally contrived (it was originally for pianola).

COUNTERPOINT plays a major role in these pieces as well, perhaps especially in the Berg, but the Three Pieces and Stravinsky's Symphonies are adventures as well in sound, the combination and contrast of timbres. Berg uses the orchestra of Mahler, in great size and with soloistic economy, providing a wealth of tonal possibilities in transparent, largely linear schemes of varying complexity; rhythm, too, is a major structural element. Stravinsky contrasts timbres of brass and woodwind choirs in several thematic settings, concluding with a chorale intoned with dual harmonic centers, parallel but never converging.

Boulez is an unabashed exponent of the modern, and he is an eminently able one. There was logic to these works and there was tonal beauty. The orchestra's work was satisfactory, not superlative, but it was well-guided, and the reception, considered the unfamiliarity of the Stravinsky studies and the Berg pieces, was unusually warm.

Boston Symphony On Ch. 2 Feb. 11

The fourth live Boston Symphony Orchestra color telecast of the season will be on Channel 2 Tuesday, Feb. 11 at 7:30 p.m. - one hour earlier than usual.

Noted French conductor Pierre Boulez has been invited to direct the concert which will be broadcast simultaneously in stereo by WGBH radio, 89.7 FM.

M. Boulez has chosen Haydn's Sinfonia Concertante in B flat, Op. 84 with four members of the Boston Symphony as soloists: Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Sherman Walt, bassoon; Joseph Silverstein, violin; and Jules Eskin, cello. It will be followed by Debussy's dance poem "Jeux" and two works by Igor Stravinsky, Symphonies of Wind Instruments and Four Studies for Orchestra.

The program will conclude with Alban Berg's Three Pieces for Orchestra. Op. 6. Boulez, one of Europe's most distinguished conductors, has directed many major European orchestras and is regular conductor of the Southwest German Radio Orchestra.

The concert is being produced for television by Symphony producer Jordan Whitelaw and directed by William Cosel.

FREE PRESS
MELROSE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,000

JAN 30 1969

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

BOULEZ BSO GUEST CONDUCTOR

Several years ago Pierre Boulez, already well established as a leader among the younger avant-garde composers, began to garner a reputation as a conductor of some genius. Last week he conducted the Boston Symphony for the first time.

It would appear that his dazzling advance notices are fully merited. The orchestra had that beautiful sound, refinement of texture, phrasing, precision of execution and, most of all, that indefineable but nonetheless marked aura of excitement that bespeaks the hand of the master born and trained.

The sweepstakes for the post of permanent conductor of the orchestra, one may be sure, is in full tilt, and any visitor who performs with this kind of eclat would by definition ordinarily be considered a prime contender. But as conductor-designate in 1971 of the BBC orchestra and as "composer in residence" in Baden-Baden, where he is the protege of the director of the Southwest German Radio and also conductor of the Baden-Baden Radio Orchestra, he already has it made.

The program Mr. Boulez chose would seem to confirm the absence of longer range ambitions in these parts. The lead-off piece was Hadyn's engaging and increasingly familiar Simphonia Concertante in B flat for Oboe, Bassoon, Violin and Cello, with Messrs. Gomberg, Walt, Silverstein and Eskin as soloists. Predictably, these four first-desk artists played with distinction, but the task of accompanying them was only a routine chore. Nothing here that a guest conductor might use to show his mettle to the native appraisers.

There were four other works on the program, and these in the aggregate must have proved absorbing to a relatively limited portion of the audience and rather spasmodic to almost everybody. Absorbing, because for the most part they represented lesser known prototype compositions of three widely contrasting currents of music that were emanated contemporaneously with each other. Limited, because all of them exacted some degree of exertion upon the listener. Spasmodic, because each number was more in the nature of an exercise than a full framed exposition.

They included Debussy's "Jeux — poeme danse", Stravinsky's Symphonies of Wind Instruments and his Four Studies for Orchestra, and Berg's Three Pieces for Orchestra, Op. 6. Hardly the stuff of tunesmiths, these.

The Jeux is a choreographic poem that Debussy composed for Diaghilev in 1912. The plot synopsis reads like an Antonioni movie script but the music exudes a sinuous delicacy from enormously complex writing.

The Wind Symphonies was cool, lesser vintage neo-classic Stravinsky, with wonderful sound combinations amid rhythmic alternations tending in places to sound like a concerto accompaniment with the solo part missing. A little of this can go a long way, but since the piece was short the results were just that.

Stravinsky's Four Studies for Orchestra consists of an arrangement of his Three Pieces for string quartet and a treatment of a somewhat later study for pianola. In essence they comprise an elegant divertisement that contains both retrospective and prospective commentary on Stravinsky's craft.

The largest work was the Berg. In a far deeper sense this music too was a retrospective and prospective. It is hard to imagine a more telling proof of the romantic origins of the 12-tone Viennese school whose influence upon all contemporary serial music remains infinitely profound to this day. With very little effort anyone at all familiar with the last two symphonies of Gustav Mahler could imagine what his Eleventh or Twelfth symphonies would have sounded like had he written them.

The Hadyn Concertante excepted, none of these was repertory pieces. The Stravinsky Four Studies and the Berg Three Pieces were first Boston performances. The Wind Symphonies had only been performed here once before and the Debussy twice. It is not only that they were prepared with such sharp and evident authority. It is that he whole cluch of them was assayed with only three days of rehearsal. This means that to Pierre Boulez' imposing catalog of virtues we have to add daring.

Curiously, after each piece the audience response was fairly tepid. At the end of the concert the response was warmly enthusiastic, suggesting that the appreciation was for how the music was played, not what. My guess would be that, with all his tremendous gifts, Pierre Boulez' programming would leave him a marked man here by the end of two seasons. My further guess is that he perfectly well knows it.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

FEB 13 1969 New England Newsclip

Tennis set to music

A sport inspired ballet

By MARGO MILLER

June, 1913. The lawn tennis season was in full play, and the London sporting and music press were further to be treated to a ballet about tennis, Nijinsky's "Jeux." (The Debussy score, commissioned by Diaghilev for his Ballets Russes, comes up this Friday and Saturday at Pierre Boulez's Boston Symphony concerts.)

"Jeux" puzzled most of its first audiences. The critic for the London Daily Telegraph observed with regret that, although Mr. Nijinsky made his first entrance with a tennis racket, he "soon tossed it into a bush." Then, there was the matter of the tennis clothes. The They were not stage costumes but the work of the Paris couturier, Paquin, and instead of the full-length flannel trousers, then proper for tennis. Nijinsky wore a kind of knickers that buttoned well below the knee. The tennis ball itself was too large, others complained. And if "Jeux" (Games) wasn't about the tennis kind of "love," it was in part about the unmentionable, or lesbian, love.

The plot of "Jeux" is simple. At dusk, in a park, three young people chase an escaped tennis ball — and each other. Tamara Karsavina and Ludmila Schollar were the two girls and Nijinsky danced the Young Man. "A faun in flannels," wrote one critic, referring back to Nijinsky's first ballet, set to Debussy's "Prelude a l'apres-midi d'un faune." "Faun in flannels" was correct, to a point.

In "Faune," Nijinsky was experimenting with a new dance movement. Inspired by Grecian friezes, he made his dancers move largely in profile. Lydia Sokolova recalled the challenge: We "had to be musical as well as rhythmical and it was necessary to relax and hear the music as a whole; it had to trickle through your consciousness, and the sensation approached the divine. One walked and moved quite gently in a rhythm that crossed over the beats given by the conductor . . . It was most ingeniously thought out. I do not know how much of this Nijinsky did himself, but he must have had enormous help from the composer." (Nijinsky was innocent of any musical knowledge, according to Igor Stravinsky's chronicles of their "Sacre du printemps" rehearsals that same season.)

As an observer of "Jeux" Sokolova continues: "It must have been the first ballet inspired by the modern craze for sport . . . . 'Jeux' had some pretty and original groupings, but there wasn't much to it. Nijinsky's idea must have been to turn his dancers into puppets by inventing a stiff and angular choreography, and to suggest that in the 20th century love was just another game, like tennis. The novelty of 'Jeux' was that it was danced on three-quarter point: That is to say, the dancers neither stood on their points, nor on the ball of the foot. Instead of wearing the usual padded toeshoes, the girls and Nijinsky had slippers which were just slightly hardened at the tips. It was not really very effective, as it looked as if they were trying to dance on their points and not doing it properly." Mme. Nijinsky recalls that her husband originally wanted to dance the Young Man on point and had coached with Cecchetti.

Mme Nijinsky, who married Nijinsky away from Diaghilev, writes of "Jeux": "The Court festivals of the Petipa ballets all explain the dancing is logical under the circumstances. Nijinsky for the first time used and treated dancing as an absolute medium, without excuse or explanation, in 'Faune' . . . (The dances in 'Jeux') presented a parallel to emotional experiences, yet without imitating the actions of real life." Audiences within and without the ballet world did not buy this pleading.

"Jeux" is interesting, too, as a chapter in Diaghilev's forced-feeding of choreographic talent, Fokine, his first discovery, had left. Nijinsky, the dance sensation, was being groomed to fill his place. Some whispered that Diaghilev and Nijinsky were lovers. But perhaps closer to the artistic truth was Diaghilev's urge to be a creator through another's work. He educated his young choreographers, taking them to museums and concerts, introducing them to artists and musicians. Debussy was at supper the night Nijinsky, watching moths circle a candle at Pre Catalan, saw in this hypnotic maneuver the plot for "Jeux."

Diaghilev to Karsavina, who danced The First Girl in "Jeux": "We will date it on the programmes 1930." Diaghilev's regisseur, Grigoriev: "Diaghilev was in a hurry to live. He was looking ahead toward fresh currents in choreography, and rather than rely on Fokine's experience, he preferred to guide Nijinsky in his lack of it." But to keep Nijinsky-plagued dancers happy, Grigoriev rehearsed them in Fokine's old ballets.

Today "Jeux" has occasional revivals. William Dollar's 1950 version is no longer in the Ballet Theater repertory, but in 1966 John Taras did one for the New York City Ballet. The costumes, window-paned organdy, would delight Gussie Moran, that Wimbleton couturiere of blessed memory. The choreography is not Nijinsky's plastique but is rather tennis-like in its taut lobs and volleys among the three young people. At the end the dancing becomes twice as heavy as the music and the phrases become long and weighty. The New York Times dance critic Clive Barnes wrote: "Mr. Taras has managed to suggest and sustain the mood of a hot Summer evening, where secrets are told and emotional corners turned, one of those evenings with thunder in the air, after which, for these three, nothing can ever be the same again."

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905

FEB 2 1969 New England

35.

TUESDAY B SERIES

FIFTH PROGRAM
Tuesday evening February 11 1969 at 7.30

PIERRE BOULEZ conductor

HAYDN — Sinfonia concertante in B flat for oboe, bassoon, violin and cello op. 84
Allegro
Andante
Allegro con spirito
RALPH GOMBERG oboe
SHERMAN WALT bassoon
JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN violin
JULES ESKIN cello

DEBUSSY — Jeux – poème dansé (1912)

intermission

STRAVINSKY — Symphonies of wind instruments

STRAVINSKY — Four studies for orchestra
Dance
Eccentric
Canticle
Madrid

BERG — Three pieces for orchestra op. 6
Präludium (Prelude)
Reigers (Rounds)
Marsch (March)

Noted Maestro Praised

BOSTON — Pierre Boulez, who within the past several years has established a reputation as one of the world's foremost composers, conductors, and musicologists, directed the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night, in Symphony Hall, in the fifth program of the current Tuesday "B" Series.

Boulez's appearance was of considerable interest because there have been persistent rumors that, within the next few years, he might well be appointed permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony. He is a serious-looking man in his forties who conducts without a baton and without a score, utilizing his large and expressive hands to good advantage. His beat is firm and steady, his control of his musicians sure, his musicianship first-rate.

However, the nature of his program last night made it difficult to assess his utmost ability inasmuch as the concert comprised selections that were, for the most part, (with one exception) approximately in the same vein and brief as well. He began his program with Haydn's "Sinfonia Concertante in B Flat," one of the pieces written in London for the impresario-violinist, Salomon. The work affords an opportunity for four soloists to shine — in this case, violinist Joseph Silverstein, cellist Jules Eskin, oboist Ralph Gomberg, and bassoonist Sherman Walt — all of whom, particularly Silverstein, gave good accounts of themselves. Boulez's phrasing in this Haydn work was good in clarity and precision, although he did evince a tendency to romanticize the music more than is customary.

The second selection was Debussy's dance poem, "Jeux," which in its original version had choreography by the great Nijinsky. In many respects, this seldom-heard work is perhaps the best orchestral score ever written by Debussy; Boulez and his musicians played it impeccably, its tonal coloration especially being conveyed beautifully.

In the concert Boulez also included two works by Stravinsky, "Symphonies of Wind Instruments" and "Four Studies for Orchestra." Boulez, as most music-lovers know, is an expert on Stravinsky. As a result, his readings, as one expected, were knowledgeable and perceptive. The "Symphonies" is dedicated to Debussy and is interesting for its intricacies of orchestration rather than for musical substance. The "Four Studies," all very short, begin with a brisk march rhythm, go to a selection that always reminds me, paradoxically, of a light-footed elephant, and end with a Spanish-influenced movement that is a good impression of Iberian style and flavor.

The concert concluded with Alban Berg's "Three Pieces for Orchestra," which, although they are dedicated to Berg's mentor, Schoenberg, sound more like Mahler than anything else. The selection is interesting as a forerunner, particularly in the final piece, of Berg's opera, "Wozzeck." The work is difficult to play (as are both the Stravinsky selections), and the orchestra responded expertly to Boulez's direction.

In fact, Boulez and the orchestra applauded each other at the end of the program, and the audience, too, joined in spontaneously in a session of mutual admiration.

STANDARD-TIMES (e)
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 68,850

FEB 12 1969 New England Newsclip

SUNDAY STANDARD TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 58,446

FEB 16 1969 New England

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

FEB 5 1969 New England

THE RECEPTION for conductor Pierre Boulez after he conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra Feb. 11 should not be interpreted as an indication that he may be the next music director here in place of Erich Leinsdorf, who's retiring at the end of this season. Boulez has been signed again by the BBC Orchestra in London for next season.

French Conductor Boulez To Direct Hub Symphony

The fourth live Boston Symphony Orchestra color telecast of the season will be on Channel 2 Tuesday, Feb. 11 at 7:30 p.m. — one hour earlier than usual.

Noted French conductor Pierre Boulez has been invited to direct the concert which will be broadcast simultaneously in stereo by WGBH radio, 89.7 FM.

Mr. Boulez has chosen Haydn's Sinfonia Concertante in B flat, Op. 84 with four members of the Boston Symphony as soloists: Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Sherman Walt, bassoon; Joseph Silverstein, violin; and Jules Eskin, cello. It will be followed by Debussy's dance poem "Jeux" and two works by Igor Stravinsky, Symphonies of Wind Instruments and Four Studies for Orchestra.

The program will conclude with Alban Berg's Three Pieces for Orchestra, Op. 6.

Boulez, one of Europe's most distinguished conductors, has directed many major European orchestras and is regular conductor of the Southwest German Radio Orchestra.

The concert is being produced for television by Symphony producer Jordan Whitelaw and directed by William Cosel.

TRANSCRIPT (e)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
CIRC. 13,500

FEB 1 1969 New England

Concerning Conductor Pierre Boulez

Pierre Boulez, the French conductor, composer, and musicologist, is generally considered to have one of the most brilliant and inventive musical minds of our time. Consequently, it was a pleasure to have the opportunity last week to watch him conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program that included Haydn's "Sinfonia Concertante in B Flat," Debussy's "Jeux," Stravinsky's "Symphonies of Wind Instruments" and "Four Studies for Orchestra," and Alban Berg's "Three Pieces for Orchestra."

Rumor has it that Boulez might possibly become the music director of the Boston Symphony in the foreseeable future. He is, of course, a forceful director—clear in his phrasing, sure in his beat, in good control of his musicians. However, I found it difficult at last Tuesday's concert to assess his capabilities completely inasmuch as the works he selected, although some were certainly difficult and demanding, were unusually brief—almost like encore pieces. I should like to hear his interpretations of some of the standard longer works—from Mozart through Ives—before venturing a hard-and-fast opinion about his conducting.

Suffice to say that he was impressive in his Boston debut and that the musicians seemed to enjoy playing for him and to perform expertly. Moreover, he seemed to establish a rapport with the audience. Nevertheless, his program (and he was particularly effective in the Debussy "Jeux") was not of the type that would set me, for one, cheering wildly or reaching for new superlatives.

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

BOULEZ BSO GUEST CONDUCTOR

Several years ago Pierre Boulez, already well established as a leader among the younger avant-garde composers, began to garner a reputation as a conductor of some genius. Last week he conducted the Boston Symphony for the first time.

It would appear that his dazzling advance notices are fully merited. The orchestra had that beautiful sound, refinement of texture, phrasing, precision of execution and, most of all, that indefineable but nonetheless marked aura of excitement that bespeaks the hand of the master born and trained.

The sweepstakes for the post of permanent conductor of the orchestra, one may be sure, is in full tilt, and any visitor who performs with this kind of eclat would by definition ordinarily be considered a prime contender. But as conductor-designate in 1971 of the BBC orchestra and as "composer in residence" in Baden-Baden, where he is the protege of the director of the Southwest German Radio and also conductor of the Baden-Baden Radio Orchestra, he already has it made.

The program Mr. Boulez chose would seem to confirm the absence of longer range ambitions in these parts. The lead-off piece was Hadyn's engaging and increasingly familiar Simphonia Concertante in B flat for Oboe, Bassoon, Violin and Cello, with Messrs. Gomberg, Walt, Silverstein and Eskin as soloists. Predictably, these four first-desk artists played with distinction, but the task of accompanying them was only a routine chore. Nothing here that a guest conductor might use to show his mettle to the native appraisers.

There were four other works on the program, and these in the aggregate must have proved absorbing to a relatively limited portion of the audience and rather spasmodic to almost everybody. Absorbing, because for the most part they represented lesser known prototype compositions of three widely contrasting currents of music that were emanated contemporaneously with each other. Limited, because all of them exacted some degree of exertion upon the listener. Spasmodic, because each number was more in the nature of an exercise than a full framed exposition.

They included Debussy's "Jeux — poeme danse", Stravinsky's Symphonies of Wind Instruments and his Four Studies for Orchestra, and Berg's Three Pieces for Orchestra, Op. 6. Hardly the stuff of tunesmiths, these.

The Jeux is a choreographic poem that Debussy composed for Diaghiley in 1912. The plot synopsis reads like an Antonioni movie script but the music exudes a sinuous delicacy from enormously complex writing.

The Wind Symphonies was cool, lesser vintage neo-classic Stravinsky, with wonderful sound combinations amid rhythmic alternations tending in places to sound like a concerto accompaniment with the solo part missing. A little of this can go a long way, but since the piece was short the results were just that.

Stravinsky's Four Studies for Orchestra consists of an arrangement of his Three Pieces for string quartet and a treatment of a somewhat later study for pianola. In essence they comprise an elegant divertisement that contains both retrospective and prospective commentary on Stravinsky's craft.

The largest work was the Berg. In a far deeper sense this music too was a retrospective and prospective. It is hard to imagine a more telling proof of the romantic origins of the 12-tone Viennese school whose influence upon all contemporary serial music remains infinitely profound to this day. With very little effort anyone at all familiar with the last two symphonies of Gustav Mahler could imagine what his Eleventh or Twelfth symphonies would have sounded like had he written them.

The Hadyn Concertante excepted, none of these was repertory pieces. The Stravinsky Four Studies and the Berg Three Pieces were first Boston performances. The Wind Symphonies had only been performed here once before and the Debussy twice. It is not only that they were prepared with such sharp and evident authority. It is that he whole cluch of them was assayed with only three days of rehearsal. This means that to Pierre Boulez' imposing catalog of virtues we have to add daring.

Curiously, after each piece the audience response was fairly tepid. At the end of the concert the response was warmly enthusiastic, suggesting that the appreciation was for how the music was played, not what. My guess would be that, with all his tremendous gifts, Pierre Boulez' programming would leave him a marked man here by the end of two seasons. My further guess is that he perfectly well knows it.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

FEB 13 1969 New England Newsclip

Tennis set to music

A sport inspired ballet

By MARGO MILLER

June, 1913. The lawn tennis season was in full play, and the London sporting and music press were further to be treated to a ballet about tennis, Nijinsky's "Jeux." (The Debussy score, commissioned by Diaghilev for his Ballets Russes, comes up this Friday and Saturday at Pierre Boulez's Boston Symphony concerts.)

"Jeux" puzzled most of its first audiences. The critic for the London Daily Telegraph observed with regret that, although Mr. Nijinsky made his first entrance with a tennis racket, he "soon tossed it into a bush." Then, there was the matter of the tennis clothes. The They were not stage costumes but the work of the Paris couturier, Paquin, and instead of the full-length flannel trousers, then proper for tennis. Nijinsky wore a kind of knickers that buttoned well below the knee. The tennis ball itself was too large, others complained. And if "Jeux" (Games) wasn't about the tennis kind of "love," it was in part about the unmentionable, or lesbian, love.

The plot of "Jeux" is simple. At dusk, in a park, three young people chase an escaped tennis ball — and each other. Tamara Karsavina and Ludmila Schollar were the two girls and Nijinsky danced the Young Man. "A faun in flannels," wrote one critic, referring back to Nijinsky's first ballet, set to Debussy's "Prelude a l'apres-midi d'un faune." "Faun in flannels" was correct, to a point.

In "Faune," Nijinsky was experimenting with a new dance movement. Inspired by Grecian friezes, he made his dancers move largely in profile. Lydia Sokolova recalled the challenge: We "had to be musical as well as rhythmical and it was necessary to relax and hear the music as a whole; it had to trickle through your consciousness, and the sensation approached the divine. One walked and moved quite gently in a rhythm that crossed over the beats given by the conductor . . . It was most ingeniously thought out. I do not know how much of this Nijinsky did himself, but he must have had enormous help from the composer." (Nijinsky was innocent of any musical knowledge, according to Igor Stravinsky's chronicles of their "Sacre du printemps" rehearsals that same season.)

As an observer of "Jeux" Sokolova continues: "It must have been the first ballet inspired by the modern craze for sport . . . . 'Jeux' had some pretty and original groupings, but there wasn't much to it. Nijinsky's idea must have been to turn his dancers into puppets by inventing a stiff and angular choreography, and to suggest that in the 20th century love was just another game, like tennis. The novelty of 'Jeux' was that it was danced on three-quarter point: That is to say, the dancers neither stood on their points, nor on the ball of the foot. Instead of wearing the usual padded toeshoes, the girls and Nijinsky had slippers which were just slightly hardened at the tips. It was not really very effective, as it looked as if they were trying to dance on their points and not doing it properly." Mme. Nijinsky recalls that her husband originally wanted to dance the Young Man on point and had coached with Cecchetti.

Mme Nijinsky, who married Nijinsky away from Diaghilev, writes of "Jeux": "The Court festivals of the Petipa ballets all explain the dancing is logical under the circumstances. Nijinsky for the first time used and treated dancing as an absolute medium, without excuse or explanation, in 'Faune' . . . (The dances in 'Jeux') presented a parallel to emotional experiences, yet without imitating the actions of real life." Audiences within and without the ballet world did not buy this pleading.

"Jeux" is interesting, too, as a chapter in Diaghilev's forced-feeding of choreographic talent, Fokine, his first discovery, had left. Nijinsky, the dance sensation, was being groomed to fill his place. Some whispered that Diaghilev and Nijinsky were lovers. But perhaps closer to the artistic truth was Diaghilev's urge to be a creator through another's work. He educated his young choreographers, taking them to museums and concerts, introducing them to artists and musicians. Debussy was at supper the night Nijinsky, watching moths circle a candle at Pre Catalan, saw in this hypnotic maneuver the plot for "Jeux."

Diaghilev to Karsavina, who danced The First Girl in "Jeux": "We will date it on the programmes 1930." Diaghilev's regisseur, Grigoriev: "Diaghilev was in a hurry to live. He was looking ahead toward fresh currents in choreography, and rather than rely on Fokine's experience, he preferred to guide Nijinsky in his lack of it." But to keep Nijinsky-plagued dancers happy, Grigoriev rehearsed them in Fokine's old ballets.

Today "Jeux" has occasional revivals. William Dollar's 1950 version is no longer in the Ballet Theater repertory, but in 1966 John Taras did one for the New York City Ballet. The costumes, window-paned organdy, would delight Gussie Moran, that Wimbleton couturiere of blessed memory. The choreography is not Nijinsky's plastique but is rather tennis-like in its taut lobs and volleys among the three young people. At the end the dancing becomes twice as heavy as the music and the phrases become long and weighty. The New York Times dance critic Clive Barnes wrote: "Mr. Taras has managed to suggest and sustain the mood of a hot Summer evening, where secrets are told and emotional corners turned, one of those evenings with thunder in the air, after which, for these three, nothing can ever be the same again."

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905

FEB 2 1969 New England

35

TUESDAY B SERIES

FIFTH PROGRAM
Tuesday evening February 11 1969 at 7.30

PIERRE BOULEZ conductor

HAYDN — Sinfonia concertante in B flat for oboe, bassoon, violin and cello op. 84
Allegro
Andante
Allegro con spirito
RALPH GOMBERG oboe
SHERMAN WALT bassoon
JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN violin
JULES ESKIN cello

DEBUSSY — Jeux – poème dansé (1912)

intermission

STRAVINSKY — Symphonies of wind instruments

STRAVINSKY — Four studies for orchestra
Dance
Eccentric
Canticle
Madrid

BERG — Three pieces for orchestra op. 6
Präludium (Prelude)
Reigers (Rounds)
Marsch (March)

French Conductor Boulez To Direct Hub Symphony

The fourth live Boston Symphony Orchestra color telecast of the season will be on Channel 2 Tuesday, Feb. 11 at 7:30 p.m. — one hour earlier than usual.

Noted French conductor Pierre Boulez has been invited to direct the concert which will be broadcast simultaneously in stereo by WGBH radio, 89.7 FM.

Mr. Boulez has chosen Haydn's Sinfonia Concertante in B flat, Op. 84 with four members of the Boston Symphony as soloists: Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Sherman Walt, bassoon; Joseph Silverstein, violin; and Jules Eskin, cello. It will be followed by Debussy's dance poem "Jeux" and two works by Igor Stravinsky, Symphonies of Wind Instruments and Four Studies for Orchestra.

The program will conclude with Alban Berg's Three Pieces for Orchestra, Op. 6.

Boulez, one of Europe's most distinguished conductors, has directed many major European orchestras and is regular conductor of the Southwest German Radio Orchestra.

The concert is being produced for television by Symphony producer Jordan Whitelaw and directed by William Cosel.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

FEB 5 1969 New England

THE RECEPTION for conductor Pierre Boulez after he conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra Feb 11 should not be interpreted as an indication that he may be the next music director here in place of Erich Leinsdorf, who's retiring at the end of this season. Boulez has been signed again by the BBC Orchestra in London for next season.

TRANSCRIPT (e)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
CIRC. 13,500

FEB 1 1969 New England

Concerning Conductor Pierre Boulez

Pierre Boulez, the French conductor, composer, and musicologist, is generally considered to have one of the most brilliant and inventive musical minds of our time. Consequently, it was a pleasure to have the opportunity last week to watch him conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program that included Haydn's "Sinfonia Concertante in B Flat," Debussy's "Jeux," Stravinsky's "Symphonies of Wind Instruments" and "Four Studies for Orchestra," and Alban Berg's "Three Pieces for Orchestra."

Rumor has it that Boulez might possibly become the music director of the Boston Symphony in the foreseeable future. He is, of course, a forceful director—clear in his phrasing, sure in his beat, in good control of his musicians. However, I found it difficult at last Tuesday's concert to assess his capabilities completely inasmuch as the works he selected, although some were certainly difficult and demanding, were unusually brief—almost like encore pieces. I should like to hear his interpretations of some of the standard longer works—from Mozart through Ives—before venturing a hard-and-fast opinion about his conducting.

Suffice to say that he was impressive in his Boston debut and that the musicians seemed to enjoy playing for him and to perform expertly. Moreover, he seemed to establish a rapport with the audience. Nevertheless, his program (and he was particularly effective in the Debussy "Jeux") was not of the type that would set me, for one, cheering wildly or reaching for new superlatives.

Noted Maestro Praised

BOSTON — Pierre Boulez, who within the past several years has established a reputation as one of the world's foremost composers, conductors, and musicologists, directed the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night, in Symphony Hall, in the fifth program of the current Tuesday "B" Series.

Boulez's appearance was of considerable interest because there have been persistent rumors that, within the next few years, he might well be appointed permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony. He is a serious-looking man in his forties who conducts without a baton and without a score, utilizing his large and expressive hands to good advantage. His beat is firm and steady, his control of his musicians sure, his musicianship first-rate.

However, the nature of his program last night made it difficult to assess his utmost ability inasmuch as the concert comprised selections that were, for the most part, (with one exception) approximately in the same vein and brief as well. He began his program with Haydn's "Sinfonia Concertante in B Flat," one of the pieces written in London for the impresario-violinist, Salomon. The work affords an opportunity for four soloists to shine — in this case, violinist Joseph Silverstein, cellist Jules Eskin, oboist Ralph Gomberg, and bassoonist Sherman Walt — all of whom, particularly Silverstein, gave good accounts of themselves. Boulez's phrasing in this Haydn work was good in clarity and precision, although he did evince a tendency to romanticize the music more than is customary.

The second selection was Debussy's dance poem, "Jeux," which in its original version had choreography by the great Nijinsky. In many respects, this seldom-heard work is perhaps the best orchestral score ever written by Debussy; Boulez and his musicians played it impeccably, its tonal coloration especially being conveyed beautifully.

In the concert Boulez also included two works by Stravinsky, "Symphonies of Wind Instruments" and "Four Studies for Orchestra." Boulez, as most music-lovers know, is an expert on Stravinsky. As a result, his readings, as one expected, were knowledgeable and perceptive. The "Symphonies" is dedicated to Debussy and is interesting for its intricacies of orchestration rather than for musical substance. The "Four Studies," all very short, begin with a brisk march rhythm, go to a selection that always reminds me, paradoxically, of a light-footed elephant, and end with a Spanish - influenced movement that is a good impression of Iberian style and flavor.

The concert concluded with Alban Berg's "Three Pieces for Orchestra," which, although they are dedicated to Berg's mentor, Schoenberg, sound more like Mahler than anything else. The selection is interesting as a forerunner, particularly in the final piece, of Berg's opera, "Wozzeck." The work is difficult to play (as are both the Stravinsky selections), and the orchestra responded expertly to Boulez's direction.

In fact, Boulez and the orchestra applauded each other at the end of the program, and the audience, too, joined in spontaneously in a session of mutual admiration.

STANDARD-TIMES (e)
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 68,850

FEB 12 1969 New England Newsclip

SUNDAY STANDARD TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 58,446

FEB 16 1969 New England

36.

SEVENTEENTH PROGRAM
Friday afternoon February 14 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening February 15 1969 at 8.30

JORGE MESTER conductor

RESPIGHI — Gli uccelli (The birds) – suite for small orchestra
- Prelude (after Bernardo Pasquini)
- The dove (after Jacques de Gallot)
- The hen (after Jean-Philippe Rameau)
- The nightingale (after an anonymous 17th century English composer)
- The cuckoo (after Bernardo Pasquini)

MOZART — Symphony no. 34 in C major K. 338
- Allegro vivace
- Andante di molto
- Finale: allegro vivace

intermission

STRAVINSKY — Petrushka (revised version of 1947)*
- The Shrove-tide fair
- Petrushka's cell
- The Moor's cell
- The fair (towards evening)

NEWTON WAYLAND piano

Maestro Mester, 34, Sparks BSO Podium

By GEORGE GELLES, Music Critic

Jorge Mester is the 34-year-old music director of the Louisville Symphany, Mexican-born of Hungarian parents, about whom people have been saying very good things. Yesterday afternoon, guest-conducting the Boston Symphony at Symphony Hall, he substantiated most of these reports, though it wasn't until his performance of "Petrushka," Stravinsky's 1911 and second score for Diaghilev's Ballets Russes, that he showed his strong suits.

The reading was superior in several ways: Mester's conducting was fluid and dramatically convincing; his timing was excellent. He was also able to get far better playing than usual from the BSO men, and to keep them alive and responsive. Finally, he seemed very attractive personally and got from the orchestra a special sheen and elan that we too seldom hear.

Previously, I had heard only a taped Tanglewood performance of Mester's, a Mozart string fugue that I thought dismal. His reading on Friday of Mozart's 34th Symphony, K. 338, was far better than what I expected, thought equally far from ideal.

In its solidity, its concern with inner voices, and, in general, its geniality, it was a good performance; it missed in being a bit heavy (not the same as solid), and in the last movement, when it needed it, without fire.

It seemed revealing that in the slow movement, phrased with exceptional care, Mester felt the need to interpolate little pauses, trying to increase expectations and heighten the drama in a piece sweet and benign that didn't really want that sort of fussing.

Respighi's "Gli Uccelli" ("The Birds") had rested peacefully and happily forgotten for 28 his opener. It's a five-movement years until Mester chose it for suite of 17th century harpsichord pieces, done up by Respighi not in the blazing technicolor vulgarity that he bestowed on "The Pines of Rome" and its two companions, but in a pretty, fragile, music-box filigree. It's movie music at best, in a style BSO is not very happy with, and clearly the stuff that provincial orchestra programs are made of. It had no business here.

Mester read it well, not stunningly, and didn't get across what his two subsequent performances did: that among under—40 conductors, he is to be taken among the most serious.

Record American

Jorge Mester Conducts

Fine 'Petrushka' At Symphony Hall

By McLAREN HARRIS

In the midst of a string of past and future Symphony programs including works by Messiaen, Berg, Stravinsky (Etudes), Webern and Varese, an afternoon of Respighi's "The Birds," Mozart's Symphony No. 34 and Stravinsky's "Petrushka" tends to appear quite conservative. Nothing could better illustrate the passage of time since "Petrushka's" 1911 premiere.

Of the three works which 33-year-old Jorge Mester conducts, "The Birds" is the most recent (1927), yet it is the most removed from its time, consisting of five movements based upon baroque pieces by Bernardo Pasquini, Jacques de Gallot, Jean-Philippe Rameau and an anonymous Englishman.

After the Prelude, which begins with a dignified theme in the strings and briefly presages the movements to follow, there come The Dove, The Hen, The Nightingale and The Cuckoo — attractive little character-pieces, lightly scored, usually with prominent woodwind solos and running, twittering figures in the strings. The Hen is the most effective, being an effective transcription of Rameau's "La Poule," from the second book of Pieces de Clavecin.

THE PERFORMANCE, like the pieces, was generally neat and unpretentious, though with something of a leaden feeling in the beginning and concluding theme (according to John Burk's notes, said theme is developed from the cuckoo motive, but where he got that idea I'll never know).

Rather curiously, Mozart's C major Symphony, K. 338, had not been played here since 1952 (under G. Wallace Woodworth). One of the three later symphonies without a minuet, it is a sturdy creation, serious in its general harmonic tone and ingeniously constructed from what would seem to be inconsequential materials if lifted from context. Something about the finale's first theme always fools me for a moment into thinking it was written by someone else, which only serves to make the work more delightful.

The Mozart performance was again amiable, although somewhat bland at the beginning in terms of dynamic contrast and instrumental clarity. Things sharpened progressively, however, through a quiescent Andante and the nimble and tireless finale.

THE WEIGHT of the afternoon was in "Petrushka," performed in the full version of 1947, which differs from the original of 1911 mostly in matters of orchestration (it has been said that Stravinsky's rather frequent revisions of his most popular works were less musical matters than a device to make obsolescent those editions, notably Russian, published outside the copyright law).

"Petrushka" put Mester, as well as the orchestra, squarely on his mettle, and he withstood it admirably. This is a beautifully-wrought, exciting score for a simple adequate scenario, music which effectively draws two levels of action, one of festive carnival atmosphere and the other of behind-stage tragedy, with clear thematic identification. It also presents considerable problems for the conductor in sustaining energy through the unbroken succession of myraid vignettes tying together vastly diverse but adjacent meters and tempos and making recognizable, though not interruptive, divisions between the scenes.

Next week Erich Leinsdorf returns to conduct Anton Webern's Five Pieces, Op. 10, Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto with Eugene Istomin as soloist and the "Eroica" Symphony.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
FEB 15 1969
New England Newsclip

THE CONDUCTOR

JORGE MESTER, now in his second season as Music Director and Conductor of the Louisville Symphony Orchestra, was born in Mexico City in 1935 of Hungarian parents. His musical career in the United States began when he was awarded a violin scholarship at the Berkshire Music Center. He enrolled at the Juilliard School, where he started to conduct. After his studies he was appointed to the faculty, the youngest member in the School's history. Jorge Mester has conducted orchestras on both sides of the Atlantic, and since his Louisville appointment has directed concerts by the Chicago Symphony Pops and the Indianapolis Symphony. He has recently recorded Menotti's Amahl and the night visitors and The medium for Columbia Records. Later this season he will conduct the New Orleans Symphony. Last summer he was a faculty member of the Aspen Festival and he conducted several concerts there. Jorge Mester last appeared with the Boston Symphony in October 1967.

Mester to Conduct Boston Symphony

Jorge Mester, 33-year-old conductor of the Louisville Symphony Orchestra, will make his second guest conducting appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concerts of Friday and Saturday, Feb. 14-15, and Thursday, Feb. 20.

These concerts were to have been conducted by the late Charles Munch. The Tuesday, Feb. 18, concert, also to have been conducted by Dr. Munch, will be led by Erich Leinsdorf.

Mester's program will include Respghi's "The Birds," Mozart's Symphony No. 34 in C and Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" (1947 version).

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
JAN 17 1969
New England Newsclip

The ARTS

BSO gets treat from Mester

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Staff Writer

Charles Munch was to have conducted the Boston Symphony concerts this weekend and next Thursday; the dates, after Munch's death in November, were inherited by Jorge Mester, the 33-year-old conductor of the Louisville Orchestra.

Mester began with Respighi's "The Birds," settings for small orchestra of genre pieces for harpsichord by Rameau and various 17th century composers.

It is an interesting footnote to the history of performance practice, and it is even possible that this suite, with its carefully written out and completely wrong ornaments, and its insistence on how quaint all this Olde Musick is, may some day acquire a certain value as camp.

It really won't do, though. The first thing, after all, required of an arranger is that he understand the material he is arranging, and Respighi didn't have the foggiest.

He gets off a couple of effective orchestral jokes that are refined ancestors of those one finds in the pieces about mosquitos and typewriters that Arthur Fiedler plays at the Pops, and he is extremely skilled at the cosmetic part of the transcriber's job.

The interventions of the celeste are excessive and really rather disgusting; otherwise, though, the orchestra makes charming noises of great delicacy.

As music, "The Birds" sounded thoroughly silly; it is, however, an occasion for playing of virtuosity and refinement, and that, on the whole, it got.

Gomberg and Cioffi particularly distinguished themselves as a pair of doves — or perhaps one dove whose voice changes — and Mester's conducting, except for an unbreathing opening ritornello, was first-rate.

NO MINUET

From the antique-store plate-scrapings, Mester went on to real Mozart, the festive and Brilliant C major Symphony, No. 34, K.338.

Unlike Sir Adrian Boult, the last conductor to do this work with the Boston Symphony, Mester did not include the Minuet, K.409, that some scholars believe may have been intended for it. The Minuet is a wonderfully and surprisingly rich piece, but all in all I find the Symphony more convincing in its three-movement form.

Again, Mester got beautiful playing from the orchestra, lustrous, in tune, rhythmic, and awake. The finale went with energy and spirit; the second, though taken perhaps a bit too slowly, was phrased with grace.

The grand first movement, however, missed making its point: it needs a powerfully developing, unfolding sort of performance — I still recall how splendidly Boult shaped this movement in 1966 — where what it had from Mester was only elegance of detail.

For the second half of the concert, Mester conducted Stravinsky's complete "Petrushka" score. He used the sharp and lean 1947 revision rather than the lusher 1911 original, and his swift, lightly accented conducting went along with that preference. It was consistently conceived, beautifully realized for the most part, and a great pleasure to hear.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
FEB 15 1969
New England Newsclip

Louisville's Mester guests at BSO

By Allan Sly

The Boston Symphony's parade of visiting conductors continued last week with the arrival of Jorge Mester, recently of the Juilliard faculty, now established in Louisville. He is of Mexican birth and Hungarian parentage; appearances at Tanglewood, Aspen, and Chicago, some recording, and a previous Boston assignment are all very much to his credit.

The orchestra watched him attentively, giving the impression that, whoever occupies the podium, it maintains its own identity; though willing to reflect a visitor's peculiarities, it surrenders nothing. Thus the Mozart No. 34 in C was its own bright self; in the delicious dialogue of the andante and the easy flow of the allegros Mr. Mester's somewhat fussy intentions came out in a high degree of sweetness—unessential but not unpleasing. The orchestra appeared to supply the work's underlying strengths from its own inner resources.

The same toothsome quality pervaded the opening work, Respighi's "Gli uccelli" ("The Birds"), the second musical aviary of the year, and the prettier. Based on 18th-century diversions, it frankly sets out to please, though for me its appeal rarely exceeded the charm of a valentine. It is not robust enough for Pops, hardly weighty enough for Symphony, but nice to hear (after 28 years), reminding us of a gallant personality from a time less turgid than our own.

The final work, the 1947 version of the complete ballet "Petrushka," supports Stravinsky's nomination as composer of the century. Conceived and produced in 1911 virtually as we heard it this weekend, it seems to be a focal point or node around which 20th-century music was to swing into new paths. But pervading all is a story of human frailty and suffering, callous unconcern and cruel frustration, all embodied in a tale as entertaining as it is eternally new. That Stravinsky and Diaghilev worked out its details together is one more miracle of the theater; that the right composer at the right time could give the story musical embodiment is our great good fortune.

Mr. Mester's engagement with the work was complete and convincing. Newton Wayland added still another feather to his cap by playing the prominent piano part—the very genesis of the Petrushka personality. At the Friday concert there was a premature entry of a clarinet and some very rarely encountered trouble among the trumpets. But the orchestra as a whole rode this high-mettled steed to a triumphant finish—a finish that leaves one sadder for surveying thus our human condition.

Mr. Mester is more in Stravinsky's debt than vice versa; but there will come a day when this young conductor's natural musicality and inner strengths will outstrip, rather than keep pace with (as at present), his splendid accomplishments.

The Symphony Hall management badly flunked its responsibilities on Friday. Ten door openings (eight before the bear entry, two during) were visible from the front of the house. One person forced an entry and took a seat in the very center of the front row some ten minutes into the Petrushka. The first violin section was noticeably distracted. Such public bad manners deserve public condemnation. Evidently all doors need guarding inside and out at all times.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150
FEB 17 1969
New England Newsclip

36.

SEVENTEENTH PROGRAM
Friday afternoon February 14 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening February 15 1969 at 8.30

JORGE MESTER conductor

RESPIGHI — Gli uccelli (The birds) – suite for small orchestra
- Prelude (after Bernardo Pasquini)
- The dove (after Jacques de Gallot)
- The hen (after Jean-Philippe Rameau)
- The nightingale (after an anonymous 17th century English composer)
- The cuckoo (after Bernardo Pasquini)

MOZART — Symphony no. 34 in C major K. 338
- Allegro vivace
- Andante di molto
- Finale: allegro vivace

intermission

STRAVINSKY — Petrushka (revised version of 1947)*
- The Shrove-tide fair
- Petrushka's cell
- The Moor's cell
- The fair (towards evening)

NEWTON WAYLAND piano

Maestro Mester, 34, Sparks BSO Podium

By GEORGE GELLES, Music Critic

Jorge Mester is the 34-year-old music director of the Louisville Symphany, Mexican-born of Hungarian parents, about whom people have been saying very good things. Yesterday afternoon, guest-conducting the Boston Symphony at Symphony Hall, he substantiated most of these reports, though it wasn't until his performance of "Petrushka," Stravinsky's 1911 and second score for Diaghilev's Ballets Russes, that he showed his strong suits.

The reading was superior in several ways: Mester's conducting was fluid and dramatically convincing; his timing was excellent. He was also able to get far better playing than usual from the BSO men, and to keep them alive and responsive. Finally, he seemed very attractive personally and got from the orchestra a special sheen and elan that we too seldom hear.

Previously, I had heard only a taped Tanglewood performance of Mester's, a Mozart string fugue that I thought dismal. His reading on Friday of Mozart's 34th Symphony, K. 338, was far better than what I expected, thought equally far from ideal.

In its solidity, its concern with inner voices, and, in general, its geniality, it was a good performance; it missed in being a bit heavy (not the same as solid), and in the last movement, when it needed it, without fire.

It seemed revealing that in the slow movement, phrased with exceptional care, Mester felt the need to interpolate little pauses, trying to increase expectations and heighten the drama in a piece sweet and benign that didn't really want that sort of fussing.

Respighi's "Gli Uccelli" ("The Birds") had rested peacefully and happily forgotten for 28 his opener. It's a five-movement years until Mester chose it for suite of 17th century harpsichord pieces, done up by Respighi not in the blazing technicolor vulgarity that he bestowed on "The Pines of Rome" and its two companions, but in a pretty, fragile, music-box filigree. It's movie music at best, in a style BSO is not very happy with, and clearly the stuff that provincial orchestra programs are made of. It had no business here.

Mester read it well, not stunningly, and didn't get across what his two subsequent performances did: that among under—40 conductors, he is to be taken among the most serious.

Record American

Jorge Mester Conducts

Fine 'Petrushka' At Symphony Hall

By McLAREN HARRIS

In the midst of a string of past and future Symphony programs including works by Messiaen, Berg, Stravinsky (Etudes), Webern and Varese, an afternoon of Respighi's "The Birds," Mozart's Symphony No. 34 and Stravinsky's "Petrushka" tends to appear quite conservative. Nothing could better illustrate the passage of time since "Petrushka's" 1911 premiere.

Of the three works which 33-year-old Jorge Mester conducts, "The Birds" is the most recent (1927), yet it is the most removed from its time, consisting of five movements based upon baroque pieces by Bernardo Pasquini, Jacques de Gallot, Jean-Philippe Rameau and an anonymous Englishman.

After the Prelude, which begins with a dignified theme in the strings and briefly presages the movements to follow, there come The Dove, The Hen, The Nightingale and The Cuckoo — attractive little character-pieces, lightly scored, usually with prominent woodwind solos and running, twittering figures in the strings. The Hen is the most effective, being an effective transcription of Rameau's "La Poule," from the second book of Pieces de Clavecin.

THE PERFORMANCE, like the pieces, was generally neat and unpretentious, though with something of a leaden feeling in the beginning and concluding theme (according to John Burk's notes, said theme is developed from the cuckoo motive, but where he got that idea I'll never know).

Rather curiously, Mozart's C major Symphony, K. 338, had not been played here since 1952 (under G. Wallace Woodworth). One of the three later symphonies without a minuet, it is a sturdy creation, serious in its general harmonic tone and ingeniously constructed from what would seem to be inconsequential materials if lifted from context. Something about the finale's first theme always fools me for a moment into thinking it was written by someone else, which only serves to make the work more delightful.

The Mozart performance was again amiable, although somewhat bland at the beginning in terms of dynamic contrast and instrumental clarity. Things sharpened progressively, however, through a quiescent Andante and the nimble and tireless finale.

THE WEIGHT of the afternoon was in "Petrushka," performed in the full version of 1947, which differs from the original of 1911 mostly in matters of orchestration (it has been said that Stravinsky's rather frequent revisions of his most popular works were less musical matters than a device to make obsolescent those editions, notably Russian, published outside the copyright law).

"Petrushka" put Mester, as well as the orchestra, squarely on his mettle, and he withstood it admirably. This is a beautifully-wrought, exciting score for a simple adequate scenario, music which effectively draws two levels of action, one of festive carnival atmosphere and the other of behind-stage tragedy, with clear thematic identification. It also presents considerable problems for the conductor in sustaining energy through the unbroken succession of myraid vignettes tying together vastly diverse but adjacent meters and tempos and making recognizable, though not interruptive, divisions between the scenes.

Next week Erich Leinsdorf returns to conduct Anton Webern's Five Pieces, Op. 10, Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto with Eugene Istomin as soloist and the "Eroica" Symphony.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

FEB 15 1969 New England Newsclip

THE CONDUCTOR

JORGE MESTER, now in his second season as Music Director and Conductor of the Louisville Symphony Orchestra, was born in Mexico City in 1935 of Hungarian parents. His musical career in the United States began when he was awarded a violin scholarship at the Berkshire Music Center. He enrolled at the Juilliard School, where he started to conduct. After his studies he was appointed to the faculty, the youngest member in the School's history. Jorge Mester has conducted orchestras on both sides of the Atlantic, and since his Louisville appointment has directed concerts by the Chicago Symphony Pops and the Indianapolis Symphony. He has recently recorded Menotti's Amahl and the night visitors and The medium for Columbia Records. Later this season he will conduct the New Orleans Symphony. Last summer he was a faculty member of the Aspen Festival and he conducted several concerts there. Jorge Mester last appeared with the Boston Symphony in October 1967.

Mester to Conduct Boston Symphony

Jorge Mester, 33-year-old conductor of the Louisville Symphony Orchestra, will make his second guest conducting appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concerts of Friday and Saturday, Feb. 14-15, and Thursday, Feb. 20.

These concerts were to have been conducted by the late Charles Munch. The Tuesday, Feb. 18, concert, also to have been conducted by Dr. Munch, will be led by Erich Leinsdorf.

Mester's program will include Respghi's "The Birds," Mozart's Symphony No. 34 in C and Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" (1947 version).

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

JAN 17 1969 New England Newsclip

The ARTS

BSO gets treat from Mester

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Staff Writer

Charles Munch was to have conducted the Boston Symphony concerts this weekend and next Thursday; the dates, after Munch's death in November, were inherited by Jorge Mester, the 33-year-old conductor of the Louisville Orchestra.

Mester began with Respighi's "The Birds," settings for small orchestra of genre pieces for harpsichord by Rameau and various 17th century composers.

It is an interesting footnote to the history of performance practice, and it is even possible that this suite, with its carefully written out and completely wrong ornaments, and its insistence on how quaint all this Olde Musick is, may some day acquire a certain value as camp.

It really won't do, though. The first thing, after all, required of an arranger is that he understand the material he is arranging, and Respighi didn't have the foggiest.

He gets off a couple of effective orchestral jokes that are refined ancestors of those one finds in the pieces about mosquitos and typewriters that Arthur Fiedler plays at the Pops, and he is extremely skilled at the cosmetic part of the transcriber's job.

The interventions of the celeste are excessive and really rather disgusting; otherwise, though, the orchestra makes charming noises of great delicacy.

As music, "The Birds" sounded thoroughly silly; it is, however, an occasion for playing of virtuosity and refinement, and that, on the whole, it got.

Gomberg and Cioffi particularly distinguished themselves as a pair of doves — or perhaps one dove whose voice changes — and Mester's conducting, except for an unbreathing opening ritornello, was first-rate.

NO MINUET

From the antique-store plate-scrapings, Mester went on to real Mozart, the festive and Brilliant C major Symphony, No. 34, K.338.

Unlike Sir Adrian Boult, the last conductor to do this work with the Boston Symphony, Mester did not include the Minuet, K.409, that some scholars believe may have been intended for it. The Minuet is a wonderfully and surprisingly rich piece, but all in all I find the Symphony more convincing in its three-movement form.

Again, Mester got beautiful playing from the orchestra, lustrous, in tune, rhythmic, and awake. The finale went with energy and spirit; the second, though taken perhaps a bit too slowly, was phrased with grace.

The grand first movement, however, missed making its point: it needs a powerfully developing, unfolding sort of performance — I still recall how splendidly Boult shaped this movement in 1966 — where what it had from Mester was only elegance of detail.

For the second half of the concert, Mester conducted Stravinsky's complete "Petrushka" score. He used the sharp and lean 1947 revision rather than the lusher 1911 original, and his swift, lightly accented conducting went along with that preference. It was consistently conceived, beautifully realized for the most part, and a great pleasure to hear.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

FEB 15 1969 New England Newsclip

Louisville's Mester guests at BSO

By Allan Sly

The Boston Symphony's parade of visiting conductors continued last week with the arrival of Jorge Mester, recently of the Juilliard faculty, now established in Louisville. He is of Mexican birth and Hungarian parentage; appearances at Tanglewood, Aspen, and Chicago, some recording, and a previous Boston assignment are all very much to his credit.

The orchestra watched him attentively, giving the impression that, whoever occupies the podium, it maintains its own identity; though willing to reflect a visitor's peculiarities, it surrenders nothing. Thus the Mozart No. 34 in C was its own bright self; in the delicious dialogue of the andante and the easy flow of the allegros Mr. Mester's somewhat fussy intentions came out in a high degree of sweetness—unessential but not unpleasing. The orchestra appeared to supply the work's underlying strengths from its own inner resources.

The same toothsome quality pervaded the opening work, Respighi's "Gli uccelli" ("The Birds"), the second musical aviary of the year, and the prettier. Based on 18th-century diversions, it frankly sets out to please, though for me its appeal rarely exceeded the charm of a valentine. It is not robust enough for Pops, hardly weighty enough for Symphony, but nice to hear (after 28 years), reminding us of a gallant personality from a time less turgid than our own.

The final work, the 1947 version of the complete ballet "Petrushka," supports Stravinsky's nomination as composer of the century. Conceived and produced in 1911 virtually as we heard it this weekend, it seems to be a focal point or node around which 20th-century music was to swing into new paths. But pervading all is a story of human frailty and suffering, callous unconcern and cruel frustration, all embodied in a tale as entertaining as it is eternally new. That Stravinsky and Diaghilev worked out its details together is one more miracle of the theater; that the right composer at the right time could give the story musical embodiment is our great good fortune.

Mr. Mester's engagement with the work was complete and convincing. Newton Wayland added still another feather to his cap by playing the prominent piano part—the very genesis of the Petrushka personality. At the Friday concert there was a premature entry of a clarinet and some very rarely encountered trouble among the trumpets. But the orchestra as a whole rode this high-mettled steed to a triumphant finish—a finish that leaves one sadder for surveying thus our human condition.

Mr. Mester is more in Stravinsky's debt than vice versa; but there will come a day when this young conductor's natural musicality and inner strengths will outstrip, rather than keep pace with (as at present), his splendid accomplishments.

The Symphony Hall management badly flunked its responsibilities on Friday. Ten door openings (eight before the bear entry, two during) were visible from the front of the house. One person forced an entry and took a seat in the very center of the front row some ten minutes into the Petrushka. The first violin section was noticeably distracted. Such public bad manners deserve public condemnation. Evidently all doors need guarding inside and out at all times.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150

FEB 17 1969 New England Newsclip

TUESDAY A SERIES

SEVENTH PROGRAM
Tuesday evening February 18 1969 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

STRAUSS — Don Juan op. 20

STRAVINSKY — Le chant du rossignol (The nightingale's song)
- The fête in the Emperor of China's palace
- The two nightingales
- Illness and recovery of the Emperor of China

intermission

BRAHMS — Symphony no. 4 in E minor op. 98*
- Allegro non troppo
- Andante moderato
- Allegro giocoso
- Allegro energico e passionato

The Sound of Music

A Brahms To Remember

By Peter M. Knapp

Two splashy tone poems were on Erich Leinsdorf's program for last night's Boston Symphony concert. But it was Brahms who came out ultimately triumphant.

After the likes of Richard Strauss' "Don Juan," and Igor Stravinsky's symphonic poem, "Le chant du rossignol," with their free-flow structures and brilliant colorations, dear old Brahms' Fourth Symphony might have been monochromatic by contrast. But it wasn't so, in the fascinating and exciting reading Leinsdorf achieved.

Leinsdorf does quite a lot of Brahms, including the Fourth. But this was something special, and I have never heard it done better. The performance had Leinsdorf's usual grasp of line and detail, but went for beyond that in a majestic combination of structure and sound. The variations of the finale seemed built block by block, to a monumental finish.

Light Strings

In the opening movement, all was extraordinarily light. The string sound seemed to float, and the wind contrasts were bright and clear. It was an unusual sound for Brahms — even for this movement. Likewise, the andante moved with noble lyricism and the scherzo had strength and "bite." It was a remarkable performance with glorious playing by the Bostonians.

It is startling to recall that the Brahms Fourth and Strauss' "Don Juan" were composed within a few years of each other in the late 1880s. Two romantics, but how different! Leinsdorf is a brilliant Strauss conductor, and the tone poem was passionately played — even impetuously in a few passages — and there was the proper display of sensuous sound, if somewhat loud.

"The "Song of the Nightingale" is early Stravinksy, of Paris days. The symphonic poem is taken from his first opera, "Le rossignol", which the composer began in 1909, put aside for "Petruchka" and "the Rite of Spring", and then completed in 1914 after finding his style had changed. Subsequently, music from the opera was employed for a Diaghilev ballet, then fashioned into the present symphonic poem.

Exotic Score

It is an evocatively exotic score, fitting the story of a Chinese emperor and the nightingale whose song saves his life. Stravinsky employs a large orchestra, but often uses it in concertante groupings of ingenious and effective voicings. Spiced with percussion and the gentle sounds of harp and celesta, often driven by ostinato rhythms of which Stravinsky is so fond, the score is imaginative chinoisrie.

The performance moved well, if cautiously in some spots, and there were many effective details. Leinsdorf is particularly good in emphasizing the grotesque or the droll in scores such as this (as in Prokofiev, for example) and his wind players enthusiastically joined in, flutist Doriot Anthony Dwyer and trumpeter Armando Ghitalla taking deserved bows.

of his program was devoted to contemporary music: Niccolo Castiglioni's "Gymel," Pierre Boulez' "Sonatine," Bruno Maderna's "Honeyreves," and Kazuo Fukushima's "Mei."

To open, there was a slight Sonata in G by Haydn, and perhaps as an antidote, Prokofiev's Sonata in D closed the program. The Haydn served as a kind of wan curtain-raiser, with a number of delicate touches by Gazzelloni but with the piano sounding somewhat worse for wear; Prokofiev came off much better — the piano-flute combination seems more congenial here, and the sonata contains Prokofiev's customarily sly melodic and harmonic twists.

In the jagged tonal world of the avant-garde, however, one encounters little of the conventional, whether it be in melody, harmony or rhythm — to say nothing of sound. Silence plays a prominent role in Castiglioni's "Gymel," spaced by gaunt piano tone-clusters or intermittent flute figurations. Boulez offers more substantial matter in a longer structure — difficult and often atmospheric writing, full of flutter-tonguing for the flute, and in which one can perceive rhythmical and tonal canons.

Inside And Out

Gazzelloni clearly is in tune with this music — as indeed is pianist Canino, who attacks the piano with enthusiasm — and he plays dynamically and with sure virtuosity. Yet this reviewer can muster no fondness for these pieces with their cerebral structures and nervous leapings. They seem more "constructed" than "composed."

More aurally satisfying was Maderna's "Honeyreves," which stretches the sonorities of both instruments. In this piece, the pianist plays both inside the piano (strumming or striking the strings) and on the keyboard, while the flute flutters, twitters and aspirates to create an effective variety of sounds. Here, Gazzelloni's tremendous control over tone and dynamics was demonstrated in the hardly-whispered sustained notes that begin and end the piece.

Fukushima's "Mei" is a dainty and melodic work evocative of Japanese temple music and using four flutes — from piccolo to bass flute. It is a lovely solo work partaking of both Western and Japanese techniques and was beautifully performed.

—P.M.K.

THURSDAY A SERIES

FIFTH PROGRAM
Thursday evening February 20 1969 at 8.30

JORGE MESTER conductor

RESPIGHI — Gli uccelli (The birds) – suite for small orchestra
- Prelude (after Bernardo Pasquini)
- The dove (after Jacques de Gallot)
- The hen (after Jean-Philippe Rameau)
- The nightingale (after an anonymous 17th century English composer)
- The cuckoo (after Bernardo Pasquini)

MOZART — Symphony no. 34 in C major K. 338
- Allegro vivace
- Andante di molto
- Finale: allegro vivace

intermission

STRAVINSKY — Petrushka (revised version of 1947)*
- The Shrove-tide fair
- Petrushka's cell
- The Moor's cell
- The fair (towards evening)

NEWTON WAYLAND piano

TUESDAY A SERIES

SEVENTH PROGRAM
Tuesday evening February 18 1969 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

STRAUSS — Don Juan op. 20

STRAVINSKY — Le chant du rossignol (The nightingale's song)
The fête in the Emperor of China's palace
The two nightingales
Illness and recovery of the Emperor of China

intermission

BRAHMS — Symphony no. 4 in E minor op. 98*
Allegro non troppo
Andante moderato
Allegro giocoso
Allegro energico e passionato

The Sound of Music

A Brahms To Remember

By Peter M. Knapp

Two splashy tone poems were on Erich Leinsdorf's program for last night's Boston Symphony concert. But it was Brahms who came out ultimately triumphant.

After the likes of Richard Strauss' "Don Juan," and Igor Stravinsky's symphonic poem, "Le chant du rossignol," with their free-flow structures and brilliant colorations, dear old Brahms' Fourth Symphony might have been monochromatic by contrast. But it wasn't so, in the fascinating and exciting reading Leinsdorf achieved.

Leinsdorf does quite a lot of Brahms, including the Fourth. But this was something special, and I have never heard it done better. The performance had Leinsdorf's usual grasp of line and detail, but went for beyond that in a majestic combination of structure and sound. The variations of the finale seemed built block by block, to a monumental finish.

Light Strings

In the opening movement, all was extraordinarily light. The string sound seemed to float, and the wind contrasts were bright and clear. It was an unusual sound for Brahms — even for this movement. Likewise, the andante moved with noble lyricism and the scherzo had strength and "bite." It was a remarkable performance with glorious playing by the Bostonians.

It is startling to recall that the Brahms Fourth and Strauss' "Don Juan" were composed within a few years of each other in the late 1880s. Two romantics, but how different! Leinsdorf is a brilliant Strauss conductor, and the tone poem was passionately played — even impetuously in a few passages — and there was the proper display of sensuous sound, if somewhat loud.

"The "Song of the Nightingale" is early Stravinksy, of Paris days. The symphonic poem is taken from his first opera, "Le rossignol", which the composer began in 1909, put aside for "Petruchka" and "the Rite of Spring", and then completed in 1914 after finding his style had changed. Subsequently, music from the opera was employed for a Diaghilev ballet, then fashioned into the present symphonic poem.

Exotic Score

It is an evocatively exotic score, fitting the story of a Chinese emperor and the nightingale whose song saves his life. Stravinsky employs a large orchestra, but often uses it in concertante groupings of ingenious and effective voicings. Spiced with percussion and the gentle sounds of harp and celesta, often driven by ostinato rhythms of which Stravinsky is so fond, the score is imaginative chinoisrie.

The performance moved well, if cautiously in some spots, and there were many effective details. Leinsdorf is particularly good in emphasizing the grotesque or the droll in scores such as this (as in Prokofiev, for example) and his wind players enthusiastically joined in, flutist Doriot Anthony Dwyer and trumpeter Armando Ghitalla taking deserved bows.

of his program was devoted to contemporary music: Niccolo Castiglioni's "Gymel," Pierre Boulez' "Sonatine," Bruno Maderna's "Honeyreves," and Kazuo Fukushima's "Mei."

To open, there was a slight Sonata in G by Haydn, and perhaps as an antidote, Prokofiev's Sonata in D closed the program. The Haydn served as a kind of wan curtain-raiser, with a number of delicate touches by Gazzelloni but with the piano sounding somewhat worse for wear; Prokofiev came off much better — the piano-flute combination seems more congenial here, and the sonata contains Prokofiev's customarily sly melodic and harmonic twists.

In the jagged tonal world of the avant-garde, however, one encounters little of the conventional, whether it be in melody, harmony or rhythm — to say nothing of sound. Silence plays a prominent role in Castiglioni's "Gymel," spaced by gaunt piano tone-clusters or intermittent flute figurations. Boulez offers more substantial matter in a longer structure — difficult and often atmospheric writing, full of flutter-tonguing for the flute, and in which one can perceive rhythmical and tonal canons.

Inside And Out

Gazzelloni clearly is in tune with this music — as indeed is pianist Canino, who attacks the piano with enthusiasm — and he plays dynamically and with sure virtuosity. Yet this reviewer can muster no fondness for these pieces with their cerebral structures and nervous leapings. They seem more "constructed" than "composed."

More aurally satisfying was Maderna's "Honeyreves," which stretches the sonorities of both instruments. In this piece, the pianist plays both inside the piano (strumming or striking the strings) and on the keyboard, while the flute flutters, twitters and aspirates to create an effective variety of sounds. Here, Gazzelloni's tremendous control over tone and dynamics was demonstrated in the hardly-whispered sustained notes that begin and end the piece.

Fukushima's "Mei" is a dainty and melodic work evocative of Japanese temple music and using four flutes — from piccolo to bass flute. It is a lovely solo work partaking of both Western and Japanese techniques and was beautifully performed.

—P.M.K.

THURSDAY A SERIES

FIFTH PROGRAM
Thursday evening February 20 1969 at 8.30

JORGE MESTER conductor

RESPIGHI — Gli uccelli (The birds) – suite for small orchestra
Prelude (after Bernardo Pasquini)
The dove (after Jacques de Gallot)
The hen (after Jean-Philippe Rameau)
The nightingale (after an anonymous 17th century English composer)
The cuckoo (after Bernardo Pasquini)

MOZART — Symphony no. 34 in C major K. 338
Allegro vivace
Andante di molto
Finale: allegro vivace

intermission

STRAVINSKY — Petrushka (revised version of 1947)*
The Shrove-tide fair
Petrushka's cell
The Moor's cell
The fair (towards evening)

NEWTON WAYLAND piano

38.

EIGHTEENTH PROGRAM
Friday afternoon February 21 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening February 22 1969 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

WEBERN — Five pieces for orchestra op. 10
- Sehr ruhig und zart (Very quietly and delicately)
- Lebhaft und zart bewegt (Moving briskly and delicately)
- Sehr langsam und äusserst ruhig (Very slowly and extremely quietly)
- Fliessend, äusserst zart (Flowing, extremely delicately)
- Sehr fliessend (Very flowing)

BEETHOVEN — Piano concerto no. 4 in G major op. 58*
- Allegro moderato
- Andante con moto
- Rondo: vivace
- EUGENE ISTOMIN

intermission

WEBERN — Five pieces for orchestra op. 10 (repeated)

BEETHOVEN — Symphony no. 3 in E flat op. 55 'Eroica'*
- Allegro con brio
- Marcia funebre: adagio assai
- Scherzo: allegro vivace
- Finale: allegro molto

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873
FEB 22 1969 New England

BSO Tribute to Late Conductor

'Eroica' Honors Ernest Ansermet

By McLAREN HARRIS

Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, whose Funeral March is so often called upon for commemorative performances, served that familiar function again at yesterday's Symphony. The "Eroica" had been scheduled already but it received its dedication when news was received of the death of Ernest Ansermet — Thursday night.

An Ansermet memorial is especially appropriate here, for he was both a giant in international music and a beloved friend to Boston. His championship of Debussy and Stravinsky in the century's early years proved an immeasurable contribution to the art, and as an orchestra leader he was a genius, having founded L'Orchestre de la Suisse Romande in 1918 in Geneva and remained its music director until retiring in 1967.

His guest-conducting engagements in Boston were several, the most recent in 1962; during the 1951-52 season he substituted for an ailing Charles Munch for eight weeks. His was one of the most authoritative voices in music, his manner the most gentle. His 85 years were lived fully and well.

THE "EROICA" we heard was probably not the kind Ansermt would have served, and that is to be expected; but it was not really the kind I anticipated from Erich Leinsdorf either. Orchestrally the performance was fair to middling and its overall dynamic shape was satisfactory, but through the first three movements there was an absence of internal expression and a metric implacability which reduced it to run-of-the-mill.

I don't favor great sweeps or rubato which pull at a work like it was a piece of taffy, but the potential drama of the "Eroica" needs something more in its preparation than a straight, never-bending Allegro in that greatest-of-all first movements striding past, or over, its best opportunities seemingly without so much as a second thought.

This is not something to be ticked off like clockwork; it is a succession of events, of surprises, of discoveries, each bearing its own significance. For example, the string of repeated dissonances in the development, one of the most gripping moments in the entire work, fairly shouts for emphasis; yet it passed as virtually any other page in the score.

THE FUNERAL MARCH fared somewhat better, principally because it contains built-in breathing spaces (measured pauses), and Leinsdorf's insistence of tempo regularity came into its own in the Scherzo, which rarely asks for relief. The variations of the finale call for a variety of pacings. Leinsdorf complied, and did so effectively; the effort paid off in well-balanced textures and flavors plus a good share of cumulative excitement.

Beethoven was also represented by the Fourth Piano Concerto in G with Eugene Istomin as soloist. Things were much more congenial here — orchestrally, anyway, as the ensemble complement was alert and lightly assured. Unfortunately, Istomin was unable to produce the delicate flow his partners did, even in the quiescence of the Andante. There was a kind of taut, tense drama to his playing which strengthened his cause, but this concerto has less requirement for tension than for brightness and a feeling of facility. It is like comparing a flick of the wrist to a jerk of the arm; the notes are the same, bu the effect isn't.

WEBERN'S FIVE Pieces for orchestra, Opus 10, were performed twice, and I think it was an excellent idea, for not only are the elemental beauties of this utterly delicate, even ethereal, subtle and varicolored score not all immediately apparent, but the pieces are so brief as to escape before the listener's complete concentration can be brought to bear. The little climactic events, the angular motives which somehow are welded into a lyric chain become (and became) more appealing with each hearing.

Next week Leinsdorf will conduct Edgar Varese's "Deserts," a work for orchestra and electronic tape; Mahler's Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen, with baritone Hermann Prey; and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5.

ERNEST ANSERMET

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
FEB 22 1969 New England Newsclip

Leinsdorf Revives 'Five Pieces'

By GEORGE GELLES
Music Critic

America first heard Anton Webern's "Five Pieces for Orchestra," his Opus 10, in 1926, when Serge Koussevitzky played them on a Boston Symphony concert. Until yesterday afternoon, when Erich Leinsdorf led them twice, at the start of either half of his Symphony Hall program, they rested in the BSO library, unheard in town.

It's a sad commentary, of course, considering their worth and warm reception shown them by the audience. In his informative program book essay, Andrew Raeburn quotes one Susan Bradshaw to the effect that the "Five Pieces" represent the "annihilation of Brahms." This is quite missing the point; for though Webern's first orchestral work, the "Passacaglia" grew unmistakably out of late German Romantic soil, the "Five Pieces" embody this same essence distilled, purified, refined. And there's not that much spiritual distance between the late piano miniatures of Brahms and these vignettes of Webern.

As is often the case when a work modern and unfamiliar to the orchestra is given back to back readings, the first of them was stiffer and somewhat cleaner, the second more musically relaxed and a shade sloppier. Neither was the last word in poetic conducting, but both performances gave an excellent idea of what the pieces are about.

Eugene Istomin, who was soloist in the Beethoven G Major Piano Concerto, is a good solid player and one not very imaginative. If there was a "standard" reading, his would be it, neither too fast nor too slow, too loud or too soft. And though his neutrality didn't move me one way or the other — though I found his playing boring — I most missed a sense of inner tension, of activity under the surface. Leinsdorf's accompaniment supplied most of the bite and muscle here; the solo work was flaccid.

I also found impressive Leinsdorf's reading of Beethoven's Third Symphony, the "Eroica". It was missing a repeat in the first movement that seems essential (for the development reaches as far harmonically as was in 1804 possible, and needs to be balanced) and in a general way it possibly spent itself too soon, for the last two movements were weaker than the first two, but it was convincing in other ways: in its rhythmic vitality, in the life and movement given the inner parts, in the admirable balance between strings and winds.

Unlike the "Pastoral", Beethovens' Sixth, which we heard a few weeks ago, the "Eroica" is highly charged, full of dramatic touches, and restive. It's a piece much more congenial to Leinsdorf than was the Sixth, and his performance was a good one.

It was played, incidently, in memory of Ernest Ansermet the Swiss conductor, who died earlier this week.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
FEB 20 1969 New England

BSO Will Perform Webers Five Pieces

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in a rare departure from usual practice, will perform Anton Webern's Five Pieces for Orchestra twice at each of the Friday afternoon and Saturday night Symphony concerts this week. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Webern work at the program's beginning and again after intermission.

The remainder will consist of Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 in G with Eugene Istomin as soloist, and the "Eroica" Symphony.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Ernest Ansermet
November 11 1883 – February 20 1969

Beethoven's symphony no. 3 in E flat is played in memory of Ernest Ansermet, who was on many occasions guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Istomin soloist with Symphony

Eugene Istomin will be soloist with the Boston Symphony in Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 Friday at 2 and Saturday at 8:30. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the program which also will include Webern's Five Pieces for Orchestra, Op. 10, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, the "Eroica."

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905
FEB 16 1969

Beethoven at BSO

Leinsdorf's 'Eroica'

By Allan Sly

ARTS ENTERTAINMENT

That the Boston Symphony is indeed a great orchestra was made abundantly clear when Erich Leinsdorf returned last week— not that it mirrored his individuality but rather that under his guidance it realized its own best potential.

Last week Beethoven's "Eroica," played in memory of Ernest Ansermet, easily outpaced any other performances of the work within memory. There was no communication gap between Beethoven and today's listeners; the notes appeared to leap into existence as from the composer's imagination. All the quaint innovations of phrase and rhythm, all the self-generating forms, all the consequent spiritual illumination and transcendent emotion swept performers and listeners along together.

Some outstanding virtues were the magnificent bass section; the overall intelligence of the strings, in rhythmic subtlety as well as in dynamics and tone quality; the expressivity of the horns, subjectively colored according to the matter in hand; the deployment of trumpets and timpani in the nick of time; the interplay of the woodwind soloists under varied circumstances.

Together with pianist Eugene Istomin, Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra made Beethoven's G-major concerto a thing of great beauty and tender charm, yet of underlying strength. I found myself recalling wistfully the more Germanic character that Artur Schnabel brought to it. On Friday last I thought at times the piece might take wings and fly out of range. But it didn't, and the high poetic content seemed to be what the full house had come to enjoy.

Rhythmically airborne

The concerto and symphony were each preceded by a performance of Webern's Five Pieces for Orchestra (1911-13). Last played here in 1926, they deserved this double exposure and the listeners responded with cordiality. A miniorchestra traverses these minipieces in a few moments; but they convey a quintessence of experience, a distillation, which makes Beethoven seem garrulous by comparison, for all his celebrated concentration of material. Andrew Raeburn's splendid program note on Webern matched these pieces in fascination and added to one's mental furniture another facet of this curious century.

Mr. Leinsdorf's way with Germanic music puts a listener on his toes to anticipate how a well-known phrase will go — always with a freshness that eludes description. Rhythmically the line is airborne from start to finish; emphatic moments are inescapable but never the least bit ponderous; lyrical flights are clean and carry their own sentiment with them, are never burdened by it. The tone colors are inflected with pertinent meaning, not merely an element of charm. And always the pace has animation tempered by intelligence. These qualities make occasions of his Beethoven programs; while one looks forward to his Ninth Symphony in April, one regrets the leave-taking nature of the event.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150
FEB 25 1969 New England Newsclip

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
FEB 22 1969 New England Newsclip

Webern's 5 Pieces well done by BSO

By HARRY NEVILLE
Staff Writer

At yesterday's afternoon Boston Symphony concert, one of the patrons wondered aloud at intermission: "Why couldn't they have made it into an all-Beethoven program and done 'Wellington's Victory' instead of that piece?" "That piece" happened to be Anton Webern's Five Pieces for Orchestra, Op. 10. It had begun the program, was to be heard again after intermission, and had not been previously heard at a Boston Symphony concert since 1926.

The last fact deserves some pondering by the people in charge of BSO programming, for it explains in part, the necessity of playing twice on the same program a work completed in 1913. It also throws some light on the anonymous patron's attitude — an attitude shared one may be certain, by a large part of the audience.

If it is possible or desirable to "educate" an audience — and we have some evidence in the Webern that Mr. Leinsdorf thinks it is — then what we surely need is a more consistent programming of contemporary or near-contemporary works. Five minutes (or ten, counting the repetition) of Webern seems a rather slender bone to throw to the culturally deprived of Symphony Hall.

The Five Pieces are much more difficult for the players than for the audience, and yesterday they got an excellent reading, particularly in the matter of the subtle tempo changes in which the score abounds. There was less than absolute precision in the observance of Webern's dynamics, but the second time around was an improvement on the first, and tomorrow night's performance will no doubt be better still.

Eugene Istomin was the soloist in Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto. He gave a performance that was rather monochromatic in color, with little in the way of definition of contrasting ideas. It would have helped in the first movement if distinctions had been observed among the various kinds of touch Beethoven asks for. The last movement suffered from clipped rhythms and misplaced accents. Istomin used Beethoven's own cadenzas and the playing here was quite refined and nicely articulated.

Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony concluded the program, and the performance seemed to be suffering from a bad case of tired blood.

4 Concerts By Symphony This Week

The eighteenth pair of Friday/Saturday Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will be conducted by the orchestra's music director, Erich Leinsdorf. Pianist Eugene Istomin will be soloist in Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 in G.

Anton Webern's Five Pieces for orchestra, Op. 10, will open the program. Composed between 1911 and 1913, the Five Pieces for orchestra received its first American performance in 1926 with the Boston Symphony, Serge Koussevitsky conducting. Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, 'Eroica,' will close the program.

The orchestra will give two other concerts during the week. On Tuesday evening, Erich Leinsdorf will conduct Strauss' "Don Juan," Stravinsky's "Le Chant du Rossignol" and Brahms' Symphony No. 4. On Thursday guest conductor Jorge Mester will conduct the orchestra in Respighi's "Gli uccelli," Mozart's Symphony No. 34 and Stravinsky's "Petrushka."

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436
FEB 16 1969 New England Newsclip

38.

EIGHTEENTH PROGRAM
Friday afternoon February 21 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening February 22 1969 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

WEBERN — Five pieces for orchestra op. 10
- Sehr ruhig und zart (Very quietly and delicately)
- Lebhaft und zart bewegt (Moving briskly and delicately)
- Sehr langsam und äusserst ruhig (Very slowly and extremely quietly)
- Fliessend, äusserst zart (Flowing, extremely delicately)
- Sehr fliessend (Very flowing)

BEETHOVEN — Piano concerto no. 4 in G major op. 58*
- Allegro moderato
- Andante con moto
- Rondo: vivace
- EUGENE ISTOMIN

intermission

WEBERN — Five pieces for orchestra op. 10 (repeated)

BEETHOVEN — Symphony no. 3 in E flat op. 55 'Eroica'*
- Allegro con brio
- Marcia funebre: adagio assai
- Scherzo: allegro vivace
- Finale: allegro molto

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

FEB 22 1969 New England

Leinsdorf Revives 'Five Pieces'

By GEORGE GELLES
Music Critic

America first heard Anton Webern's "Five Pieces for Orchestra," his Opus 10, in 1926, when Serge Koussevitzky played them on a Boston Symphony concert. Until yesterday afternoon, when Erich Leinsdorf led them twice, at the start of either half of his Symphony Hall program, they rested in the BSO library, unheard in town.

It's a sad commentary, of course, considering their worth and warm reception shown them by the audience. In his informative program book essay, Andrew Raeburn quotes one Susan Bradshaw to the effect that the "Five Pieces" represent the "annihilation of Brahms." This is quite missing the point; for though Webern's first orchestral work, the "Passacaglia" grew unmistakably out of late German Romantic soil, the "Five Pieces" embody this same essence distilled, purified, refined. And there's not that much spiritual distance between the late piano miniatures of Brahms and these vignettes of Webern.

As is often the case when a work modern and unfamiliar to the orchestra is given back to back readings, the first of them was stiffer and somewhat cleaner, the second more musically relaxed and a shade slopier. Neither was the last word in poetic conducting, but both performances gave an excellent idea of what the pieces are about.

Eugene Istomin, who was soloist in the Beethoven G Major Piano Concerto, is a good solid player and one not very imaginative. If there was a "standard" reading, his would be it, neither too fast nor too slow, too loud or too soft. And though his neutrality didn't move me one way or the other — though I found his playing boring — I most missed a sense of inner tension, of activity under the surface. Leinsdorf's accompaniment supplied most of the bite and muscle here; the solo work was flaccid.

I also found impressive Leinsdorf's reading of Beethoven's Third Symphony, the "Eroica". It was missing a repeat in the first movement that seems essential (for the development reaches as far harmonically as was in 1804 possible, and needs to be balanced) and in a general way it possibly spent itself too soon, for the last two movements were weaker than the first two, but it was convincing in other ways: in its rhythmic vitality, in the life and movement given the inner parts, in the admirable balance between strings and winds.

Unlike the "Pastoral", Beethovens' Sixth, which we heard a few weeks ago, the "Eroica" is highly charged, full of dramatic touches, and restive. It's a piece much more congenial to Leinsdorf than was the Sixth, and his performance was a good one.

It was played, incidently, in memory of Ernest Ansermet the Swiss conductor, who died earlier this week.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Ernest Ansermet
November 11 1883 – February 20 1969

Beethoven's symphony no. 3 in E flat is played in memory of Ernest Ansermet, who was on many occasions guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BSO Tribute to Late Conductor

'Eroica' Honors Ernest Ansermet

By McLAREN HARRIS

Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, whose Funeral March is so often called upon for commemorative performances, served that familiar function again at yesterday's Symphony. The "Eroica" had been scheduled already but it received its dedication when news was received of the death of Ernest Ansermet — Thursday night.

An Ansermet memorial is especially appropriate here, for he was both a giant in international music and a beloved friend to Boston. His championship of Debussy and Stravinsky in the century's early years proved an immeasurable contribution to the art, and as an orchestra leader he was a genius, having founded L'Orchestre de la Suisse Romande in 1918 in Geneva and remained its music director until retiring in 1967.

His guest-conducting engagements in Boston were several, the most recent in 1962; during the 1951-52 season he substituted for an ailing Charles Munch for eight weeks. His was one of the most authoritative voices in music, his manner the most gentle. His 85 years were lived fully and well.

ERNEST ANSERMET

THE "EROICA" we heard was probably not the kind Ansermt would have served, and that is to be expected; but it was not really the kind I anticipated from Erich Leinsdorf either. Orchestrally the performance was fair to middling and its overall dynamic shape was satisfactory, but through the first three movements there was an absence of internal expression and a metric implacability which reduced it to run-of-the-mill.

I don't favor great sweeps or rubato which pull at a work like it was a piece of taffy, but the potential drama of the "Eroica" needs something more in its preparation than a straight, never-bending Allegro in that greatest-of-all first movements striding past, or over, its best opportunities seemingly without so much as a second thought.

This is not something to be ticked off like clockwork; it is a succession of events, of surprises, of discoveries, each bearing its own significance. For example, the string of repeated dissonances in the development, one of the most gripping moments in the entire work, fairly shouts for emphasis; yet it passed as virtually any other page in the score.

THE FUNERAL MARCH fared somewhat better, principally because it contains built-in breathing spaces (measured pauses), and Leinsdorf's insistence of tempo regularity came into its own in the Scherzo, which rarely asks for relief. The variations of the finale call for a variety of pacings. Leinsdorf complied, and did so effectively; the effort paid off in well-balanced textures and flavors plus a good share of cumulative excitement.

Beethoven was also represented by the Fourth Piano Concerto in G with Eugene Istomin as soloist. Things were much more congenial here — orchestrally, anyway, as the ensemble complement was alert and lightly assured. Unfortunately, Istomin was unable to produce the delicate flow his partners did, even in the quiescence of the Andante. There was a kind of taut, tense drama to his playing which strengthened his cause, but this concerto has less requirement for tension than for brightness and a feeling of facility. It is like comparing a flick of the wrist to a jerk of the arm; the notes are the same, bu the effect isn't.

WEBERN'S FIVE Pieces for orchestra, Opus 10, were performed twice, and I think it was an excellent idea, for not only are the elemental beauties of this utterly delicate, even ethereal, subtle and varicolored score not all immediately apparent, but the pieces are so brief as to escape before the listener's complete concentration can be brought to bear. The little climactic events, the angular motives which somehow are welded into a lyric chain become (and became) more appealing with each hearing.

Next week Leinsdorf will conduct Edgar Varese's "Deserts," a work for orchestra and electronic tape; Mahler's Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen, with baritone Hermann Prey; and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

FEB 22 1969 New England Newsclip

BSO Will Perform Webers Five Pieces

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in a rare departure from usual practice, will perform Anton Webern's Five Pieces for Orchestra twice at each of the Friday afternoon and Saturday night Symphony concerts this week. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Webern work at the program's beginning and again after intermission.

The remainder will consist of Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 in G with Eugene Istomin as soloist, and the "Eroica" Symphony.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

FEB 20 1969 New England

Istomin soloist with Symphony

Eugene Istomin will be soloist with the Boston Symphony in Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 Friday at 2 and Saturday at 8:30. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the program which also will include Webern's Five Pieces for Orchestra, Op. 10, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, the "Eroica."

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905

FEB 16 1969

Beethoven at BSO

Leinsdorf's 'Eroica'

By Allan Sly

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

That the Boston Symphony is indeed a great orchestra was made abundantly clear when Erich Leinsdorf returned last week—not that it mirrored his individuality but rather that under his guidance it realized its own best potential.

Last week Beethoven's "Eroica," played in memory of Ernest Ansermet, easily outpaced any other performances of the work within memory. There was no communication gap between Beethoven and today's listeners; the notes appeared to leap into existence as from the composer's imagination. All the quaint innovations of phrase and rhythm, all the self-generating forms, all the consequent spiritual illumination and transcendent emotion swept performers and listeners along together.

Some outstanding virtues were the magnificent bass section; the overall intelligence of the strings, in rhythmic subtlety as well as in dynamics and tone quality; the expressivity of the horns, subjectively colored according to the matter in hand; the deployment of trumpets and timpani in the nick of time; the interplay of the woodwind soloists under varied circumstances.

Together with pianist Eugene Istomin, Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra made Beethoven's G-major concerto a thing of great beauty and tender charm, yet of underlying strength. I found myself recalling wistfully the more Germanic character that Artur Schnabel brought to it. On Friday last I thought at times the piece might take wings and fly out of range. But it didn't, and the high poetic content seemed to be what the full house had come to enjoy.

Rhythmically airborne

The concerto and symphony were each preceded by a performance of Webern's Five Pieces for Orchestra (1911-13). Last played here in 1926, they deserved this double exposure and the listeners responded with cordiality. A miniorchestra traverses these minipieces in a few moments; but they convey a quintessence of experience, a distillation, which makes Beethoven seem garrulous by comparison, for all his celebrated concentration of material. Andrew Raeburn's splendid program note on Webern matched these pieces in fascination and added to one's mental furniture another facet of this curious century.

Mr. Leinsdorf's way with Germanic music puts a listener on his toes to anticipate how a well-known phrase will go — always with a freshness that eludes description. Rhythmically the line is airborne from start to finish; emphatic moments are inescapable but never the least bit ponderous; lyrical flights are clean and carry their own sentiment with them, are never burdened by it. The tone colors are inflected with pertinent meaning, not merely an element of charm. And always the pace has animation tempered by intelligence. These qualities make occasions of his Beethoven programs; while one looks forward to his Ninth Symphony in April, one regrets the leave-taking nature of the event.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150

FEB 25 1969 New England Newsclip

Webern's 5 Pieces well done by BSO

By HARRY NEVILLE
Staff Writer

At yesterday's afternoon Boston Symphony concert, one of the patrons wondered aloud at intermission: "Why couldn't they have made it into an all-Beethoven program and done 'Wellington's Victory' instead of that piece?" "That piece" happened to be Anton Webern's Five Pieces for Orchestra, Op. 10. It had begun the program, was to be heard again after intermission, and had not been previously heard at a Boston Symphony concert since 1926.

The last fact deserves some pondering by the people in charge of BSO programming, for it explains in part, the necessity of playing twice on the same program a work completed in 1913. It also throws some light on the anonymous patron's attitude — an attitude shared one may be certain, by a large part of the audience.

If it is possible or desirable to "educate" an audience — and we have some evidence in the Webern that Mr. Leinsdorf thinks it is — then what we surely need is a more consistent programming of contemporary or near-contemporary works. Five minutes (or ten, counting the repetition) of Webern seems a rather slender bone to throw to the culturally deprived of Symphony Hall.

The Five Pieces are much more difficult for the players than for the audience, and yesterday they got an excellent reading, particularly in the matter of the subtle tempo changes in which the score abounds. There was less than absolute precision in the observance of Webern's dynamics, but the second time around was an improvement on the first, and tomorrow night's performance will no doubt be better still.

Eugene Istomin was the soloist in Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto. He gave a performance that was rather monochromatic in color, with little in the way of definition of contrasting ideas. It would have helped in the first movement if distinctions had been observed among the various kinds of touch Beethoven asks for. The last movement suffered from clipped rhythms and misplaced accents. Istomin used Beethoven's own cadenzas and the playing here was quite refined and nicely articulated.

Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony concluded the program, and the performance seemed to be suffering from a bad case of tired blood.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

FEB 22 1969 New England Newsclip

4 Concerts By Symphony This Week

The eighteenth pair of Friday/Saturday Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will be conducted by the orchestra's music director, Erich Leinsdorf. Pianist Eugene Istomin will be soloist in Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 in G.

Anton Webern's Five Pieces for orchestra, Op. 10, will open the program. Composed between 1911 and 1913, the Five Pieces for orchestra received its first American performance in 1926 with the Boston Symphony, Serge Koussevitsky conducting. Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, 'Eroica,' will close the program.

The orchestra will give two other concerts during the week. On Tuesday evening, Erich Leinsdorf will conduct Strauss' "Don Juan," Stravinsky's "Le Chant du Rossignol" and Brahms' Symphony No. 4. On Thursday guest conductor Jorge Mester will conduct the orchestra in Respighi's "Gli uccelli," Mozart's Symphony No. 34 and Stravinsky's "Petrushka."

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436

FEB 16 1969 New England Newsclip

TUESDAY A SERIES

EIGHTH PROGRAM
Tuesday evening February 25 1969 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

WEBERN	Five pieces for orchestra op. 10
	Sehr ruhig und zart (Very quietly and delicately)
	Lebhaft und zart bewegt (Moving briskly and delicately)
	Sehr langsam und äusserst ruhig (Very slowly and extremely quietly)
	Fliessend, äusserst zart (Flowing, extremely delicately)
	Sehr fliessend (Very flowing)
BEETHOVEN	Piano concerto no. 4 in G major op. 58*
	Allegro moderato
	Andante con moto
	Rondo: vivace
	EUGENE ISTOMIN
intermission
BEETHOVEN	Symphony no. 3 in E flat op. 55 'Eroica'*
	Allegro con brio
	Marcia funebre: adagio assai
	Scherzo: allegro vivace
	Finale: allegro molto

The Sound of Music

Symphony, And All The Comforts Of Home

By Dorothy Newell

There were few in the live audience for Erich Leinsdorf's return to the Boston Symphony podium Tuesday night, but he was not lacking in listeners. The decision of WGBH-TV, Channel 2 to film the performance kept symphony regulars with electricity from missing the show, and provided others homebound by the storm (including this reviewer) an evening's pleasure.

The first-half program inadvertently reflected the difficulty of travel; there were few players on the platform. But it was planned.

Webern's Five Pieces for Orchestra, Opus 10, requires only a chamber-sized orchestra, while Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4, in F Major, Opus 58, uses strings and winds and with only tympani — and the solo piano — in the percussion.

The Webern was a warmup. It couldn't have taken as long as seven minutes to perform. While there were a multiplicity of "movements," and varieties of instruments — add mandolin, guitar, glockinspiel and other odd ones to the quartet of strings — and of staggered and dissimilar sounds, the piece was over blessedly soon.

The more traditional solo brought Eugene Istomin, 36-year-old pianist, to Boston. He played the three movements of Beethoven's 1806 work with precision and from memory. The work had a slow start, proceeding to stately, almost sombre mood, and concluding in a spirited manner. While the piano took the lead for the first two movements, it was the orchestra leading in the finale.

It's great to watch a pianist on television. Not the Liberace kind with sequins and tails and candles, but the serious artist, seen through the creative eye of educational TV. Istomin, who studied at Curtis Institute and got his start in an orchestra youth contest, has long fingers (No, pianists don't). And you wouldn't have known if you'd been in Symphony Hall. You wouldn't have followed the intricate fingering required for embellished scales, or seen the method in one-hand exercise.

EUGENE ISTOMIN
. . . stormy welcome

The full second half program — with full orchestra now — was given to another Beethoven work, Symphony No. 3 in B-flat Opus 55, Eroica. Here the winds were again dominant, not in volume, but in solo.

Eroica requires double the usual number of winds and horns. The oboe, flute and bassoon (sometimes French horn) teamed for many of the solo themes. Interesting how the flute's softness tempers the ordinarily shrill tones of the double reeds, especially oboe.

Conductor Face-On

The second movement took a minor theme, while the third was vibrant. The staccatos seemed let loose — like a reward for patience in the slower parts. The third was the familiar melody of the evening, concluding with a horn trio.

In Eroica's final movement, the strings and winds play a theme embellished in pizzacato.

It was a pleasure to watch Leinsdorf again, his direction is a study in understatement, and on television you have the forward look instead of the view from the pew.

There are some disadvantages. You sometimes get the distorted view created by a camerman trying to be artsy. Picture Leinsdorf directing himself, butting heads with himself in an unkind, unfunny caricature. And you don't get to people-watch at home. The fashion show at symphony is something since the pants suit.

But there are other advantages. You can see some of the players so much more clearly. You don't have to guess, "was that the French horn?"

You don't have to drive in the storm. And you can finish the supper dishes during intermission.

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 62,736
FEB 27 1969 New England

BSO ON TV

Pianist Eugene Istomin joins the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a Channel 2 telecast concert live and in color, Tuesday, Feb. 25 at 8:30 p.m. WGBH radio (89.7 FM) will broadcast the program simultaneously. Conductor Erich Leinsdorf has chosen Five Orchestra Pieces, Op. 10 by Webern. Istomin performs Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 in G, Op. 58. Concert concludes with Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 ("Eroica").

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000
FEB 13 1969 New England

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

BSO: WEBERN AND BEETHOVEN

Anton Webern, much written about but rarely performed, is at last making something of a show of strength in the local repertory during these autumnal days of Erich Leinsdorf's tenure here. Last week it was his Five Pieces for Orchestra, Opus 10 which showed up for the first time since the only previous airing in 1926.

Not only did the work show up, but it was played twice, at the beginning and immediately after the intermission, in order "to give," said Mr. Leinsdorf as quoted in the program notes, "our audience the rare opportunity of hearing two performances of this significant and seldom played work in close succession."

Webern is so much written about, of course, because more than any other composer he has inspired the totally organized approach to music. Schoenberg had earlier done so in the exploration of serial technique in the direction of pitch, but Webern dealt with the organization of the duration of notes at the expense of pitch. The essence of a vast fraction of contemporary writing, as a consequence, dilates on the very matter of sound itself.

The Five Pieces embodies the quintessence of Webern's craft. He employs only a few instruments and these seldom simultaneously. He achieves orchestral effects from solo, pointillistic materials and in doing so creates the effect of largeness of scale with ultimate concision. With time and familiarity, it is said, one can approach Webern's points of reference, the indispensability of each note and fragment, the emotional current and warmth beneath the delicacy and subtlety of the filigree made by the piccolo, cowbells and some other instruments of a greater or lesser exoticism.

This may well be so. But hearing it, as I did, on Washington's birthday I can only be candid about Webern: the man's influence continues to be so awesome and his following so legion and perfervid that he must be more than legend. A good deal more exposure is indispensable to me, however.

If there is merit to that, then to play the piece twice makes enormous good sense. Actually, the practice of repeating a work on the same program is not alien to the tradition here. Dr. Koussevitsky not only sometimes did that but fairly often repeated new works (and even old ones) twice in a season. The applause for the Five Pieces was tepid after the first run. After the second it was at least routinely cordial.

The Beethoven Fourth Piano Concerto in G major with Eugene Istomin as soloist and the "Eroica" Symphony constituted the balance of the program. There are various ways to play this concerto, perhaps the most elegant of all works in the form, but Mr. Istomin's notions surely cannot occupy a very exalted place among them.

B.S.O. On TV February 27

Noted American pianist Eugene Istomin joins the Boston Symphony Orchestra when Channel 2 presents the fifth telecast concert of the season, live and in color, Tuesday, February 25 at 8:30 p.m.

WGBH radio (89.7 FM) will broadcast the program simultaneously in stereo so that viewers may have the benefit of superior sound reproduction which hi-quality FM radio provides.

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf has chosen Five Orchestera Pieces, Op. 10 by Webern. Istomin performs Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 in G, Op. 58.

The concert concludes with Beethoven's popular Symphony No. 3, better known as the "Eroica."

STAR
WINCHESTER, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 5,450
FEB 13 1969 New England

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000
FEB 27 1969 New England

TUESDAY A SERIES

EIGHTH PROGRAM
Tuesday evening February 25 1969 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

WEBERN — Five pieces for orchestra op. 10
- Sehr ruhig und zart (Very quietly and delicately)
- Lebhaft und zart bewegt (Moving briskly and delicately)
- Sehr langsam und äusserst ruhig (Very slowly and extremely quietly)
- Fliessend, äusserst zart (Flowing, extremely delicately)
- Sehr fliessend (Very flowing)

BEETHOVEN — Piano concerto no. 4 in G major op. 58*
- Allegro moderato
- Andante con moto
- Rondo: vivace
- EUGENE ISTOMIN

intermission

BEETHOVEN — Symphony no. 3 in E flat op. 55 'Eroica'*
- Allegro con brio
- Marcia funebre: adagio assai
- Scherzo: allegro vivace
- Finale: allegro molto

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

BSO: WEBERN AND BEETHOVEN

Anton Webern, much written about but rarely performed, is at last making something of a show of strength in the local repertory during these autumnal days of Erich Leinsdorf's tenure here. Last week it was his Five Pieces for Orchestra, Opus 10 which showed up for the first time since the only previous airing in 1926.

Not only did the work show up, but it was played twice, at the beginning and immediately after the intermission, in order "to give," said Mr. Leinsdorf as quoted in the program notes, "our audience the rare opportunity of hearing two performances of this significant and seldom played work in close succession."

Webern is so much written about, of course, because more than any other composer he has inspired the totally organized approach to music. Schoenberg had earlier done so in the exploration of serial technique in the direction of pitch, but Webern dealt with the organization of the duration of notes at the expense of pitch. The essence of a vast fraction of contemporary writing, as a consequence, dilates on the very matter of sound itself.

The Five Pieces embodies the quintessence of Webern's craft. He employs only a few instruments and these seldom simultaneously. He achieves orchestral effects from solo, pointillistic materials and in doing so creates the effect of largeness of scale with ultimate concision. With time and familiarity, it is said, one can approach Webern's points of reference, the indispensability of each note and fragment, the emotional current and warmth beneath the delicacy and subtlety of the filigree made by the piccolo, cowbells and some other instruments of a greater or lesser exoticism.

This may well be so. But hearing it, as I did, on Washington's birthday I can only be candid about Webern: the man's influence continues to be so awesome and his following so legion and perfervid that he must be more than legend. A good deal more exposure is indispensable to me, however.

If there is merit to that, then to play the piece twice makes enormous good sense. Actually, the practice of repeating a work on the same program is not alien to the tradition here. Dr. Koussevitsky not only sometimes did that but fairly often repeated new works (and even old ones) twice in a season. The applause for the Five Pieces was tepid after the first run. After the second it was at least routinely cordial.

The Beethoven Fourth Piano Concerto in G major with Eugene Istomin as soloist and the "Eroica" Symphony constituted the balance of the program. There are various ways to play this concerto, perhaps the most elegant of all works in the form, but Mr. Istomin's notions surely cannot occupy a very exalted place among them.

The Sound of Music

Symphony, And All The Comforts Of Home

By Dorothy Newell

There were few in the live audience for Erich Leinsdorf's return to the Boston Symphony podium Tuesday night, but he was not lacking in listeners. The decision of WGBH-TV, Channel 2 to film the performance kept symphony regulars with electricity from missing the show, and provided others homebound by the storm (including this reviewer) an evening's pleasure.

The first-half program inadvertently reflected the difficulty of travel; there were few players on the platform. But it was planned.

Webern's Five Pieces for Orchestra, Opus 10, requires only a chamber-sized orchestra, while Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4, in F Major, Opus 58, uses strings and winds and with only tympani — and the solo piano — in the percussion.

The Webern was a warmup. It couldn't have taken as long as seven minutes to perform. While there were a multiplicity of "movements," and varieties of instruments — add mandolin, guitar, glockinspiel and other odd ones to the quartet of strings — and of staggered and dissimilar sounds, the piece was over blessedly soon.

The more traditional solo brought Eugene Istomin, 36-year-old pianist, to Boston. He played the three movements of Beethoven's 1806 work with precision and from memory. The work had a slow start, proceeding to stately, almost sombre mood, and concluding in a spirited manner. While the piano took the lead for the first two movements, it was the orchestra leading in the finale.

It's great to watch a pianist on television. Not the Liberace kind with sequins and tails and candles, but the serious artist, seen through the creative eye of educational TV. Istomin, who studied at Curtis Institute and got his start in an orchestra youth contest, has long fingers (No, pianists don't). And you wouldn't have known if you'd been in Symphony Hall. You wouldn't have followed the intricate fingering required for embellished scales, or seen the method in one-hand exercise.

EUGENE ISTOMIN
. . . stormy welcome

The full second half program — with full orchestra now — was given to another Beethoven work, Symphony No. 3 in B-flat Opus 55, Eroica. Here the winds were again dominant, not in volume, but in solo.

Eroica requires double the usual number of winds and horns. The oboe, flute and bassoon (sometimes French horn) teamed for many of the solo themes. Interesting how the flute's softness tempers the ordinarily shrill tones of the double reeds, especially oboe.

Conductor Face-On

The second movement took a minor theme, while the third was vibrant. The staccatos seemed let loose — like a reward for patience in the slower parts. The third was the familiar melody of the evening, concluding with a horn trio.

In Eroica's final movement, the strings and winds play a theme embellished in pizzacato.

It was a pleasure to watch Leinsdorf again, his direction is a study in understatement, and on television you have the forward look instead of the view from the pew.

There are some disadvantages. You sometimes get the distorted view created by a camerman trying to be artsy. Picture Leinsdorf directing himself, butting heads with himself in an unkind, unfunny caricature. And you don't get to people-watch at home. The fashion show at symphony is something since the pants suit.

But there are other advantages. You can see some of the players so much more clearly. You don't have to guess, "was that the French horn?"

You don't have to drive in the storm. And you can finish the supper dishes during intermission.

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 62,736

FEB 27 1969 New England

BSO ON TV

Pianist Eugene Istomin joins the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a Channel 2 telecast concert live and in color, Tuesday, Feb. 25 at 8:30 p.m. WGBH radio (89.7 FM) will broadcast the program simultaneously. Conductor Erich Leinsdorf has chosen Five Orchestra Pieces, Op. 10 by Webern. Istomin performs Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 in G, Op. 58. Concert concludes with Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 ("Eroica").

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

FEB 13 1969 New England

B.S.O. On TV February 27

Noted American pianist Eugene Istomin joins the Boston Symphony Orchestra when Channel 2 presents the fifth telecast concert of the season, live and in color, Tuesday, February 25 at 8:30 p.m.

WGBH radio (89.7 FM) will broadcast the program simultaneously in stereo so that viewers may have the benefit of superior sound reproduction which hi-quality FM radio provides.

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf has chosen Five Orchestera Pieces, Op. 10 by Webern. Istomin performs Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 in G, Op. 58.

The concert concludes with Beethoven's popular Symphony No. 3, better known as the "Eroica."

STAR
WINCHESTER, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 5,450

FEB 13 1969 New England

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

FEB 27 1969 New England

40.

NINETEENTH PROGRAM
Friday afternoon February 28 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening March 1 1969 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

VARÈSE Désertst
first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

MAHLER Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen
(Songs of a wayfarer)
Wenn mein Schatz Hochzeit macht
(My sweetheart's wedding day)
Ging heut morgen über's Feld
(This morning I walked through the field)
Ich hab ein glühend Messer
(I feel a knife burning in my breast)
Die zwei blauen Augen von meinem Schatz
(My sweetheart's blue eyes)

HERMANN PREY baritone

intermission

TCHAIKOVSKY Symphony no. 5 in E minor op. 64*
Andante – allegro con anima
Andante cantabile con alcuna licenza
Valse: allegro moderato
Finale: andante maestoso – allegro vivace

Varese 'Deserts' exciting sound

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

"Deserts" by Edgard Varese, composed in 1954, introduced to Boston in 1962 during Frederik Prausnitz's first season at the New England Conservatory was played at a Boston Symphony concert for the first time on Friday afternoon, Erich Leinsdorf conducting.

When Varese died in November 1965, not quite 82, he had lived three careers as a composer. The first of these was finished by time he was 20. All that music is lost or destroyed, but it included, characteristically enough for the composer whom his colleague, Otto Luening, was to toast in 1963 as "really the first of the astronauts," a Jules Verne opera, written in 1894!

The second Varese chapter came after his move to America when, in the 20's and early 30's, he wrote what are still his most famous instrumental and vocal works, "Ameriques," "Hyperprism," "Octandre," "Integrales," "Arcana," "Ionization," "Ecuatorial," "Density 21.5."

Then he stopped. The situation seemed hopeless. His music was ignored. His impatience with existing performance resources grew, and so did his obsession with creating an instrument that would bring new sounds and free music from the tempered system. The 50's at last provided the technology that made possible the electronic music of which Varese had dreamed when Milton Babbitt was in diapers and Karlheinz Stockhausen and Mario Davidovsky were yet unborn.

With "Deserts" and the "Poeme electronique," whose 11 channels of sound were played through 425 speakers in Le Corbusier's Philips Pavilion at the Brussels fair, the third phase of Varese's life as a composer began.

"Deserts," a big piece, takes about 24 minutes to play. It consists of four instrumental sections of different lengths, scored for flutes, clarinets, brass, piano, and more than 40 percussion instruments, and these sections are linked by three interpolations of electronically organized two-channel stereophonic sound. The electronic music never occurs together with the instrumental. It imitates instruments, offers variations of their sounds, mocks them with fragmented and distorted "quotations" of Romantic organ music, and most often it explores a new world of unpitched noise.

But the game goes the other way as well: the instruments, producing what Milton Babbitt once called "those dazzling, coruscating sonorities and the intricate web of rhythms," themselves play in a manner that both in its abruptions and its modulations of timbre suggests the resources and effects of electronic music.

Complex as "Deserts" is, it comes over to the listener as purely expressive experience. It is startlingly direct and lucid music "audible" and immediate, intense, fascinating in its interplay of time and density. Its pages for instruments are excitingly beautiful as sheer sound.

It is not meant as descriptive music, though Varese at one time hoped to make a film to accompany it. Intensely evocative, it is a tragic vision — not at all without humor — whose sense of the apocalypse has made listening to it a frightening experience for many. And "Deserts" has a musical and expressive richness that make it, for me, one of the great compositions for orchestra.

Let me say that I am grateful to Erich Leinsdorf for having given another Boston performance of "Deserts" and that I hope it will not be seven years until the next. And then I must go on to say that Friday's performance was not very good, rhythmically tentative and too soft-edged altogether (except for the often superb percussion playing), and with the electronic interpolations projected too gently.

The baritone, Hermann Prey was soloist in Mahler's "Sons of a Wayfarer." He sang with taste, intelligence, and with musical and vocal finesse, and Leinsdorf drew delicate playing from the orchestra.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436
FEB 23 1969 New England

German Baritone Back For Symphony Concert

The nineteenth pair of Friday-Saturday Boston Symphony concerts will be conducted by this week Erich Leinsdorf. German baritone Herman Prey will be soloist in Mahler's song cycle "Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen" (Songs of a Wayfarer).

The program will open with Edgard Varese's "Deserts" and close with Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5 in E minor. "Deserts" is written for orchestra and tape recorder. This will be the first performance of the work by the orchestra.

After an absence of two years Hermann Prey returns to the United States for the special Mahler Lieder performances with the Boston Symphony and appearances in New York, Pittsburgh, San Francisco and Los Angeles. Mr. Prey is an established singer of Lieder, oratorio and opera. He has appeared in all the major opera houses in the United States and Europe and has performed frequently at Bayreuth, Edinburgh, Salzburg and Vienna Festwiochen.

The orchestra will give two other concerts during the week. On Tuesday evening Leinsdorf will conduct Webern's Five pieces for orchestra, Op. 10, Beethoven's Piano concerto No. 4 with Eugene Istomin as piano soloist and Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, "Eroica." This performance will be seen on WGBH-TV as the fifth color telecast of the season.

Moderns, Conservatives Share at Symphony

By McLAREN HARRIS

Examples of what may be considered extremes of modern and conservative repertoire are on this weekend's program at Symphony. In reverse chronological order Erich Leinsdorf conducted Edgar Varese's "Deserts," Mahlre's Lider eines fahrenden Gesellen and Tchaikivsky's Fifth Symphony; those who can't abidem odernism can arrive late and those whose tastes are too sophisticated for Tchaikivsky can leave early.

"Deserts" is not such a new work as contemporary music goes (the face of which can change almost daily), having been completed 15 years ago. It is something of a milestone in a musical trend divergent from that of the serialists and first conceived by Varese more than 40 years ago: the organization of sound based upon acoustical properties and transformations. It is in seven sections in all, four for orchestra interspersed with three for electionic tape "in antiphonal form," which means here that orchestra and tape are heard in turn and do not combine.

THE SCORE calls fro an orchestra of winds in reasonable numbers and an extensive percussion group including both definite and indefinite-pitch instruments with several in various sizes.

It goes almost without saying that harmony, melody and conventional meter and rhythm are not part of the scheme; "Deserts" is formed through sound and timbre, both elemental and conglomerate, often building from the former to the latter in pyramid fashion.

There is rhythm in the precussion work, but so far removed, or evolved, from usual patterns that it appears random. While the orchestral sections deal largely in pitch patterns the tape contains "noise" sounds of indifinite or varying pitch — taps, siren-sounds, hollow booms and much more beyond accurate description.

James Lyons' notes quote Varese's biographer, Fernand Oulette, in describing "Deserts" as having been conceived as the musical complement for a never-accomplished motion picture, and that the music reveals deserts of the earth, the sea, outer space and in the mind of man; that Varese expresses "suffering, horror and desolation themselves."

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
MAR 1 1969 New England

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150
MAR 3 1969 New England

Globe 3-1-69

BSO: 'parasonority' and its alternatives

By Allan Sly

Erich Leinsdorf's Boston Symphony program last week (19th in the current series) began with Varèse's Déserts. Upstage wind and percussion players (lots of them, no strings at all) alternated with prerecorded stereo tapes: four live segments, three taped. If it sounded like film music, it was; the film, never made, would have explored deserts, including the mental.

One could experience it as abstract or suggestive; as composed of "acoustic elements" or tonal relationships—its challenge seemed to arrive on more than one level of experience, to exist on more than one plane. Enormously stimulating to the imagination, puzzling, exasperating, it holds the listener enchanted like Coleridge's wedding guest. Its advocates use words like parasonority, electromusic, as if unaware that these, to some of us, are terms of reproach!

At any rate, the early Mahler Songs of a Wayfarer, with Hermann Prey as soloist, came next like balm in Gilead, and more than compensated the attentive audience for its suspension of disbelief. Friday's audience indeed was a credit to Boston, but then the performance was skillfull beyond description and furthermore the house management cooperated beautifully. Not only did it restrain latecomers from forcing their way into their seats, but it gave us light enough to read programs, and during the Tchaikovsky Fifth there was not a single door opening or early departure. Perhaps this was because the performance was so superlative. At any rate, all these elements together made up a most memorable afternoon. It could be that the attentive house itself actually helped achieve the successful performance.

Fast pace

It was a fastpaced Tchaikovsky Fifth except for the tender second theme; and at the return late in the andante the countermelody was unusually prominent. The fate theme brooked no nonsense, and the kinetics of the final cadence set the stage for Rachmaninoff. Come to think of it, isn't it time Boston heard his (Rachmaninoff's) third symphony? The early Mahler and the mature Tchaikovsky set each other off—the Germanic and the Slav—and the Rachmaninoff would project these styles into our own times, would offer us an alternative to parasonority. After all, Boulez himself has warned against the avant-gardist ghetto.

Yet as Charles Lamb said, after his safe return from his one adventure, "Skiddaw is a fine creature," and many of us benefitted greatly from our exposure to Déserts. But we are not ready to abdicate in favor of audio technology—whatever they do about it in 2001.

classical...

Leinsdorf presents varied program

By Steven Shladover

The Boston Symphony's nineteenth Saturday night concert of the season consisted of a varied program of uneven quality, with Erich Leinsdorf on the podium. It began with the first Boston Symphony performance of Edgar Varese's "Deserts", a fifteen year old work for brasses, reeds, vastly augmented percussion and tape recorded electronic sounds. This work lasts about twenty-five minutes and makes repeated use of extreme dissonances followed by quiet passages. If this performance proved anything, it was the unquestionable superiority of the sound produced by the live orchestra to the pre-recorded electronic sounds.

The second work on the program, Gustav Mahler's "Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen" (Songs of a Wayfarer), is as different a piece from the Varese as it is possible to get. This is an exquisitely beautiful and melancholy song cycle about a lost love. The soloist was baritone Hermann Prey, who gave a very moving performance of the difficult vocal part. These songs require an extreme vocal range, as well as considerable power, in order to be heard through the large orchestra. Mr. Prey sang the part beautifully, with pleasantly secure high notes and enough strength to be heard over the orchestra. He also captured exactly the bittersweet, simple quality that is most effective in these songs. The orchestra, as in all Mahler, was an integral participant in the work. The instrumental tone was properly refined and transparent, and the coloration was subtle, but very effective. Most important was the necessarily precarious balance maintained between the orchestra and Mr. Prey. Maestro Leinsdorf kept the rythms slightly more regular than is customary, and although this clarified some parts of the score, it also tended to tangle a few of Mahler's more floating melodic lines. On the whole, however, this was an extremely satisfying performance. The only disappointment was that it was so short, and there was no more Mahler on the program. Considering that Leinsdorf is one of the finest Mahler conductors available, it is to be hoped that next year's guest appearances by Mr. Leinsdorf will feature more of the masterpieces of Mahler.

Saturday night's program concluded with Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Op.64, in a performance which defied categorization. The opening passages were very promising, haveing been played in an unusually expressive and attentive manner, and with a melodic line remarkably supple, considering that Erich Leinsdorf was on the podium. Unfortunately, this promise was not lived up to, and the performance quickly degenerated into a mixture of effective and original effects with very commonplace, and even banal, playing. Leinsdorf was far off his usual form, paying little attention to detail and seemingly letting the music happen, without attempting to mold it. The transistions between contrasting sections were remarkably poor for Leinsdorf, as there was frequently no motivating sense behind them. The illogic of this interpretation carried over into the tempi, which were frequently eccentric and excessively contrasting. Not everything was disastrous about this performance. Some of Leinsdorf's original touches worked well and brought a new dimension to this old warhorse symphony.

Mention can not be omitted of the finale of the Tchaikovsky, which had to be one of the worst things heard in this season's symphony programs. Leinsdorf seemed to encourage it to get out of control, and the whole orchestra headed off at an impossible pace, too fast for it to be anything but devoid of expression. The result was either blood-tingling or blood-curdling, depending upon the taste of the listner. In all fairness, it should be added that the audience loved it, and gave the performance an enthusiastic reception.

40.

NINETEENTH PROGRAM
Friday afternoon February 28 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening March 1 1969 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

VARÈSE Déserts†
first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

MAHLER Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen
(Songs of a wayfarer)
Wenn mein Schatz Hochzeit macht
(My sweetheart's wedding day)
Ging heut morgen über's Feld
(This morning I walked through the field)
Ich hab ein glühend Messer
(I feel a knife burning in my breast)
Die zwei blauen Augen von meinem Schatz
(My sweetheart's blue eyes)

HERMANN PREY baritone

intermission

TCHAIKOVSKY Symphony no. 5 in E minor op. 64*
Andante – allegro con anima
Andante cantabile con alcuna licenza
Valse: allegro moderato
Finale: andante maestoso – allegro vivace

Varese 'Deserts' exciting sound

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Globe Music Critic

"Deserts" by Edgard Varese, composed in 1954, introduced to Boston in 1962 during Frederik Prausnitz's first season at the New England Conservatory was played at a Boston Symphony concert for the first time on Friday afternoon, Erich Leinsdorf conducting.

When Varese died in November 1965, not quite 82, he had lived three careers as a composer. The first of these was finished by time he was 20. All that music is lost or destroyed, but it included, characteristically enough for the composer whom his colleague, Otto Luening, was to toast in 1963 as "really the first of the astronauts," a Jules Verne opera, written in 1894!

The second Varese chapter came after his move to America when, in the 20's and early 30's, he wrote what are still his most famous instrumental and vocal works, "Ameriques," "Hyperprism," "Octandre," "Integrales," "Arcana," "Ionization," "Ecuatorial," "Density 21.5."

Then he stopped. The situation seemed hopeless. His music was ignored. His impatience with existing performance resources grew, and so did his obsession with creating an instrument that would bring new sounds and free music from the tempered system. The 50's at last provided the technology that made possible the electronic music of which Varese had dreamed when Milton Babbitt was in diapers and Karlheinz Stockhausen and Mario Davidovsky were yet unborn.

With "Deserts" and the "Poeme electronique," whose 11 channels of sound were played through 425 speakers in Le Corbusier's Philips Pavilion at the Brussels fair, the third phase of Varese's life as a composer began.

"Deserts," a big piece, takes about 24 minutes to play. It consists of four instrumental sections of different lengths, scored for flutes, clarinets, brass, piano, and more than 40 percussion instruments, and these sections are linked by three interpolations of electronically organized two-channel stereophonic sound. The electronic music never occurs together with the instrumental. It imitates instruments, offers variations of their sounds, mocks them with fragmented and distorted "quotations" of Romantic organ music, and most often it explores a new world of unpitched noise.

But the game goes the other way as well: the instruments, producing what Milton Babbitt once called "those dazzling, coruscating sonorities and the intricate web of rhythms," themselves play in a manner that both in its abruptions and its modulations of timbre suggests the resources and effects of electronic music.

Complex as "Deserts" is, it comes over to the listener as purely expressive experience. It is startlingly direct and lucid music "audible" and immediate, intense, fascinating in its interplay of time and density. Its pages for instruments are excitingly beautiful as sheer sound.

It is not meant as descriptive music, though Varese at one time hoped to make a film to accompany it. Intensely evocative, it is a tragic vision — not at all without humor — whose sense of the apocalypse has made listening to it a frightening experience for many. And "Deserts" has a musical and expressive richness that make it, for me, one of the great compositions for orchestra.

Let me say that I am grateful to Erich Leinsdorf for having given another Boston performance of "Deserts" and that I hope it will not be seven years until the next. And then I must go on to say that Friday's performance was not very good, rhythmically tentative and too soft-edged altogether (except for the often superb percussion playing), and with the electronic interpolations projected too gently.

The baritone, Hermann Prey was soloist in Mahler's "Sons of a Wayfarer." He sang with taste, intelligence, and with musical and vocal finesse, and Leinsdorf drew delicate playing from the orchestra.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436

FEB 23 1969 New England

German Baritone Back For Symphony Concert

The nineteenth pair of Friday-Saturday Boston Symphony concerts will be conducted by this week Erich Leinsdorf. German baritone Herman Prey will be soloist in Mahler's song cycle "Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen" (Songs of a Wayfarer).

The program will open with Edgard Varese's "Deserts" and close with Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5 in E minor. "Deserts" is written for orchestra and tape recorder. This will be the first performance of the work by the orchestra.

After an absence of two years Hermann Prey returns to the United States for the special Mahler Lieder performances with the Boston Symphony and appearances in New York, Pittsburgh, San Francisco and Los Angeles. Mr. Prey is an established singer of Lieder, oratorio and opera. He has appeared in all the major opera houses in the United States and Europe and has performed frequently at Bayreuth, Edinburgh, Salzburg and Vienna Festwiochen.

The orchestra will give two other concerts during the week. On Tuesday evening Leinsdorf will conduct Webern's Five pieces for orchestra, Op. 10, Beethoven's Piano concerto No. 4 with Eugene Istomin as piano soloist and Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, "Eroica." This performance will be seen on WGBH-TV as the fifth color telecast of the season.

Moderns, Conservatives Share at Symphony

By McLAREN HARRIS

Examples of what may be considered extremes of modern and conservative repertoire are on this weekend's program at Symphony. In reverse chronological order Erich Leinsdorf conducted Edgar Varese's "Deserts," Mahlre's Lider eines fahrenden Gesellen and Tchaikivsky's Fifth Symphony; those who can't abidem odernism can arrive late and those whose tastes are too sophisticated for Tchaikivsky can leave early.

"Deserts" is not such a new work as contemporary music goes (the face of which can change almost daily), having been completed 15 years ago. It is something of a milestone in a musical trend divergent from that of the serialists and first conceived by Varese more than 40 years ago: the organization of sound based upon acoustical properties and transformations. It is in seven sections in all, four for orchestra interspersed with three for electionic tape "in antiphonal form," which means here that orchestra and tape are heard in turn and do not combine.

THE SCORE calls fro an orchestra of winds in reasonable numbers and an extensive percussion group including both definite and indefinite-pitch instruments with several in various sizes.

It goes almost without saying that harmony, melody and conventional meter and rhythm are not part of the scheme; "Deserts" is formed through sound and timbre, both elemental and conglomerate, often building from the former to the latter in pyramid fashion.

There is rhythm in the precussion work, but so far removed, or evolved, from usual patterns that it appears random. While the orchestral sections deal largely in pitch patterns the tape contains "noise" sounds of indifinite or varying pitch — taps, siren-sounds, hollow booms and much more beyond accurate description.

James Lyons' notes quote Varese's biographer, Fernand Oulette, in describing "Deserts" as having been conceived as the musical complement for a never-accomplished motion picture, and that the music reveals deserts of the earth, the sea, outer space and in the mind of man; that Varese expresses "suffering, horror and desolation themselves."

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

MAR 1 1969 New England

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150

MAR 3 1969 New England

BSO: 'parasonority' and its alternatives

By Allan Sly

Erich Leinsdorf's Boston Symphony program last week (19th in the current series) began with Varèse's Déserts. Upstage wind and percussion players (lots of them, no strings at all) alternated with prerecorded stereo tapes: four live segments, three taped. If it sounded like film music, it was; the film, never made, would have explored deserts, including the mental.

One could experience it as abstract or suggestive; as composed of "acoustic elements" or tonal relationships—its challenge seemed to arrive on more than one level of experience, to exist on more than one plane. Enormously stimulating to the imagination, puzzling, exasperating, it holds the listener enchanted like Coleridge's wedding guest. Its advocates use words like parasonority, electromusic, as if unaware that these, to some of us, are terms of reproach!

At any rate, the early Mahler Songs of a Wayfarer, with Hermann Prey as soloist, came next like balm in Gilead, and more than compensated the attentive audience for its suspension of disbelief. Friday's audience indeed was a credit to Boston, but then the performance was skillfull beyond description and furthermore the house management cooperated beautifully. Not only did it restrain latecomers from forcing their way into their seats, but it gave us light enough to read programs, and during the Tchaikovsky Fifth there was not a single door opening or early departure. Perhaps this was because the performance was so superlative. At any rate, all these elements together made up a most memorable afternoon. It could be that the attentive house itself actually helped achieve the successful performance.

Fast pace

It was a fastpaced Tchaikovsky Fifth except for the tender second theme; and at the return late in the andante the countermelody was unusually prominent. The fate theme brooked no nonsense, and the kinetics of the final cadence set the stage for Rachmaninoff. Come to think of it, isn't it time Boston heard his (Rachmaninoff's) third symphony? The early Mahler and the mature Tchaikovsky set each other off—the Germanic and the Slav—and the Rachmaninoff would project these styles into our own times, would offer us an alternative to parasonority. After all, Boulez himself has warned against the avant-gardist ghetto.

Yet as Charles Lamb said, after his safe return from his one adventure, "Skiddaw is a fine creature," and many of us benefitted greatly from our exposure to Déserts. But we are not ready to abdicate in favor of audio technology—whatever they do about it in 2001.

Globe 3-1-69

classical...

Leinsdorf presents varied program

By Steven Shladover

The Boston Symphony's nineteenth Saturday night concert of the season consisted of a varied program of uneven quality, with Erich Leinsdorf on the podium. It began with the first Boston Symphony performance of Edgar Varese's "Deserts", a fifteen year old work for brasses, reeds, vastly augmented percussion and tape recorded electronic sounds. This work lasts about twenty-five minutes and makes repeated use of extreme dissonances followed by quiet passages. If this performance proved anything, it was the unquestionable superiority of the sound produced by the live orchestra to the pre-recorded electronic sounds.

The second work on the program, Gustav Mahler's "Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen" (Songs of a Wayfarer), is as different a piece from the Varese as it is possible to get. This is an exquisitely beautiful and melancholy song cycle about a lost love. The soloist was baritone Hermann Prey, who gave a very moving performance of the difficult vocal part. These songs require an extreme vocal range, as well as considerable power, in order to be heard through the large orchestra. Mr. Prey sang the part beautifully, with pleasantly secure high notes and enough strength to be heard over the orchestra. He also captured exactly the bittersweet, simple quality that is most effective in these songs. The orchestra, as in all Mahler, was an integral participant in the work. The instrumental tone was properly refined and transparent, and the coloration was subtle, but very effective. Most important was the necessarily precarious balance maintained between the orchestra and Mr. Prey. Maestro Leinsdorf kept the rythms slightly more regular than is customary, and although this clarified some parts of the score, it also tended to strangle a few of Mahler's more floating melodic lines. On the whole, however, this was an extremely satisfying performance. The only disappointment was that it was so short, and there was no more Mahler on the program. Considering that Leinsdorf is one of the finest Mahler conductors available, it is to be hoped that next year's guest appearances by Mr. Leinsdorf will feature more of the masterpieces of Mahler.

Saturday night's program concluded with Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Op.64, in a performance which defied categorization. The opening passages were very promising, haveing been played in an unusually expressive and attentive manner, and with a melodic line remarkably supple, considering that Erich Leinsdorf was on the podium. Unfortunately, this promise was not lived up to, and the performance quickly degenerated into a mixture of effective and original effects with very commonplace, and even banal, playing. Leinsdorf was far off his usual form, paying little attention to detail and seemingly letting the music happen, without attempting to mold it. The transitions between contrasting sections were remarkably poor for Leinsdorf, as there was frequently no motivating sense behind them. The illogic of this interpretation carried over into the tempi, which were frequently eccentric and excessively contrasting. Not everything was disastrous about this performance. Some of Leinsdorf's original touches worked well and brought a new dimension to this old warhorse symphony.

Mention can not be omitted of the finale of the Tchaikovsky, which had to be one of the worst things heard in this season's symphony programs. Leinsdorf seemed to encourage it to get out of control, and the whole orchestra headed off at an impossible pace, too fast for it to be anything but devoid of expression. The result was either blood-tingling or blood-curdling, depending upon the taste of the listener. In all fairness, it should be added that the audience loved it, and gave the performance an enthusiastic reception.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436

MAR 9 1969 New England

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

BSO: VARESE, MAHLER, TCHAIKOVSKY

Edgard Varese, the first great exponent of electronic music, once wrote a score for a movie called Deserts designed to be filmed only after the music was written. For some reason the movie was never made, but the concert version of the score today is something of a towering edifice to the cogniscenti of the electronic music genre.

The instrumental forces consist of winds, a vast array from the battery and a piano. The work is in four sections between which are three "interpolations" of pre-taped recordings of "electronically organized" sound. The idea, I suppose, is one of contrast and synthesis of the tape among Varese's own very special extreme harmonic dissonances and his meticulously considered arrangement of each individual note within each chord of the orchestral score.

Varese's venturesomeness in pushing out toward a new medium of expression and his consummate artistry and craftsmanship in obtaining uncanny sonorities are unconditionally conceded. You get the idea, though, in about five minutes, hard upon the first few moments of the first interpolation. The trouble, among other things, is that the damned piece goes on for about as long as the average Haydn Symphony and in the process deteriorates into an unrelieved bore, with neither evocation of mood nor wit nor drama. Who knows, this may well be the stuff of how music will be put together in the year 2000, but for the present, it says here, stifling is the word. Ah well, they say that when thirds were introduced into musical compositions of the Middle Ages they were banned in some quarters as too sexually stimulating.

Surcease followed with the rare and haunting "Songs of a Wayafarer" by Gustave Mahler. These first of his song cycles find Mahler springing full blown as a creative genius, with all the freshness and radiance, almost note for note, that he organized and interpolated into his First Symphony a few years later. The baritone soloist was Hermann Prey. A knowledgeable commentator with neither malice nor charity observed that Prey may be the poor man's Fischer-Diskau but that that man would have to be awfully destitute. The singing, in voice and interpretation, came out utterly neutral, devoid of involvement of the emotional expressiveness of the songs.

Paradoxically this did not kill the performance. For the simple purity of the melodies and the marvelously expressive nature and fine balance of the orchestral score sufficed to sustain the music. Mr. Leinsdorf's direction had that clarity, precision and commitment that he so often brings to his performances of Mahler. More's the pity that this is the only performance of that composer's work of this season.

Rounding off the concert was Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5 in E minor. With a reading of ordinary caliber or less, the Fifth Symphony is an old warhorse en route to the glue factory. But given a strong performance, one is once more reminded that a Tchaikovsky symphony every few years is still a very good thing. The traversal here was exceptionally strong - warm, beautiful in sound, crisp in attack and vital, though the finale was a little in the Charles Munch vein in its wildness. Mr. Stagliano's horn solo came off exquisitely in the Andante. Indeed the whole movement was affecting and not, as might have been expected so much corn from the Steppe.

This week's program includes Bach's Suite No. 4 in d major, Schoenberg's Variations, Wagner's Seigfried Idyll and Strauss' Suite from "Der Rosenkavalier". Mr. Leinsdorf will again conduct.

The Advocate regrets that the Music in Review column on the Boston Symphony was through error abbreviated last week. Below, we reprint the paragraph dealing with the Beethoven Fourth Piano Concerto and succeeding paragraphs that were omitted.

The Beethoven Fourth Piano Concerto in G major with Eugene Istomin as soloist and the "Eroica" Symphony constituted the balance of the program. There are various ways to play this concerto, perhaps the most elegant of all works in the form, but Mr. Istomin's notions surely cannot occupy a very exalted place among them.

Along with its elegance the piece possesses great masculinity and presents a sense of menacing confrontation with the orchestra. The reading here was anything but masculine and menacing. Rather, there was an almost mincing understatement, though rescued by some purling scale work and an orchestral accompaniment of exceptional fidelity.

And, as for the "Eroica," here is a symphony whose magisterial sweep and nobility of concept calls for and usually gets a reverential approach from performer and listener. Mr. Leinsdorf dealt rather more in pastels of sound than is customary with him, but his interpretation withal was essentially straightforward and did not trifle with the grandeur of the score. There was the build up and sweeping force of the funeral march, the inexplorability of the unfolding of the variations, the marvelous abundance of so many other elements that make the "Eroica" one of the more supreme affirmations of creative genius. If, as others have reported, the performance sounded jaded, here is one listener to whom it sounded virtually memorable.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

MAR 6 1969 New England

Symphonic Reverberations

By McLAREN HARRIS

Man and his institutions quake before a few things as before snowstorms, especially when they occur with such demoralizing frequency as we have seen. One of the indirect casualties of storm-centered circumstances was the Symphony review of March 1, some of whose conclusions, I am given to understand, were excised to make room for more pressing news.

Here, then, is a reconstruction of the report of that Feb. 28 concert—an event, I believe, of some significance.

Probably the overriding significance arose from the performance of Edgar Varese's "Deserts," first by the BSO and the second in Boston (the New England Conservatory Orchestra under Frederick Prausnitz performed it in 1962). Varese completed "Deserts" in 1954, but its genesis can be said to have begun more than 40 years ago in the composer's conception of the organization of sound via acoustical properties and transformations rather than conventional systems of melody, rhythm and harmony, or even serialism.

FOLLOWING THOSE years, during which Varese explored acoustical qualities of the voice and existing musical instruments, there came a void in his composing career when his output dwindled practically to zero. His imagination had gone beyond the sonic resources of the instruments available to him; he wished to express his art through an infinitely wider variety of sounds, timbres and rhythms than they could afford. But such creations as the Moog synthesizer or electronic tape had yet to wait for their invention.

In the late 1940's and early 1950's they became available, and "Deserts" is a fruit of that long siege of silence. It is written for an orchestra of conventional instruments (winds, piano and 40 percentage instruments) which play in a very unconventional manner, to an extent forming an instrumental counterpart in its elements and pyramid conglomerations of sound to the taps, sirens, booms and even organ flourishes of the passages for electronic tape.

What is the intent of this seven-section work? James Lyons' program notes quoted Varese's biographer, Fernand Oulette, who describes "Deserts" as having been composed for a never-produced motion picture; that the music reveals deserts of the earth, the sea, outer space and in the mind of man; and that it expresses "suffering, horror and desolation themselves."

I GAIN LITTLE from that descriptive analysis; for me the appeal of 'Deserts" is simply in the fascination with its aural explorations, in discovering how the orchestra and tape complement each other. The Feb. 28 performance, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, was tentative at best, with the dynamic rise-and-fall and the rhythms somewhat uneven in the orchestra, as if the players were feeling their way through unfamiliar territory (undoubtedly they were). Even the tape seemed, in terms of fidelity, of questionable quality.

Also on the program were Mahler's Songs of a Wayfarer, which I had waited all season to hear. Their texts are not of immortal literary value and in certain instances even their settings tend toward awkwardness (Mahler was but 23 when he composed them). But their melodic sweeps, poignant harmonies and exquisite orchestration qualify them as among the most eloquent and beautiful works in the elite repertory of song.

Hermann Prey's baritone has everything to recommend it and his interpretive sense is of the highest order. Nevertheless, his realization of Mahler's poetry seemed somewhat incomplete on that Friday; I suspect that the cause of a seeming uneasiness, as if he and the orchestra were waiting for each other's lead, could have been inadequate rehearsal, in turn caused by our weather of late. I also heard Saturday's performance via radio, and all rough spots seemed to have been smoothed over. What was hesitant on Friday became assured by Saturday, and the emotional involvement deepened to the fullest. The work on both days by Leinsdorf and the orchestra was delicately, convincingly responsive.

Other people, I think, had been waiting all season for something like Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, that epitome of rock-ribbed romanticism. The Symphony's product was worth their expectations; excepting a bit of spongy intonation from the solo winds, the reading was lushly-toned and in full voice.

At the conclusion people who never shout anything shouted healthy bravos, and I consider it commendable that they finally had their say.

THOMAS DUNN will conduct Erik Satie's "Entr'acte," with a simultaneous showing of the original Rene Clair film, during the Handel and Haydn Society's fifth concert next Sunday at Symphony Hall, also including works by Haydn, Stravinsky and Hindemith.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

MAR 1 1969 New England

BSO PLAYS VARESE SCORE

'Deserts' Musical Masterpiece

By GEORGE GELLES
Music Critic

I hate to play the prophet, but it seems to me that "Deserts" by Edgard Varese, with which Erich Leinsdorf opened his Boston Symphony program yesterday afternoon, is one of theorchestral masterpieces of our time. Along with Stockhausen's "Gruppen," which I would also put in this category and which the orchestra has yet to play, "Deserts" breaks new ground brilliantly, is enormous ni its emotional grasp, and unrelentingly successful.

Varese brooded over the work in the early fifties, and completed it in 1954, when he was 71. The "deserts" of his title were to be the subject of a film shot after the score was completed, though it was never made.

What we have in the music is no naturalistic description, but rather an interplay of tensions that powerfully holds the listener.

The score is divided in seven sections, the odd numbered ones for wind orchestra, the even ones for pre-recorded tape. In general, the taped portions are pitched at a lower emotional key, than those for instruments; from the speakers we hear largely wooshes, bongs, scrapes, twitters, but there are also, in the third recorded sections, for instance, some purposefully provoking and outlandish sounds.

INTENSE AND SEARING

The 'live' segments, on the contrary, are for the most part intense and searing, scored stunningly, with greater imagination than that shown in his earlier works but with equal craft.

It seemed to me, though I had no score, that Leinsdorf's performance could have gone about 10 percent faster and easily stood more bite and edge. He seemed to be stressing the lyrical element, (particularly in the opening pages), but I'm not sure this isn't of secondary importance here.

I've often admired Hermann Prey as a baritone with an exceedingly handsome voice and a stage-presence that's praiseworthy for its straightforwardness and low kitsch quotient. But even though his performance of Mahler's "Songs of a Wayfarer" with the orchestra had these same qualities, it didn't really make it.

As a whole it was bloated, and both Prey's voice and Leinsdorf's accompaniment were too rounded, with too little rasp and bite. If there's a composer that cries for clarity and incisiveness it's Mahler, and in this respect he was ill served.

COMPOSER NOT AT BEST

After two such superior works, I wasn't very taken with the Tchaikovsky Fifth Symphony. It's not the composer at his best, for prime Tchaikovsky is the ballet music and opera scores, and in this setting it seemed extravagant and overripe.

For a performance that stayed continuously on the surface it wasn't bad, reasonably well shaped and energetic. But as to nuances of balance or refinement of phrasing it was a rudimentary reading, with especially miserable work from the solo clarinetist.

This was the only Tchaikovsky scheduled this season, which is too bad, for, first of all, the composer has far more interesting sides to show, and, second, nothing of his deserves to be half-baked.

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

BSO: VARESE, MAHLER, TCHAIKOVSKY

Edgard Varese, the first great exponent of electronic music, once wrote a score for a movie called Deserts designed to be filmed only after the music was written. For some reason the movie was never made, but the concert version of the score today is something of a towering edifice to the cogniscenti of the electronic music genre.

The instrumental forces consist of winds, a vast array from the battery and a piano. The work is in four sections between which are three "interpolations" of pre-taped recordings of "electronically organized" sound. The idea, I suppose, is one of contrast and synthesis of the tape among Varese's own very special extreme harmonic dissonances and his meticulously considered arrangement of each individual note within each chord of the orchestral score.

Varese's venturesomeness in pushing out toward a new medium of expression and his consummate artistry and craftsmanship in obtaining uncanny sonorities are unconditionally conceded. You get the idea, though, in about five minutes, hard upon the first few moments of the first interpolation. The trouble, among other things, is that the damned piece goes on for about as long as the average Haydn Symphony and in the process deteriorates into an unrelieved bore, with neither evocation of mood nor wit nor drama. Who knows, this may well be the stuff of how music will be put together in the year 2000, but for the present, it says here, stifling is the word. Ah well, they say that when thirds were introduced into musical compositions of the Middle Ages they were banned in some quarters as too sexually stimulating.

Surcease followed with the rare and haunting "Songs of a Wayafarer" by Gustave Mahler. These first of his song cycles find Mahler springing full blown as a creative genius, with all the freshness and radiance, almost note for note, that he organized and interpolated into his First Symphony a few years later. The baritone soloist was Hermann Prey. A knowledgeable commentator with neither malice nor charity observed that Prey may be the poor man's Fischer-Diskau but that that man would have to be awfully destitute. The singing, in voice and interpretation, came out utterly neutral, devoid of involvement of the emotional expressiveness of the songs.

Paradoxically this did not kill the performance. For the simple purity of the melodies and the marvelously expressive nature and fine balance of the orchestral score sufficed to sustain the music. Mr. Leinsdorf's direction had that clarity, precision and commitment that he so often brings to his performances of Mahler. More's the pity that this is the only performance of that composer's work of this season.

Rounding off the concert was Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5 in E minor. With a reading of ordinary caliber or less, the Fifth Symphony is an old warhorse en route to the glue factory. But given a strong performance, one is once more reminded that a Tchaikovsky symphony every few years is still a very good thing. The traversal here was exceptionally strong - warm, beautiful in sound, crisp in attack and vital, though the finale was a little in the Charles Munch vein in its wildness. Mr. Stagliano's horn solo came off exquisitely in the Andante. Indeed the whole movement was affecting and not, as might have been expected so much corn from the Steppe.

This week's program includes Bach's Suite No. 4 in d major, Schoenberg's Variations, Wagner's Seigfried Idyll and Strauss' Suite from "Der Rosenkavalier". Mr. Leinsdorf will again conduct.

The Advocate regrets that the Music in Review column on the Boston Symphony was through error abbreviated last week. Below ~~we reprint the~~ paragraph dealing with the Beethoven Fourth Piano Concerto and succeeding paragraphs that were omitted.

The Beethoven Fourth Piano Concerto in G major with Eugene Istomin as soloist and the "Eroica" Symphony constituted the balance of the program. There are various ways to play this concerto, perhaps the most elegant of all works in the form, but Mr. Istomin's notions surely cannot occupy a very exalted place among them.

Along with its elegance the piece possesses great masculinity and presents a sense of menacing confrontation with the orchestra. The reading here was anything but masculine and menacing. Rather, there was an almost mincing understatement, though rescued by some purling scale work and an orchestral accompaniment of exceptional fidelity.

And, as for the "Eroica," here is a symphony whose magisterial sweep and nobility of concept calls for and usually gets a reverential approach from performer and listener. Mr. Leinsdorf dealt rather more in pastels of sound than is customary with him, but his interpretation withal was essentially straightforward and did not trifle with the grandeur of the score. There was the build up and sweeping force of the funeral march, the inexplorability of the unfolding of the variations, the marvelous abundance of so many other elements that make the "Eroica" one of the more supreme affirmations of creative genius. If, as others have reported, the performance sounded jaded, here is one listener to whom it sounded virtually memorable.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

MAR 6 1969 New England

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436

MAR 9 1969 New England

Symphonic Reverberations

By McLAREN HARRIS

Man and his institutions quake before a few things as before snowstorms, especially when they occur with such demoralizing frequency as we have seen. One of the indirect casualties of storm-centered circumstances was the Symphony review of March 1, some of whose conclusions, I am given to understand, were excised to make room for more pressing news.

Here, then, is a reconstruction of the report of that Feb. 28 concert—an event, I believe, of some significance.

Probably the overriding significance arose from the performance of Edgar Varese's "Deserts," first by the BSO and the second in Boston (the New England Conservatory Orchestra under Frederick Prausnitz performed it in 1962). Varese completed "Deserts" in 1954, but its genesis can be said to have begun more than 40 years ago in the composer's conception of the organization of sound via acoustical properties and transformations rather than conventional systems of melody, rhythm and harmony, or even serialism.

FOLLOWING THOSE years, during which Varese explored acoustical qualities of the voice and existing musical instruments, there came a void in his composing career when his output dwindled practically to zero. His imagination had gone beyond the sonic resources of the instruments available to him; he wished to express his art through an infinitely wider variety of sounds, timbres and rhythms than they could afford. But such creations as the Moog synthesizer or electronic tape had yet to wait for their invention.

In the late 1940's and early 1950's they became available, and "Deserts" is a fruit of that long siege of silence. It is written for an orchestra of conventional instruments (winds, piano and 40 percussion instruments) which play in a very unconventional manner, to an extent forming an instrumental counterpart in its elements and pyramid conglomerations of sound to the taps, sirens, booms and even organ flourishes of the passages for electronic tape.

What is the intent of this seven-section work? James Lyons' program notes quoted Varese's biographer, Fernand Oulette, who describes "Deserts" as having been composed for a never-produced motion picture; that the music reveals deserts of the earth, the sea, outer space and in the mind of man; and that it expresses "suffering, horror and desolation themselves."

I GAIN LITTLE from that descriptive analysis; for me the appeal of 'Deserts" is simply in the fascination with its aural explorations, in discovering how the orchestra and tape complement each other. The Feb. 28 performance, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, was tentative at best, with the dynamic rise-and-fall and the rhythms somewhat uneven in the orchestra, as if the players were feeling their way through unfamiliar territory (undoubtedly they were). Even the tape seemed, in terms of fidelity, of questionable quality.

Also on the program were Mahler's Songs of a Wayfarer, which I had waited all season to hear. Their texts are not of immortal literary value and in certain instances even their settings tend toward awkwardness (Mahler was but 23 when he composed them). But their melodic sweeps, poignant harmonies and exquisite orchestration qualify them as among the most eloquent and beautiful works in the elite repertory of song.

Hermann Prey's baritone has everything to recommend it and his interpretive sense is of the highest order. Nevertheless, his realization of Mahler's poetry seemed somewhat incomplete on that Friday; I suspect that the cause of a seeming uneasiness, as if he and the orchestra were waiting for each other's lead, could have been inadequate rehearsal, in turn caused by our weather of late. I also heard Saturday's performance via radio, and all rough spots seemed to have been smoothed over. What was hesitant on Friday became assured by Saturday, and the emotional involvement deepened to the fullest. The work on both days by Leinsdorf and the orchestra was delicately, convincingly responsive.

Other people, I think, had been waiting all season for something like Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony, that epitome of rock-ribbed romanticism. The Symphony's product was worth their expectations; excepting a bit of spongy intonation from the solo winds, the reading was lushly-toned and in full voice.

At the conclusion people who never shout anything shouted healthy bravos, and I consider it commendable that they finally had their say.

THOMAS DUNN will conduct Erik Satie's "Entr'acte," with a simultaneous showing of the original Rene Clair film, during the Handel and Haydn Society's fifth concert next Sunday at Symphony Hall, also including works by Haydn, Stravinsky and Hindemith.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

MAR 1 1969 New England

BSO PLAYS VARESE SCORE

'Deserts' Musical Masterpiece

By GEORGE GELLES
Music Critic

I hate to play the prophet, but it seems to me that "Deserts" by Edgard Varese, with which Erich Leinsdorf opened his Boston Symphony program yesterday afternoon, is one of theorchestral masterpieces of our time. Along with Stockhausen's "Gruppen," which I would also put in this category and which the orchestra has yet to play, "Deserts" breaks new ground brilliantly, is enormous ni its emotional grasp, and unrelentingly successful.

Varese brooded over the work in the early fifties, and completed it in 1954, when he was 71. The "deserts" of his title were to be the subject of a film shot after the score was completed, though it was never made.

What we have in the music is no naturalistic description, but rather an interplay of tensions that powerfully holds the listener.

The score is divided in seven sections, the odd numbered ones for wind orchestra, the even ones for pre-recorded tape. In general, the taped portions are pitched at a lower emotional key, than those for instruments; from the speakers we hear largely wooshes, bongs, scrapes, twitters, but there are also, in the third recorded sections, for instance, some purposefully provoking and outlandish sounds.

INTENSE AND SEARING

The 'live' segments, on the contrary, are for the most part intense and searing, scored stunningly, with greater imagination than that shown in his earlier works but with equal craft.

It seemed to me, though I had no score, that Leinsdorf's performance could have gone about 10 percent faster and easily stood more bite and edge. He seemed to be stressing the lyrical element, (particularly in the opening pages), but I'm not sure this isn't of secondary importance here.

I've often admired Hermann Prey as a baritone with an exceedingly handsome voice and a stage-presence that's praiseworthy for its straightforwardness and low kitsch quotient. But even though his performance of Mahler's "Songs of a Wayfarer" with the orchestra had these same qualities, it didn't really make it.

As a whole it was bloated, and both Prey's voice and Leinsdorf's accompaniment were too rounded, with too little rasp and bite. If there's a composer that cries for clarity and incisiveness it's Mahler, and in this respect he was ill served.

COMPOSER NOT AT BEST

After two such superior works, I wasn't very taken with the Tchaikovsky Fifth Symphony. It's not the composer at his best, for prime Tchaikovsky is the ballet music and opera scores, and in this setting it seemed extravagant and overripe.

For a performance that stayed continuously on the surface it wasn't bad, reasonably well shaped and energetic. But as to nuances of balance or refinement of phrasing it was a rudimentary reading, with especially miserable work from the solo clarinetist.

This was the only Tchaikovsky scheduled this season, which is too bad, for, first of all, the composer has far more interesting sides to show, and, second, nothing of his deserves to be half-baked.

42.

CAMBRIDGE SERIES

FIFTH PROGRAM
Tuesday evening March 4 1969 at 8.30

CHARLES WILSON conductor

STRAUSS Don Juan op. 20

RACHMANINOV Rhapsody on a theme of Paganini
JORGE BOLET piano

intermission

SIBELIUS Symphony no. 2 in D major op. 43
Allegretto
Tempo andante ma rubato
Vivacissimo – lento e suave
Finale: allegro moderato

THURSDAY B SERIES

SECOND PROGRAM
Thursday evening March 6 1969 at 8.30

CHARLES WILSON conductor

STRAUSS Don Juan op. 20

RACHMANINOV Rhapsody on a theme of Paganini
JORGE BOLET piano

intermission

SIBELIUS Symphony no. 2 in D major op. 43
Allegretto
Tempo andante ma rubato
Vivacissimo – lento e suave
Finale: allegro moderato

The concert schedule of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall: March 6, Charles Wilson conducting with piano soloist Jorge Bolet, Don Juan by Strauss, Rachmaninov's Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini, and Symphony no. 2 in D by Sibelius. March 7 and 8, Leinsdorf conducting, Bach's Suite no. 4 in D major, Variations, op. 31, by Schoenberg, Wagner's Siegfried Idyll, and Strauss' Suite from Der Rosenkavalier. March 25, Wilson conducting, Symphony no. 5 in B flat by Schubert, Stravinsky's Jeu de cartes (1937), and Sibelius' Symphony no. 2 in D. March 28 and 29, guest conductor Henry Lewis, Overture to Le Siège de Corinthe by Rossini, Nielsen's Symphony no 3, "Sinfonia Espansiva," and Brahms' Piano Concerto no. 2 in B flat, with Clifford Curzon, soloist. April 1, Leinsdorf conducts an all-Beethoven program, Overture to Egmont, Symphony no. 1 in C major, and Symphony no. 3 in E flat, "Eroica." April 3, Leinsdorf conducts Beethoven's Symphony no. 6 in F major, "The Pastoral," and Symphony no. 3 in E flat, "Eroica." April 4 and 5, Leinsdorf, Beethoven's Overture to Egmont, Piano concerto no. 5 in F, with John Browning, and Symphony no. 6 in A major by Bruckner. The last open rehearsal is on March 27. For tickets call 266-1492.

BOSTON
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.

MAR 1969

TWENTIETH PROGRAM
Friday afternoon March 7 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening March 8 1969 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BACH	Suite no. 4 in D major BWV 1069 Ouverture Bourrée 1 – Bourrée 2 Gavotte Menuett 1 – Menuett 2 Réjouissance (Rejoicing)
	ROBERT LEVIN harpsichord continuo
SCHOENBERG	Variations for orchestra op. 31
intermission
WAGNER	Siegfried Idyll
STRAUSS	Suite from 'Der Rosenkavalier' op. 43

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
MAR 8 1969 New England

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
MAR 8 1969 New England

BSO's Schoenberg fine

By HARRY NEVILLE
Staff Writer

An event originally scheduled for Dec. 13 and 14 finally materialized yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, and it proved to be well worth the long wait. Erich Leinsdorf conducted the Boston Symphony in Schoenberg's Variations for Orchestra, Op. 31, and for this listener the performance was one of the highlights of the season.

Opus 31 dates from 1928 and is the first orchestral composition to use the twelve-tone technique Schoenberg had been evolving since the early 1920's. It is not an easy work for the listener to grasp, but the demands it makes of our attention are much less strenuous — and, one is tempted to add, much more rewarding — than those made by most of its present-day descendents.

PRECISE and CLEAR

There is something almost old-fashioned about Schoenberg's handling of rhythm and form in the Variations — something for which one ends up being grateful as it does provide a kind of aural guidepost.

The great performance problem of the work is to achieve clarity of texture and correctness of balance—qualities made difficult to attain by the density of Schoenberg's writing. That Leinsdorf did get wonderfully precise and clear playing was perhaps the smaller part of his triumph, for he also got some beautifully expressive playing—expecially in the second and sixth variations.

One might have wished for a more forceful reading at times—speeds were generally on the slow side with the total performance time (about 22 minutes) some five minutes longer than markings would indicate—but this would probably have resulted in some loss of the remarkable luminosity that resulted from Leinsdorf's approach.

It was an especial pleasure to hear the rapid figurations in the higher registers of the violins delivered with the sheen of the Boston strings.

Bach's Suite No. 4 opened the program. There was little attention paid to such niceties as double-dotting in the introduction, and the performance in general suffered from a lack of rhythmic incisiveness.

Wagner's Siegfried Idyll seems ideally suited to Leinsdorf's temperament, abounding as it does in the atmospheric sense of repose within which he does so much of his best work. He did not disappoint yesterday, nor did the woodwinds who were in unusually good form.

Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdorf conducting Bach: Suite No. 4 in D, BWV 1069; Schoenberg, Variations, Op. 31; Wagner, Siegfried Idyll; Strauss, Suite from "Der Rosenkavalier." Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall.

Leinsdorf Chooses Bach for 20th Concert

BOSTON — An all-orchestral program will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of its music director, Erich Leinsdorf, as the 20th program of the current season. The Friday/Saturday pair of concerts is March 7 at 2 p.m. and March 8 at 8:30 p.m.

The program will open with Bach's Suite No. 4 in major. Leinsdorf will then conduct Schoenberg's Variations op. 31, Wagner's Siegfried Idyll and conclude with Richard Strauss' Suite from "Der Rosenkavalier."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give two other programs during the week of March 3. On Tuesday evening, March 4, at 8:30 and Thursday evening, March 6 at 8:30, Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the orchestra, will conduct Strauss' Don Juan, Rachmaninov's Rhapsody on a theme of Paganini with Jorge Bolet as piano soloist, and Sibelius' Symphony No. 2.

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 5,600
MAR 5 1969 New England

TIMES (e)
BEVERLY, MASS.
CIRC. 9,017
FEB 28 1969 New England

Wagner and Strauss

Symphony Offers Bach, Schoenberg

By McLAREN HARRIS

This weekend's Symphony program bears no resemblance to the one originally planned for these dates — Mendelssohn, Varese, Webern and Strauss in theory as against Bach, Schoenberg, Wagner and Strauss in actuality, and even the Strauss works are different.

The Schoenberg Variations for orchestra, Opus 31, received their performance after a three-month wait. They were last done by the Symphony in 1962 under Richard Burgin. I also attended that concert, and it seems that the intervening seven years has done little to warm the Friday audience's taste for the work.

I SUSPECT that the resistance is due less to the Variations' lack of total center or such matters as harmonic dissonance as to the listener's occasional difficulty in identifying salient features or unifying elements during the course of the nine variations. This must be more a fault of performance than of composition, for the basic tone row is not only distinctive but with a graceful beauty in its pure form in the introduction.

There is a seemingly infinite variety of orchestral color, rhythmic and thematic configuration which Schoenberg embraces in the Variations, but relatively few of them emerged with sufficient relief. Erich Leinsdorf's pacing of the sections was sensible enough, yet there was not the internal flow, the dynamic proportion to provide direction and continuity.

The players seemed to be getting at the notes rather than getting past them, with the result that we were made aware only of their existence, not their significance. Maybe another week could have made things right.

TRULY, HOWEVER, the orchestra was technically solid all afternoon, as they demonstrated immediately with the opening Fourth Suite in D of Bach. The winds, who can never rest easily in such transparent circumstances, were alert with clean attacks and sure intonation. Rhythms snapped crisply throughout an ensemble by turns lightly agile and robust. I'm sorry to say it, but the harpsichord is becoming something of a fifth wheel in these situations. A harpsichord would have difficulty being heard in Symphony Hall even by itself; in the midst of an orchestra all it can add is a slight tonal ring. Placement nearer the apron could raise its contribution.

Wagner's Siegfried Idyll was something of a new experience, for the performance used Leinsdorf's own ideas about its orchestration, mostly in the direction of economy, to a measure reminiscent of Wagner's original scoring for solo instruments. The beginning by solo string quartet is the most striking change; the Idyll suddenly becomes beautifully intimate, in a mood not dispelled but actually enlarged by later full-orchestra textures. The reading breathed total relaxation, sensitively phrased through sustained passages whose ethereal bearing gradually increased dimension toward the end.

THERE ARE ANY number of suites from Strauss' "Der Rosenkavalier" available to orchestras. Yesterday's was put together by assistant conductor Charles Wilson. It includes the prelude and opening of Act I, the "Breakfast Waltz," the waltz from Act II, whose idyllic close is interrupted by Act III's prelude, followed by the "Riot Waltz" and music from the opera's conclusion. It makes a neat dramatic distillate, both in itself and in relation to the opera; Leinsdorf and the players served it with a satisfying gusto.

The orchestra will be on tour for the next two weeks; on March 28-29 Henry Lewis will be guest conductor with Rossini's overture to "The Siege of Corinth," Carl Nielsen's Symphony No. 3 and Brahms' Second Piano Concerto with Clifford Curzon as soloist.

43.

Lighthearted music plus Schoenberg at BSO

By David Sterritt

The Boston Symphony presented a relatively lighthearted program on Friday afternoon. The only selection with an emphasis that could be called heavy was Schoenberg's 1928 Variations for Orchestra, Op. 31. This was written at a time when the composer had been involved primarily with chamber music. One motivation in scoring the piece for full orchestra came from his feeling that certain audiences—mainly American ones—needed the element of sight as well as that of sound to impress them.

But even if the orchestra failed to look any more exciting than it normally does, its execution of the early dodecaphonic work was often striking. Erich Leinsdorf conducted with a strong rhythmic sense, bringing the piece to quick, sharp climaxes, then leading it off down the tone rows for another approach. The orchestra sounded rich and full, avoiding the aggressively piercing sound that can characterize the work. Mr. Leinsdorf brought a good deal of dynamic contrast to it, which Schoenberg might not have approved of; he once spoke, with regard to the Variations, of textural and coloristic shifts and contrasts being far more important and effective than liberal dynamic changes.

Palpably idyllic mood

The program opened in an easy, graceful way with Bach's dignified but happy Suite No. 4 in D major, BWV 1069. Despite the employment (again) of a fairly large orchestra, Mr. Leinsdorf maintained an airy delicacy throughout. He showed a firm knowledge of the piece's overall construction and movement, as well as sympathy with its many internal contrasts (mostly of color). Robert Levin's handling of the continuo was (when it could be heard) always alive, sometimes sparkling.

Wagner's Siegfried Idyll followed, that exceptionally quiet piece (emphasized by a long, slow finale) that Liszt called a "wondrous hymn in praise of domestic sentiment." It has deservedly become an often-heard selection in the years since the composer conducted its first performance on the stairs of his villa, as a birthday-Christmas present to his wife.

Mr. Leinsdorf conducted it calmly, evoking a genuinely idyllic mood that became almost palpable, right there in familiar old Symphony Hall. The orchestra dwelled on and mulled over the exquisite melodies, shaping a warm and contented atmosphere. The arrangement was Mr. Leinsdorf's own, in which the number of strings employed varies throughout the piece.

Then, perhaps to liven things up a bit before sending their audience home, the BSO launched into a vigorous, enthusiastic reading of a Suite (put together by assistant conductor Charles Wilson) from Strauss's "Der Rosenkavalier," Op. 43. Here at times Mr. Leinsdorf appeared to be reaching for a lightness of touch, striving for a spontaneity (which simply can't be done) that the orchestra just hasn't developed, at least not with relation to a piece such as this. It was especially noticeable in the introduction. At other times, though, the bouncy, light quality did appear, even delightfully so. And the full, gaily grandiose passages were played very grandiosely, with a full measure of the requisite sense of fun.

Toward the end some clarity was forsaken in favor of speed, and the bells-and-fiddles conclusion was played with a slightly heavy-handed touch. But all in all it was a lively finish to a singularly lively (if, on reflection, a trifle insubstantial) concert.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150
MAR 10 1969

'Variations' Shows Prime Schoenberg

By GEORGE GELLES, Music Critic

Arnold Schoenberg's "Variations for Orchestra," Opus 31, which the Boston Symphony played yesterday, was not his last venture with the "theme and variation" principle, but it remains his most impressive. No composer of the century has written variations so well, made them as strong a carrier of musical force and as essential a mode of musical utterance. In this Schoenberg is intimately related to Brahms in the 19th Century and a step further back, to Beethoven in the 18th; others, of course, have composed "theme and variations," but without the high seriousness of purpose and singular success we find in the works of these three.

The Schoenberg set under discussion was completed in September of 1928 and given to Furtwaengler and the Berlin Philharmonic for its December premiere, which was stormy.

It's hard today to see why. Dissonant, yes, but classical in form and intent, and very beautiful besides. The theme is introduced after a short and notably mild introduction, is then varied nine ways, each different in character, rhythmic layout, orchestration, and finally is followed by a coda of hair-raising posibilities.

If no hair was raised at Symphony Hall yesterday, it wasn't Leonsdorf's fault alone. True, the progressively accelerating tempo relationships didn't make much of an effect here, and in the fifth and seventh sections, those toughest to weave together, there was no feeling of solidity, but the problem is larger than Leinsdorf alone. The players, infrequently faced with a wor so conceived (it is twelve-tone) and of such great technical demands, were naturally on strange terrain, and perhaps predictably, did a job that left lots undone.

For the most part, notes were there, but one heard little dynamic shading, little accent, little color, little security in execution. The general stance each variation was taking came across, but details got inadequate attention, and the total impression was a somewhat forbidding grey.

Still, I was glad to hear the piece for it's prime Schoenberg, and I had hoped that it was to be played on the forthcoming southern tour and brought back to Boston in sturdier shape, but it's not.

The afternoon opened with Bach's Fourth Suite, Leinsdorf leading, and t he performance was not a happy one. Tempi were slack, the surface overly smooth, the whole lacking muscle and articulation. And after the intermission Wagner's "Seigfried Idyll" and a suite from Strauss' "Rosenkavalier" were heard.

All-Orchestral BSO Program

An all-orchestral program will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its music director, Erich Leinsdorf, as the 20th program of the current season on Friday and Saturday.

The program will open with Bach's Suite No. 4 in major. Mr. Leinsdorf will then conduct Schoenberg's Variations, Op. 31, Wagner's Siegfried Idyll and conclude with Richard Strauss' Suite from "Der Rosenkavalier."

The orchestra will give two other programs during the week of March 3. On Tuesday and Thursday evenings at 8:30, Charles Wilson, assistant conductor, will conduct Strauss' "Don Juan," Rachmaninoff's Rhapsody on a theme of Paganini with Jorge Bolet as piano soloist, and Sibelius' Symphony No. 2.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436
MAR 2 1969 New England

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873
MAR 8 1969 New England

TWENTIETH PROGRAM
Friday afternoon March 7 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening March 8 1969 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BACH — Suite no. 4 in D major BWV 1069
Ouverture
Bourrée 1 – Bourrée 2
Gavotte
Menuett 1 – Menuett 2
Réjouissance (Rejoicing)
ROBERT LEVIN harpsichord continuo

SCHOENBERG — Variations for orchestra op. 31

intermission

WAGNER — Siegfried Idyll

STRAUSS — Suite from 'Der Rosenkavalier' op. 43

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
MAR 8 1969 New England

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
MAR 8 1969 New England

BSO's Schoenberg fine

By HARRY NEVILLE
Staff Writer

An event originally scheduled for Dec. 13 and 14 finally materialized yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, and it proved to be well worth the long wait. Erich Leinsdorf conducted the Boston Symphony in Schoenberg's Variations for Orchestra, Op. 31, and for this listener the performance was one of the highlights of the season.

Opus 31 dates from 1928 and is the first orchestral composition to use the twelve-tone technique Schoenberg had been evolving since the early 1920's. It is not an easy work for the listener to grasp, but the demands it makes of our attention are much less strenuous — and, one is tempted to add, much more rewarding — than those made by most of its present-day descendents.

PRECISE and CLEAR

There is something almost old-fashioned about Schoenberg's handling of rhythm and form in the Variations — something for which one ends up being grateful as it does provide a kind of aural guidepost.

The great performance problem of the work is to achieve clarity of texture and correctness of balance—qualities made difficult to attain by the density of Schoenberg's writing. That Leinsdorf did get wonderfully precise and clear playing was perhaps the smaller part of his triumph, for he also got some beautifully expressive playing—expecially in the second and sixth variations.

One might have wished for a more forceful reading at times—speeds were generally on the slow side with the total performance time (about 22 minutes) some five minutes longer than markings would indicate—but this would probably have resulted in some loss of the remarkable luminosity that resulted from Leinsdorf's approach.

It was an especial pleasure to hear the rapid figurations in the higher registers of the violins delivered with the sheen of the Boston strings.

Bach's Suite No. 4 opened the program. There was little attention paid to such niceties as double-dotting in the introduction, and the performance in general suffered from a lack of rhythmic incisiveness.

Wagner's Siegfried Idyll seems ideally suited to Leinsdorf's temperament, abounding as it does in the atmospheric sense of repose within which he does so much of his best work. He did not disappoint yesterday, nor did the woodwinds who were in unusually good form.

Boston Symphony, Erich Leinsdrof conducting Bach, Suite No. 4 in D, BWV 1069; Schoenberg, Variations, Op. 31; Wagner, Siefried Idyll; Strauss, Suite from "Der Rosenkavalier." Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall.

Leinsdorf Chooses Bach for 20th Concert

BOSTON — An all-orchestral program will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of its music director, Erich Leinsdorf, as the 20th program of the current season. The Friday/Saturday pair of concerts is March 7 at 2 p.m. and March 8 at 8:30 p.m.

The program will open with Bach's Suite No. 4 in major. Leinsdorf will then conduct Schoenberg's Variations op. 31, Wagner's Siegfried Idyll and conclude with Richard Strauss' Suite from "Der Rosenkavalier."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give two other programs during the week of March 3. On Tuesday evening, March 4, at 8:30 and Thursday evening, March 6 at 8:30, Charles Wilson, assistant conductor of the orchestra, will conduct Strauss' Don Juan, Rachmaninov's Rhapsody on a theme of Paganini with Jorge Bolet as piano soloist, and Sibelius' Symphony No. 2.

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 5,600
MAR 5 1969 New England

TIMES (e)
BEVERLY, MASS.
CIRC. 9,017
FEB 28 1969 New England

Wagner and Strauss

Symphony Offers Bach, Schoenberg

By McLAREN HARRIS

This weekend's Symphony program bears no resemblance to the one originally planned for these dates — Mendelssohn, Varese, Webern and Strauss in theory as against Bach, Schoenberg, Wagner and Strauss in actuality, and even the Strauss works are different.

The Schoenberg Variations for orchestra, Opus 31, received their performance after a three-month wait. They were last done by the Symphony in 1962 under Richard Burgin. I also attended that concert, and it seems that the intervening seven years has done little to warm the Friday audience's taste for the work.

I SUSPECT that the resistance is due less to the Variations' lack of total center or such matters as harmonic dissonance as to the listener's occasional difficulty in identifying salient features or unifying elements during the course of the nine variations. This must be more a fault of performance than of composition, for the basic tone row is not only distinctive but with a graceful beauty in its pure form in the introduction.

There is a seemingly infinite variety of orchestral color, rhythmic and thematic configuration which Schoenberg embraces in the Variations, but relatively few of them emerged with sufficient relief. Erich Leinsdorf's pacing of the sections was sensible enough, yet there was not the internal flow, the dynamic proportion to provide direction and continuity.

The players seemed to be getting at the notes rather than getting past them, with the result that we were made aware only of their existence, not their significance. Maybe another week could have made things right.

TRULY, HOWEVER, the orchestra was technically solid all afternoon, as they demonstrated immediately with the opening Fourth Suite in D of Bach. The winds, who can never rest easily in such transparent circumstances, were alert with clean attacks and sure intonation. Rhythms snapped crisply throughout an ensemble by turns lightly agile and robust. I'm sorry to say it, but the harpsichord is becoming something of a fifth wheel in these situations. A harpsichord would have difficulty being heard in Symphony Hall even by itself; in the midst of an orchestra all it can add is a slight tonal ring. Placement nearer the apron could raise its contribution.

Wagner's Siegfried Idyll was something of a new experience, for the performance used Leinsdorf's own ideas about its orchestration, mostly in the direction of economy, to a measure reminiscent of Wagner's original scoring for solo instruments. The beginning by solo string quartet is the most striking change; the Idyll suddenly becomes beautifully intimate, in a mood not dispelled but actually enlarged by later full-orchestra textures. The reading breathed total relaxation, sensitively phrased through sustained passages whose ethereal bearing gradually increased dimension toward the end.

THERE ARE ANY number of suites from Strauss' "Der Rosenkavalier" available to orchestras. Yesterday's was put together by assistant conductor Charles Wilson. It includes the prelude and opening of Act I, the "Breakfast Waltz," the waltz from Act II, whose idyllic close is interrupted by Act III's prelude, followed by the "Riot Waltz" and music from the opera's conclusion. It makes a neat dramatic distillate, both in itself and in relation to the opera; Leinsdorf and the players served it with a satisfying gusto.

The orchestra will be on tour for the next two weeks; on March 28-29 Henry Lewis will be guest conductor with Rossini's overture to "The Siege of Corinth," Carl Nielsen's Symphony No. 3 and Brahms' Second Piano Concerto with Clifford Curzon as soloist.

43.

Lighthearted music plus Schoenberg at BSO

By David Sterritt

The Boston Symphony presented a relatively lighthearted program on Friday afternoon. The only selection with an emphasis that could be called heavy was Schoenberg's 1928 Variations for Orchestra, Op. 31. This was written at a time when the composer had been involved primarily with chamber music. One motivation in scoring the piece for full orchestra came from his feeling that certain audiences—mainly American ones—needed the element of sight as well as that of sound to impress them.

But even if the orchestra failed to look any more exciting than it normally does, its execution of the early dodecaphonic work was often striking. Erich Leinsdorf conducted with a strong rhythmic sense, bringing the piece to quick, sharp climaxes, then leading it off down the tone rows for another approach. The orchestra sounded rich and full, avoiding the aggressively piercing sound that can characterize the work. Mr. Leinsdorf brought a good deal of dynamic contrast to it, which Schoenberg might not have approved of; he once spoke, with regard to the Variations, of textural and coloristic shifts and contrasts being far more important and effective than liberal dynamic changes.

Palpably idyllic mood

The program opened in an easy, graceful way with Bach's dignified but happy Suite No. 4 in D major, BWV 1069. Despite the employment (again) of a fairly large orchestra, Mr. Leinsdorf maintained an airy delicacy throughout. He showed a firm knowledge of the piece's overall construction and movement, as well as sympathy with its many internal contrasts (mostly of color). Robert Levin's handling of the continuo was (when it could be heard) always alive, sometimes sparkling.

Wagner's Siegfried Idyll followed, that exceptionally quiet piece (emphasized by a long, slow finale) that Liszt called a "wondrous hymn in praise of domestic sentiment." It has deservedly become an often-heard selection in the years since the composer conducted its first performance on the stairs of his villa, as a birthday-Christmas present to his wife.

Mr. Leinsdorf conducted it calmly, evoking a genuinely idyllic mood that became almost palpable, right there in familiar old Symphony Hall. The orchestra dwelled on and mulled over the exquisite melodies, shaping a warm and contented atmosphere. The arrangement was Mr. Leinsdorf's own, in which the number of strings employed varies throughout the piece.

Then, perhaps to liven things up a bit before sending their audience home, the BSO launched into a vigorous, enthusiastic reading of a Suite (put together by assistant conductor Charles Wilson) from Strauss's "Der Rosenkavalier," Op. 43. Here at times Mr. Leinsdorf appeared to be reaching for a lightness of touch, striving for a spontaneity (which simply can't be done) that the orchestra just hasn't developed, at least not with relation to a piece such as this. It was especially noticeable in the introduction. At other times, though, the bouncy, light quality did appear, even delightfully so. And the full, gaily grandiose passages were played very grandiosely, with a full measure of the requisite sense of fun.

Toward the end some clarity was forsaken in favor of speed, and the bells-and-fiddles conclusion was played with a slightly heavy-handed touch. But all in all it was a lively finish to a singularly lively (if, on reflection, a trifle insubstantial) concert.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150
MAR 10 1969

'Variations' Shows Prime Schoenberg

By GEORGE GELLES, Music Critic

Arnold Schoenberg's "Variations for Orchestra," Opus 31, which the Boston Symphony played yesterday, was not his last venture with the "theme and variation" principle, but it remains his most impressive. No composer of the century has written variations so well, made them as strong a carrier of musical force and as essential a mode of musical utterance. In this Schoenberg is intimately related to Brahms in the 19th Century and a step further back, to Beethoven in the 18th; others, of course, have composed "theme and variations," but without the high seriousness of purpose and singular success we find in the works of these three.

The Schoenberg set under discussion was completed in September of 1928 and given to Furtwaengler and the Berlin Philharmonic for its December premiere which was stormy.

It's hard today to see why. Dissonant, yes, but classical in form and intent, and very beautiful besides. The theme is introduced after a short and notably mild introduction, is then varied nine ways, each different in character, rhythmic layout, orchestration, and finally is followed by a coda of hair-raising posibilities.

If no hair was raised at Symphony Hall yesterday, it wasn't Leonsdorf's fault alone. True, the progressively accelerating tempo relationships didn't make much of an effect here, and in the fifth and seventh sections, those toughest to weave together, there was no feeling of solidity, but the problem is larger than Leinsdorf alone. The players, infrequently faced with a wor so conceived (it is twelve-tone) and of such great technical demands, were naturally on strange terrain, and perhaps predictably, did a job that left lots undone.

For the most part, notes were there, but one heard little dynamic shading, little accent, little color, little security in execution. The general stance each variation was taking came across, but details got inadequate attention, and the total impression was a somewhat forbidding grey.

Still, I was glad to hear the piece for it's prime Schoenberg, and I had hoped that it was to be played on the forthcoming southern tour and brought back to Boston in sturdier shape, but it's not.

The afternoon opened with Bach's Fourth Suite, Leinsdorf leading, and t he performance was not a happy one. Tempi were slack, the surface overly smooth, the whole lacking muscle and articulation. And after the intermission Wagner's "Seigfried Idyll" and a suite from Strauss' "Rosenkavalier" were heard.

All-Orchestral BSO Program

An all-orchestral program will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its music director, Erich Leinsdorf, as the 20th program of the current season on Friday and Saturday.

The program will open with Bach's Suite No. 4 in major. Mr. Leinsdorf will then conduct Schoenberg's Variations, Op. 31, Wagner's Siegfried Idyll and conclude with Richard Strauss' Suite from "Der Rosenkavalier."

The orchestra will give two other programs during the week of March 3. On Tuesday and Thursday evenings at 8:30, Charles Wilson, assistant conductor, will conduct Strauss' "Don Juan," Rachmaninoff's Rhapsody on a theme of Paganini with Jorge Bolet as piano soloist, and Sibelius' Symphony No. 2.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436
MAR 2 1969 New England

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873
MAR 8 1969 New England

44.

TUESDAY A SERIES

NINTH PROGRAM
Tuesday evening March 25 1969 at 8.30

CHARLES WILSON conductor

SCHUBERT — Symphony no. 5 in B flat
Allegro
Andante con moto
Menuetto: allegro molto
Allegro vivace

STRAVINSKY — Jeu de cartes (1937)*

intermission

SIBELIUS — Symphony no. 2 in D major op. 43
Allegretto
Tempo andante ma rubato
Vivacissimo – lento e suave
Finale: allegro moderato

Making the Musical Circuit In Boston This Past Week

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

Last Friday and Saturday Mr. Leinsdorf contrived a sampler program — something for everybody: Bach, Suite No. 4; Schoenberg, Variations for Orchestra. op. 31; Wagner, Siegfried Idyll; and Strauss, Suite from "Der Rosenkavalier." Conductor and orchestra were at their shining best.

The overture in the Bach may not have had the regal weight and impact in opening and closing sections, but the following dances bounced with clean staccattos in appropriate tempos and delightful contrapuntal play. Schoenberg's early essay with a twelve-tone scheme had many moments of effective orchestral resonance (a singing affettuoso in the cellos, for instance) and there was no doubt about classic derivations of variation from the opening motif in the plucked strings (like the last movement of Beethoven's Eroica) but the net result was very scrappy, lige a collage of torn paper in various colors. Unlike a picture, music unrolls in linear sequence, and except for momentary counterpoint of contrasts it was difficult, even in careful performance, to hear relationships in the whole. The fact that there was a tone-row basis means nothing; hearing is believing.

Discontinuity by now is a fashionable ambition and no bar to performance — if anybody wants it. The whole cult of absurdity in the arts certinly reflects a shallow reality; but when understood to a degree, strange juxtapositions in nature and human experience are always related in deeper oneness (late Beethoven can seem either random or profound). Don't take this too seriously; Schoenberg had a fierce integrity, whether we hear it or not.

With the Siegried Idyll, the private tenderness, the lyric warmth of that driven, grandiloquent master flowed with all its introspective immediacy. The orchestra's playing of this sets a standard difficult to approach. We get the inflated, though sometimes glorious, world of the Ring, and even the more convincing humanity of the little operas (the Mastersingers and Tristan) and recognize an unforced statement of private love that speaks for all of us.

From Wagner to Strauss is an easy step musically, but a step onto another level of living. Wagner's orchestra is now extended, his sensuosities of tone more colorful; his terrible commitment becomes a night-out-on-the-town. And who doesn't need occasional vacation. After countless abridgments and arrangements finally in 1944 the old composer himself did his own concert suite, which the then young Erich Leinsdorf conducted in London.

No wonder we were beguiled by this final cocktail to a program of very human variety.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000
MAR 13 1969
New England Newsclip

The Sound of Music

The Three S's At Symphony

By Peter M. Knapp

With Assistant Conductor Charles Wilson on the podium, the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert last night was devoted to what might be termed "The Three S's" Schubert, Stavinsky and Sibelius.

The lighter moments came first — Shubert's youthful Symphony No. 5 in B-flat, and Stravinsky's playful "Jeu de Cartes." Then to conclude there was the Symphony No. 2 in D of Sibelius, sterner fare.

Wilson has come a long way as a conductor since making his first appearances with the orchestra, and has developed into a reliable and tidy interpreter of symphonic works. He keeps order well, phrases nicely, has a keen sense of rhythm and generally chooses tempi discriminatingly.

Sunny Shubert

He did play the second movement, andante con moto, of the Shubert symphony with less "moto" than desirable, though he managed to keep the lines of this lovely movement from drooping. A brisker tempo would have helped it.

The rest of the symphony went well, with fine outlining of detail and good balances among the reduced number of players. The first movement in particular had a sunny simplicity, even if at times Wilson seemed to put a little more iron into his chords than necessary.

Stravinsky's "Card Party" ballet came off with bubbling good humor and virtuoso playing among the large orchestra generally treated in concertante style. It is a light-hearted piece depicting a scenario in which the dancers are the cards in a game of poker, and its "movements" are "three deals," each prefaced by a kind of fanfare.

Stravinsky has written that "Jeu" is his most "German" score, his conception of the scene being a German spa in the Romantic period with snatches of concert music drifting into the casino. (A longtime card player, Stravinsky notes that between composing he played poker.)

Borrowed Tunes

The score is unmistakably Stravinsky, full of ostinato and syncopated rhythms, demanding writing for woodwinds and brass, and deft transformations of melodic material. There is also a good deal of parody, as snippets of Ravel, Johann Strauss, Rossini and early Stravinsky works are stitched into the fabric. An unpretentious, entertaining work, well performed.

The Sibelius symphony has more muscle and introspection, of course, as well as that grand Nordic rhetoric the Finnish composer could make rock-hard. The symphony was strongly performed, through Wilson did not succeed in communicating much emotion, the opening of the first movement seemed rather heavy-textured, and the initial fragmentary episodes could have been handled with more coherence in their relationship each other.

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 62,736
MAR 26 1969
New England Newsclip

Newark Star-Ledger
NEWARK, N. J.
D. 238,474
MAR 19 1969

Lewis to direct Boston orchestra

Henry Lewis, music director of the New Jersey Symphony Orchestra, resumes his winter schedule of guest appearances with a pair of concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall, Boston, on Friday March 28 and Saturday March 29. This will mark Lewis' first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The program will include Rossini's "Overture to the Seige of Corinthe" and Carl Nielsen's Symphony No. 3 (Sinfonia Espansiva"). Soloist will be English pianist Clifford Curzon in a performance of Brahm's Concerto No. 2.

Lewis' guest schedule for the 1968-69 season began in November at the Vancouver Opera Company. In December, he appeared with the Royal Philharmonic in London. On April 13, he will conduct the Hartford Symphony, and he will direct the Italian Radio Orchestra in May in a concert to be broadcast live throughout Italy and other European countries.

Next summer, Lewis will appear again with the Boston Symphony at the Tanglewood Music Festival and with the Detroit Symphony at its Meadowbrook Festival.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436
MAR 23 1969
New England

Henry Lewis To Conduct Symphony

Henry Lewis, conductor of the New Jersey Symphony, makes his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. His program includes the Rossini Overture to "The Siege of Corinth," Nielsen's Symphony No. 3, "Sinfonia Espansiva," and Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 2 in B flat.

Soloist in the Brahms concerto will be British pianist Clifford Curzon, performing with the orchestra for the first time since the Edinburgh Festival of 1956.

Lewis, born in Los Angeles in 1932, became the youngest member of the Los Angeles Philharmonic when he joined the double bass section at sixteen. During his army service in Europe, he was music director of the Seventh Army Symphony.

Newark Sunday News
NEWARK, N. J.
SUN. 423,157
MAR 23 1969

Lewis to Lead Boston Symphony

Henry Lewis, music director of the New Jersey Symphony Orchestra, resumes his winter schedule of guest appearances with a pair of concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall, Boston, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. This will mark Lewis' first appearance with the Boston Symphony.

The program will include Rossini's "Overture to the Siege of Corinth" and Carl Nielsen's Symphony No. 3 ("Sinfonia Espansiva"). Soloist will be English pianist Clifford Curzon in a performance of Brahm's Piano Concerto No. 2.

Lewis' guest schedule for the 1968-69 season began in November at the Vancouver Opera Company. In December, he appeared with the Royal Philharmonic in London. On April 13, he will conduct the Hartford Symphony, and he will direct the Italian Radio Orchestra in May in a concert to be broadcast live throughout Italy and other European countries.

Next summer, Lewis will appear with the Boston Symphony at the Berkshire Music Festival in Lenox, Mass., and with the Detroit Symphony at its Meadowbrook Festival.

44.

TUESDAY A SERIES

NINTH PROGRAM
Tuesday evening March 25 1969 at 8.30

CHARLES WILSON conductor

SCHUBERT — Symphony no. 5 in B flat
Allegro
Andante con moto
Menuetto: allegro molto
Allegro vivace

STRAVINSKY — Jeu de cartes (1937)*

intermission

SIBELIUS — Symphony no. 2 in D major op. 43
Allegretto
Tempo andante ma rubato
Vivacissimo – lento e suave
Finale: allegro moderato

Making the Musical Circuit In Boston This Past Week

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

Last Friday and Saturday Mr. Leinsdorf contrived a sampler program — something for everybody: Bach, Suite No. 4; Schoenberg, Variations for Orchestra. op. 31; Wagner, Siegfried Idyll; and Strauss, Suite from "Der Rosenkavalier." Conductor and orchestra were at their shining best.

The overture in the Bach may not have had the regal weight and impact in opening and closing sections, but the following dances bounced with clean staccattos in appropriate tempos and delightful contrapuntal play. Schoenberg's early essay with a twelve-tone scheme had many moments of effective orchestral resonance (a singing affettuoso in the cellos, for instance) and there was no doubt about classic derivations of variation from the opening motif in the plucked strings (like the last movement of Beethoven's Eroica) but the net result was very scrappy, lige a collage of torn paper in various colors. Unlike a picture, music unrolls in linear sequence, and except for momentary counterpoint of contrasts it was difficult, even in careful performance, to hear relationships in the whole. The fact that there was a tone-row basis means nothing; hearing is believing.

Discontinuity by now is a fashionable ambition and no bar to performance — if anybody wants it. The whole cult of absurdity in the arts certinly reflects a shallow reality; but when understood to a degree, strange juxtapositions in nature and human experience are always related in deeper oneness (late Beethoven can seem either random or profound). Don't take this too seriously; Schoenberg had a fierce integrity, whether we hear it or not.

With the Siegried Idyll, the private tenderness, the lyric warmth of that driven, grandiloquent master flowed with all its introspective immediacy. The orchestra's playing of this sets a standard difficult to approach. We get the inflated, though sometimes glorious, world of the Ring, and even the more convincing humanity of the little operas (the Mastersingers and Tristan) and recognize an unforced statement of private love that speaks for all of us.

From Wagner to Strauss is an easy step musically, but a step onto another level of living. Wagner's orchestra is now extended, his sensuosities of tone more colorful; his terrible commitment becomes a night-out-on-the-town. And who doesn't need occasional vacation. After countless abridgments and arrangements finally in 1944 the old composer himself did his own concert suite, which the then young Erich Leinsdorf conducted in London.

No wonder we were beguiled by this final cocktail to a program of very human variety.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

MAR 13 1969

New England Newsclip

The Sound of Music

The Three S's At Symphony

By Peter M. Knapp

With Assistant Conductor Charles Wilson on the podium, the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert last night was devoted to what might be termed "The Three S's" Schubert, Stavinsky and Sibelius.

The lighter moments came first — Shubert's youthful Symphony No. 5 in B-flat, and Stravinsky's playful "Jeu de Cartes." Then to conclude there was the Symphony No. 2 in D of Sibelius, sterner fare.

Wilson has come a long way as a conductor since making his first appearances with the orchestra, and has developed into a reliable and tidy interpreter of symphonic works. He keeps order well, phrases nicely, has a keen sense of rhythm and generally chooses tempi discriminatingly.

Sunny Shubert

He did play the second movement, andante con moto, of the Shubert symphony with less "moto" than desirable, though he managed to keep the lines of this lovely movement from drooping. A brisker tempo would have helped it.

The rest of the symphony went well, with fine outlining of detail and good balances among the reduced number of players. The first movement in particular had a sunny simplicity, even if at times Wilson seemed to put a little more iron into his chords than necessary.

Stravinsky's "Card Party" ballet came off with bubbling good humor and virtuoso playing among the large orchestra generally treated in concertante style. It is a light-hearted piece depicting a scenario in which the dancers are the cards in a game of poker, and its "movements" are "three deals," each prefaced by a kind of fanfare.

Stravinsky has written that "Jeu" is his most "German" score, his conception of the scene being a German spa in the Romantic period with snatches of concert music drifting into the casino. (A longtime card player, Stravinsky notes that between composing he played poker.)

Borrowed Tunes

The score is unmistakably Stravinsky, full of ostinato and syncopated rhythms, demanding writing for woodwinds and brass, and deft transformations of melodic material. There is also a good deal of parody, as snippets of Ravel, Johann Strauss, Rossini and early Stravinsky works are stitched into the fabric. An unpretentious, entertaining work, well performed.

The Sibelius symphony has more muscle and introspection, of course, as well as that grand Nordic rhetoric the Finnish composer could make rock-hard. The symphony was strongly performed, through Wilson did not succeed in communicating much emotion, the opening of the first movement seemed rather heavy-textured, and the initial fragmentary episodes could have been handled with more coherence in their relationship each other.

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 62,736

MAR 26 1969

New England Newsclip

Newark Star-Ledger
NEWARK, N. J.
D. 238,474

MAR 19 1969

Lewis to direct Boston orchestra

Henry Lewis, music director of the New Jersey Symphony Orchestra, resumes his winter schedule of guest appearances with a pair of concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall, Boston, on Friday March 28 and Saturday March 29. This will mark Lewis' first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The program will include Rossini's "Overture to the Seige of Corinthe" and Carl Nielsen's Symphony No. 3 (Sinfonia Espansiva"). Soloist will be English pianist Clifford Curzon in a performance of Brahm's Concerto No. 2.

Lewis' guest schedule for the 1968-69 season began in November at the Vancouver Opera Company. In December, he appeared with the Royal Philharmonic in London. On April 13, he will conduct the Hartford Symphony, and he will direct the Italian Radio Orchestra in May in a concert to be broadcast live throughout Italy and other European countries.

Next summer, Lewis will appear again with the Boston Symphony at the Tanglewood Music Festival and with the Detroit Symphony at its Meadowbrook Festival.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436

MAR 23 1969

New England

Henry Lewis To Conduct Symphony

Henry Lewis, conductor of the New Jersey Symphony, makes his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. His program includes the Rossini Overture to "The Siege of Corinth," Nielsen's Symphony No. 3, "Sinfonia Espansiva," and Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 2 in B flat.

Soloist in the Brahms concerto will be British pianist Clifford Curzon, performing with the orchestra for the first time since the Edinburgh Festival of 1956.

Lewis, born in Los Angeles in 1932, became the youngest member of the Los Angeles Philharmonic when he joined the double bass section at sixteen. During his army service in Europe, he was music director of the Seventh Army Symphony.

Newark Sunday News
NEWARK, N. J.
SUN. 423,157

MAR 23 1969

Lewis to Lead Boston Symphony

Henry Lewis, music director of the New Jersey Symphony Orchestra, resumes his winter schedule of guest appearances with a pair of concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall, Boston, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. This will mark Lewis' first appearance with the Boston Symphony.

The program will include Rossini's "Overture to the Siege of Corinth" and Carl Nielsen's Symphony No. 3 ("Sinfonia Espansiva"). Soloist will be English pianist Clifford Curzon in a performance of Brahm's Piano Concerto No. 2.

Lewis' guest schedule for the 1968-69 season began in November at the Vancouver Opera Company. In December, he appeared with the Royal Philharmonic in London. On April 13, he will conduct the Hartford Symphony, and he will direct the Italian Radio Orchestra in May in a concert to be broadcast live throughout Italy and other European countries.

Next summer, Lewis will appear with the Boston Symphony at the Berkshire Music Festival in Lenox, Mass., and with the Detroit Symphony at its Meadowbrook Festival.

45.

TWENTY-FIRST PROGRAM
Friday afternoon March 28 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening March 29 1969 at 8.30

HENRY LEWIS conductor

ROSSINI — Overture to 'Le siège de Corinthe'
first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

NIELSEN — Symphony no. 3 op. 27 'Sinfonia espansiva'
Allegro espansivo
Andante pastorale
Allegretto un poco
Finale: allegro

JOANNA BRUNO soprano
MARK PEARSON baritone

first performance in Boston

intermission

BRAHMS — Piano concerto no. 2 in B flat op. 83
Allegro non troppo
Allegro appassionato
Andante
Allegretto grazioso

CLIFFORD CURZON

New Jersey conductor makes BSO debut

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Staff Writer

After the house lights went down before Friday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert, the man who appeared on stage was not the conductor, but the orchestra's manager, Thomas D. Perry Jr.

He announced the death an hour and a half earlier of former President Dwight D. Eisenhower and said that the orchestra would play the Funeral March from Beethoven's "Eroica." Guest conductor Henry Lewis walked out in silence, led a very slow performance the Beethoven movement — the audience making up its mind in measures one and two that it ought to hear it standing — and then retired, again in silence.

Moments later, Lewis, the 37-year-old music director of the New Jersey Symphony Orchestra, reappeared, this time to cordial applause, and got down to the afternoon's anticipated business.

Lewis conducted "Carmen" last year for the Opera Company of Boston, but this was his concert debut here. For it he chose Rossini's "Siege of Corinth" Overture (not played previously by the Boston Symphony) and Nielsen's "Sinfonia espansiva" (never before played in Boston at all). In the second half he had a soloist, the English pianist Clifford Curzon, who had not appeared in Boston for 16 years, and who played the Brahms B flat Concerto.

The Rossini Overture, as a matter of fact, contains a noble funeral music of its own, magically scored for woodwinds, low strings, and military drums. That serves as an introductory section, which is followed by the standard Rossini allegro, crescendo and all. It is a singularly inventive piece, the richest, I should think, of Rossini's Overtures before "William Tell," and Lewis and the orchestra gave it an effective performance.

Carl Nielsen's Symphony No. 3, "Espansiva," completed in 1911, is the last of Nielsen's conventionally shaped symphonies. It opens brilliantly, with a waltz symphony of enormous proportions. That, it seems to me, is Nielsen at his best, full of energy and fun and surprises, engagingly combining subtlety of mind with heartiness, even rowdyness, of manner.

What follows convinces me less, though the middle movements, a gentle eclogue and a quietly restless quasi-scherzo, are full of lovely and telling details.

One could describe the last movement as a march-time analogue to the first: It is a very down-beating music that makes emphatic protestations about being healthy and affirmative. Maybe it needs a movie, something along the lines of a WW II documentary with an aircraft carrier (I am not only part of the alcohol generation, but also part of the big battleship generation).

Lewis produced a performance that was energetic, richly sonorous, inclined to be round rather than sharp in rhythm and articulation, and apt just a bit to emphasize that something heavy in the music. At the end of his Andante pastorale, Nielsen introduces a baritone and soprano to vocalize wordlessly. It is a surprise that does not quite work. Either it is no surprise because you have already been warned in the program notes, or the effect is so sensational and produces such a tempest of ah-ing and neck-craning and heavy breathing as to disrupt hopelessly the continuity of the piece.

The music itself is however, especially attractive just there, and it was well sung by Joanna Bruno and Mark Pearson. I should have thought, though, that having the singers off-stage would have more accurately produced the sonority and the effect I take Nielsen to have had in mind.

Clifford Curzon and Lewis gave a beautiful ensemble performance of the difficult Brahms Concerto. Curzon is in some ways a limited pianist in that his fortissimo is colorless and his markmanship is often wild. On the other hand, his coloristic repertory in piano and pianissimo is rich, he is a masterful leggiero player, and a great accompanist and chamber musician. All that matters a good deal in the Brahms B flat, and those qualities, combined with a lively sense of musical character, went into as fine and interesting an interpretation of that much-whipped concerto as I have heard in many years.

Lewis, neither a neutrally non-listening accompanist nor a dictator, took exceptional pains with the work, and in spite of some orchestral blemishes, with impressive results. Jules Eskin played the celle solo very well indeed, and it was a special pleasure for once not to hear that Andante mercilessly dragged.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Henry Lewis conducting. Beethoven: Funeral March from Symphony No. 3, "Eroica" (In Memoriam President Eisenhower) Rossini: Overture to "Le siege de Corinthe;" Nielsen: Symphony No. 3, "Sinfonia espansiva;" Brahms: Piano Concerto No. 2 in B flat. Clifford Curzon, soloist. Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
MAR 29 1969
New England Newsclip

THE CONDUCTOR

HENRY LEWIS, Music Director of the New Jersey Symphony Orchestra, was born in Los Angeles in 1932. He started learning the piano when he was five, and studied many of the standard instruments while still a boy. At the age of sixteen he became a double bass player in the Los Angeles Philharmonic, the youngest member of the orchestra. He was drafted into the army in 1955 and went to Stuttgart, Germany where he first played double bass in the Seventh Army Symphony, later becoming musical director.

Returning to the United States, Henry Lewis continued his dual career as player and conductor. He founded the Los Angeles Chamber Orchestra, and in 1961 was invited to replace the ill Igor Markevitch at a pair of Philharmonic concerts. Soon afterwards he resigned from the Orchestra to devote his time to conducting.

Henry Lewis has taken the Los Angeles Chamber Orchestra on tour to Europe, has conducted the Los Angeles Opera Company and appeared at the Hollywood Bowl. He has conducted the Vancouver Opera, the American Opera Society and at the Teatro La Scala in Milan. Symphony orchestras which he has directed include those in Detroit, Chicago, San Francisco and London. He has made several recordings for London Records. Henry Lewis is married to soprano Marilyn Horne, who appeared with the Boston Symphony earlier this season. He makes his debut with the Orchestra at these concerts.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
MAR 29 1969
New England Newsclip

The Funeral March

Solemn Day at Symphony

By McLAREN HARRIS

"Shortly after noon," said Symphony manager Thomas D. Perry, "we received news of the death of former President Eisenhower. In his memory Henry Lewis will conduct the orchestra in the Funeral March from the 'Eroica' Symphony by Beethoven."

It was not a new experience for the Friday Symphony audience. A little more than five years ago — Nov. 22, 1963 — Erich Leinsdorf interrupted the concert to announce the assassination of President John Kennedy. Then both audience and orchestra were stunned; the same music was played.

WITH YESTERDAY'S announcment came a murmur through the audience. There was sorrow, even grief on the faces, but there was no shock. This had been expected. Everyone remained seated while music began, the rolling of drums reminiscent in the lower strings. Suddenly in a wave from back to front the audience stood, as if by an unspoken order, remaining silently upright, almost stock-still throughout the long movement, each mind heavy with the realization that this was the most anyone could do.

The scheduled program, by contrast, was very positive in mood. Rossini's overture to "The Seige of Corinth," receiving its first performance by the orchestra, contained the only hints of tragedy through the operatic plot concerning a Moslem conquest of the Greek city. The overture is nonetheless heroic in tone, reflecting the personal nobility of the Corinthian heroine, who chooses death by her father's side over life with her Mohammendan lover. The music is little more than decorative claptrap, with neither the musical nor formal values of Rossini's opera buffa overtures.

Following was the "Sinfonia Espansiva," the third of five symphonies by Carl Nielsen. A Dane whose life bridged the latter 19th and early 20th centuries to 1931, Nielsen is not the stranger to modern listeners that he once was. I'm not implying there is a current Nielsen "boomlet." but the existence of one wouldn't do any harm.

The Symphony No. 3 is conservative in materials, romantic in style but purely unsentimental. Most of the themes are built on intervals of various sizes rather than scale-patterns, but they seem to lose no lyric bent because of it. That and the wind timbres with which they are often presented contribute to a gentle plangency and a feeling of time and distance; in the Andante the magic is enhanced by closely-integrated vocalises for baritone and soprano, well taken care of by Mark Pearson and Joanna Bruno (Nielsen preferred that the singers, because of their purely adjunctive roles, not be named). The first movement alternates between exuberant waltz rhythm and rather brusque Scherzo feeling; the third explores even further extremes of storminess and quiet and the finale concludes in measured majesty.

ONE CAN CONCEIVE this idiom, the somewhat broadly romantic, as the stuff upon which conductor Lewis thrives. His long arms, slightly lanky stance and sweeping, earnest gestures remind me of no one so much as an image of — I can already hear someone say, "Oh, come, now!" — Gustav Mahler. On the podium Lewis exudes confidence, mastery of musical situations and a genuine poetic yearning. His enthusiasm is not simply energetic, it is exhortive. In the case of his Mahlerian image, perhaps we should hear him conduct Mahler before we decide; but the time is coming, if it hasn't already come, when he must be considered high in the ranks of orchestral conductors.

Still, it was not a day for the orchestra's best — or, for that matter, Clifford Curzon's best either. Curzon was soloist in a rendition of the Brahms Second Piano Concerto by turns pleasing and perplexing. Curzon's lyric passages and lighter ornamental flourishes sparkled brilliantly, and perhaps in these instances he cannot yet be bettered. But it would appear that he no longer possesses the power control combination to sustain a convincing protagonist's role; heavier statements were marked with some harshness and spilled notes. At that, through all trials he and the orchestra hung on to remain solvent to the end. Jules Eskin's third-movement cello solo was of consummate tenderness.

Curzon solos

Lewis conducts BSO

By Allan Sly

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

The Boston Symphony's presentation of Henry Lewis as conductor and Clifford Curzon as soloist in Brahms's B-flat piano concerto was memorable as a gallant effort by all concerned. But compatability was lacking: Mr. Lewis's sincerity, his devotion to the matter in hand, is rather low-keyed for the BSO's nervous and urgent esprit, and Mr. Curzon's heaven-storming rhetoric acquired by contrast the appearance of extreme self-consciousness.

The funeral march from Beethoven's Eroica opened the program in memory of General Eisenhower; obviously unrehearsed, it tested the orchestra's integrity vis-à-vis the slow pace, the restrained mood. The bass section rose to the occasion, the upper strings rallied, but the woodwind intonation was bad again and there was insecurity among the horns. These problems surfaced again later, an oboe soloist even having reed trouble.

These drawbacks were offset by the sunny charm of Nielsen's 1910 symphony (his third), the BSO's very first traversal of Rossini's "Siege of Corinth" overture, and the gorgeous panoply of the Brahms, even if it did sound neon-lighted and psychedelic in places. (At other times the orchestra withdrew into the shadows as if in discouragement.)

Mr. Lewis believes deeply in the Nielsen and he almost convinced us that this composer is more than just another eager personality. One recalls some BSO Nielsen performances in the early '50's. Perhaps we should resist his being retired again. The Third Symphony required Joanna Bruno and Mark Pearson to vocalize, without text, from the rear of the stage, which they did beautifully. Mr. Lewis projected the work vividly, and one regretted seeing him upstaged in the concerto that followed.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150
MAR 31 1969
New England Newsclip

TWENTY-FIRST PROGRAM
Friday afternoon March 28 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening March 29 1969 at 8.30

HENRY LEWIS conductor

ROSSINI — Overture to 'Le siège de Corinthe'
first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

NIELSEN — Symphony no. 3 op. 27 'Sinfonia espansiva'
Allegro espansivo
Andante pastorale
Allegretto un poco
Finale: allegro
JOANNA BRUNO soprano
MARK PEARSON baritone
first performance in Boston

intermission

BRAHMS — Piano concerto no. 2 in B flat op. 83
Allegro non troppo
Allegro appassionato
Andante
Allegretto grazioso
CLIFFORD CURZON

THE CONDUCTOR

HENRY LEWIS, Music Director of the New Jersey Symphony Orchestra, was born in Los Angeles in 1932. He started learning the piano when he was five, and studied many of the standard instruments while still a boy. At the age of sixteen he became a double bass player in the Los Angeles Philharmonic, the youngest member of the orchestra. He was drafted into the army in 1955 and went to Stuttgart, Germany where he first played double bass in the Seventh Army Symphony, later becoming musical director.

Returning to the United States, Henry Lewis continued his dual career as player and conductor. He founded the Los Angeles Chamber Orchestra, and in 1961 was invited to replace the ill Igor Markevitch at a pair of Philharmonic concerts. Soon afterwards he resigned from the Orchestra to devote his time to conducting.

Henry Lewis has taken the Los Angeles Chamber Orchestra on tour to Europe, has conducted the Los Angeles Opera Company and appeared at the Hollywood Bowl. He has conducted the Vancouver Opera, the American Opera Society and at the Teatro La Scala in Milan. Symphony orchestras which he has directed include those in Detroit, Chicago, San Francisco and London. He has made several recordings for London Records. Henry Lewis is married to soprano Marilyn Horne, who appeared with the Boston Symphony earlier this season. He makes his debut with the Orchestra at these concerts.

New Jersey conductor makes BSO debut

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Staff Writer

After the house lights went down before Friday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert, the man who appeared on stage was not the conductor, but the orchestra's manager, Thomas D. Perry Jr.

He announced the death an hour and a half earlier of former President Dwight D. Eisenhower and said that the orchestra would play the Funeral March from Beethoven's "Eroica." Guest conductor Henry Lewis walked out in silence, led a very slow performance the Beethoven movement — the audience making up its mind in measures one and two that it ought to hear it standing — and then retired, again in silence.

Moments later, Lewis, the 37-year-old music director of the New Jersey Symphony Orchestra, reappeared, this time to cordial applause, and got down to the afternoon's anticipated business.

Lewis conducted "Carmen" last year for the Opera Company of Boston, but this was his concert debut here. For it he chose Rossini's "Siege of Corinth" Overture (not played previously by the Boston Symphony) and Nielsen's "Sinfonia espansiva" (never before played in Boston at all). In the second half he had a soloist, the English pianist Clifford Curzon, who had not appeared in Boston for 16 years, and who played the Brahms B flat Concerto.

The Rossini Overture, as a matter of fact, contains a noble funeral music of its own, magically scored for woodwinds, low strings, and military drums. That serves as an introductory section, which is followed by the standard Rossini allegro, crescendo and all. It is a singularly inventive piece, the richest, I should think, of Rossini's Overtures before "William Tell," and Lewis and the orchestra gave it an effective performance.

Carl Nielsen's Symphony No. 3, "Espansiva," completed in 1911, is the last of Nielsen's conventionally shaped symphonies. It opens brilliantly, with a waltz symphony of enormous proportions. That, it seems to me, is Nielsen at his best, full of energy and fun and surprises, engagingly combining subtlety of mind with heartiness, even rowdyness, of manner.

What follows convinces me less, though the middle movements, a gentle eclogue and a quietly restless quasi-scherzo, are full of lovely and telling details.

One could describe the last movement as a marchtime analogue to the first: It is a very down-beating music that makes emphatic protestations about being healthy and affirmative. Maybe it needs a movie, something along the lines of a WW II documentary with an aircraft carrier (I am not only part of the alcohol generation, but also part of the big battleship generation).

Lewis produced a performance that was energetic, richly sonorous, inclined to be round rather than sharp in rhythm and articulation, and apt just a bit to emphasize that something heavy in the music. At the end of his Andante pastorale, Nielsen introduces a baritone and soprano to vocalize wordlessly. It is a surprise that does not quite work. Either it is no surprise because you have already been warned in the program notes, or the effect is so sensational and produces such a tempest of ah-ing and neck-craning and heavy breathing as to disrupt hopelessly the continuity of the piece.

The music itself is however, especially attractive just there, and it was well sung by Joanna Bruno and Mark Pearson. I should have thought, though, that having the singers off-stage would have more accurately produced the sonority and the effect I take Nielsen to have had in mind.

Clifford Curzon and Lewis gave a beautiful ensemble performance of the difficult Brahms Concerto. Curzon is in some ways a limited pianist in that his fortissimo is colorless and his markmanship is often wild. On the other hand, his coloristic repertory in piano and pianissimo is rich, he is a masterful leggiero player, and a great accompanist and chamber musician. All that matters a good deal in the Brahms B flat, and those qualities, combined with a lively sense of musical character, went into as fine and interesting an interpretation of that much-whipped concerto as I have heard in many years.

Lewis, neither a neutrally non-listening accompanist nor a dictator, took exceptional pains with the work, and in spite of some orchestral blemishes, with impressive results. Jules Eskin played the cello solo very well indeed, and it was a special pleasure for once not to hear that Andante mercilessly dragged.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Henry Lewis conducting Beethoven: Funeral March from Symphony No. 3, "Eroica" (In Memoriam President Eisenhower) Rossini: Overture to "Le siege de Corinthe;" Nielsen: Symphony No. 3, "Sinfonia espansiva;" Brahms: Piano Concerto No. 2 in B flat. Clifford Curzon, soloist. Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

MAR 29 1969

New England Newsclip

28 B BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER, SATURDAY, MARCH 29, 1969

The Funeral March

Solemn Day at Symphony

By McLAREN HARRIS

"Shortly after noon," said Symphony manager Thomas D. Perry, "we received news of the death of former President Eisenhower. In his memory Henry Lewis will conduct the orchestra in the Funeral March from the 'Eroica' Symphony by Beethoven."

It was not a new experience for the Friday Symphony audience. A little more than five years ago — Nov. 22, 1963 — Erich Leinsdorf interrupted the concert to announce the assassination of President John Kennedy. Then both audience and orchestra were stunned; the same music was played.

WITH YESTERDAY'S announcment came a murmur through the audience. There was sorrow, even grief on the faces, but there was no shock. This had been expected. Everyone remained seated while music began, the rolling of drums reminiscent in the lower strings. Suddenly in a wave from back to front the audience stood, as if by an unspoken order, remaining silently upright, almost stock-still throughout the long movement, each mind heavy with the realization that this was the most anyone could do.

The scheduled program, by contrast, was very positive in mood. Rossini's overture to "The Seige of Corinth," receiving its first performance by the orchestra, contained the only hints of tragedy through the operatic plot concerning a Moslem conquest of the Greek city. The overture is nonetheless heroic in tone, reflecting the personal nobility of the Corinthian heroine, who chooses death by her father's side over life with her Mohammendan lover. The music is little more than decorative claptrap, with neither the musical nor formal values of Rossini's opera buffa overtures.

Following was the "Sinfonia Espansiva," the third of five symphonies by Carl Nielsen. A Dane whose life bridged the latter 19th and early 20th centuries to 1931, Nielsen is not the stranger to modern listeners that he once was. I'm not implying there is a current Nielsen "boomlet," but the existence of one wouldn't do any harm.

The Symphony No. 3 is conservative in materials, romantic in style but purely unsentimental. Most of the themes are built on intervals of various sizes rather than scale-patterns, but they seem to lose no lyric bent because of it. That and the wind timbres with which they are often presented contribute to a gentle plangency and a feeling of time and distance; in the Andante the magic is enhanced by closely-integrated vocalises for baritone and soprano, well taken care of by Mark Pearson and Joanna Bruno (Nielsen preferred that the singers, because of their purely adjunctive roles, not be named). The first movement alternates between exuberant waltz rhythm and rather brusque Scherzo feeling; the third explores even further extremes of storminess and quiet and the finale concludes in measured majesty.

ONE CAN CONCEIVE this idiom, the somewhat broadly romantic, as the stuff upon which conductor Lewis thrives. His long arms, slightly lanky stance and sweeping, earnest gestures remind me of no one so much as an image of — I can already hear someone say, "Oh, come, now!" — Gustav Mahler. On the podium Lewis exudes confidence, mastery of musical situations and a genuine poetic yearning. His enthusiasm is not simply energetic, it is exhortive. In the case of his Mahlerian image, perhaps we should hear him conduct Mahler before we decide; but the time is coming, if it hasn't already come, when he must be considered high in the ranks of orchestral conductors.

Still, it was not a day for the orchestra's best — or, for that matter, Clifford Curzon's best either. Curzon was soloist in a rendition of the Brahms Second Piano Concerto by turns pleasing and perplexing. Curzon's lyric passages and lighter ornamental flourishes sparkled brilliantly, and perhaps in these instances he cannot yet be bettered. But it would appear that he no longer possesses the power control combination to sustain a convincing protagonist's role; heavier statements were marked with some harshness and spilled notes. At that, through all trials he and the orchestra hung on to remain solvent to the end. Jules Eskin's third-movement cello solo was of consummate tenderness.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

MAR 29 1969

New England Newsclip

Curzon solos

Lewis conducts BSO

By Allan Sly

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

The Boston Symphony's presentation of Henry Lewis as conductor and Clifford Curzon as soloist in Brahms's B-flat piano concerto was memorable as a gallant effort by all concerned. But compatability was lacking: Mr. Lewis's sincerity, his devotion to the matter in hand, is rather low-keyed for the BSO's nervous and urgent esprit, and Mr. Curzon's heaven-storming rhetoric acquired by contrast the appearance of extreme self-consciousness.

The funeral march from Beethoven's Eroica opened the program in memory of General Eisenhower; obviously unrehearsed, it tested the orchestra's integrity vis-à-vis the slow pace, the restrained mood. The bass section rose to the occasion, the upper strings rallied, but the woodwind intonation was bad again and there was insecurity among the horns. These problems surfaced again later, an oboe soloist even having reed trouble.

These drawbacks were offset by the sunny charm of Nielsen's 1910 symphony (his third), the BSO's very first traversal of Rossini's "Siege of Corinth" overture, and the gorgeous panoply of the Brahms, even if it did sound neon-lighted and psychedelic in places. (At other times the orchestra withdrew into the shadows as if in discouragement.)

Mr. Lewis believes deeply in the Nielsen and he almost convinced us that this composer is more than just another eager personality. One recalls some BSO Nielsen performances in the early '50's. Perhaps we should resist his being retired again. The Third Symphony required Joanna Bruno and Mark Pearson to vocalize, without text, from the rear of the stage, which they did beautifully. Mr. Lewis projected the work vividly, and one regretted seeing him upstaged in the concerto that followed.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150

MAR 31 1969

New England Newsclip

46

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

BSO: LEWIS CONDUCTS, CURZON PLAYS

On the face of it the program was a considerable cut above the usual. In the rendering there was a peculiar combination of languor and anxiety thrust upon the listener that made the occasion something less than the most rewarding concert of the season.

Scheduled pieces included the first performance by the orchestra of Rossini's Overture to the "Seige of Corinth," the first Boston performance of Carl Nielsen's Symphony No. 3, "Sinfonia expansiva" and Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 2 in B flat. Preceding these was the Funeral March from the "Eroica", played in honor of General Eisenhower, who had died only an hour and a half before the concert on Friday. The conductor was Henry Lewis, making his first visit with the orchestra, and the soloist was the veteran British pianist, Clifford Curzon.

The languor was dreadfully apparent before the Funeral March had proceeded more than a few bars. Some of the members of the audience, which straggled to its feet shortly after the piece got underway, must have rued their form of homage as the music sagged and dragged to the breaking point and finally ground to a halt some twenty-two minutes later — a third again longer than the most measured standard reading of this most indestructible of slow movements.

Further evidence that Henry Lewis is not yet ready to assume the mantle of Arturo Toscanini materialized in the performance of the Rossini piece. Not that his reading was egregiously poor, as in the Beethoven movement; yet, only that it lacked the crackle-snap-pop that is de rigueur with Rossini overtures. Given its head, such music will produce that effect on its own. Danny Kaye, for example, achieved it intuitively awhile back in leading "La Gazza Ladra" in a Pension Fund performance.

The most imposing portion of the afternoon's long undertaking was the Nielsen symphony. Nielsen's idiom is craggy, brusque, rather texturally thick in the Brahms manner. His composing derives strictly from the orthodox symphonic line of the nineteenth century, but the harmonic vocabulary is distinctive and his exploitation of orchestral resources highly individualistic. Although Nielsen's capacity for dramatic development is impressive, even awesome, there is little of the tune-smith in him. Virtually unplayed until ten years ago outside of Scandinavia, where he has always been something of a demi-god, his works are assuming an ever larger place in the symphony repertory.

All of this suggests that adequate measurement of the man requires some repeated exposure. For purposes of a guest conductor's initial stint, a Nielsen symphony is, as the Central European saying goes, a curious way to make a debut. More power to Mr. Lewis, then, who appeared profoundly committed to the score; yet here again the nemesis of dragging tempi overtook him, especially in the first movement waltz, which he took, it sounded to me, at about half time.

But to get on with the anxiety quotient, which we can lay at the feet of Mr. Curzon. If you will agree that a soloist ought not publicly to attempt to negotiate a piece that is rather more than he can handle, by definition he ought to stand clear of one where it is not at all certain that he can even get through it. So it was here with the soloist and Brahms' B flat concerto. Whatever burden this imposes upon a performer, and it must have been considerable, it certainly makes listening an intolerably tense experience. Ordinarily when this concerto is performed I find myself heaving a sigh for the sheer beauty of it all at the end of the Andante. Last Friday afternoon came two sighs, after the first and after second movements respectively, both in sheer relief that the pianist, conductor and orchestra had managed somehow to pull the work together. The orchestra shares the indictment simply because these things are contagious; here an oboe squawked, there a horn blurped, and elsewhere whole sections came in by osmosis rather than by unified attack. To everybody's credit, the last two movements came off without incident and even creditably.

The soloist's conception of the concerto was as much his undoing as his realization thereof. He played it as some citadel to be stormed when essentially its genius lies in its subtle chamber quality. Though ordinarily not of that school of reviewers who dilate with Proustian remembrances of performances past, here I would commend the way that Richter did it a decade or so ago as the model of how really to play it.

Anyhow, Mr. Leinsdorf returns this week-end to commence the last three weeks of his career here. He will conduct Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont," Prokofief's Piano Concerto No. 5 in F, and the Bruckner Symphony No. 6. John Browning is the soloist.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000
APR 3 1969
New England Newsclip

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,543
MAR 29 1969
New England Newsclip

Orchestral Tribute For Eisenhower

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

BOSTON — Less than two hours after the death of Dwight D. Eisenhower, the Boston Symphony Orchestra played memorial music as the audience of 2,500 in Symphony Hall stood in tribute.

Thus the initial Boston appearnace of Henry Lewis was greeted with silence. He conducted the Funeral March from Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony with the greatest breadth we have ever heard. Completely aware of the emotion of the occasion, and master of his orchestral forces, Lewis revealed a great heart.

Gazette Review

Conductor of the New Jersey Symphony, and the first Negro to assume an American symphonic post, he is guest conducting this season at Tanglewood, Detroit, and elsewhere.

Runs the Gamut

His conducting runs the gamut from careful details to urgent adjuring. Everything he does looks natural and means much.

The concert hall rang with applause later. Clifford Curzon, British pianist, shared curtain calls with Lewis and Jules Eskin, cellist, after the Brahms Piano Concerto No. 2 in B flat.

The soloist achieved wonderful impact without loss of poetry, and appeared to be completely in love with his task. The orchestra under Lewis made the work a "symphony with piano."

Boston First

Rossini's Overture to "The Siege of Corinth" was given its first Boston Symphony performance, a neat mingling of dramatic episodes and florid details.

Lewis created a memorable first Boston hearing of Nielsen's Symphony No. 3 "Sinfonia Espansiva," heard at the 1967 Worcester Festival. Its love of life and variety of moods made up a sweeping canvas. The wordless solos of Joanna Bruno and Mark Pearson were well projected. At one point, the orchestra sounded like a huge, hearty carousel organ.

IN BSO DEBUT

3/29 Record-American

By GEORGE GELLES
Music Critic

Henry Lewis Sub Par

IN equation, Henry Lewis is to Marilyn Horne as Richard Bonynge is to Joan Sutherland — husband, musical alter-ego, conductor of choice. But at his Boston Symphony debut Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall, Lewis was, in a word, unimpressive.

He gave Boston its first performance of Carl Nielsen's Third Symphony, which though less imaginative in its ideas and more conventionally and unvaryingly scored than the Fourth, Fifth, or Sixth, is nevertheless a work of some power.

Opening movement is direct, concise, rhythmically to the point. In several ways it is suggestive of Mahler, and reminiscent, in particular, of the G Major Symphony—in its loose key scheme, its downbeat triplets, its prominent melodic grace notes, its Laendler-like gait.

But the piece is uneven in quality, and subsequent sections fall off. Some details: in the second movement, the two-voice vocalise seems a silly conceit, for it adds nothing that we couldn't just as easily do without, while in the third movement, there are moments of textural inconsistency, when near the close the winds are paired in thirds and the harmony beneath them drops by thirds, as well, an effect right out of Brahms; lastly the finale, which resolves the harmonic conflict of the preceding movements, doesn't seem persuasive, though I can imagine it being so if the performance is less poorly paced than Lewis's was.

Lewis favored slow tempi all afternoon, but again like Mahler, Nielsen is probably heard at his best when there is a polarity, and exaggeration of temi, a fast that's really fast and slow that's really slow. This wasn't to be had.

I was in my usual impossible seat until after the intermission, and though I saw violins scrubbing away, I heard mostly grumbling of cellos and basses, and have no idea of how Lewis put the piece together.

Ditto for the opener of the afternoon, the overture to Rossini's opera "The Siege of Corinth;" it's a tuneful, noisy, pleasant piece, which was composed before and survived the catostrophic premiere of "Maometto Secondo,' what the opera was first called, went along to Paris with the revamped "Le Siege," and was a success. It had no pretensions and Friday served its purpose well.

I never heard Clifford Curzon when his reputation was being made, and I'm not going to review the embarrassing and incompetent performance of the second Brahms piano concerto that he gave—he clearly has very little left.

Equally disconcerting was the orchestral work; aside from the Andate cello solo that was beautifully played by a discouraged-looking Jules Eskin, it was crass and indifferent. Lewis, who didn't seem to be overloaded with ideas earlier, didn't seem to have any notions about the Brahms, either.

About five seconds into the Funeral March from Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, a memorial to President Eisenhower, the audience spontaneously rose to its feet, though a woman in the row before mine stayed seated and wept.

TUESDAY B SERIES

SIXTH PROGRAM
Tuesday evening April 1 1969 at 7.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BEETHOVEN

Overture to 'Egmont' op. 84

Symphony no. 1 in C major op. 21

Adagio molto – allegro con brio
Andante cantabile con moto
Menuetto: allegro molto e vivace
Finale: adagio – allegro molto vivace

intermission.

Symphony no. 3 in E flat op. 55 'Eroica'*

Allegro con brio
Marcia funebre: adagio assai
Scherzo: allegro vivace
Finale: allegro molto

Leinsdorf Says a Temporary Farewell

Last week Erich Leinsdorf conducted his final concert of the Tuesday "B" Series; as you know, he leaves his post at the end of this season. Mr. Leinsdorf chose an all-Beethoven program—the "Egmont Overture," "Symphony No. I," and the "Eroica." So familiar are these works to Mr. Leinsdorf and his musicians that they could probably play while standing on their heads and munching on sandwiches. In any event, the concert was admirably performed, with close attention to structure and texture, to clarity of phrasing, to dynamics, and, especially in the "Eroica" to the proper conveying of emotional climaxes.

Mr. Leinsdorf, who for the next five years will appear often as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony, has planned a busy schedule. During the late spring and early summer, he will conduct Schumann's "Scenes From Goethe's Faust" in Frankfurt, Germany; will direct the French Orchestre Nationale at the Lausanne Festival in Switzerland and on French TV in a concert which will include Mahler's "Symphony No. 4; with the Tonhalle in Zurich he will perform Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps," and then go to Tanglewood where, he informs us, "we have an exciting series of programs planned, including several complete performances of Mozart's 'Die Entfuhrnung' and Verdi's 'Otello,' lots of Bhc and Mozart, and the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven."

After Tanglewood Mr. Leinsdorf goes to Buenos Aires to conduct three works at the Teatro Colon—Strauss' "Der Rosenkavalier," Berg's "Wozzeck," and Wagner's "Parsifal."

Mr. Leinsdorf concludes, "My seven years with the Boston Symphony have been enormously enjoyable and rewarding to me personally. I look forward with pleasure to my return as guest conductor."

SUNDAY STANDARD TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 58,446
APR 6 1969
New England Newsclip

46

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

BSO: LEWIS CONDUCTS, CURZON PLAYS

On the face of it the program was a considerable cut above the usual. In the rendering there was a peculiar combination of languor and anxiety thrust upon the listener that made the occasion something less than the most rewarding concert of the season.

Scheduled pieces included the first performance by the orchestra of Rossini's Overture to the "Seige of Corinth," the first Boston performance of Carl Nielsen's Symphony No. 3, "Sinfonia expansiva" and Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 2 in B flat. Preceding these was the Funeral March from the "Eroica", played in honor of General Eisenhower, who had died only an hour and a half before the concert on Friday. The conductor was Henry Lewis, making his first visit with the orchestra, and the soloist was the veteran British pianist, Clifford Curzon.

The languor was dreadfully apparent before the Funeral March had proceeded more than a few bars. Some of the members of the audience, which straggled to its feet shortly after the piece got underway, must have rued their form of homage as the music sagged and dragged to the breaking point and finally ground to a halt some twenty-two minutes later — a third again longer than the most measured standard reading of this most indestructible of slow movements.

Further evidence that Henry Lewis is not yet ready to assume the mantle of Arturo Toscanini materialized in the performance of the Rossini piece. Not that his reading was egregiously poor, as in the Beethoven movement; yet, only that it lacked the crackle-snap-pop that is de rigueur with Rossini overtures. Given its head, such music will produce that effect on its own. Danny Kaye, for example, achieved it intuitively awhile back in leading "La Gazza Ladra" in a Pension Fund performance.

The most imposing portion of the afternoon's long undertaking was the Nielsen symphony. Nielsen's idiom is craggy, brusque, rather texturally thick in the Brahms manner. His composing derives strictly from the orthodox symphonic line of the nineteenth century, but the harmonic vocabulary is distinctive and his exploitation of orchestral resources highly individualistic. Although Nielsen's capacity for dramatic development is impressive, even awesome, there is little of the tune-smith in him. Virtually unplayed until ten years ago outside of Scandinavia, where he has always been something of a demi-god, his works are assuming an ever larger place in the symphony repertory.

All of this suggests that adequate measurement of the man requires some repeated exposure. For purposes of a guest conductor's initial stint, a Nielsen symphony is, as the Central European saying goes, a curious way to make a debut. More power to Mr. Lewis, then, who appeared profoundly committed to the score; yet here again the nemesis of dragging tempi overtook him, especially in the first movement waltz, which he took, it sounded to me, at about half time.

But to get on with the anxiety quotient, which we can lay at the feet of Mr. Curzon. If you will agree that a soloist ought not publicly to attempt to negotiate a piece that is rather more than he can handle, by definition he ought to stand clear of one where it is not at all certain that he can even get through it. So it was here with the soloist and Brahms' B flat concerto. Whatever burden this imposes upon a performer, and it must have been considerable, it certainly makes listening an intolerably tense experience. Ordinarily when this concerto is performed I find myself heaving a sigh for the sheer beauty of it all at the end of the Andante. Last Friday afternoon came two sighs, after the first and after second movements respectively, both in sheer relief that the pianist, conductor and orchestra had managed somehow to pull the work together. The orchestra shares the indictment simply because these things are contagious; here an oboe squawked, there a horn blurped, and elsewhere whole sections came in by osmosis rather than by unified attack. To everybody's credit, the last two movements came off without incident and even creditably.

The soloist's conception of the concerto was as much his undoing as his realization thereof. He played it as some citadel to be stormed when essentially its genius lies in its subtle chamber quality. Though ordinarily not of that school of reviewers who dilate with Proustian remembrances of performances past, here I would commend the way that Richter did it a decade or so ago as the model of how really to play it.

Anyhow, Mr. Leinsdorf returns this week-end to commence the last three weeks of his career here. He will conduct Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont," Prokofief's Piano Concerto No. 5 in F, and the Bruckner Symphony No. 6. John Browning is the soloist.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

APR 3 1969 New England Newsclip

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,543

MAR 29 1969 New England Newsclip

Orchestral Tribute For Eisenhower

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

BOSTON — Less than two hours after the death of Dwight D. Eisenhower, the Boston Symphony Orchestra played memorial music as the audience of 2,500 in Symphony Hall stood in tribute.

Thus the initial Boston appearnace of Henry Lewis was greeted with silence. He conducted the Funeral March from Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony with the greatest breadth we have ever heard. Completely aware of the emotion of the occasion, and master of his orchestral forces, Lewis revealed a great heart.

Gazette Review

Conductor of the New Jersey Symphony, and the first Negro to assume an American symphonic post, he is guest conducting this season at Tanglewood, Detroit, and elsewhere.

Runs the Gamut

His conducting runs the gamut from careful details to urgent adjuring. Everything he does looks natural and means much.

The concert hall rang with applause later. Clifford Curzon, British pianist, shared curtain calls with Lewis and Jules Eskin, cellist, after the Brahms Piano Concerto No. 2 in B flat.

The soloist achieved wonderful impact without loss of poetry, and appeared to be completely in love with his task. The orchestra under Lewis made the work a "symphony with piano."

Boston First

Rossini's Overture to "The Siege of Corinth" was given its first Boston Symphony performance, a neat mingling of dramatic episodes and florid details.

Lewis created a memorable first Boston hearing of Nielsen's Symphony No. 3 "Sinfonia Espansiva," heard at the 1967 Worcester Festival. Its love of life and variety of moods made up a sweeping canvas. The wordless solos of Joanna Bruno and Mark Pearson were well projected. At one point, the orchestra sounded like a huge, hearty carousel organ.

IN BSO DEBUT

3/29 Record-American

By GEORGE GELLES
Music Critic

Henry Lewis Sub Par

IN equation, Henry Lewis is to Marilyn Horne as Richard Bonynge is to Joan Sutherland — husband, musical alter-ego, conductor of choice. But at his Boston Symphony debut Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall, Lewis was, in a word, unimpressive.

He gave Boston its first performance of Carl Nielsen's Third Symphony, which though less imaginative in its ideas and more conventionally and unvaryingly scored than the Fourth, Fifth, or Sixth, is nevertheless a work of some power.

Opening movement is direct, concise, rhythmically to the point. In several ways it is suggestive of Mahler, and reminiscent, in particular, of the G Major Symphony—in its loose key scheme, its downbeat triplets, its prominent melodic grace notes, its Laendler-like gait.

But the piece is uneven in quality, and subsequent sections fall off. Some details: in the second movement, the two-voice vocalise seems a silly conceit, for it adds nothing that we couldn't just as easily do without, while in the third movement, there are moments of textural inconsistency, when near the close the winds are paired in thirds and the harmony beneath them drops by thirds, as well, an effect right out of Brahms; lastly the finale, which resolves the harmonic conflict of the preceding movements, doesn't seem persuasive, though I can imagine it being so if the performance is less poorly paced than Lewis's was.

Lewis favored slow tempi all afternoon, but again like Mahler, Nielsen is probably heard at his best when there is a polarity, and exaggeration of temi, a fast that's really fast and slow that's really slow. This wasn't to be had.

I was in my usual impossible seat until after the intermission, and though I saw violins scrubbing away, I heard mostly grumbling of cellos and basses, and have no idea of how Lewis put the piece together.

Ditto for the opener of the afternoon, the overture to Rossini's opera "The Siege of Corinth;" it's a tuneful, noisy, pleasant piece, which was composed before and survived the catostrophic premiere of "Maometto Secondo,' what the opera was first called, went along to Paris with the revamped "Le Siege," and was a success. It had no pretensions and Friday served its purpose well.

I never heard Clifford Curzon when his reputation was being made, and I'm not going to review the embarrassing and incompetent performance of the second Brahms piano concerto that he gave—he clearly has very little left.

Equally disconcerting was the orchestral work; aside from the Andate cello solo that was beautifully played by a discouraged-looking Jules Eskin, it was crass and indifferent. Lewis, who didn't seem to be overloaded with ideas earlier, didn't seem to have any notions about the Brahms, either.

About five seconds into the Funeral March from Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, a memorial to President Eisenhower, the audience spontaneously rose to its feet, though a woman in the row before mine stayed seated and wept.

TUESDAY B SERIES

SIXTH PROGRAM
Tuesday evening April 1 1969 at 7.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BEETHOVEN

Overture to 'Egmont' op. 84

Symphony no. 1 in C major op. 21

Adagio molto – allegro con brio
Andante cantabile con moto
Menuetto: allegro molto e vivace
Finale: adagio – allegro molto vivace

intermission

Symphony no. 3 in E flat op. 55 'Eroica'*

Allegro con brio
Marcia funebre: adagio assai
Scherzo: allegro vivace
Finale: allegro molto

Leinsdorf Says a Temporary Farewell

Last week Erich Leinsdorf conducted his final concert of the Tuesday "B" Series; as you know, he leaves his post at the end of this season. Mr. Leinsdorf chose an all-Beethoven program—the "Egmont Overture," "Symphony No. I," and the "Eroica." So familiar are these works to Mr. Leinsdorf and his musicians that they could probably play while standing on their heads and munching on sandwiches. In any event, the concert was admirably performed, with close attention to structure and texture, to clarity of phrasing, to dynamics, and, especially in the "Eroica" to the proper conveying of emotional climaxes.

Mr. Leinsdorf, who for the next five years will appear often as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony, has planned a busy schedule. During the late spring and early summer, he will conduct Schumann's "Scenes From Goethe's Faust" in Frankfurt, Germany; will direct the French Orchestre Nationale at the Lausanne Festival in Switzerland and on French TV in a concert which will include Mahler's "Symphony No. 4; with the Tonhalle in Zurich he will perform Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps," and then go to Tanglewood where, he informs us, "we have an exciting series of programs planned, including several complete performances of Mozart's 'Die Entfuhrnung' and Verdi's 'Otello,' lots of Bhc and Mozart, and the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven."

After Tanglewood Mr. Leinsdorf goes to Buenos Aires to conduct three works at the Teatro Colon—Strauss' "Der Rosenkavalier," Berg's "Wozzeck," and Wagner's "Parsifal."

Mr. Leinsdorf concludes, "My seven years with the Boston Symphony have been enormously enjoyable and rewarding to me personally. I look forward with pleasure to my return as guest conductor."

SUNDAY STANDARD
TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
CIRC. 58,446

APR 6 1969 New England Newsclip

47.

THURSDAY B SERIES

THIRD PROGRAM
Thursday evening April 3 1969 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BEETHOVEN

Symphony no. 6 in F major op. 68 'The Pastoral'

Awakening of happy feelings on reaching the countryside: allegro ma non troppo
At the brook's edge: andante molto mosso
Festive gathering of the country people: allegro
Thunderstorm: allegro
Shepherd's song — happy and thankful feelings after the storm: allegretto

intermission

Symphony no. 3 in E flat op. 55 'Eroica'*

Allegro con brio
Marcia funebre: adagio assai
Scherzo: allegro vivace
Finale: allegro molto

BSO: Prokofiev a generation later

By Allan Sly

Those were exciting days when the Boston Symphony introduced the Prokofiev piano concertos, one by one, with the composer as soloist. Now, a generation later, the orchestra is recording them all, with John Browning as soloist and Erich Leinsdorf conducting. By including No. 5 in the Easter weekend concerts the organization virtually placed us favorably at a rare banquet. We could recall and compare, and form an opinion of Prokofiev's state of mind while he still lived outside the Soviet Union.

The fifth concerto is essentially cool emotionally, but animated to the point of being nervously tense. The movements are rather short but there are five of them, with a final reference to the opening measures which is followed by a precipitate ending. Mr. Browning's split-second timing and highly charged agility were great assets, well matched by the orchestra.

The concert started imposingly with the Beethoven "Egmont" overture and finished with the grandiloquent Bruckner Symphony No. 6 — which, most strangely, has never until now been played by the BSO. Both these works, earnest and vehement, were well suited to Mr. Leinsdorf and were seasonally most appropriate. The orchestra covered itself in glory. It showed great versatility in this program, and a very high degree of inner adjustment and poise. At times Mr. Leinsdorf's beat seemed a detached thing, but the mutual understanding was evident and the very discrepancies that might puzzle some observers served to reveal to others the depth and extent of what had been achieved in rehearsal.

Heady music

The Bruckner is strong, heady music, but its transports are well spaced by lovely intimate revealings and well-organized build-ups. We hope it will stay in the repertoire. It fills out our knowledge of musical Vienna, adds something to our notions of Wagner (and even, by contrast, Brahms), and when well played, adds luster to both conductor and orchestra.

The two remaining programs this season are important. The next contains the Stravinsky Symphony in C; and the final one includes the Schoenberg "A Survivor from Warsaw" and Beethoven's Ninth.

TWENTY-SECOND PROGRAM
Friday afternoon April 4 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening April 5 1969 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BEETHOVEN — Overture to 'Egmont'

PROKOFIEV — Piano concerto no. 5 in F op. 55*

Allegro con brio
Moderato ben accentuato
Toccata: allegro con fuoco
Larghetto
Vivo

JOHN BROWNING

intermission

BRUCKNER — Symphony no. 6 in A

Majestoso
Adagio: sehr feierlich
Scherzo: nicht schnell – trio: langsam
Finale: bewegt, doch nicht zu schnell

first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER, SATURDAY, APRIL 5, 1969 B 15

Leinsdorf Shines in Varied BSO Program

By McLAREN HARRIS

Erich Leinsdorf is generally able to make a pretty good case for anything he chooses to conduct, be it good, bad, hackneyed, over-wrought or just plain dull. To some extent he was put to the test with yesterday's Symphony program of Beethoven, Prokofiev and Bruckner.

The opening "Egmont" Overture of Beethoven is a work most of us probably know like the backs of our hands, something sufficiently familiar that it has found its way into Disney cartoon scores.

Yet Leinsdorf caused it to emerge in the carefully-phrased, tightly-formed and orchestrally brilliant manner which constitutes its supreme likeness. It is pleasant to discover, in a reading not given to slapdash heroics, how much mileage is still left in such an oft-abused vehicle.

THE CONDUCTOR had help from John Browning for Prokofiev's Fifth Piano Concerto—not that the concerto would otherwise have failed, but because Browning's well-directed energetic impulse qualifies him as a far-above-average Prokofiev exponent.

This is neither the best nor the worst of the composer's efforts in pianistic fields; there are works with greater thematic power and endearing lyric qualities—parts of the Second and Third Concertos, for example—but the Fifth has a distinctive humor about its crackling vitality, a lightness and utter lack of stern feeling in those galloping pages.

The quick movements dominate the score—the pianistically and orchestrally dashing Allegro, the white-hot brilliance of the Toccata, the seeming nervous compulsion of the final Vivo.

But separating these are a Moderato, whose square-metered, disjunctly-twisting theme manages yet to make its lyric point, and the smooth-cornered, quiescent Larghetto. The Fifth is, at the least, a many-faceted experience and in Browning's hands, a fully zestful one.

BROWNING FOUND the right combination of light-minded ferocity, if you will, for yesterday's performance. His approach wasn't harsh or jarringly percussive, but neither was it bland nor without pointed authority. His technical command was buttressed by a power of instant response, by which he placed accents with appropriate strength and unerring accuracy even in the midst of rushing octaves.

The orchestra and Leinsdorf were willing partners all the way, though they never quite matched him for purely diabolical elan.

Warren Storey Smith has a telling anecdote about the Bruckner Symphony No. 6 which received its first BSO performance yesterday and only the second in Boston.

When questioned why he never conducted the Sixth, Bruno Walter said it was because he thought it a weak work and not truly representative of the composer. "I consider myself a Bruckner propagandist," Walter told Smith, "and I refuse to play into the hands of the opposition by performing it!"

WALTER'S CONCLUSION is essentially sound. Though the Sixth calls for an orchestra of Brahmsian proportions, it yet evokes the characteristic Brucknerian feeling of spaciousness in string usage and rockbound majesty in its brass pillars. But given these and the logic of most of its forms, the symphony still cannot rise above the thematic barrenness of its materials.

The first movement pounces upon a motive or two, rescores them, transposes them endlessly, and that is that; the finale virtually stutters with thematic indecision as if Bruckner never knew whether to finish what he began to say and ends up spitting out fragments of everything.

The inner movements are a little greener for imagination—especially the attractive Scherzo, though using string pizzicatos to begin the trio's fanfare strikes one as odd.

SOME HIDEOUS brass intonation at the outset caused me to worry about the remainder, but that situation was swiftly rectified. Brass chords, without which Bruckner would be lost, came forth with undeniable, albeit tonally unfocused, authority.

String textures were rich. Leinsdorf stated his best case for Bruckner's Sixth, but for meaningful mileage in music there must be more than architectural excellence and efficient machinery; there must be a tankful of inspiration.

BOSTON
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.
APR 1969

Boston Symphony Orchestra bids farewell to Erich Leinsdorf this month with the following concerts at Symphony Hall: April 4 and 5, Beethoven's Overture to Egmont, Prokofiev's Piano Concerto no. 5 in F with John Browning, and Symphony no. 6 in A by Bruckner. April 8, two Beethoven symphonies, no. 6 in F, The Pastoral, and no. 3 in E flat, Eroica. April 11 and 12, Bach Suite no. 1 in C, Bruch's Scottish Fantasy for Violin and Orchestra with soloist Joseph Silverstein, and Stravinsky's Symphony in C. April 15, Beethoven's Overture to Egmont, Scottish Fantasy by Bruch, and Symphony no. 5 in E minor by Tchaikovsky. April 17, the all-Beethoven program, Symphonies no. 6 and 3. April 18 and 19, A Survivor from Warsaw, by Schoenberg, and Beethoven's Symphony no. 9 in C minor with the Chorus Pro Musica and the New England Conservatory Chorus. For tickets call 266-1492.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
APR 5 1969
New England Newsclip

BSO too casual with Bruckner

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Staff Writer

The ARTS

Bruckner's Symphony No. 6 in A major is probably the least played of the mature ones, those from No. 3 on. It had its first Boston performance only two and a half years ago. And the performance Friday afternoon, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, was the first by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Bruckner himself thought it the boldest of his symphonies. It does not begin with a string tremolando, but it does go on to include all the other Bruckner thumb-prints, the sequences, the stops and starts, the rhythms with mixed twos and threes, the final wrap-up with a quotation from the first movement, and so forth. The general lay-out is also Bruckner's normal one.

It is more exploratory than the other symphonies by virtue of its more intense and vigorous harmonic activity. Certainly the mood and sound are special. It is of unique brightness and lightness and it is, for that matter, not quite as long as most of the others. It comes close, at times, to a kind of gaiety that I find nowhere else in Bruckner.

The Adagio, even though Bruckner does mark it "sehr feirlich" (very solemn), is, a bit like that in the 4th Symphony, in the gracious tradition of Schubert and Schumann more than in the grand one of Beethoven and Wagner. This Adagio is, for me, the loveliest of the four movements and one of Bruckner's most beautiful altogether, and the Scherzo with its strangely abrupt Trio is particularly fine as well. The finale, like most Bruckner finales, does not quite work, but the Symphony as a whole is a fresh and delightful piece in which a high level of invention is sustained.

The performance Friday was disappointing. It was not properly clear in texture, nor, especially in the first movement, was it always aptly paced. The greater problem, however, lay in the unyielding, unbreathing, unfeeling quality of the whole casual, even rather profane, runthrough. At the beginning of the concert, Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture had gotten a similar sort of lick and not much promise.

Prokofiev's Piano Concerto No. 5, written in 1932, is, as far as musical content goes, somewhere on the trivial side of Scharwenka. It is, on the other hand, an occasion for brilliant playing, and John Browning gave it just the glitter and crackle it needed. His brilliant playing was neatly backed up by the orchestra under Leinsdorf.

Finally, a footnote to the review of the previous Friday's Boston Symphony concert. The program had incorrectly claimed the performance of Nielsen's Symphony No. 3 as the first in Boston, and the mistake was repeated in my review. Credit for the Boston premiere of the Nielsen 3rd properly goes to Kalman Novak and the Boston Civic Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Erich Leinsdorf conducting Beethoven: "Egmont" Overture; Prokofiev: Piano Concerto No. 5, John Browning, soloist; Bruckner: Symphony No. 6 in A major. Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall.

2:00 WGBH-FM — BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Live from Symphony Hall. Erich Leinsdorf conducts Beethoven's Overture to Egmont," Prokofiev's Piano Concerto No. 5 in F, Op. 55.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
APR 4 1969
New England

THURSDAY B SERIES

THIRD PROGRAM
Thursday evening April 3 1969 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BEETHOVEN

Symphony no. 6 in F major op. 68 'The Pastoral'

Awakening of happy feelings on reaching the countryside: allegro ma non troppo
At the brook's edge: andante molto mosso
Festive gathering of the country people: allegro
Thunderstorm: allegro
Shepherd's song — happy and thankful feelings after the storm: allegretto

intermission

Symphony no. 3 in E flat op. 55 'Eroica'*

Allegro con brio
Marcia funebre: adagio assai
Scherzo: allegro vivace
Finale: allegro molto

BOSTON
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY-CIRC. N. AVAIL.
APR 1969

Boston Symphony Orchestra bids farewell to Erich Leinsdorf this month with the following concerts at Symphony Hall: April 4 and 5, Beethoven's Overture to Egmont, Prokofiev's Piano Concerto no. 5 in F with John Browning, and Symphony no. 6 in A by Bruckner. April 8, two Beethoven symphonies, no. 6 in F, The Pastoral, and no. 3 in E flat, Eroica. April 11 and 12, Bach Suite no. 1 in C, Bruch's Scottish Fantasy for Violin and Orchestra with soloist Joseph Silverstein, and Stravinsky's Symphony in C. April 15, Beethoven's Overture to Egmont, Scottish Fantasy by Bruch, and Symphony no. 5 in E minor by Tchaikovsky. April 17, the all-Beethoven program, Symphonies no. 6 and 3. April 18 and 19, A Survivor from Warsaw, by Schoenberg, and Beethoven's Symphony no. 9 in C minor with the Chorus Pro Musica and the New England Conservatory Chorus. For tickets call 266-1492.

47.

BSO: Prokofiev a generation later

By Allan Sly

Those were exciting days when the Boston Symphony introduced the Prokofiev piano concertos, one by one, with the composer as soloist. Now, a generation later, the orchestra is recording them all, with John Browning as soloist and Erich Leinsdorf conducting. By including No. 5 in the Easter weekend concerts the organization virtually placed us favorably at a rare banquet. We could recall and compare, and form an opinion of Prokofiev's state of mind while he still lived outside the Soviet Union.

The fifth concerto is essentially cool emotionally, but animated to the point of being nervously tense. The movements are rather short but there are five of them, with a final reference to the opening measures which is followed by a precipitate ending. Mr. Browning's split-second timing and highly charged agility were great assets, well matched by the orchestra.

The concert started imposingly with the Beethoven "Egmont" overture and finished with the grandiloquent Bruckner Symphony No. 6 — which, most strangely, has never until now been played by the BSO. Both these works, earnest and vehement, were well suited to Mr. Leinsdorf and were seasonally most appropriate. The orchestra covered itself in glory. It showed great versatility in this program, and a very high degree of inner adjustment and poise. At times Mr. Leinsdorf's beat seemed a detached thing, but the mutual understanding was evident and the very discrepancies that might puzzle some observers served to reveal to others the depth and extent of what had been achieved in rehearsal.

Heady music

The Bruckner is strong, heady music, but its transports are well spaced by lovely intimate revealings and well-organized build-ups. We hope it will stay in the repertoire. It fills out our knowledge of musical Vienna, adds something to our notions of Wagner (and even, by contrast, Brahms), and when well played, adds luster to both conductor and orchestra.

The two remaining programs this season are important. The next contains the Stravinsky Symphony in C; and the final one includes the Schoenberg "A Survivor from Warsaw" and Beethoven's Ninth.

TWENTY-SECOND PROGRAM
Friday afternoon April 4 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening April 5 1969 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BEETHOVEN — Overture to 'Egmont'

PROKOFIEV — Piano concerto no. 5 in F op. 55*

Allegro con brio
Moderato ben accentuato
Toccata: allegro con fuoco
Larghetto
Vivo

JOHN BROWNING

intermission

BRUCKNER — Symphony no. 6 in A

Majestoso
Adagio: sehr feierlich
Scherzo: nicht schnell – trio: langsam
Finale: bewegt, doch nicht zu schnell

first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
APR 5 1969 New England Newsclip

Leinsdorf Shines in Varied BSO Program

By McLAREN HARRIS

Erich Leinsdorf is generally able to make a pretty good case for anything he chooses to conduct, be it good, bad, hackneyed, over-wrought or just plain dull. To some extent he was put to the test with yesterday's Symphony program of Beethoven, Prokofiev and Bruckner.

The opening "Egmont" Overture of Beethoven is a work most of us probably know like the backs of our hands, something sufficiently familiar that it has found its way into Disney cartoon scores.

Yet Leinsdorf caused it to emerge in the carefully-phrased, tightly-formed and orchestrally brilliant manner which constitutes its supreme likeness. It is pleasant to discover, in a reading not given to slapdash heroics, how much mileage is still left in such an oft-abused vehicle.

THE CONDUCTOR had help from John Browning for Prokofiev's Fifth Piano Concerto—not that the concerto would otherwise have failed, but because Browning's well-directed energetic impulse qualifies him as a far-above-average Prokofiev exponent.

This is neither the best nor the worst of the composer's efforts in pianistic fields; there are works with greater thematic power and endearing lyric qualities—parts of the Second and Third Concertos, for example—but the Fifth has a distinctive humor about its crackling vitality, a lightness and utter lack of stern feeling in those galloping pages.

The quick movements dominate the score—the pianistically and orchestrally dashing Allegro, the white-hot brilliance of the Toccata, the seeming nervous compulsion of the final Vivo.

But separating these are a Moderato, whose square-metered, disjunctly-twisting theme manages yet to make its lyric point, and the smooth-cornered, quiescent Larghetto. The Fifth is, at the least, a many-faceted experience and in Browning's hands, a fully zestful one.

BROWNING FOUND the right combination of light-minded ferocity, if you will, for yesterday's performance. His approach wasn't harsh or jarringly percussive, but neither was it bland nor without pointed authority. His technical command was buttressed by a power of instant response, by which he placed accents with appropriate strength and unerring accuracy even in the midst of rushing octaves.

The orchestra and Leinsdorf were willing partners all the way, though they never quite matched him for purely diabolical elan.

Warren Storey Smith has a telling anecdote about the Bruckner Symphony No. 6 which received its first BSO performance yesterday and only the second in Boston.

When questioned why he never conducted the Sixth, Bruno Walter said it was because he thought it a weak work and not truly representative of the composer. "I consider myself a Bruckner propagandist," Walter told Smith, "and I refuse to play into the hands of the opposition by performing it!"

WALTER'S CONCLUSION is essentially sound. Though the Sixth calls for an orchestra of Brahmsian proportions, it yet evokes the characteristic Brucknerian feeling of spaciousness in string usage and rockbound majesty in its brass pillars. But given these and the logic of most of its forms, the symphony still cannot rise above the thematic barrenness of its materials.

The first movement pounces upon a motive or two, rescores them, transposes them endlessly, and that is that; the finale virtually stutters with thematic indecision as if Bruckner never knew whether to finish what he began to say and ends up spitting out fragments of everything.

The inner movements are a little greener for imagination—especially the attractive Scherzo, though using string pizzicatos to begin the trio's fanfare strikes one as odd.

SOME HIDEOUS brass intonation at the outset caused me to worry about the remainder, but that situation was swiftly rectified. Brass chords, without which Bruckner would be lost, came forth with undeniable, albeit tonally unfocused, authority.

String textures were rich. Leinsdorf stated his best case for Bruckner's Sixth, but for meaningful mileage in music there must be more than architectural excellence and efficient machinery; there must be a tankful of inspiration.

2:00 WGBH-FM — BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Live from Symphony Hall. Erich Leinsdorf conducts Beethoven's Overture to Egmont," Prokofiev's Piano Concerto No. 5 in F, Op. 55

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
APR 4 1969 New England

BSO too casual with Bruckner

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Staff Writer

The ARTS

Bruckner's Symphony No. 6 in A major is probably the least played of the mature ones, those from No. 3 on. It had its first Boston performance only two and a half years ago. And the performance Friday afternoon, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, was the first by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Bruckner himself thought it the boldest of his symphonies. It does not begin with a string tremolando, but it does go on to include all the other Bruckner thumb-prints, the sequences, the stops and starts, the rhythms with mixed twos and threes, the final wrap-up with a quotation from the first movement, and so forth. The general lay-out is also Bruckner's normal one.

It is more exploratory than the other symphonies by virtue of its more intense and vigorous harmonic activity. Certainly the mood and sound are special. It is of unique brightness and lightness and it is, for that matter, not quite as long as most of the others. It comes close, at times, to a kind of gaiety that I find nowhere else in Bruckner.

The Adagio, even though Bruckner does mark it "sehr feirlich" (very solemn), is, a bit like that in the 4th Symphony, in the gracious tradition of Schubert and Schumann more than in the grand one of Beethoven and Wagner. This Adagio is, for me, the loveliest of the four movements and one of Bruckner's most beautiful altogether, and the Scherzo with its strangely abrupt Trio is particularly fine as well. The finale, like most Bruckner finales, does not quite work, but the Symphony as a whole is a fresh and delightful piece in which a high level of invention is sustained.

The performance Friday was disappointing. It was not properly clear in texture, nor, especially in the first movement, was it always aptly paced. The greater problem, however, lay in the unyielding, unbreathing, unfeeling quality of the whole casual, even rather profane, runthrough. At the beginning of the concert, Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture had gotten a similar sort of lick and not much promise.

Prokofiev's Piano Concerto No. 5, written in 1932, is, as far as musical content goes, somewhere on the trivial side of Scharwenka. It is, on the other hand, an occasion for brilliant playing, and John Browning gave it just the glitter and crackle it needed. His brilliant playing was neatly backed up by the orchestra under Leinsdorf.

Finally, a footnote to the review of the previous Friday's Boston Symphony concert. The program had incorrectly claimed the performance of Nielsen's Symphony No. 3 as the first in Boston, and the mistake was repeated in my review. Credit for the Boston premiere of the Nielsen 3rd properly goes to Kalman Novak and the Boston Civic Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Erich Leinsdorf conducting Beethoven: "Egmont" Overture; Prokofiev: Piano Concerto No. 5, John Browning, soloist; Bruckner: Symphony No. 6 in A major. Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall.

48.

CAMBRIDGE SERIES

SIXTH PROGRAM
Tuesday evening April 8 1969 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BEETHOVEN

Symphony no. 6 in F major op. 68 'The Pastoral'

- Awakening of happy feelings on reaching the countryside: allegro ma non troppo
- At the brook's edge: andante molto mosso
- Festive gathering of the country people: allegro
- Thunderstorm: allegro
- Shepherd's song — happy and thankful feelings after the storm: allegretto

intermission

Symphony no. 3 in E flat op. 55 'Eroica'*

- Allegro con brio
- Marcia funebre: adagio assai
- Scherzo: allegro vivace
- Finale: allegro molto

By GERALD A. BERLIN

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

APR 10 1969

BSO REFORMS BRUCKNER 6TH

There is a familiar rule of thumb that if a work seldom if ever is performed there must be good reason for it. Of two such pieces on the same program last weekend, one, the Bruckner 6th Symphony in A, was an emphatic exception to the rule; the other, the 5th Prokofiev Piano Concerto, was resounding proof of its validity.

This occasion was the first airing of the Bruckner 6th Symphony by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and only the second in the city (Prausnitz did it with the New England Conservatory in 1966). Yet, it is vintage Bruckner. There are the child-like building blocks of structure and sound, the theme clusters, the curious admixture of Wagner, Schubert and Beethoven all adding up in the aggregate to pure, eloquent and moving romantic restatement. All the more welcome by virtue of its rarity. By Bruckner measurements the 6th is a mini-symphony, only three-quarters of an hour long. It does not soar off into the empyrean spaces as the last three Bruckner symphonies do, not even in the crown of the work, the affecting Adagio. On the contrary, a sort of pastorale understatement is wholly pervasive, the typically outsized and pulsating scherzo excepted.

Mr. Leinsdorf, as fine a Brucknerian as there is around, and the orchestra accounted for themselves splendidly. Which means finding and holding to the proper tempo in each movement, dramatically underscoring of the contrast dynamics, smoothing over the jerkiness of the thematic transitions and in the process producing great golden cathedrals of sound. This was brass night in Symphony Hall and the choir certainly rose to the challenge.

Prokofiev's 5th Piano Concerto is a five movement throw together of the Prokofievisms which emerged in the early thirties, when he was still very much his own master and not yet bending to the dictates of Zhadanov and the Union of Soviet Composers. That means steely acerbities, self-conscious shock effects and key-board tours-de-force of uncommon virtuosity. Though generally his vocabulary of that period was original and arresting enough, in this instance what Prokofiev had to say all adds up to one of the more unrelievedly convulsive, spasmodic and exhausting-to-listen-to concertos in all the literature.

I hasten to point out that none of these pejoratives apply to the soloist, John Browning. A specialist in Prokofiev who shortly will have recorded all of the Concertos with Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra, a fact which no doubt accounts for its advent at this time, he ripped and cascaded through the work with undeniable brilliance. The orchestral support was of a piece. What a pity that some of this extraordinary talent to spare couldn't have been shared with the particeps criminis in last week's Brahms B flat Piano Concerto.

The opening piece on the program was a remarkably strong reading of Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture, which is certainly one of the more satisfying ways to commence a symphony concert.

This week-end Joseph Silverstein will be the soloist in Bruch's Scottish Fantasy for violin and orchestra. Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Bach's Sonata No. 1 in C and Stravinsky's Symphony in C.

RECORD AMERICAN, BOSTON, SAT., APRIL 12, 1969

Stravinsky Symphony Rock Solid

By GEORGE GELLES
Music Critic

Stravinsky's blandest title, "Symphony in C," is his most provocative. In 1940, when the work was completed, the symphonic form had been long left for dead by composers most with it, and the key of C was thought a river run dry. The attitude towards classical forms and traditional tonal structures was wider (and less one-sided), of course, but in writing a "Symphony in C" which Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony played yesterday Stravinsky recalled two powerful and once-prominent fixtures of a repudiated heritage.

He also raised most clearly the tangled issue of the two probable inseparables, form and content, for much of the music, its melodic structure, its rhythmic layout in the large and small, its instrumentation, its ambience in general, is of a piece with contemporaneous Stravinsky.

But although we can grab at matches and isolate strains from the ballets and from "Rake's Progress," the "Symphony" is absolutely unified, rock solid in construction and musically justified in each detail, an eloquent vindication of mid-20th century symphonies in C.

It's a double shame that the piece hadn't been played by the BSO in a quarter century (since 1944 when the composer himself conducted), for the "Symphony" obviously deserves repeated hearing and because we might have got a more satisfactory reading than that on Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall.

It was a stiffly led performance, awkward in execution and tight, without bite or beauty of phrase or textural variety, lacking, in a word, tone. The players, however, seemed unusually alert and interested in what they were doing (and from the solo horn, there was very fine, effortless, unobtrusive playing), but in general, I missed a feeling of relaxation and security that only long familiarity with works can bring.

Max Bruch's "Scottish Fantasy," which had concertmaster Joesph Silverstein as its soloist, is an expertly written, absolutely professional pleasant piece of Kitsch, bad because mindless, but sincere and slick, a real period piece.

I don't care if Silverstein has been playing the "Fantasy" since he was in knickers, which he probably has, or that Bruch has scored for the obvious virtuosic effort, which he certainly has— it was a tremendously effective performance, with the right amount of sentiment and wonderfully played. I wish, though, that the orchestra had gone heavier on the Schmaltz, but the players sounded as bored as they had every right to be.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

APR 12 1969

New England Newsclip

A Bland Afternoon At the Symphony

By HARRY NEVILLE
Staff Writer

Erich Leinsdorf's penultimate Friday afternoon concert with the Boston Symphony was a mixture of bland and blandly played music. There is nothing bland about Bach's Orchestral Suite No. 1, which opened the program, or Stravinsky's Symphony in C, which closed it. But under Leinsdorf's direction, both emerged as something less than vital musical statements.

Similar problems plagued both performances: attacks were not incisive enough, rhythms lacked "bite," counterpoints were not clearly delineated, and balances seemed ill-conceived.

The Bach Suite was accorded particularly lackadaisical treatment. It seems rather odd after all the lessons of recent baroque scholarship to hear this work in the suave, overripe, big band type performance that was normal twenty years ago.

Leinsdorf used 20 violins, 8 violas, 6 cellos, and 4 doublebasses, which, together with the luscious blend of the Boston strings, pretty effectively killed the clarity and force one wants to hear in this music. Needless to say, ornamentation got minimal attention.

Bruch's "Scottish Fantasy" used to be something of a war-horse for violinists, but until yesterday it hadn't been performed at a B.S.O. concert since 1922.

It is a quaint piece of music that might also be said (grudgingly) to possess some charm — ideal in any event for subscription audiences. Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein was the soloist and he played quite elegantly, showing great respect for the music and never belaboring the obvious.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

APR 12 1969

New England Newsclip

TWENTY-THIRD PROGRAM
Friday afternoon April 11 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening April 12 1969 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BACH — Suite no. 1 in C BWV 1066

- Ouverture
- Courante
- Gavotte 1 – gavotte 2
- Forlane
- Menuet 1 – menuet 2
- Bourrée 1 – bourrée 2
- Passepied 1 – passepied 2

BRUCH — Scottish fantasy for violin and orchestra op. 46

- Introduction: grave – adagio cantabile
- Scherzo: allegro
- Andante sostenuto
- Finale: allegro guerriero

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN violin
BERNARD ZIGHERA harp

intermission

STRAVINSKY — Symphony in C

- Moderato alla breve
- Larghetto concertante
- Allegretto
- Largo – tempo giusto, alla breve

The Symphony

'Scottish Fantasy' Adds Variety

By McLAREN HARRIS

On paper, Bach's Suite No. 1 for orchestra, Max Bruch's Scottish Fantasy for violin, Opus 46, and Stravinsky's Symphony in C would hardly seem to make up a full-length Symphony program, but in practice the three prove ample in both duration and content — and where the Bruch piece is concerned, variety too.

The Scottish Fantasy, you see, is not among the most sublime products of the 19th century. Even when measured against Bruch's own pair of gypsy-flavored violin concertos the scale may tip the other way. After all, any work with such a thorough basis in folk melody has already given away a portion of its originality, and it remains for the composer to develop new and meaningful things in the arrangement without destroying utterly the sense of its inspirational material.

PRECISELY this latter point was argued by some of the work's early critics, notably those in Great Britain (naturally). As Philip Hale's program notes have it, the work was first introduced in England as a concerto, prompting criticism for its being neither a concerto in form nor Scottish in content, as Bruch had by no means gone in for literal quotations.

Of course "concerto" is a misnomer and Bruch avoided it, including in its full title a reference to "free use of Scottish folk-melodies." Even so, the personalities of the four movements have more than simply a Scottish flavor. Characteristic phrase patterns as well as melodic turns identify its sources, and Bruch's careful orchestration balance of solo and orchestral parts and variety of material give it far more substance than that of a medley. At the very least it was a refreshing change of pace.

The Fantasy's early popularity was as a vehicle for the great romantic violinists of its day and after: Sarasate, Joachim, Ysaye, Kreisler. Joseph Silverstein resurrected it yesterday after an absence of 47 years, which says something for its dated flavor, and endowed it with an unpretentious, nevertheless elegant, lyric feeling.

Melodic embellishment substitutes for bravura in this work, and Silverstein negotiated quick-spinning passages with an easy grace, sustained ones with a sympathetic warmth. Bernard Zighera took able care of the prominent harp support.

STRAVINSKY'S Symphony in C hadn't been performed at these concerts since 1944 — a figure which tests credibility, as the work is by no means a stranger to modern repertoire. The Symphony in C is virtually a restatement of classic (even baroque) principles in terms of 20th-century harmony, melody and rhythm. True the characters of some of the forms have become altered in the process — the "minuet" is such in meter and tempo only and the serene larghetto contains a softly whirring centerpiece in rapid tempo — but the economy of both orchestration and musical language has few parallels in the period between Schubert and itself.

The performance under Erich Leinsdorf was clean, nicely reticent in dynamic mood and with good internal balance as to Stravinsky's own ideas about instrumental sound —i.e., pointed and tonally differentiated.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

APR 12 1969

New England Newsclip

48.

CAMBRIDGE SERIES

SIXTH PROGRAM
Tuesday evening April 8 1969 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BEETHOVEN

Symphony no. 6 in F major op. 68 'The Pastoral'

Awakening of happy feelings on reaching the countryside: allegro ma non troppo
At the brook's edge: andante molto mosso
Festive gathering of the country people: allegro
Thunderstorm: allegro
Shepherd's song — happy and thankful feelings after the storm: allegretto

intermission

Symphony no. 3 in E flat op. 55 'Eroica'*

Allegro con brio
Marcia funebre: adagio assai
Scherzo: allegro vivace
Finale: allegro molto

By GERALD A. BERLIN

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

APR 10 1969

BSO REFORMS BRUCKNER 6TH

There is a familiar rule of thumb that if a work seldom if ever is performed there must be good reason for it. Of two such pieces on the same program last weekend, one, the Bruckner 6th Symphony in A, was an emphatic exception to the rule; the other, the 5th Prokofiev Piano Concerto, was resounding proof of its validity.

This occasion was the first airing of the Bruckner 6th Symphony by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and only the second in the city (Prausnitz did it with the New England Conservatory in 1966). Yet, it is vintage Bruckner. There are the child-like building blocks of structure and sound, the theme clusters, the curious admixture of Wagner, Schubert and Beethoven all adding up in the aggregate to pure, eloquent and moving romantic restatement. All the more welcome by virtue of its rarity. By Bruckner measurements the 6th is a mini-symphony, only three-quarters of an hour long. It does not soar off into the empyrean spaces as the last three Bruckner symphonies do, not even in the crown of the work, the affecting Adagio. On the contrary, a sort of pastorale understatement is wholly pervasive, the typically outsized and pulsating scherzo excepted.

Mr. Leinsdorf, as fine a Brucknerian as there is around, and the orchestra accounted for themselves splendidly. Which means finding and holding to the proper tempo in each movement, dramatically underscoring of the contrast dynamics, smoothing over the jerkiness of the thematic transitions and in the process producing great golden cathedrals of sound. This was brass night in Symphony Hall and the choir certainly rose to the challenge.

Prokofiev's 5th Piano Concerto is a five movement throw together of the Prokofievisms which emerged in the early thirties, when he was still very much his own master and not yet bending to the dictates of Zhadanov and the Union of Soviet Composers. That means steely acerbities, self-conscious shock effects and key-board tours-de-force of uncommon virtuosity. Though generally his vocabulary of that period was original and arresting enough, in this instance what Prokofiev had to say all adds up to one of the more unrelievedly convulsive, spasmodic and exhausting-to-listen-to concertos in all the literature.

I hasten to point out that none of these pejoratives apply to the soloist, John Browning. A specialist in Prokofiev who shortly will have recorded all of the Concertos with Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra, a fact which no doubt accounts for its advent at this time, he ripped and cascaded through the work with undeniable brilliance. The orchestral support was of a piece. What a pity that some of this extraordinary talent to spare couldn't have been shared with the particeps criminis in last week's Brahms B flat Piano Concerto.

The opening piece on the program was a remarkably strong reading of Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture, which is certainly one of the more satisfying ways to commence a symphony concert.

This week-end Joseph Silverstein will be the soloist in Bruch's Scottish Fantasy for violin and orchestra. Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct Bach's Sonata No. 1 in C and Stravinsky's Symphony in C.

28

RECORD AMERICAN, BOSTON, SAT., APRIL 12, 1969

Stravinsky Symphony Rock Solid

By GEORGE GELLES
Music Critic

Stravinsky's blandest title, "Symphony in C," is his most provocative. In 1940, when the work was completed, the symphonic form had been long left for dead by composers most with it, and the key of C was thought a river run dry. The attitude towards classical forms and traditional tonal structures was wider (and less one-sided), of course, but in writing a "Symphony in C" which Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony played yesterday Stravinsky recalled two powerful and once-prominent fixtures of a repudiated heritage.

He also raised most clearly the tangled issue of the two probable inseparables, form and content, for much of the music, its melodic structure, its rhythmic layout in the large and small, its instrumentation, its ambience in general, is of a piece with contemporaneous Stravinsky.

But although we can grab at snatches and isolate strains from the ballets and from "Rake's Progress," the "Symphony" is absolutely unified, rock solid in construction and musically justified in each detail, an eloquent vindication of mid-20th century symphonies in C.

It's a double shame that the piece hadn't been played by the BSO in a quarter century (since 1944 when the composer himself conducted), for the "Symphony" obviously deserves repeated hearing and because we might have got a more satisfactory reading than that on Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall.

It was a stiffly led performance, awkward in execution and tight, without bite or beauty of phrase or textural variety, lacking, in a word, tone. The players, however, seemed unusually alert and interested in what they were doing (and from the solo horn, there was very fine, effortless, unobtrusive playing), but in general, I missed a feeling of relaxation and security that only long familiarity with works can bring.

Max Bruch's "Scottish Fantasy," which had concertmaster Joesph Silverstein as its soloist, is an expertly written, absolutely professional pleasant piece of Kitsch, bad because mindless, but sincere and slick, a real period piece.

I don't care if Silverstein has been playing the "Fantasy" since he was in knickers, which he probably has, or that Bruch has scored for the obvious virtuosic effort, which he certainly has—it was a tremendously effective performance, with the right amount of seniment and wonderfully played. I wish, though, that the orchestra had gone heavier on the Schmaltz, but the players sounded as bored as they had every right to be.

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873

APR 12 1969

New England Newsclip

A Bland Afternoon At the Symphony

By HARRY NEVILLE
Staff Writer

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

APR 12 1969

New England Newsclip

Erich Leinsdorf's penultimate Friday afternoon concert with the Boston Symphony was a mixture of bland and blandly played music. There is nothing bland about Bach's Orchestral Suite No. 1, which opened the program, or Stravinsky's Symphony in C, which closed it. But under Leinsdorf's direction, both emerged as something less than vital musical statements.

Similar problems plagued both performances: attacks were not incisive enough, rhythms lacked "bite," counterpoints were not clearly delineated, and balances seemed ill-conceived.

The Bach Suite was accorded particularly lackadaisical treatment. It seems rather odd after all the lessons of recent baroque scholarship to hear this work in the suave, overripe, big band type performance that was normal twenty years ago.

Leinsdorf used 20 violins, 8 violas, 6 cellos, and 4 doublebasses, which, together with the luscious blend of the Boston strings, pretty effectively killed the clarity and force one wants to hear in this music. Needless to say, ornamentation got minimal attention.

Bruch's "Scottish Fantasy" used to be something of a war-horse for violinists, but until yesterday it hadn't been performed at a B.S.O. concert since 1922.

It is a quaint piece of music that might also be said (grudgingly) to possess some charm — ideal in any event for subscription audiences. Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein was the soloist and he played quite elegantly, showing great respect for the music and never belaboring the obvious.

TWENTY-THIRD PROGRAM
Friday afternoon April 11 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening April 12 1969 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BACH — Suite no. 1 in C BWV 1066

Ouverture
Courante
Gavotte 1 – gavotte 2
Forlane
Menuet 1 – menuet 2
Bourrée 1 – bourrée 2
Passepied 1 – passepied 2

BRUCH — Scottish fantasy for violin and orchestra op. 46

Introduction: grave – adagio cantabile
Scherzo: allegro
Andante sostenuto
Finale: allegro guerriero

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN violin
BERNARD ZIGHERA harp

intermission

STRAVINSKY — Symphony in C

Moderato alla breve
Larghetto concertante
Allegretto
Largo – tempo giusto, alla breve

The Symphony

'Scottish Fantasy' Adds Variety

By McLAREN HARRIS

On paper, Bach's Suite No. 1 for orchestra, Max Bruch's Scottish Fantasy for violin, Opus 46, and Stravinsky's Symphony in C would hardly seem to make up a full-length Symphony program, but in practice the three prove ample in both duration and content — and where the Bruch piece is concerned, variety too.

The Scottish Fantasy, you see, is not among the most sublime products of the 19th century. Even when measured against Bruch's own pair of gypsy-flavored violin concertos the scale may tip the other way. After all, any work with such a thorough basis in folk melody has already given away a portion of its originality, and it remains for the composer to develop new and meaningful things in the arrangement without destroying utterly the sense of its inspirational material.

PRECISELY this latter point was argued by some of the work's early critics, notably those in Great Britain (naturally). As Philip Hale's program notes have it, the work was first introduced in England as a concerto, prompting criticism for its being neither a concerto in form nor Scottish in content, as Bruch had by no means gone in for literal quotations.

Of course "concerto" is a misnomer and Bruch avoided it, including in its full title a reference to "free use of Scottish folk-melodies." Even so, the personalities of the four movements have more than simply a Scottish flavor. Characteristic phrase patterns as well as melodic turns identify its sources, and Bruch's careful orchestration balance of solo and orchestral parts and variety of material give it far more substance than that of a medley. At the very least it was a refreshing change of pace.

The Fantasy's early popularity was as a vehicle for the great romantic violinists of its day and after: Sarasate, Joachim, Ysaye, Kreisler. Joseph Silverstein resurrected it yesterday after an absence of 47 years, which says something for its dated flavor, and endowed it with an unpretentious, nevertheless elegant, lyric feeling.

Melodic embellishment substitutes for bravura in this work, and Silverstein negotiated quick-spinning passages with an easy grace, sustained ones with a sympathetic warmth. Bernard Zighera took able care of the prominent harp support.

STRAVINSKY'S Symphony in C hadn't been performed at these concerts since 1944 — a figure which tests credibility, as the work is by no means a stranger to modern repertoire. The Symphony in C is virtually a restatement of classic (even baroque) principles in terms of 20th-century harmony, melody and rhythm. True the characters of some of the forms have become altered in the process — the "minuet" is such in metre and tempo only and the serene Larghetto contains a softly whirring centerpiece in rapid tempo — but the economy of both orchestration and musical language has few parallels in the period between Schubert and itself.

The performance under Erich Leinsdorf was clean, nicely reticent in dynamic mood and with good internal balance as to Stravinsky's own ideas about instrumental sound —i.e., pointed and tonally differentiated.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

APR 12 1969

New England Newsclip

Triangular program at BSO

By Allan Sly

Last weekend's Boston Symphony program (next to last of the current season) was virtually triangular, so widely disparate were the three works played: Bach's Suite No. 1, Bruch's Scottish fantasy, Stravinsky's Symphony in C. For listeners able to turn mental somersaults from one work to the next, it was effective, and it showed how Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra can turn themselves on in various ways. Whether the audience as a whole was turned on to the same degree is another question.

The Bach jogged along aimiably, the ouverture neither grave at first nor animated later, but leading naturally to a succession of cool dances—adding up to a non-dynamic but pleasant reminder of life at court, or of some aspects of it, not the more exciting ones, certainly.

Nothing in Symphony Hall can sound like chamber music, so the reduced orchestra, plus inaudible harpsichord (played by a handsome young man whose name could not be discovered in the program book), tended to sound untypical of a symphony concert and yet unlike any other known musical occasion. A listener's unashamed devotion to Bach, however, could spill over to an affectionate endorsement of Mr. Leinsdorf's total musical integrity, clearly evident in the Suite, as it was in the succeeding Bruch Scottish fantasy. In this Joseph Silverstein shone as soloist, together with Bernard Zighera in the prominent harp part. But here was another shortcoming—Bruch's whimsy satisfies neither the emotional hunger nor the ideological necessities of our times. One could walk away with a tune or two, as at Pops; but the occasion honored neither Scotland nor the audiences of the 1880's at whom the work was aimed in the first place.

However, this old favorite has been kept in the BSO's closet since 1922; might it merit another outing if played in a more frankly German romantic manner? Since Mr. Silverstein succeeded Richard Burgin as concertmaster the BSO strings have changed direction; there is now clarity and tidiness, a narrower focus of sound, and when he is heard alone Mr. Silverstein's own playing stands revealed as the target image, so to speak. It is altogether admirable as a style, yet as a vehicle for the romanticism of a Bruch one yearns for more.

After the break the Stravinsky Symphony in C almost compensated for the anomalies described so far. Conductor and orchestra were interested—as who wasn't?—in their task. Every moment counts in this work, cerebration is instant and constant, the material striking, the edifice of tone man-sized, rather than colossal. One can live in it, move around in it, survey it, study it within and without. Mr. Leinsdorf's objective way with it is doubtless quite right, though I hardly feel he identifies himself with it, as we know he does with Beethoven, for example, or even Schoenberg.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150
APR 14 1969
New England Newsclip

THE TECH TUESDAY, APRIL 15, 1969

music...

Silverstein at Boston Symphony

By Steven Shladover

This weekend, the Boston Symphony presented the next-to-last program of its Friday-Saturday series for this season. With Erich Leinsdorf conducting, almost at the end of his term as music director, the varied program served to show his adaptibility to a wide range of styles, as well as displaying the capabilities of most of the members of the orchestra. The works chosen for presentation were Bach's Suite No. 1 in C, Max Bruch's Scottish fantasy for violin and orchestra, op. 46, with Joseph Silverstein as soloist, and Stravinsky's Symphony in C. At Friday afternoon's concert, at least, this combination resulted in a very satisfying musical experience.

The Bach Suite, which opened the concert, was distinguished in this performance for the stylistic clarity and purity of the presentation. The work is scored for strings, two oboes and bassoon, rather than for the full orchestra. Leinsdorf used a slightly larger complement of strings than might ordinarily have been expected, but this was justified because of the size of Symphony Hall and the tendency of small ensemble sounds to get lost in it. The woodwinds were a joy to listen to, combining masterful use of tone with perfect coordination and precision playing. The somewhat dry approach in both sound and interpretation was not at all objectionable, although the slightly excessive push Leinsdorf gave the music was not appreciated. The ensemble at the very beginning of the piece was distractingly ragged, but Leinsdorf soon brought things under control, and the remainder of the performance was characterized by precision attacks and a generally pleasing manner.

Silverstein in solo

After the Bach suite gave Leinsdorf an opportunity to show his mastery of the Baroque style and allowed the woodwind and string sections of the orchestra to display their talents, the Bruch Scottish fantasy found Leinsdorf demonstrating his understanding of the romantic style while Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster, was displaying his own considerable talents. The Scottish fantasy is a melodic, somewhat sentimental, piece which is fun to listen to and serves as a very favorable vehicle for the virtuoso violinist. Much of its charm comes from its rather unconventional style, and from the use of a harp accompaniment, a part which, incidentally, was well handled by Bernard Zighera. The performance, on the whole, was in the best high romantic tradition, with full-voiced playing and songful expression. This is a work in which technical facility is vitally important, and Mr. Silverstein came through with flying colors. His intonation was unfailingly accurate and his double-stops could hardly have been bettered. It was encouraging to find that the very elusive balance between orchestra and violin dynamics was found and maintained throughout the performance. In sum, this was an excellent presentation with a large-scale, festive air about it.

Stravinsky Symphony

The second half of the program consisted of the Stravinsky Symphony in C, composed between 1938 and 1940. Although this was written later than Stravinsky's famous ballet scores it came before his turn to atonality. Unlike the ballets, the harmonic texture of the Symphony is quite thin and simple, allowing the individual instruments to be heard separately, rather than having them blend into a cohesive sound. The rhythmic structure, though, is complex and consistently intriguing. This symphony is music of a decidely intellectual, rather than emotional, nature, and for this reason Leinsdorf's somewhat detached approach was highly successful. The orchestral playing was of consistently high quality, and the transparent texture of the sound, coupled with the clarity of the rhythmic treatment, helped greatly in untangling the complex structure of the work. Even though this was a very fine performance of one of Stravinsky's most readily accessible works, the audience failed to appreciate it, and the response was pitifully small.

CHRONICLE SUN
CAMBRIDGE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 12,850
APR 3 1969

GAZETTE (e)
TAUNTON, MASS.
CIRC. 13,316
APR 12 1969

TRANSCRIPT (e)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
CIRC. 13,500
APR 12 1969
New Eng

Symphony Ends Season On Saturday

The final Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts of the season will take place Friday afternoon and Saturday evening when Erich Leinsdorf conducts Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

Although he will conduct the opening portion of a Symphony Hall benefit concert for Biafran Relief on Monday, April 28, these are the last full concerts Erich Leinsdorf will conduct in Symphony Hall as music director of the orchestra. He began his tenure at the beginning of the 1962-63 season, and retires in August of this year at the end of the Tanglewood season.

Soloists in the Beethoven Ninth are Jane Marsh, soprano; Josephine Veasey, mezzo - soprano; Placido Domingo, tenor; and Sherrill Milnes, baritone. The Chorus Pro Musica and the New England Conservatory of Music Chorus will also sing.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436
APR 13 1969
New England Newsclip

BSO Concert to Be Broadcast In Live Color Tuesday Night

New England music lovers will have just one more chance this season to watch a live color telecast of a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert from Symphony Hall on Tuesday, April 15 at 8:30 p.m.

The program will also be the last telecast from Symphony Hall during Mr. Leinsdorf's tenure as music director.

Broadcast simultaneously in stereo by WGBH-FM, the program opens with Beethoven's Egmont Overture, followed by Bruch's Scottish Fantasy for Violin and Orchestra. Soloist in the Bruch work will be the Boston Symphony's concert master Joseph Silverstein.

After intermission, Erich Leinsdorf will return to the podium to conduct Tchakovsky's Symphony No. 5, one of the most popular works in the entire concert repertoire.

The program is being produced for television by Boston Sympthony producer Jordan Whitelaw and directed by William Cosel of WGBH.

Symphony concerts final

The final Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given Friday at 2 and Saturday at 8:30, when Erich Leinsdorf conducts Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

Although Leinsdorf will conduct the opening portion of an Apr. 28 benefit concert, these appearances are the last full concerts he will lead in Symphony Hall as the orchestra's music director.

Soloists in the Beethoven Ninth will be Jane Marsh, soprano; Josephine Veasey, mezzo-soprano; Placido Domingo, tenor, and Sherrill Milnes, baritone. Milnes also will appear as narrator in the Schoenberg work.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905
APR 13 1969
New England

TENTH PROGRAM
Tuesday evening April 15 1969 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BEETHOVEN — Overture to 'Egmont'

BRUCH — Scottish fantasy for violin and orchestra op. 46
Introduction: grave – adagio cantabile
Scherzo: allegro
Andante sostenuto
Finale: allegro guerriero
JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN violin
BERNARD ZIGHERA harp

intermission

TCHAIKOVSKY — Symphony no. 5 in E minor op. 64*
Andante – allegro con anima
Andante cantabile con alcuna licenza
Valse: allegro moderato
Finale: andante maestoso – allegro vivace

The Sound of Music

Romantic Farewell

By Peter M. Knapp

In the glare of television lights, Erich Leinsdorf led the Boston Symphony in a high-pitched program of 19th century music last night.

It was his Symphony Hall farewell to the Tuesday series subscribers as the BSO's music director, though he will direct the Tanglewood programs, and they gave him a standing ovation at the end. The program was telecast by WGBH-TV, Channel 2.

Leinsdorf chose a romantic, perhaps sentimental, program: Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont;" Max Bruch's Scottish fantasy for violin and orchestra; Tschaikovsky's Symphony No. 5. Each was originally heard in Symphony Hall in the last century — 1881, 1888, and 1892, respectively — and need not wait for a "romantic revival" to be welcomed in traditionalist Boston.

Orchestral Precision

The performances were all of high standards, illustrating the enormous individual and collective virtuosity of this great orchestra, as well as the discipline Leinsdorf has imposed during his directorship. And for a conductor who has been accused of being emotionally cold, if intellectually precise, Leinsdorf led a hot-hued Tschaikovsky.

The Fifth Symphony, and the Bruch fantasy, are definite creatures of the romantic period. To an unsentimental age, they may appear to be overstuffed relics, overemotional, rhetorical, even bombastic. Yet no music survives on sheer sentimentality and bombast, and many Symphony-goers doubtless yearn for a return to lush melodies and plush orchestration. If Berlioz stays in style, why not Tschaikovsky?

The Scottish fantasy is on a softer scale. Even so, I find the Bruch cloying and dumpy in its accompaniment. The violin part does present some interesting figurations for the soloist and Joseph Silverstein, the Boston Symphony's concertmaster, played it with technical aplomb and a silvery, throbbing tone that seemed ideally suited for its content.

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN
. . . BSO soloist

Rapid Symphony

The Tschaikovsky symphony featured polished instrumental work — the horns were superb throughout the program — and a high-keyed approach by Leinsdorf. Despite the frenzy of sound, control was maintained, though the finale was taken at a perilous speed, and the allergo of the first movement also moved at a faster-than-desirable clip.

The Beethoven overture set the pace for the evening with a taut, incisive reading, silken string playing, and an exciting, if driven, coda.

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 62,736
APR 16 1969
New England Newsclip

Triangular program at BSO

By Allan Sly

Last weekend's Boston Symphony program (next to last of the current season) was virtually triangular, so widely disparate were the three works played: Bach's Suite No. 1, Bruch's Scottish fantasy, Stravinsky's Symphony in C. For listeners able to turn mental somersaults from one work to the next, it was effective, and it showed how Mr. Leinsdorf and the orchestra can turn themselves on in various ways. Whether the audience as a whole was turned on to the same degree is another question.

The Bach jogged along aimiably, the ouverture neither grave at first nor animated later, but leading naturally to a succession of cool dances—adding up to a non-dynamic but pleasant reminder of life at court, or of some aspects of it, not the more exciting ones, certainly.

Nothing in Symphony Hall can sound like chamber music, so the reduced orchestra, plus inaudible harpsichord (played by a handsome young man whose name could not be discovered in the program book), tended to sound untypical of a symphony concert and yet unlike any other known musical occasion. A listener's unashamed devotion to Bach, however, could spill over to an affectionate endorsement of Mr. Leinsdorf's total musical integrity, clearly evident in the Suite, as it was in the succeeding Bruch Scottish fantasy. In this Joseph Silverstein shone as soloist, together with Bernard Zighera in the prominent harp part. But here was another shortcoming—Bruch's whimsy satisfies neither the emotional hunger nor the ideological necessities of our times. One could walk away with a tune or two, as at Pops; but the occasion honored neither Scotland nor the audiences of the 1880's at whom the work was aimed in the first place.

However, this old favorite has been kept in the BSO's closet since 1922; might it merit another outing if played in a more frankly German romantic manner? Since Mr. Silverstein succeeded Richard Burgin as concertmaster the BSO strings have changed direction; there is now clarity and tidiness, a narrower focus of sound, and when he is heard alone Mr. Silverstein's own playing stands revealed as the target image, so to speak. It is altogether admirable as a style, yet as a vehicle for the romanticism of a Bruch one yearns for more.

After the break the Stravinsky Symphony in C almost compensated for the anomalies described so far. Conductor and orchestra were interested—as who wasn't?—in their task. Every moment counts in this work, cerebration is instant and constant, the material striking, the edifice of tone man-sized, rather than colossal. One can live in it, move around in it, survey it, study it within and without. Mr. Leinsdorf's objective way with it is doubtless quite right, though I hardly feel he identifies himself with it, as we know he does with Beethoven, for example, or even Schoenberg.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150

APR 14 1969 New England Newsclip

music...

Silverstein at Boston Symphony

By Steven Shladover

This weekend, the Boston Symphony presented the next-to-last program of its Friday-Saturday series for this season. With Erich Leinsdorf conducting, almost at the end of his term as music director, the varied program served to show his adaptibility to a wide range of styles, as well as displaying the capabilities of most of the members of the orchestra. The works chosen for presentation were Bach's Suite No. 1 in C, Max Bruch's Scottish fantasy for violin and orchestra, op. 46, with Joseph Silverstein as soloist, and Stravinsky's Symphony in C. At Friday afternoon's concert, at least, this combination resulted in a very satisfying musical experience.

The Bach Suite, which opened the concert, was distinguished in this performance for the stylistic clarity and purity of the presentation. The work is scored for strings, two oboes and bassoon, rather than for the full orchestra. Leinsdorf used a slightly larger complement of strings than might ordinarily have been expected, but this was justified because of the size of Symphony Hall and the tendency of small ensemble sounds to get lost in it. The woodwinds were a joy to listen to, combining masterful use of tone with perfect coordination and precision playing. The somewhat dry approach in both sound and interpretation was not at all objectionable, although the slightly excessive push Leinsdorf gave the music was not appreciated. The ensemble at the very beginning of the piece was distractingly ragged, but Leinsdorf soon brought things under control, and the remainder of the performance was characterized by precision attacks and a generally pleasing manner.

Silverstein in solo

After the Bach suite gave Leinsdorf an opportunity to show his mastery of the Baroque style and allowed the woodwind and string sections of the orchestra to display their talents, the Bruch Scottish fantasy found Leinsdorf demonstrating his understanding of the romantic style while Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster, was displaying his own considerable talents. The Scottish fantasy is a melodic, somewhat sentimental, piece which is fun to listen to and serves as a very favorable vehicle for the virtuoso violinist. Much of its charm comes from its rather unconventional style, and from the use of a harp accompaniment, a part which, incidentally, was well handled by Bernard Zighera. The performance, on the whole, was in the best high romantic tradition, with full-voiced playing and songful expression. This is a work in which technical facility is vitally important, and Mr. Silverstein came through with flying colors. His intonation was unfailingly accurate and his double-stops could hardly have been bettered. It was encouraging to find that the very elusive balance between orchestra and violin dynamics was found and maintained throughout the performance. In sum, this was an excellent presentation with a large-scale, festive air about it.

Stravinsky Symphony

The second half of the program consisted of the Stravinsky Symphony in C, composed between 1938 and 1940. Although this was written later than Stravinsky's famous ballet scores it came before his turn to atonality. Unlike the ballets, the harmonic texture of the Symphony is quite thin and simple, allowing the individual instruments to be heard separately, rather than having them blend into a cohesive sound. The rhythmic structure, though, is complex and consistently intriguing. This symphony is music of a decidely intellectual, rather than emotional, nature, and for this reason Leinsdorf's somewhat detached approach was highly successful. The orchestral playing was of consistently high quality, and the transparent texture of the sound, coupled with the clarity of the rhythmic treatment, helped greatly in untangling the complex structure of the work. Even though this was a very fine performance of one of Stravinsky's most readily accessible works, the audience failed to appreciate it, and the response was pitifully small.

CHRONICLE SUN
CAMBRIDGE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 12,850

APR 3 1969

GAZETTE (e)
TAUNTON, MASS.
CIRC. 13,316

APR 12 1969

TRANSCRIPT (e)
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
CIRC. 13,500

APR 12 1969 New Eng

Symphony Ends Season On Saturday

The final Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts of the season will take place Friday afternoon and Saturday evening when Erich Leinsdorf conducts Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

Although he will conduct the opening portion of a Symphony Hall benefit concert for Biafran Relief on Monday, April 28, these are the last full concerts Erich Leinsdorf will conduct in Symphony Hall as music director of the orchestra. He began his tenure at the beginning of the 1962-63 season, and retires in August of this year at the end of the Tanglewood season.

Soloists in the Beethoven Ninth are Jane Marsh, soprano; Josephine Veasey, mezzo - soprano; Placido Domingo, tenor; and Sherrill Milnes, baritone. The Chorus Pro Musica and the New England Conservatory of Music Chorus will also sing.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436

APR 13 1969 New England Newsclip

BSO Concert to Be Broadcast In Live Color Tuesday Night

New England music lovers will have just one more chance this season to watch a live color telecast of a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert from Symphony Hall on Tuesday, April 15 at 8:30 p.m.

The program will also be the last telecast from Symphony Hall during Mr. Leinsdorf's tenure as music director.

Broadcast simultaneously in stereo by WGBH-FM, the program opens with Beethoven's Egmont Overture, followed by Bruch's Scottish Fantasy for Violin and Orchestra. Soloist in the Bruch work will be the Boston Symphony's concert master Joseph Silverstein.

After intermission, Erich Leinsdorf will return to the podium to conduct Tchakovsky's Symphony No. 5, one of the most popular works in the entire concert repertoire.

The program is being produced for television by Boston Symphony producer Jordan Whitelaw and directed by William Cosel of WGBH.

Symphony concerts final

The final Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given Friday at 2 and Saturday at 8:30, when Erich Leinsdorf conducts Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

Although Leinsdorf will conduct the opening portion of an Apr. 28 benefit concert, these appearances are the last full concerts he will lead in Symphony Hall as the orchestra's music director.

Soloists in the Beethoven Ninth will be Jane Marsh, soprano; Josephine Veasey, mezzo-soprano; Placido Domingo, tenor, and Sherrill Milnes, baritone. Milnes also will appear as narrator in the Schoenberg work.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905

APR 13 1969 New England

TENTH PROGRAM
Tuesday evening April 15 1969 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BEETHOVEN — Overture to 'Egmont'

BRUCH — Scottish fantasy for violin and orchestra op. 46
Introduction: grave – adagio cantabile
Scherzo: allegro
Andante sostenuto
Finale: allegro guerriero
JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN violin
BERNARD ZIGHERA harp

intermission

TCHAIKOVSKY — Symphony no. 5 in E minor op. 64*
Andante – allegro con anima
Andante cantabile con alcuna licenza
Valse: allegro moderato
Finale: andante maestoso – allegro vivace

The Sound of Music

Romantic Farewell

By Peter M. Knapp

In the glare of television lights, Erich Leinsdorf led the Boston Symphony in a high-pitched program of 19th century music last night.

It was his Symphony Hall farewell to the Tuesday series subscribers as the BSO's music director, though he will direct the Tanglewood programs, and they gave him a standing ovation at the end. The program was telecast by WGBH-TV, Channel 2.

Leinsdorf chose a romantic, perhaps sentimental, program: Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont;" Max Bruch's Scottish fantasy for violin and orchestra; Tschaikovsky's Symphony No. 5. Each was originally heard in Symphony Hall in the last century — 1881, 1888, and 1892, respectively — and need not wait for a "romantic revival" to be welcomed in traditionalist Boston.

Orchestral Precision

The performances were all of high standards, illustrating the enormous individual and collective virtuosity of this great orchestra, as well as the discipline Leinsdorf has imposed during his directorship. And for a conductor who has been accused of being emotionally cold, if intellectually precise, Leinsdorf led a hot-hued Tschaikovsky.

The Fifth Symphony, and the Bruch fantasy, are definite creatures of the romantic period. To an unsentimental age, they may appear to be overstuffed relics, overemotional, rhetorical, even bombastic. Yet no music survives on sheer sentimentality and bombast, and many Symphony-goers doubtless yearn for a return to lush melodies and plush orchestration. If Berlioz stays in style, why not Tschaikovsky?

The Scottish fantasy is on a softer scale. Even so, I find the Bruch cloying and dumpy in its accompaniment. The violin part does present some interesting figurations for the soloist and Joseph Silverstein, the Boston Symphony's concertmaster, played it with technical aplomb and a silvery, throbbing tone that seemed ideally suited for its content.

JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN
. . . BSO soloist

Rapid Symphony

The Tschaikovsky symphony featured polished instrumental work — the horns were superb throughout the program — and a high-keyed approach by Leinsdorf. Despite the frenzy of sound, control was maintained, though the finale was taken at a perilous speed, and the allergo of the first movement also moved at a faster-than-desirable clip.

The Beethoven overture set the pace for the evening with a taut, incisive reading, silken string playing, and an exciting, if driven, coda.

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 62,736

APR 16 1969 New England Newsclip

50.

THURSDAY A SERIES

SIXTH PROGRAM
Thursday evening April 17 1969 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BEETHOVEN

Overture to 'Egmont' op. 84

Symphony no. 1 in C major op. 21
- Adagio molto – allegro con brio
- Andante cantabile con moto
- Menuetto: allegro molto e vivace
- Finale: adagio – allegro molto vivace

intermission

Symphony no. 3 in E flat op. 55 'Eroica'*
- Allegro con brio
- Marcia funebre: adagio assai
- Scherzo: allegro vivace
- Finale: allegro molto

End of symphony season

The final concerts of the Boston Symphony's 1968-69 season will be given April 18 and 19 in Symphony Hall. These performances will also mark the last full concerts Erich Leinsdorf will conduct in Symphony Hall, although the music director does not retire officially until the end of the Tanglewood season in August. Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw" and Beethoven's Symphony No. 9 will be performed by the symphony accompanied by the Chorus Pro Musica, New England Conservatory Chorus, and Jane Marsh, Josephine Veasey, Placido Domingo, and Sherrill Milnes.

MONITOR (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150
APR 17 1969
New England Newsclip

Traveler

Symphony Ends Season On Saturday

The final Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts of the season will take place Friday afternoon and Saturday evening when Erich Leinsdorf conducts Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

Although he will conduct the opening portion of a Symphony Hall benefit concert for Biafran Relief on Monday, April 28, these are the last full concerts Erich Leinsdorf will conduct in Symphony Hall as music director of the orchestra. He began his tenure at the beginning of the 1962-63 season, and retires in August of this year at the end of the Tanglewood season.

Soloists in the Beethoven Ninth are Jane Marsh, soprano; Josephine Veasey, mezzo - soprano; Placido Domingo, tenor; and Sherrill Milnes, baritone. The Chorus Pro Musica and the New England Conservatory of Music Chorus will also sing.

TWENTY-FOURTH PROGRAM
Friday afternoon April 18 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening April 19 1969 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

SCHOENBERG — A survivor from Warsaw op. 46
- SHERRILL MILNES narrator
- NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY CHORUS
  - Lorna Cooke deVaron conductor

first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

intermission

BEETHOVEN — Symphony no. 9 in D minor op. 125
1. Allegro ma non troppo, un poco maestoso
2. Molto vivace – presto
3. Adagio molto e cantabile
4. Presto – allegro
   - Allegro assai
   - Presto
   - Baritone recitative
   - Quartet and chorus: allegro assai
   - Tenor solo and chorus: allegro assai vivace, alla marcia
   - Chorus: andante maestoso
   - Adagio ma non troppo, ma divoto
   - Allegro energico, sempre ben marcato
   - Quartet and chorus: allegro ma non tanto
   - Chorus: prestissimo

- JANE MARSH soprano
- JOSEPHINE VEASEY contralto
- PLACIDO DOMINGO tenor
- SHERRILL MILNES bass
- CHORUS PRO MUSICA
  - Alfred Nash Patterson conductor
- NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY CHORUS
  - Lorna Cooke deVaron conductor

Schoenberg's 'Survivor' A Well Chosen Finale

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Staff Writer

Georg Henschel in 1882 was the first of a number of Boston Symphony conductors who have put Beethoven's 9th on their last programs.

Last Summer, when Erich Leinsdorf, whose concerts Apr. 18 and 19 will be in his final pair here as music director, first mentioned that he intended to precede the 9th with Arnold Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw," he explained that he thought it valid thus to juxtapose monuments to man's lowest moment and to his highest aspiration.

Rene Leibowitz was, so far as I know, the first conductor to make a program of the two works; another, by coincidence, was James Yannatos of the Harvard-Radcliffe Orchestra, who also made the plan last Summer and carried it out in a Cambridge concert in December.

"A Survivor from Warsaw," finished Aug. 23, 1947, on commission from the Koussevitzky Music Foundation when the composer was about to be 73, was Schoenberg's last complete work for orchestra. It takes about six minutes to perform, and it is, in the words of Robert Craft, "a fully-formed music drama" in which "the economy of statement and compression of the form are extreme, even for Schoenberg." It is scored for harrator, male chorus, and orchestra. The text, in English, with German and Hebrew, is Schoenberg's own, and it treats an episode from the destruction of the Warsaw ghetto. Schoenberg, it seems, learned of the incident directly from one of the survivors.

Germany invaded Poland Sept. 1, 1939. On Nov. 23, Polish Jews were required to wear identifying armbands (blue Star of David on a white ground). Five days later, the notorious Judenraete (Jewish Councils) were established. By the end of January 1940, freedom of movement was, to all intents and purposes, cut off for Jews in Poland. In October of that year, the Warsaw ghetto was defined and closed, an area of 1.3 square miles, enclosing 470,000 persons (Jews, and partners and children of mixed marriages), jammed together at a rate of 7.7 persons per room.

During 1941, the concentration of Polish Jews was completed with the establishment of similar ghettos in Lodz, Krakow, Lublin, Radom, and Lvov.

In the Winter of 1941-42, disease and hunger began to take their toll. Sewage pipes froze, toilets could not be used, and human excrement was dumped in the streets together with garbage. By early 1943, expenditure on food was down to 12 cents a day. The ratio of deaths to births had dropped to 45 to 1, and in January 1943, by which time massive deportations had begun, there were only 70,000 left in Warsaw's getto.

A resistance movement got into action in August 1942, one effective enough to disturb the Germans. April 19, 1943, it came to a battle. There were 2,000-3,000 well equipped Germans and about 1,500 Jews with relatively few weapons, many of them improvised. Early in the morning, the Waffen-SS surrounded, then entered, the ghetto. The Germans made slow progress at first, but by Apr. 22, the Jews began to lose ground rapidly. It was not until the evening of May 16, however, that SS Brigadefuehrer Stroop fired the Tlomacki Synagogue to signal the end of the battle.

Raul Hilberg, in "The Destruction of the European Jews," sums up: "Several thousands of Jews had been buried in the debris, and 56,065 had surrendered. Seven thousand of the captured Jews were shot; another 7,000 were transported to the death camp at Treblinka; another 15,000 were shipped to the concentration and killing center at Lublin; the remainder were sent to labor camps." About five thousand Jews escaped, harrassed by Polish blackmailers; about 200 were left in Warsaw when the Russian Army arrived in January 1945.

Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw" is adequate to its subject, and that is with its three languages each with its own kind of the most important thing to be said about it. It is a tightly packed masterpiece, declamation (for English, speech-song in which rhythms are fixed, but with pitch contours outlined rather than defined; regular speech for the barking of the German sergeant; song for the Hebrew peroration.)

With terrific concentration, the music travels a course from the explosively brittle to the spacious. The culmination is the singing of the Sh'ma Yisroel (Hear, O Israel,) the central prayer of the Jewish liturgy, whose appearance is an act of faith in the midst of despair. The ending, like that of the 9th, is triumph.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
APR 16 1969
New England Newsclip

50.

THURSDAY A SERIES

SIXTH PROGRAM
Thursday evening April 17 1969 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

BEETHOVEN

Overture to 'Egmont' op. 84

Symphony no. 1 in C major op. 21
- Adagio molto – allegro con brio
- Andante cantabile con moto
- Menuetto: allegro molto e vivace
- Finale: adagio – allegro molto vivace

intermission

Symphony no. 3 in E flat op. 55 'Eroica'*
- Allegro con brio
- Marcia funebre: adagio assai
- Scherzo: allegro vivace
- Finale: allegro molto

End of symphony season

The final concerts of the Boston Symphony's 1968-69 season will be given April 18 and 19 in Symphony Hall. These performances will also mark the last full concerts Erich Leinsdorf will conduct in Symphony Hall, although the music director does not retire officially until the end of the Tanglewood season in August. Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw" and Beethoven's Symphony No. 9 will be performed by the symphony accompanied by the Chorus Pro Musica, New England Conservatory Chorus, and Jane Marsh, Josephine Veasey, Placido Domingo, and Sherrill Milnes.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150

APR 17 1969

New England Newsclip

Traveler

Symphony Ends Season On Saturday

The final Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts of the season will take place Friday afternoon and Saturday evening when Erich Leinsdorf conducts Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

Although he will conduct the opening portion of a Symphony Hall benefit concert for Biafran Relief on Monday, April 28, these are the last full concerts Erich Leinsdorf will conduct in Symphony Hall as music director of the orchestra. He began his tenure at the beginning of the 1962-63 season, and retires in August of this year at the end of the Tanglewood season.

Soloists in the Beethoven Ninth are Jane Marsh, soprano; Josephine Veasey, mezzo - soprano; Placido Domingo, tenor; and Sherrill Milnes, baritone. The Chorus Pro Musica and the New England Conservatory of Music Chorus will also sing.

TWENTY-FOURTH PROGRAM
Friday afternoon April 18 1969 at 2 o'clock
Saturday evening April 19 1969 at 8.30

ERICH LEINSDORF conductor

SCHOENBERG — A survivor from Warsaw op. 46
- SHERRILL MILNES narrator
- NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY CHORUS
  - Lorna Cooke deVaron conductor

first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

intermission

BEETHOVEN — Symphony no. 9 in D minor op. 125
1. Allegro ma non troppo, un poco maestoso
2. Molto vivace – presto
3. Adagio molto e cantabile
4. Presto – allegro
   - Allegro assai
   - Presto
   - Baritone recitative
   - Quartet and chorus: allegro assai
   - Tenor solo and chorus: allegro assai vivace, alla marcia
   - Chorus: andante maestoso
   - Adagio ma non troppo, ma divoto
   - Allegro energico, sempre ben marcato
   - Quartet and chorus: allegro ma non tanto
   - Chorus: prestissimo

- JANE MARSH soprano
- JOSEPHINE VEASEY contralto
- PLACIDO DOMINGO tenor
- SHERRILL MILNES bass
- CHORUS PRO MUSICA
  - Alfred Nash Patterson conductor
- NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY CHORUS
  - Lorna Cooke deVaron conductor

Schoenberg's 'Survivor' A Well Chosen Finale

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Staff Writer

Georg Henschel in 1882 was the first of a number of Boston Symphony conductors who have put Beethoven's 9th on their last programs.

Last Summer, when Erich Leinsdorf, whose concerts Apr. 18 and 19 will be in his final pair here as music director, first mentioned that he intended to precede the 9th with Arnold Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw," he explained that he thought it valid thus to juxtapose monuments to man's lowest moment and to his highest aspiration.

Rene Leibowitz was, so far as I know, the first conductor to make a program of the two works; another, by coincidence, was James Yannatos of the Harvard-Radcliffe Orchestra, who also made the plan last Summer and carried it out in a Cambridge concert in December.

"A Survivor from Warsaw," finished Aug. 23, 1947, on commission from the Koussevitzky Music Foundation when the composer was about to be 73, was Schoenberg's last complete work for orchestra. It takes about six minutes to perform, and it is, in the words of Robert Craft, "a fully-formed music drama" in which "the economy of statement and compression of the form are extreme, even for Schoenberg." It is scored for narrator, male chorus, and orchestra. The text, in English, with German and Hebrew, is Schoenberg's own, and it treats an episode from the destruction of the Warsaw ghetto. Schoenberg, it seems, learned of the incident directly from one of the survivors.

Germany invaded Poland Sept. 1, 1939. On Nov. 23, Polish Jews were required to wear identifying armbands (blue Star of David on a white ground). Five days later, the notorious Judenraete (Jewish Councils) were established. By the end of January 1940, freedom of movement was, to all intents and purposes, cut off for Jews in Poland. In October of that year, the Warsaw ghetto was defined and closed, an area of 1.3 square miles, enclosing 470,000 persons (Jews, and partners and children of mixed marriages), jammed together at a rate of 7.7 persons per room.

During 1941, the concentration of Polish Jews was completed with the establishment of similar ghettos in Lodz, Krakow, Lublin, Radom, and Lvov.

In the Winter of 1941-42, disease and hunger began to take their toll. Sewage pipes froze, toilets could not be used, and human excrement was dumped in the streets together with garbage. By early 1943, expenditure on food was down to 12 cents a day. The ratio of deaths to births had dropped to 45 to 1, and in January 1943, by which time massive deportations had begun, there were only 70,000 left in Warsaw's getto.

A resistance movement got into action in August 1942, one effective enough to disturb the Germans. April 19, 1943, it came to a battle. There were 2,000-3,000 well equipped Germans and about 1,500 Jews with relatively few weapons, many of them improvised. Early in the morning, the Waffen-SS surrounded, then entered, the ghetto. The Germans made slow progress at first, but by Apr. 22, the Jews began to lose ground rapidly. It was not until the evening of May 16, however, that SS Brigadefuehrer Stroop fired the Tlomacki Synagogue to signal the end of the battle.

Raul Hilberg, in "The Destruction of the European Jews," sums up: "Several thousands of Jews had been buried in the debris, and 56,065 had surrendered. Seven thousand of the captured Jews were shot; another 7,000 were transported to the death camp at Treblinka; another 15,000 were shipped to the concentration and killing center at Lublin; the remainder were sent to labor camps." About five thousand Jews escaped, harrassed by Polish blackmailers; about 200 were left in Warsaw when the Russian Army arrived in January 1945.

Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw" is adequate to its subject, and that is with its three languages each with its own kind of the most important thing to be said about it. It is a tightly packed masterpiece, declamation (for English, speech-song in which rhythms are fixed, but with pitch contours outlined rather than defined; regular speech for the barking of the German sergeant; song for the Hebrew peroration.)

With terrific concentration, the music travels a course from the explosively brittle to the spacious. The culmination is the singing of the Sh'ma Yisroel (Hear, O Israel,) the central prayer of the Jewish liturgy, whose appearance is an act of faith in the midst of despair. The ending, like that of the 9th, is triumph.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

APR 16 1969

New England Newsclip

Erich Leinsdorf Saying Farewell With Two Powerful Works

By McLAREN HARRIS

We should find a way to abolish all first and last concerts, all debuts and farewells, for any musician, a conductor especially, who must give a farewell performance is not a man to be envied. Too much is expected of him or too much effort is exerted in his behalf, and the impressions carried away may not be those of which he is worthy.

Now it is Erich Leinsdorf's turn to bid his farewells to Symphony Hall, and he is doing it with two of the most powerful works in vocal-orchestral literature, Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. In spite of the above, neither musicians nor yesterday's Symphony audience nor Leinsdorf himself had cause for regret.

On the surface the performances were not perfect, but there was no mistaking the force of conviction which propelled them. The Schoenberg, a work of less than 10 minutes for narrator, men's chorus and orchestra, recounts the memory of a Nazi prison camp survivor who, semi-conscious after having been beaten, hears his doomed fellow prisoners break spontaneously into the "Shema Yisroel" during a frenzied count-off.

THE INFLECTION of the narration, the far-ranging dynamics of the orchestral portion are as near to graphic in description of moods of desperation and terror as music can be; their iron-fisted grip, savage in the shouts of the Nazi Feldwebel, cannot be missed or pass unfelt even by listeners who think they can't abide Schoenberg's 12-tone idiom.

The performance was well-nigh shattering. Sherrill Milnes' narration, surely much closer to actual speech than the Sprechstimme the composer envisioned, was yet effective in its crystal-clear English and German diction, as was the Hebrew from men's voices of the New England Conservatory Chorus.

Somewhat unexpectedly but nevertheless admirably, "The Survivor from Warsaw" was immediately repeated; though the narration varied in a couple of details, loss of impact was negligible.

IT WAS IN THE Ninth that the impulse outstripped, to some extent, the manifestations of its realization. Strings and in places winds, for example, were on edge and off center of accurate response for a good part of the first movement, and the interpretive direction was not firmly established until sometime in the Scherzo.

The first movement's impression, instead of a majestic spaciousness, was one of hurry and straight-line, albeit ragged, dynamics in its main sections. It gave way to a Scherzo which, however rapid its tempo, managed a powerful, controlled impact (also, there is something about the timpani's corner placement which gives them excessive resonance).

THE FINALE, undeniably, was the signal for gathering strengths. In Leinsdorf's grasp the different tempos, halting, measured and fleeting, underlined their functions of anticipation, transition, verse-setting and building joyful near-hysteria with a common purpose.

The vocal quartet of Jane Marsh, Josephine Veasey, Placido Domingo and Sherrill Milnes was especially strong at top and bottom, though internal balance and blend left much to be desired. More than 100 combined voices of the Conservatory Chorus and the Chorus pro Musica fulfilled every opportunity for formidable power.

A concluding ovation for Beethoven, but especially for Leinsdorf was expected, and it came. Leinsdorf's seven-season tenure as music director does not equal Munch's 13 or begin to touch Koussevitzky's 25, and the impressions his departure calls forth are certain to differ.

Yet there is something about the realization that we will not set him again in the same capacity which brought out the sense of duty, the willingness, the compulsion to honor a man of talent and sincerity. Symphony Hall has rarely rung as it did yesterday.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
APR 19 1969
New England Newsclip

Schoenberg drama awesomely performed

By MICHAEL STEINBERG
Staff Writer

The ARTS

Friday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert was the first half of Erich Leinsdorf's final Friday-Saturday pair as the orchestra's Music Director. Having come here in 1962, Leinsdorf will end his duties at the conclusion of the coming season at Tanglewood though he will return as guest conductor during the next five seasons.

Like many of his predecessors, including Sir George Henschel, the Boston Symphony's first conductor, Leinsdorf put Beethoven's 9th Symphony on his farewell program. There was more applause than is usual at a Friday concert and there was a solid round of cheers when the conductor took a solo bow after the Beethoven; it was not an emotional occasion, though. During his seven years here, Leinsdorf had often engaged the audience's respect, but hardly their affection, and his farewell matched his tenure in tone.

Leinsdorf preceded Beethoven's 9th with Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw," a short, intensely concentrated music drama whose subject is an episode in the battle that began just 26 years ago, 19 April 1943, in the Warsaw ghetto. A survivor tells the story of a group of Jews, who, at the moment of their deportation to the death camp, suddenly, in a last flaring of spirit and faith, burst into singing the prayer Shemah Yisroel.

Schoenberg, who seems to have had the story from an actual Warsaw survivor, wrote the piece in 1947, and it was the last orchestral work he completed. He shaped the narrative so that the singing of the prayer is its culmination. This brief intervention for men's chorus in unison is the only singing we hear in "Survivor," and it appears as the climax of a story told in speech-song (rhythms exactly prescribed, but pitch contours only loosely indicated) for the narrator's account in English, and in which the German sergeant's words are given special profile and character by their delivery in straight, percussive speech.

The compression of the music, its rhythmic life, the ferocious energy of impluse, the richness of cross-reference of languages and corresponding and characteristic vocal techniques, the vividness of musical imagery, the unsurpassed orchestral virtuosity through which that imagery is articulated, all this produces a work that is terrifyingly adequate to its subject.

For one, too, Schoenberg received an adequate performance. To begin with, the playing was so clear and so clean that one could actually follow the acoustic events of the work, and that, as Schoenberg performances go, is in itself rare and noteworthy. That had been generally true as well of Leinsdorf's finely made performance of the Variations, Op. 31, some weeks ago. A certain caution had gone into the achieving of the effect then, but what made Friday's performance of "A Survivor from Warsaw" so marvelous was that all these sharply defined gestures were delivered with electrifying force, and that they were integrated into a tightly coherent progression of tremendous sweep.

Sherrill Milnes did the narration. It was done without a trace of cheap pathos, with an astonishing ability to project situation and character, with complete comprehension of the purpose and effect of Schoenbergian speech-song, with rhythmic vitality, with an extraordinary range of tone color, volume, intensity of attack (used with the utmost virtuosity, though quite unobtrusively), and, most significantly, with evident understanding and depth of feeling. It was one of the greatest vocal performances I have ever heard. The orchestral playing itself was superb, and the singing by the men of the New England Conservatory Chorus was good, if a little weak in sheer physical impact.

Leinsdorf immediately repeated the piece, a move that, to judge from the reception, worked well for most of the audience. The performance of "Survivor" will be remembered as one of the most valued, distinguished, and exciting achievements in Leinsdorf's seven years' directorship here.

The performance of the Beethoven 9th was much like the one Leinsdorf gave at the opening of the 1965-66 season, generally effective in the first movement, in the scherzo, and in the bouncy parts of the finale, but too determinedly straight and unrhetorical for the scherzo's trio, for the great slow movement, and for the

Continued on the Next Page

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150
APR 21 1969
New England Newsclip

Schoenberg drama

Cont'd. from Preceding Page

mysterious passages in the finale. Nor was there much trace, this time, of the extremely beautiful playing of the 1965 performances.

The two choruses — Chorus Pro Musica and the New England Conservatory Chorus, prepared respectively by Alfred Nash Patterson and Lorna Cooke deVaron — sang very well. Sherrill Milnes, whose baritone voice has a sound of extraordinary brilliance concentration and power, again distinguished himself remarkably. Placido Domingo lacks the heroic force for the proto-Mahlerian march with the suns flying through heaven's splendid space, but in all other respects his work was stylish, musical, and very agreeable in sound. A mezzo friend once said that one should always wear the brightest possible dress when singing the alto solo in the 9th, otherwise one won't be noticed at all; in sum, the alto has nothing conspicuous to do, and Josephine Veasey, a fine singer, made a solid contribution to the ensemble. Jane Marsh sang the soprano solo with a nice, easy-going athleticism in 1965, but this time she sounded strained and unhappy.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA: Erich Leinsdorf conducting Schoenberg: "A Survivor from Warsaw," with Sherrill Milnes, narrator, and the New England conservatory Men's Chorus; Beethoven: Symphony No. 9, with Jane Marsh, soprano, Josephine Veasey, contralto, Placido Domingo, tenor, Sherrill Milnes, bass, the Chorus Pro Musica (Alfred Nash Patterson, conductor), and the New England Conservatory Chorus (Lorna Cooke DeVaron, conductor). Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
APR 19 1969
New England Newsclip

Leinsdorf's last

BSO's 'Survivor'

By David Sterritt

Last Friday afternoon Erich Leinsdorf began his final weekly series as music director of the Boston Symphony. After the summer season at Tanglewood he will be seen with the BSO only occasionally, as a guest conductor.

Fittingly, his last program was impressive both in content and in execution. It was received with an ovation that reflected not only the quality of the performance, but also the audience's appreciation for the departing artist.

There were only two pieces. The first was Schoenberg's compressed but emotionally devastating "A Survivor From Warsaw," Op. 46, in its first BSO performance. Lasting not much over five minutes, it is scored for narrator, men's chorus, and orchestra. The narrator's part is written as sprechgesang — the rhythms and approximate pitches are defined, but exact pitch prescription is relinquished in favor of a "speech-song" effect. The exceptions to this come when the narrator repeats the words of a brutal Nazi Sergeant; ordinary speech is used at these points.

The narration (based on a tale told the composer by an actual survivor from the Warsaw ghetto) was performed flawlessly by Sherrill Milnes. The orchestra played clearly and precisely, expressing the work's full emotional content with no loss of detail. Especially exciting was the section just before the chorus begins its climactic prayer (sung Friday by the New England Conservatory Chorus), when the narrator tells of ghetto dwellers counting off before being removed to the gas chambers, the count building to a wild stampede of screaming confusion. Mr. Leinsdorf took the small orchestral units and developed them into a swelling vortex of ever-increasing intensity that appeared far greater than the sum of its parts.

After two readings of the Schoenberg the orchestra proceeded to Beethoven's Symphony No. 9 in D minor, Op. 125. It moved along at a lively pace, with overall clarity and notably strong, flowing string work (that balanced some less than perfect intonation in the woodwinds, most markedly in the Adagio molto e cantabile). Aided by solid choral work in the final movement by the NEC Chorus and the Chorus Pro Musica, it was a rich, sometimes very moving performance of a cherished masterpiece, and as such a suitable finale to the first of Mr. Leinsdorf's farewell appearances.

52

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

APR 24 1969 New England

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

LEINSDORF'S LAST AS DIRECTOR

The first Boston Symphony Orchestra performance of Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw," Opus 46, and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony constituted Erich Leinsdorf's valedictory here, and they made for an imposing adieu.

The Ninth Symphony, too long to perform with a full first half and too short to occupy an entire program is usually played with the likes of the Coriolanus Overture. Of late the tendency to pair it with the Schoenberg "Survivor" has arisen. This makes sense in timing and particularly in mode, for between them they set forth two very different affirmations of the triumph of the human spirit.

"A Survivor from Warsaw" is Schoenberg's last orchestral work, written after he had returned to the fold of Judaism. It is composed for narrator, men's chorus and orchestra. The narrator's part is in Schoenberg's own English text. Someone who had managed to get out alive from the Warsaw sewers recounts how, as the Germans finally overwhelmed the defenders of the Ghetto and were lining up the remnants for the gas chamber transport, the Jews burst spontaneously into the Shema Yisroel. This grim narrative is attended by a dramatically descriptive and instantly accessible orchestral score, and when the chorus bursts into the prayer the impact is quite shattering.

The role of the narrator was performed by Sherrill Milnes, bass, and the male chorus were members of the New England Conservatory Chorus. Mr. Milnes is a basso with impressive dramatic projection, vocal equipment and stage presence. For all his obvious reserves of power, and despite the printing of Schoenberg's unusual and moving text in the program, the narrator's part was electrically amplified. Any amplification injects an element of artificiality that, by definition, sets the audience at one remove from the performers. This particular amplification was so loud as to cause the narration to overshadow and on occasion altogether to drown out the orchestral score. Happily, Mr. Leinsdorf had the imagination, courage and common sense immediately to repeat the six-minute work, and on the second round it was possible to recoup something of the instrumental dimension. Even so, for this listener, at least, the gratuitous intrusion of Technology was a major though not fatal impairment to the performance.

The Ninth Symphony, it is true, can often sound like a prolonged cliche, but sometimes, not too often, with an inspired reading, one may relive with the old awe the mysteriousness of its opening tremolo, the force of that change from the D minor to the D major in the probing and profound first movement, the propulsiveness of the Scherzo, the ache and breadth of the slow movement, the drama of the recapitulation just before the Cellos whisper the ode for the first time in the Finale and all the rest of it. On such occasions well may one ponder how this great prototype has remained the glory and the despair of every symphonist since Beethoven.

Plainly, I am suggesting, the performance here was in the finer tradition. There was the tension, the sweep of it without the sacrifice of marvelously wrought detail at least for the first three movements and half way through to the last. The qualification stems both from the inherent weakness of the chorale writing, which does not adequately live up to the arguments posed in the preceding portions of the symphony, and, in this performance, from the uneven quality of the solo quartet, which consisted of Mr. Milnes, Jane Marsh, soprano, Josephine Veasey, contralto, and Placido Domingo, tenor. Mr. Milnes carried out his assignment with the nobility and eclat he had shown earlier in the Schoenberg work, but the tenor's recitative was undistinguished, the soprano had more strength than timbre, and the contralto part is a cipher anyway. The choruses which included the Chorus Pro Musica and the New England Conservatory Chorus, demonstrated their usual fine training and musicianship. They came through with enormous vitality and kept the yelping which seems embedded in the uncongenial scoring to a minimum.

At the end Mr. Leinsdorf was accorded an extended standing tribute, something he has gotten far less than he has deserved during his tenure here. Moreover, I suggest, the plaudits were on the merits rather than for the sentiment.

So ends this 1968-1969 season, a season which went off on a moderately high plateau with few enough peaks to h[illegible]ure but no sharp declivities.

Of the instrumental soloists, there were only two violinists as distinguished from a clutch of seven pianists. Arthur Grumiaux in the Berg Concerto and Joseph Silverstein turned in elegant performances, but the pianists were distinctly a mixed bag, running from the deadly dullness of Istomin's Beethoven, Curzon's Brahms and Pennaro's Rachmaninoff, to sizzling traversals by Claude Frank in Mozart's B flat Concerto, Andre Watts in both of Liszt's, John Browning in Prokofieff's Fifth and, of all things, Earl Wild in Scharwenka's old tapestry piece.

Mr. Leinsdorf came through with exceptionally strong readings on several occasions, most notably with the "Eroica," "Pastoral" and Ninth, of Beethoven, the Brahms' Requiem, the concert version of Strauss' "Ariadne," Stravinsky's "Sacre," and Bruckner's Sixth Symphony—enough to ensure the height of any plateau.

There were a number of first performances in Boston or at the BSO, some of them involving quite venerable works but few of works of recent vintage. There were no premieres of any compositions. This speaks for a great deal. There was only one Mahler and one Bruckner work, and one would have hoped for more of these two composers in Mr. Leinsdorf's final season.

All of this suggests further retrospective commentary on the last seven years, and this will be forthcoming in this space next week.

CONCERT ANNOUNCEMENTS AND REVIEWS

Boston Symphony on Tour

Concert Dates	Cities or Series	Prov.	N.Y.-Phil.	N.Y.-Carnegie	Brkln Acad.
Sept.26		53
Oct.16,18			54
17
19					55
24				55,56
	Northhampton
	Davis cond.- with his clippings in reg. season page 7,8
31		--
Nov.18	Springfield,57
19	New Haven,59
20,22			60,61
21	New Brunswick,60
23				61
Dec.17	Hartford,62
18,20			63
19					64
21				64
Jan.15,17			65
16	Philadelphia (cancelled)
18
23		69 (Pretre)		66,67,68
Feb.27		70
Mar.10,11	Raleigh,71
12	Atlanta,72
13	St. Petersburg,73,74
14	Ft. Lauderdale,74
15	Miami Beach,74
17,(68)	Washington,75 to 78(78)
19,21			78,79
20
22					79
Apr.10		80		79

52

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

APR 24 1969 New England

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By GERALD A. BERLIN

LEINSDORF'S LAST AS DIRECTOR

The first Boston Symphony Orchestra performance of Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw," Opus 46, and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony constituted Erich Leinsdorf's valedictory here, and they made for an imposing adieu.

The Ninth Symphony, too long to perform with a full first half and too short to occupy an entire program is usually played with the likes of the Coriolanus Overture. Of late the tendency to pair it with the Schoenberg "Survivor" has arisen. This makes sense in timing and particularly in mode, for between them they set forth two very different affirmations of the triumph of the human spirit.

"A Survivor from Warsaw" is Schoenberg's last orchestral work, written after he had returned to the fold of Judaism. It is composed for narrator, men's chorus and orchestra. The narrator's part is in Schoenberg's own English text. Someone who had managed to get out alive from the Warsaw sewers recounts how, as the Germans finally overwhelmed the defenders of the Ghetto and were lining up the remnants for the gas chamber transport, the Jews burst spontaneously into the Shema Yisroel. This grim narrative is attended by a dramatically descriptive and instantly accessible orchestral score, and when the chorus bursts into the prayer the impact is quite shattering.

The role of the narrator was performed by Sherrill Milnes, bass, and the male chorus were members of the New England Conservatory Chorus. Mr. Milnes is a basso with impressive dramatic projection, vocal equipment and stage presence. For all his obvious reserves of power, and despite the printing of Schoenberg's unusual and moving text in the program, the narrator's part was electrically amplified. Any amplification injects an element of artificiality that, by definition, sets the audience at one remove from the performers. This particular amplification was so loud as to cause the narration to overshadow and on occasion altogether to drown out the orchestral score. Happily, Mr. Leinsdorf had the imagination, courage and common sense immediately to repeat the six-minute work, and on the second round it was possible to recoup something of the instrumental dimension. Even so, for this listener, at least, the gratuitous intrusion of Technology was a major though not fatal impairment to the performance.

The Ninth Symphony, it is true, can often sound like a prolonged cliche, but sometimes, not too often, with an inspired reading, one may relive with the old awe the mysteriousness of its opening tremolo, the force of that change from the D minor to the D major in the probing and profound first movement, the propulsiveness of the Scherzo, the ache and breadth of the slow movement, the drama of the recapitulation just before the Cellos whisper the ode for the first time in the Finale and all the rest of it. On such occasions well may one ponder how this great prototype has remained the glory and the despair of every symphonist since Beethoven.

Plainly, I am suggesting, the performance here was in the finer tradition. There was the tension, the sweep of it without the sacrifice of marvelously wrought detail at least for the first three movements and half way through to the last. The qualification stems both from the inherent weakness of the chorale writing, which does not adequately live up to the arguments posed in the preceding portions of the symphony, and, in this performance, from the uneven quality of the solo quartet, which consisted of Mr. Milnes, Jane Marsh, soprano, Josephine Veasey, contralto, and Placido Domingo, tenor. Mr. Milnes carried out his assignment with the nobility and eclat he had shown earlier in the Schoenberg work, but the tenor's recitative was undistinguished, the soprano had more strength than timbre, and the contralto part is a cipher anyway. The choruses which included the Chorus Pro Musica and the New England Conservatory Chorus, demonstrated their usual fine training and musicianship. They came through with enormous vitality and kept the yelping which seems embedded in the uncongenial scoring to a minimum.

At the end Mr. Leinsdorf was accorded an extended standing tribute, something he has gotten far less than he has deserved during his tenure here. Moreover, I suggest, the plaudits were on the merits rather than for the sentiment.

So ends this 1968-1969 season, a season which went off on a moderately high plateau with few enough peaks to be sure but no sharp declivities.

Of the instrumental soloists, there were only two violinists as distinguished from a clutch of seven pianists. Arthur Grumiaux in the Berg Concerto and Joseph Silverstein turned in elegant performances, but the pianists were distinctly a mixed bag, running from the deadly dullness of Istomin's Beethoven, Curzon's Brahms and Pennaro's Rachmaninoff, to sizzling traversals by Claude Frank in Mozart's B flat Concerto, Andre Watts in both of Liszt's, John Browning in Prokofieff's Fifth and, of all things, Earl Wild in Scharwenka's old tapestry piece.

Mr. Leinsdorf came through with exceptionally strong readings on several occasions, most notably with the "Eroica," "Pastoral" and Ninth, of Beethoven, the Brahms' Requiem, the concert version of Strauss' "Ariadne," Stravinsky's "Sacre," and Bruckner's Sixth Symphony—enough to ensure the height of any plateau.

There were a number of first performances in Boston or at the BSO, some of them involving quite venerable works but few of works of recent vintage. There were no premieres of any compositions. This speaks for a great deal. There was only one Mahler and one Bruckner work, and one would have hoped for more of these two composers in Mr. Leinsdorf's final season.

All of this suggests further retrospective commentary on the last seven years, and this will be forthcoming in this space next week.

CONCERT ANNOUNCEMENTS AND REVIEWS

Boston Symphony on Tour

Concert Dates	Cities or Series	Phon.	N.Y.-Phil.	N.Y.-Carnegie	Phila Acad.
Sept.26		53
Oct.16,18			54
17
19				55,56	55
24	Northhampton
	Davis cond.- with his clippings in reg. season page 7,8
31		--
Nov.18	Springfield,57
19	New Haven,59
20,22			60,61
21	New Brunswick,60
23				61
Dec.17	Hartford,62
18,20			63
19
21				64	64
Jan.15,17			65
16	Philadelphia (cancelled)
18				66,67,68
23		69 (Protre)
Feb.27		70
Mar.10,11	Raleigh,71
12	Atlanta,72
13	St. Petersburg,73,74
14	Ft. Lauderdale,74
15	Miami Beach,74
17,(18)	Washington,75 to 78(78)
19,21			78,79
20
22					79
Apr.10		80		79

B.S.O.
Away —

53

Boston Symphony to Open in Providence

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra in a change from tradition, opens its 88th season tonight with a concert in Providence, R.I.

Customarily, the first concert of the season has been in the orchestra's home grounds, Symphony Hall, and always on a Friday afternoon.

The orchestra has gone to Providence each year for five concerts, on Thursday evenings, beginning in October.

This is Erich Leinsdorf's seventh and final season as music director.

SUN (e)
WESTERLY, R. I.
CIRC. 9,300
SEP 26 1968 New England

ITEM (e)
WAKEFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 6,600
SEP 26 1968 New England

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
SEP 26 1968

NEWS (e)
GARDNER, MASS.
CIRC. 7,893
SEP 26 1968

CALL (e)
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CIRC. 29,850
SEP 26 1968 New England Newsclip

BSO season opener tonight at Providence

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 88th season tonight at Providence — a departure from its usual procedure of opening on a Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall in Boston.

The BSO normally plays five Thursday evening concerts in Providence each season, starting in early October, but this year the schedule was moved ahead.

The "home" season will be launched Friday at 2.

Erich Leinsdorf, entering his final season as music director, will be on the podium.

The Friday program will open with Mozart's Symphony No. 39 in E flat, K. 543. Beethoven's concert aria "Ah! perfido" will be sung by soprano Marilyn Horne. She will also be heard in the Immolation Scene from Wagner's "Die Gotterdammerung," an excerpt she did with Leinsdorf and the BSO at Tanglewood in 1967. Friday's program will be repeated Saturday at 8:30.

Leinsdorf came to the Boston Symphony in September, 1962. He will leave after Tanglewood 1969, but is to return as guest conductor for five seasons. Miss Horne, whose husband Henry Lewis is conductor of the New Jersey Symphony, is familiar to Opera Company of Boston audiences for her roles in "Carmen" last season and in "Semiramide" in 1965. This weekend's program is her first with the BSO in Boston.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
SEP 26 1968 New England

TIMES (e)
PAWTUCKET-
CENTRAL FALLS, R. I.
CIRC. 38,800
NOV 1 1968 New England

Music In Review

Boston Symphony At Best Gets Standing Ovation

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Erich Leinsdorf was at its best in one of its finest programs of happy music Thursday evening in Veterans Memorial Auditorium, Providence.

The opening work, Brahms' "Symphony No. 90 in C," set the mood for the evening with its sober adagio introduction that quickly changed to a nimble and playful allegro assai, then into an andante movement that had a thrilling flute solo by Doriot Anthony Dwyer with responses in the first violin played by Joseph Silverstein.

The following minuet, third movement, had a folksy theme that at times seemed a bit rowdy, or at least unrefined, for so stately a dance, but was beautified by a superb oboe solo. The finale, returning to the brightness of the allegro assai of the first movement, caused lips to smile, eyes to sparkle and feet to dance.

It was the next number, Janacek's "Sinfonietta For Orchestra, opus 60" that brought cheers and an ovation of praise with the brilliance of a brass choir of 12 trumpets, four horns, two bass trumpets, two tenor tubas and one bass tuba, followed by a brass chorus of 10 trumpets backed by the strings, woodwinds and percussion. Leinsdorf was recalled several times for curtain calls.

And the concluding work, "Symphony No. 8 in G-Major," by Anton Dvorak was a masterpiece of ethnic writing. Like Grieg and Sibelius, who described in music the customs and moods of the Scandinavian groups, Dvorak filled this symphony with the Czech music of old Bohemia.

After a brilliant opening movement, allegro con brio, that had a fiery national pride, it swept into an adagio that bespoke a tranquil pastoral happiness in a woodwind chorus led by the flute and English horn.

The allegretto grazioso movement was at times the swaying, soaring waltz rhythm, then a colorful country dance, then changed to a carefree song of rippling waters, broad fields and cool glades, embracing all the earthy, folksy moods of a happy people.

It was climaxed by a finale of the martial rhythm and beat of the parade grounds, then phrases that were reverently religious were followed by interpolations of heroic themes that may have been patriotic hymns.

So, from Brahms merriest of symphonies to Dvorak's nationalistic folk poems, it was joy all the way, and a grateful audience gave Leinsdorf and the orchestra a standing ovation with cheers and hand-clapping applause.

C.H.L.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM (e)
HOLYOKE, MASS.
CIRC. 26,950
SEP 27 1968

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424
SEP 26 1968 New England

UNION LEADER (M) & (E)
MANCHESTER, N. H.
SEP 26 1968 New England Newsclip

SUN (e)
LOWELL, MASS.
CIRC. 47,948
SEP 26 1968

ITEM (e)
LYNN, MASS.
CIRC. 34,100
SEP 26 1968

Music Last Night

Boston Symphony Opens Here; Piano Recital at URI

By RUTH TRIPP

Providence was chosen for the opening program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fall season last evening. It is the first time in memory that the orchestra has played first in any location other than Symphony Hall in Boston.

Erich Leinsdorf conducted. This will be his last season with the orchestra and if the concert we heard last evening at Veterans Memorial Auditorium is an indication of what to expect, the year will be a memorable one. His conducting transcended any we have heard during his tenure with the Boston orchestra. Handel, Mozart and Wagner were his choices for our listening pleasure and the audience was entranced.

The greatest achievement, from the viewpoint of orchestral brilliance, was the performance of the portions of Wagner's "Die Gotterdammerung." The magnificence of the brass, the skill and artistry of the reeds and the warmth and beauty of the strings combined to produce a memorable program.

The dramatic impact of the music was fully realized, without singers and operatic setting. We could almost relive the fateful Wagnerian legends and we should be eternally grateful for the sensitive portrayal we heard from a virtuoso at the interpretation of this masterpiece. And to think that Leinsdorf conducts without score. Is this not another type of genius?

The fresh and cheerful opening group was Handel's "Water Music," three sections of it. A more fitting musical invitation to a gala could not have been chosen. Every note was in its proper place and as the several instruments threaded their way through the neatly patterned score, it was a foregone conclusion that we were to hear something special.

And for the music lovers who may not have been Wagnerian devotees, there was the Mozart Symphony No. 39 in E flat, K.543. Absolute perfection prevailed in every choir. The conductor made every familiar phrase a thing of beauty with a freshness which showed beyond a doubt why Mozart's music is so captivating. Here again we heard another facet of the Leinsdorf skill and a program, which at first glance may have seemed familiar and trite came to life with extraordinary virtuosity to start our musical season off with unbounded enthusiasm.

intermezzos from Brahms' Op. 116, the E minor, Op. 90 sonata by Beethoven, and the first series of "Images" for piano by Debussy. The closest thing to the truly familiar was the "Reflets dans l'eau" and maybe the "Hommage a Rameau" from that last group.

Another thing to mark is Mr. Rankin's approach. He has a rather clear idea of how he wants to sound and sticks to it. This does not always work to advantage, as last evening it did not with the Brahms. You can enjoy the master of romantic classicism, or classic romanticism, whichever, performed in a reasonably refined manner. But for these ears, at least, there was just too much cool, too much objective lack of involvement as evidenced in a minimum of rubato. You do not want it muddied, but there is lots of room for the lingering phrase, or a rise and fall not merely of dynamics.

For almost the same reasons Beethoven and Debussy came off very well. The two-movement sonata was fresh as could be, nearly Schubertian in its second movement, and the "Images," momentarily getting off to a too dry state, had an excellent feeling for their linear proportions, were not afraid to be climactic, and still held to impressionism's context. It was a good program all told, building upon itself as it went along, and it was good to observe a pianist's forward progress.

JOURNAL (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
CIRC. 67,050
SEP 27 1968 New England

ENTERPRISE & TIMES (e)
BROCKTON, MASS.
CIRC. 52,417
SEP 26 1968 New England Newsclip

HERALD (m)
RUTLAND, VT.
CIRC. 20,750
SEP 26 1968 New England Newsclip

ITEM (e)
CLINTON, MASS.
CIRC. 3,566
SEP 26 1968 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE EAGLE (e)
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 30,239
SEP 26 1968 New England Newsclip

KENNEBEC JOURNAL (m)
AUGUSTA, ME.
CIRC. 15,150
SEP 26 1968 New England Newsclip

GAZETTE (e)
TAUNTON, MASS.
CIRC. 13,050
SEP 26 1968 New England Newsclip

Music In Review

Wagner Redeems Symphony After 'Indifferent' Handel

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, opening its 88th season in Providence Thursday night, receive an ovation from the first night audience in Veterans Memorial Auditorium.

Erich Leinsdorf, who last year announced that he was resigning the directorship of the orchestra at the end of this season, should be convinced that Providence audiences will regret his leaving. His directing of Wagner's orchestral excerpts from "Die Goetterdaemmerung" brought magnificence to a program that began with a cold, lackadaisical indifference in the playing of Handel's dance suite from "Water Music."

It seemed that it was not the same Boston Symphony nor the same Leinsdorf. Of course, each man played his part with the customary tone and precision, but what was lacking was the grandiloquence of expression that these men have given Leinsdorf. The surges of chords were thin, not solid and there seemed to be a contention between the orchestra and leader.

This carried over into the second work, Mozart's "Symphony No. 39 in E-Flat," and the usual Mozart merriment was missing. This may have been because there were fewer instruments than usual for both numbers, and there was a feeling among the listeners that something was amiss.

But after intermission, with a stage crowded with the full complement of musicians, and extras, the magnitude of Wagner's writing and Leinsdorf's reading, was overwhelmingly beautiful. The rich deep-toned chords of the Wagner tubas, four of them, shimmered against the cavernous tones of the double-B flat tubas, while the higher brasses, trombones, trumpets and French horns, eight of them, gave it all a sublime majesty, climaxing with Siegfried's Death in a glorious conclusion.

TIMES (e)
PAWTUCKET-
CENTRAL FALLS, R. I.
CIRC. 38,800
SEP 27 1968 New England

54.

Music to My Ears

Irving Kolodin

Arthur Grumiaux, the Berg Violin Concerto, Erich Leinsdorf, and the Boston Symphony are all known quantities, but they were nevertheless productive of unknown results when combined in Philharmonic Hall at the orchestra's first visit of the season. This is merely to say that any knowns can result in unknowns when newly combined.

It was particularly provocative to hear Grumiaux, who has made his reputation as an ideally equipped interpreter of the Mozart-Bach literature, in a new confrontation with a demanding work of the most recent Viennese vocabulary. What Berg has expounded is something more than a newly shaped network of tonal values. It embodies psychological overtones and neurotic undertones which must be touched with the gentlest kind of magic for final fulfillment. Much of what was required Grumiaux provided in abundant measure; but the totality—taking in the orchestral participation under Leinsdorf—was lacking in the kind of interpenetration that makes one of two. It remained, persistently, Grumiaux plus Leinsdorf rather than becoming Grumiaux-Leinsdorf. The well made program began with a welcome hearing of the Haydn Symphony No. 90 in C and concluded with Stravinsky's Le sacre du printemps.

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 443,000

NOV 2 1968

LEINSDORF LEADS OPENING CONCERT

Boston Symphony Is Heard in Haydn and Stravinsky

By RAYMOND ERICSON

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, opening its New York season last night at Philharmonic Hall, offered a not too traditional program in — for the orchestra — traditional performances, superbly suave and polished. Erich Leinsdorf's choice of music, nicely contrasted in style and mood, included Haydn's Symphony No. 90 in C, Berg's Violin Concerto and Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring." Arthur Grumiaux was the soloist in the concerto.

Mr. Leinsdorf created most interest with his version of the Stravinsky score, since it is not a work one associates with him, and this may have been the first time he conducted it here. His reading followed his customary pattern of interpretation in its care, thoughtfulness, even deliberation.

Details Newly Emphasized

In its literalness, the performance might have been ideal as accompaniment to a staged ballet. It should have pleased the composer, although it did not have quite the brilliant, dry textures that Stravinsky gets in his own performances. In the course of it, many normally overlooked details stood out. Since the music has its own built-in power, this was not lacking. Still, there was a certain excitement missing, the kind provided by urgency within the individual phrase or urgency permeating the entire rhythmic structure of the work.

The Haydn symphony, one that is not heard too often in concert, must be as entertaining as any the composer wrote. Under Mr. Leinsdorf's direction, it moved along brightly and smoothly. At times almost too smoothly—the opening section of the slow movement had more honey in the tone than was good for it. But the conductor kept the string tone down, so that all the diverting wind passages, which give the work its special character, exerted their full effect.

Least satisfactorily treated was the Berg concerto, that lyrical requiem for a teen-age girl, Manon Gropius. Mr. Grumiaux is a well-known interpreter of the solo part, and he played it with authority and a ravishing tone. But the performance on his part and Mr. Leinsdorf's was surprisingly impersonal, without much differentiation of approach as the concerto ran its course.

A work that is anything but seemed curiously bland.

Czech Program Tonight

The all-Czech program by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony will be given at the Brooklyn Academy tonight as originally announced.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 840,495 SUN. 1,494,704

OCT 17 1968

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 840,495 SUN. 1,494,704

OCT 18 1968

New York Post
D. 628,146 SAT. 354,497

OCT 17 1968

Words and Music

By Harriett Johnson

Leinsdorf Leads Boston Opening

When readers are annoyed or confused by disagreement among critics, they should remember that reactions of other musicians often vary far more than those of the press.

Very few would agree with an evaluation of Alban Berg by Stravinsky, quoted in last night's program notes for the Boston Symphony's concert at Philharmonic Hall. This was the opening of the Bostonian's local season and of music director Erich Leinsdorf's last season as chief. Stravinsky's comment, from his book, "Expositions and Developments": . . . Berg, who is synthetic (in the best sense).

The words have special pertinence as the Berg Violin Concerto, with Belgian violinist Arthur Grumiaux as soloist, preceded Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps."

Berg was a tortured genius who died too young at 50. To call "Violin" of the Concerto "artificial, not genuine," is an incentive to anger.

The quiet and noble expressiveness of Leinsdorf's and Grumiaux's interpretation fanned the fuel of refutation. Berg died about a month after the Concerto's completion in July, 1935. For him he had worked swiftly: six weeks of feverish, unrelenting concentration. It was conceived as a "requiem" for Manon Gropius, the child of Alma Mahler and Walter Gropius, to whom Berg had been devoted, and who had died in May of infantile paralysis. It became Berg's requiem too, a haunting, complex inspiration, dominated by its content, not its means. Today, to our dissonant-oriented ears, it sounds conservative, but no less emotionally powerful for this reason.

The program opened with an objective, detached and suave rendition of Haydn's Symphony No. 90 in C Major. With regret I left before "Le Sacre" began, arriving at Carnegie Hall in time to hear the second half of Dietrich Fischer—Dieskau's recital of Schubert's song cycle, "Die Schoene Muellerin." The Bostonians' program will be repeated tomorrow night.

CONCERT REVIEW

Leinsdorf Turns on Power

NEW YORK—Although the program began with Haydn's "Symphony No. 90," the main interest in the Oct. 18 program of Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony at Philharmonic Hall was in two celebrated 20th century pieces. and Berg's "Violin Concerto" featuring a superb performance by soloist Arthur Grumiaux and Stravinsky's "Le sacre du printemps (The Rite of Spring)" both received strong readings.

Leinsdorf and the Boston who have recorded Haydn for RCA, showed they were at home with this classical period piece, which is not as well known as many of Haydn's other later symphonies. Grumiaux, whose Philips recording credits include the Berg piece with Amsterdam's Concertgebouw Orchestra, was flawless in the concealed virtuosity demanded by the concerto. Orchestral balance was splendid throughout with the Chorale almost breathtaking.

"Le sacre du printemps" is a powerful work, whose impact is shattering when well performed. Under Leinsdorf's skilled direction, it was well performed. The Boston Symphony, one of America's great orchestras, used its full resources in putting the masterpiece across before a full house.

FRED KIRBY

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000

NOV 2 1968

LAST Wednesday evening, Erich Leinsdorf brought the Boston Symphony to Philharmonic Hall and presented what is usually referred to as a "well-balanced" program, consisting of Haydn's not terribly often heard Symphony No. 90 in C Major, Alban Berg's Violin Concerto, with Arthur Grumiaux as soloist, and Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps." The contrast between the last two works—one representing the sunset of the great Viennese symphonic tradition, the other a brave venture in a new era in which there was no tradition at all and in which music was deprived of its qualities as a special language and became, for the first time, a matter of sound rather than meaning—was an interesting one. The violin part of the concerto was played in a masterly manner by Mr. Grumiaux, while Mr. Leinsdorf provided a meticulous reading of the orchestral score.. His reading of the "Sacre," on the other hand, was a bit boisterous. The orchestra, in the Haydn work, did not seem to be at its best. There were a couple of misses in the horns, and a few other rough edges. I would like to call attention to the Boston Symphony's program notes on this occasion, which were written by James Lyons. They are models of their kind. They do not, thank God, attempt to explain the music. They merely serve the useful function of telling something about the composer and the circumstances under which a work was written.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 473,000

OCT 26 1968

Clemens Kalischer

Erich Leinsdorf directs the Boston Symphony in four concerts here: two in Philharmonic Hall; one each in Carnegie and Brooklyn.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 840,495 SUN. 1,494,704

OCT 13 1968

BSO in Concert Twice Next Week

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play twice in Symphony this coming week. The rest of the week will be given over to the Orchestra's first NewYork City appearances of the 1968-69 season.

On Tuesday evening October 15, Music Director Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the opening concert of the Tuesday Evening "B" Series of six concerts, music of Mozart, Smetana, and Stravinsky. The six Tuesday "B" concerts begin at 7:30 pm.

Monday evening, October 15, the Orchestra will play for the American Chemical Society, Northeast Region. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony Hall box office at $5 and $6.

Wednesday and Friday evenings, October 16 and 18, the Orchestra makes its New York City season debut at Philharmonic Hall, Lincoln Center, with a program featuring Arthur Grumiaux as soloist in the Berg Violin concerto. On Thursday evening, October 17, the Orchestra plays an all-Czechoslavak program at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, and on Saturday evening October 19, it plays in Carnegie Hall. Marilyn Horne is soloist in Carnegie Hall singing Beethoven's Ah! perfido and the Immolation scene from Wagner's Die Gotterdammerung.

LEDGER-TIMES
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 10,000

OCT 10 1968

New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony

Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, Tschaikovsky's Symphony No. 5, Brahms' Symphony No. 4 and a number of 20th century compositions will be among works performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra during its two five-concert New York series at Philharmonic Hall this season. The first concert, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf with violinist Arthur Grumiaux, will take place on Wednesday, October 16, at 8:30 p.m.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PARK EAST
W. CIRC. N. AVAIL.

OCT 10 1968

54.

Music to My Ears

Irving Kolodin

LEINSDORF LEADS OPENING CONCERT

Boston Symphony Is Heard in Haydn and Stravinsky

By RAYMOND ERICSON

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, opening its New York season last night at Philharmonic Hall, offered a not too traditional program in — for the orchestra — traditional performances, superbly suave and polished. Erich Leinsdorf's choice of music, nicely contrasted in style and mood, included Haydn's Symphony No. 90 in C, Berg's Violin Concerto and Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring." Arthur Grumiaux was the soloist in the concerto.

Mr. Leinsdorf created most interest with his version of the Stravinsky score, since it is not a work one associates with him, and this may have been the first time he conducted it here. His reading followed his customary pattern of interpretation in its care, thoughtfulness, even deliberation.

Details Newly Emphasized

In its literalness, the performance might have been ideal as accompaniment to a staged ballet. It should have pleased the composer, although it did not have quite the brilliant, dry textures that Stravinsky gets in his own performances. In the course of it, many normally overlooked details stood out. Since the music has its own built-in power, this was not lacking. Still, there was a certain excitement missing, the kind provided by urgency within the individual phrase or urgency permeating the entire rhythmic structure of the work.

The Haydn symphony, one that is not heard too often in concert, must be as entertaining as any the composer wrote. Under Mr. Leinsdorf's direction, it moved along brightly and smoothly. At times almost too smoothly—the opening section of the slow movement had more honey in the tone than was good for it. But the conductor kept the string tone down, so that all the diverting wind passages, which give the work its special character, exerted their full effect.

Least satisfactorily treated was the Berg concerto, that lyrical requiem for a teen-age girl, Manon Gropius. Mr. Grumiaux is a well-known interpreter of the solo part, and he played it with authority and a ravishing tone. But the performance on his part and Mr. Leinsdorf's was surprisingly impersonal, without much differentiation of approach as the concerto ran its course.

A work that is anything but seemed curiously bland.

Czech Program Tonight

The all-Czech program by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony will be given at the Brooklyn Academy tonight as originally announced.

Arthur Grumiaux, the Berg Violin Concerto, Erich Leinsdorf, and the Boston Symphony are all known qualities, but they were nevertheless productive of unknown results when combined in Philharmonic Hall at the orchestra's first visit of the season. This is merely to say that any knowns can result in unknowns when newly combined.

It was particularly provocative to hear Grumiaux, who has made his reputation as an ideally equipped interpreter of the Mozart-Bach literature, in a new confrontation with a demanding work of the most recent Viennese vocabulary. What Berg has expounded is something more than a newly shaped network of tonal values. It embodies psychological overtones and neurotic undertones which must be touched with the gentlest kind of magic for final fulfillment. Much of what was required Grumiaux provided in abundant measure; but the totality—taking in the orchestral participation under Leinsdorf—was lacking in the kind of interpenetration that makes one of two. It remained, persistently, Grumiaux plus Leinsdorf rather than becoming Grumiaux-Leinsdorf. The well made program began with a welcome hearing of the Haydn Symphony No. 90 in C and concluded with Stravinsky's Le sacre du printemps.

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 443,000

NOV 2 1968

New York Post
D. 628,146 SAT. 354,497

OCT 17 1968

Words and Music

By Harriett Johnson

Leinsdorf Leads Boston Opening

When readers are annoyed or confused by disagreement among critics, they should remember that reactions of other musicians often vary far more than those of the press.

Very few would agree with an evaluation of Alban Berg by Stravinsky, quoted in last night's program notes for the Boston Symphony's concert at Philharmonic Hall. This was the opening of the Bostonian's local season and of music director Erich Leinsdorf's last season as chief. Stravinsky's comment, from his book, "Expositions and Developments": . . . Berg, who is synthetic (in the best sense).

The words have special pertinence as the Berg Violin Concerto, with Belgian violinist Arthur Grumiaux as soloist, preceded Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps."

Berg was a tortured genius who died too young at 50. To call "Vazeck" or the Concerto "artificial, not genuine," is an incentive to anger.

The quiet and noble expressiveness of Leinsdorf's and Gruiaux's interpretation fanned the fuel of refutation. Berg died about a month after the Conceto's completion in July, 1935. For him he had worked swiftly: six weeks of feverish, unrelenting concentration. It was conceived as a "requiem" for Manon Gropius, the child of Alma Mahler and Walter Gropius, to whom Berg had been devoted, and who had died in May of infantile paralysis. It became Berg's requiem too, a haunting, complex inspiration, dominated by its content, not its means. Today, to our dissonant-oriented ears, it sounds conservative, but no less emotionally powerful for this reason.

The program opened with an objective, detached and suave rendition of Haydn's Symphony No. 90 in C Major. With regret I left before "Le Sacre" began, arriving at Carnegie Hall in time to hear the second half of Dietrich Fischer—Dieskau's recital of Schubert's song cycle, "Die Schoene Muellerin." The Bostonians' program will be repeated tomorrow night.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 840,495 SUN. 1,494,704

OCT 17 1968

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 840,495 SUN. 1,494,704

OCT 18 1968

Boston Symphony

Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, Tschaikovsky's Symphony No. 5, Brahms' Symphony No. 4 and a number of 20th century compositions will be among works performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra during its two five-concert New York series at Philharmonic Hall this season. The first concert, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf with violinist Arthur Grumiaux, will take place on Wednesday, October 16, at 8:30 p.m.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PARK EAST
W. CIRC. N. AVAIL.

OCT 10 1968

CONCERT REVIEW

Leinsdorf Turns on Power

NEW YORK—Although the program began with Haydn's "Symphony No. 90," the main interest in the Oct. 18 program of Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony at Philharmonic Hall was in two celebrated 20th century pieces. and Berg's "Violin Concerto" featuring a superb performance by soloist Arthur Grumiaux and Stravinsky's "Le sacre du printemps (The Rite of Spring)" both received strong readings.

Leinsdorf and the Boston who have recorded Haydn for RCA, showed they were at home with this classical period piece, which is not as well known as many of Haydn's other later symphonies. Grumiaux, whose Philips recording credits include the Berg piece with Amsterdam's Concertgebouw Orchestra, was flawless in the concealed virtuosity demanded by the concerto. Orchestral balance was splendid throughout with the Chorale almost breathtaking.

"Le sacre du printemps" is a powerful work, whose impact is shattering when well performed. Under Leinsdorf's skilled direction, it was well performed. The Boston Symphony, one of America's great orchestras, used its full resources in putting the masterpiece across before a full house.

FRED KIRBY

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000

NOV 2 1968

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 473,000

OCT 26 1968

LAST Wednesday evening, Erich Leinsdorf brought the Boston Symphony to Philharmonic Hall and presented what is usually referred to as a "well-balanced" program, consisting of Haydn's not terribly often heard Symphony No. 90 in C Major, Alban Berg's Violin Concerto, with Arthur Grumiaux as soloist, and Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps." The contrast between the last two works—one representing the sunset of the great Viennese symphonic tradition, the other a brave venture in a new era in which there was no tradition at all and in which music was deprived of its qualities as a special language and became, for the first time, a matter of sound rather than meaning—was an interesting one. The violin part of the concerto was played in a masterly manner by Mr. Grumiaux, while Mr. Leinsdorf provided a meticulous reading of the orchestral score. His reading of the "Sacre," on the other hand, was a bit boisterous. The orchestra, in the Haydn work, did not seem to be at its best. There were a couple of misses in the horns, and a few other rough edges. I would like to call attention to the Boston Symphony's program notes on this occasion, which were written by James Lyons. They are models of their kind. They do not, thank God, attempt to explain the music. They merely serve the useful function of telling something about the composer and the circumstances under which a work was written.

Clemens Kalischer

Erich Leinsdorf directs the Boston Symphony in four concerts here: two in Philharmonic Hall; one each in Carnegie and Brooklyn.

BSO in Concert Twice Next Week

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play twice in Symphony this coming week. The rest of the week will be given over to the Orchestra's first NewYork City appearances of the 1968-69 season.

On Tuesday evening October 15, Music Director Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the opening concert of the Tuesday Evening "B" Series of six concerts, music of Mozart, Smetana, and Stravinsky. The six Tuesday "B" concerts begin at 7:30 pm.

Monday evening, October 15, the Orchestra will play for the American Chemical Society, Northeast Region. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony Hall box office at $5 and $6.

Wednesday and Friday evenings, October 16 and 18, the Orchestra makes its New York City season debut at Philharmonic Hall, Lincoln Center with a program featuring Arthur Grumiaux as soloist in the Berg Violin concerto. On Thursday evening, October 17, the Orchestra plays an all-Czechoslavak program at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, and on Saturday evening October 19, it plays in Carnegie Hall. Marilyn Horne is soloist in Carnegie Hall singing Beethoven's Ah! perfido and the Immolation scene from Wagner's Die Gotterdammerung.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 840,495 SUN. 1,494,704

OCT 13 1968

LEDGER-TIMES
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 10,000

OCT 10 1968

New England Newsclip

...en

LEONARD LYONS

...iplomatic passport was not recognized ...cials when she arrived here Friday. Her opened and searched . . . Warren Beatty ...rank Sinatra as Elizabeth Taylor's co-star in 20th- ...ty Game in Town" . . . Godfrey Cambridge gave 50 old sweaters and slacks to the Poor People's March. They ...ere reluctant to accept them "because most of our people aren't fat."

S. Hurok will install the 120-member Romanian Folk Ensemble in the Felt Forum of Madison Square Garden . . . Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Oct. 17 in a special program marking the Czech Republic's 50th anniversary . . . Dick Goodwin is writing, for Look magazine, the story of Steve Smith's session with Sen. McCarthy during the Democratic convention. Goodwin was the only outsider there.

Barbara Rush has mixed reactions to her role in ... Place." At Trader Vic's and in department store... called to her, "Keep up those sexy love se... Rush's mother objects to them and sa... haved like that."

Attorney General Lef... nation to the State S... white-tie to pr... taping of ... mon...

New York Post
D. 628,146 SAT. 354,497
NEWS (e)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 96,932
SEP 9 1968 Buffalo
SEP 11 1968 New England Newsclip

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000
JUN 1 1968 Buffalo

Leinsdorf Will Open B'klyn Academy Series on Oct. 17

NEW YORK — The 1968-1969 Brooklyn Academy of Music orchestra series begins on Oct. 17 with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony, who also perform on Dec. 16 and March 20. William Steinberg and the Pittsburgh Symphony appe... on Nov. 21 with violinist Oliver Buswell IV as ... April 24 with ... Firkusny as so...

The five ... Series ... Ser...

Stern, Jan. 22; vio... Szeryng, Feb. ... ford Curz... cellist ... May ...

CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 244,000
NOV 16 1968 Buffalo

with ...
Tebaldi began ...
come to hear one of tw...
as the Principessa di Bouillon. We...
ladies had the stage to themselves, it was ... grand opera—"You take your side of the audience an... take mine"—and here we had what the Met and opera are all about. Tenor Placido Domingo was ringingly splendid.

Erich Leinsdorf led the Boston Symphony and its brasses at their most sonorous in a program of Mozart, Beethoven, and Wagner at Carnegie Hall on October 19. I won't soon forget it. Marilyn Horne was the soprano soloist, and there's the headline. She delivered Beethoven's "Ah perfido!" tastefully and then, as a culminant Wagnerian excerpt, gave us Brünnhilde's "Immolation Scene." She probably does not yearn to sing that role in any staging and, indeed, is now too young for it. But is there another soprano who can go from an impressive "Carmen" to unsurpassed bel canto and even to the Valkyrie? Name her. Miss Horne is phenomenal, as is Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau. The latter, a drama in himself, again electrified Carnegie Hall with Goethe lieder on October 30. His uncanny art smacks of the supernal.

—GREER JOHNSON

Mr. Johnson's recordings reviews appear regularly in Cue.

Boston Symphony Orch. Opens Academy Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, will open its 81st season at the Academy on Thurs. evening, Oct. 17, at 8:30.

A special all-Czech program commemorating the 50th Anniversary of the First Czech Republic has been prepared by Mr. Leinsdorf and in honor of the occasion, His Excellency Ambassador Karl Duda, Czechoslovakian Ambassador to the United States, will be present with Mme. Duda and members of the Czechoslovakian delegation to the United Nations.

The performance will include Smetana's "From Bohemia's meadows and forests, "Janacek's "Sinfonietta," and "Symphony No. 8 in G Opus 88" by Dvorak.

The Oct. 17 concert is the first of the Academy Orchestra series which includes two other performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Erich Leinsdorf directing, on Dec. 19 and Mar. 20. The Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra under the direction of William Steinberg, will be heard on Nov. 21 and April 24.

Patrons from Manhattan and Staten Island will be able to avail themselves of the Express Bus service recently inaugurated by the Academy. The BAM direct round-trip buses leave from 86th St. on the East and West sides of Manhattan, making three additional stops on their way to the Academy. The Staten Island Academy bus leaves from the Municipal Parking Lot at Seaside Blvd. & Sand Lane where free parking with attendants on duty is available.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CANARSIE DIGEST
W. 15,500
OCT 19 1968 Buffalo

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
BAY NEWS
W. 14,500
OCT 19 1968 Buffalo

Czech Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf will present an all-Czech program to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the First Czech Republic tonight (Thursday) at 8.30 p. m. at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The program will include Smetana's "From Bohemia's Meadows and Forests," Janacek's "Sinfonietta," and Dvorak's Symphony No. 8.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
VILLAGE VOICE
W. 35,500
OCT 17 1968 Buffalo

Leinsdorf to Salute Czechs

A program commemorating the 50th anniversary of Czechoslovakia will be played tonight at the Brooklyn Academy of Music by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony. Members of the Czechoslovak delegation to the United Nations, headed by Ambassador Karl Duda, will be present. The program will be made up of Janacek's "Sinfonietta," Smetana's "From Bohemia's Meadows and Forests" and Dvorak's "Eighth Symphony."

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 840,495 SUN. 1,494,704
OCT 16 1968 Buffalo

Boston Symphony At Academy

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, will open its 81st season at the Academy on Thursday evening, October 17, at 8:30.

A special all-Chech program commemorating the 50th Anniversary of the First Czech Republic has been prepared by Mr. Leinsdorf and in honor of the occasion, His Exellency Ambassador Karl Duda, Czechoslovakian Ambassador to the United States, will be present with Mme. Duda and members of the Czechoslovakian delegation to the United States.

The October 17 concert is the first of the Academy Orchestra series which includes two other performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Erich Leinsdof directing, on December 19 and March 20. The Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra under the direction of William Steinberg, will be heard on November 21 and April 24.

NEW YORK
Amsterdam News
W. 75,664
OCT 19 1968 Buffalo

DAILY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
D. 2,074,004 SUN. 3,099,658
OCT 14 1968 Buffalo

Seasonal Bow

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 81st season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Thursday night. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct.

Clemens Kalischer

Erich Leinsdorf directs the Boston Symphony in four concerts here: two in Philharmonic Hall; one each in Carnegie and Brooklyn.

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 767,250
OCT 13 1968 New England Newsclip

Byron Belt Newhouse Papers 21 Oct 68

ERIC LEINSDORF offered more familiar fare in Saturday's magnificent launching of a special Carnegie Hall series of concerts by the Boston Symphony.

Mozart's Symphony No. 39 opened the program, a pristine interpretation that managed to be both elegant and lively, doing full justice to one of the composer's finest creations.

Soprano Marilin Horne sang Beethoven's concert aria "Ah Perfida!" then Brunnhilde's Immolation in the post-intermission excerpts from Wagner's "Die Gotterdammerung."

Miss Horn continues to fill this reviewer with all sorts of ambivalent feelings. Her voice can be astonishingly beautiful or ugly, frequently within the same phrase. She is noted especially for her technical command of her large voice, but her run in the Beethoven were surprisingly not always clean, and her somewhat detached manner did not bring great impact to it or the Wagner scene.

Whatever was lacking in Miss Horn's performance, the audience adored her and flooded the stage with flowers at the conclusion of the Wagner, which was thrillingly conducted by Leinsdorf and performed brilliantly by the aristocratic Bostonians.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
MANHATTAN EAST
W. 17,000
OCT 18 1968 Buffalo

Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall

Boston Symphony Orchestra. Erich Leinsdorf opens the annual Carnegie Hall series of four concerts on Saturday evening, October 19, with a program featuring Marilyn Horne, soprano, as soloist: Symphony in E-flat, K. 543 (Mozart); Concert Aria, "Ah Perfido!" (Beethoven); Excerpts from "Gotterdammerung" -- Rhine Journey, Siegfried's Funeral Music, Immolation Scene and Finale (Wagner). Only scattered seats are available.

All tickets on sale at Carnegie Hall Box Office, West 57th Street at Seventh Avenue. No mail or telephone orders can be accepted for these concerts.

New York Post
D. 628,146 SAT. 354,497
SEP 9 1968

LEONARD LYONS

...iplomatic passport was not recognized ...icials when she arrived here Friday. Her ... opened and searched . . . Warren Beatty ... rank Sinatra as Elizabeth Taylor's co-star in 20th-... ity Game in Town" . . . Godfrey Cambridge gave 50 old ..., sweaters and slacks to the Poor People's March. They ...ere reluctant to accept them "because most of our people aren't fat."

S. Hurok will install the 120-member Romanian Folk Ensemble in the Felt Forum of Madison Square Garden . . . Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Oct. 17 in a special program marking the Czech Republic's 50th anniversary . . . Dick Goodwin is writing, for Look magazine, the story of Steve Smith's session with Sen. McCarthy during the Democratic convention. Goodwin was the only outsider there.

Barbara Rush has mixed reactions to her role in ... Place." At Trader Vic's and in department store... called to her, "Keep up those sexy love se... Rush's mother objects to them and sa... haved like that."

Attorney General Lef... nation to the State S... white-tie to pr... taping of ... mon...

NEWS (e)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 96,932
SEP 11 1968
New England Newsclip

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000
JUN 1 1968

Leinsdorf Will Open B'klyn Academy Series on Oct. 17

NEW YORK — The 1968-1969 Brooklyn Academy of Music orchestra series begins on Oct. 17 with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony, who also perform on Dec. 16 and March 20. William Steinberg and the Pittsburgh Symphony app... on Nov. 21 with violinist Oliver Buswell IV as ... April 24 with ... Firkusny as so...

The five ... Series ... Ser...

Stern, Jan. 22; vio... Szeryng, Feb. ... ford Curz... cellist ... Ma...

CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 244,000
NOV 16 1968

with ...
Tebaldi began ...
come to hear one of tw...
as the Principessa di Bouillon. We...
ladies had the stage to themselves, it was ...
grand opera—"You take your side of the audience an... take mine"—and here we had what the Met and opera are all about. Tenor Placido Domingo was ringingly splendid.

Erich Leinsdorf led the Boston Symphony and its brasses at their most sonorous in a program of Mozart, Beethoven, and Wagner at Carnegie Hall on October 19. I won't soon forget it. Marilyn Horne was the soprano soloist, and there's the headline. She delivered Beethoven's "Ah perfido!" tastefully and then, as a culminant Wagnerian excerpt, gave us Brünnhilde's "Immolation Scene." She probably does not yearn to sing that role in any staging and, indeed, is now too young for it. But is there another soprano who can go from an impressive "Carmen" to unsurpassed bel canto and even to the Valkyrie? Name her. Miss Horne is phenomenal, as is Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau. The latter, a drama in himself, again electrified Carnegie Hall with Goethe lieder on October 30. His uncanny art smacks of the supernal.

—GREER JOHNSON

Mr. Johnson's recordings reviews appear regularly in Cue.

Boston Symphony Orch. Opens Academy Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, will open its 81st season at the Academy on Thurs. evening, Oct. 17, at 8:30.

A special all-Czech program commemorating the 50th Anniversary of the First Czech Republic has been prepared by Mr. Leinsdorf and in honor of the occasion, His Excellency Ambassador Karl Duda, Czechoslovakian Ambassador to the United States, will be present with Mme. Duda and members of the Czechoslovakian delegation to the United Nations.

The performance will include Smetana's "From Bohenia's meadows and forests, "Janacek's "Sinfonietta," and "Symphony No. 8 in G Opus 88" by Dvorak.

The Oct. 17 concert is the first of the Academy Orchestra series which includes two other performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Erich Leinsdorf directing, on Dec. 19 and Mar. 20. The Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra under the direction of William Steinberg, will be heard on Nov. 21 and April 24.

Patrons from Manhattan and Staten Island will be able to avail themselves of the Express Bus service recently inaugurated by the Academy. The BAM direct round-trip buses leave from 86th St. on the East and West sides of Manhattan, making three additional stops on their way to the Academy. The Staten Island Academy bus leaves from the Municipal Parking Lot at Seaside Blvd. & Sand Lane where free parking with attendants on duty is available.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CANARSIE DIGEST
W. 15,500
OCT 19 1968

Czech Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf will present an all-Czech program to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the First Czech Republic tonight (Thursday) at 8.30 p. m. at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The program will include Smetana's "From Bohemia's Meadows and Forests," Janacek's "Sinfonietta," and Dvorak's Symphony No. 8.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
BAY NEWS
W. 14,500
OCT 19 1968

NEW YORK, N. Y.
VILLAGE VOICE
W. 35,500
OCT 17 1968

Leinsdorf to Salute Czechs

A program commemorating the 50th anniversary of Czechoslovakia will be played tonight at the Brooklyn Academy of Music by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony. Members of the Czechoslovak delegation to the United Nations, headed by Ambassador Karl Duda, will be present. The program will be made up of Janacek's "Sinfonietta," Smetana's "From Bohemia's Meadows and Forests" and Dvorak's "Eighth Symphony."

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 840,495 SUN. 1,494,704
OCT 16 1968

Boston Symphony At Academy

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, will open its 81st season at the Academy on Thursday evening, October 17, at 8:30.

A special all-Chech program commemorating the 50th Anniversary of the First Czech Republic has been prepared by Mr. Leinsdorf and in honor of the occasion, His Exellency Ambassador Karl Duda, Czechoslovakian Ambassador to the United States, will be present with Mme. Duda and members of the Czechoslovakian delegation to the United States.

The October 17 concert is the first of the Academy Orchestra series which includes two other performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Erich Leinsdof directing, on December 19 and March 20. The Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra under the direction of William Steinberg, will be heard on November 21 and April 24.

NEW YORK
Amsterdam News
W. 75,664
OCT 19 1968

DAILY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
D. 2,074,004 SUN. 3,099,658
OCT 14 1968

Seasonal Bow

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 81st season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Thursday night. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct.

Clemens Kalischer

Erich Leinsdorf directs the Boston Symphony in four concerts here: two in Philharmonic Hall; one each in Carnegie and Brooklyn.

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 767,250
OCT 13 1968
New England Newsclip

Byron Belt
Newhouse Papers
21 Oct 68

ERIC LEINSDORF offered more familiar fare in Saturday's magnificent launching of a special Carnegie Hall series of concerts by the Boston Symphony.

Mozart's Symphony No. 39 opened the program, a pristine interpretation that managed to be both elegant and lively, doing full justice to one of the composer's finest creations.

Soprano Marilin Horne sang Beethoven's concert aria "Ah Perfida!" then Brunnhilde's Immolation in the post-intermission excerpts from Wagner's "Die Gotterdammerung."

Miss Horn continues to fill this reviewer with all sorts of ambivalent feelings. Her voice can be astonishingly beautiful or ugly, frequently within the same phrase. She is noted especially for her technical command of her large voice, but her run in the Beethoven were surprisingly not always clean, and her somewhat detached manner did not bring great impact to it or the Wagner scene.

Whatever was lacking in Miss Horn's performance, the audience adored her and flooded the stage with flowers at the conclusion of the Wagner, which was thrillingly conducted by Leinsdorf and performed brilliantly by the aristocratic Bostonians.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
MANHATTAN EAST
W. 17,000
OCT 18 1968

Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall

Boston Symphony Orchestra. Erich Leinsdorf opens the annual Carnegie Hall series of four concerts on Saturday evening, October 19, with a program featuring Marilyn Horne, soprano, as soloist: Symphony in E-flat, K. 543 (Mozart); Concert Aria, "Ah Perfido!" (Beethoven); Excerpts from "Gotterdammerung" -- Rhine Journey, Siegfried's Funeral Music, Immolation Scene and Finale (Wagner). Only scattered seats are available.

All tickets on sale at Carnegie Hall Box Office, West 57th Street at Seventh Avenue. No mail or telephone orders can be accepted for these concerts.

56.

THE CLASSICS

A Double Blast At Carnegie Hall

By Mark A. Stuart

MARILYN, the golden Horne, came to Carnegie Hall the night of October 19 and dismantled the place.

This has to be the greatest living American girl singer. I doubt, after that night, if any in Europe can match her, either.

This was the night she performed miracles with her breathtakingly beautiful singing of Beethoven's concert aria, "Ah! perfido". To top it off, she shook the hall with the vaulting joy of her singing of Brunnhilde's immolation from Wagner's "Die Gotterdaemmerung".

For sheer smooth artistry and beauty of tone she has to be heard to be believed. A big, powerful voice without shouting or forcing. A sweet voice, under complete control always. A voice with almost unbelievable range, from the purest of high soprano to a true, full contralto. And dramatic, too—always with an effortlessness that is almost supernatural.

Miss Horne was aided by one of America's great orchestras on one of its best nights. The Brahmins of Boston used to say there is no comparison between their home team players and that of any other big league city, and they weren't talking about the Red Sox. They are about right.

This was a night for Erich Leinsdorf. He was playing the music he knows best — Wagner in opera and Beethoven in song. When he played as Miss Horne sang the Beethoven I waited for the fatal misstep. The orchestra was under tight control. Not once did they try to overcome her. Even if I doubt they ever could. This has to be one of the best-disciplined groups playing here and abroad. I have seen only one other orchestra under such tight control — the Leningrad.

Then, in the Wagner, the soaring tones seemed to lift the roof off the famed old hall. The little man on the podium raised his hand to get the powerful leitmotiv of Siegfried's going and he appeared 10 feet tall.

The audience reacted in a paroxysm of joy. They poured down the aisles to cheer Miss Horne and her cohorts onstage. It was the first time in recent memory I saw flowers being hurled from the boxes above to the stage. One little old lady in a white brocaded suit I've seen around the concert halls fairly often was just overcome. She couldn't cheer and she feared her clapping with gloves on wouldn't express her joy enough. She just waved her hand in the air as if saying: "You people are too much."

I saw her at the fifth or sixth curtain call down front. She had been wearing a single yellow rosebud on her suit. She tore it off and handed it up to Miss Horne.

The evening began with an example of softness, as if Leinsdorf wanted to show his men could play that way as well. It was the Mozart Symphony No. 39 with its lilting clarinet tunes and its constricted orchestra. Leinsdorf took his people through it in almost mechanical style, never exciting too much passion, but never missing any chance to show off the lyrical power of the piece.

Then on came Miss Horne in a lovely blue Grecian gown, serene and composed, and the orchestra went into the Beethoven. From the first notes out of her throat you could see the people around you begin turning their heads to each other as if they wished confirmation that what they were hearing wasn't fantasy.

Marilyn Horne: A flawless performance.

The concert aria, in case you aren't familiar with the form, is a piece written for a singing star instead of sandwiched into an opera libretto. The aria is a convenient way of showing off a singer's talent. Why waste a whole opera production when all you wanted to do was show off the singer? That's the way it was in the days of Handel and Beethoven. Mozart wrote more than 50 of them.

Then, after intermission, on came the orchestra with first The Dawn, then Siegfried's Rhine journey, the Interlude from Act One of Gotterdaemmerung, the Prelude to Act II, and Siegfried's Death. Up stepped Miss Horne and all the satirical portrayals of Brunnhilde as an overblown Germanic version of a blitzing linebacker on one of football's great defensive units went out the door.

Miss Horne, without costume, scenery, or supporting cast, made you believe that this was a lover bereft of her loved one, a human being.

The orchestra concluded with the finish to Act III and the house went stark, staring mad.

As the audience poured into the aisles to get down front to yell their lungs out, our aisle was left clear. Running alongside the seats to get backstage came Henry Lewis, Miss Horne's husband and conductor of the New Jersey Symphony. He stopped long enough to acknowledge our expressions of appreciation, then dashed on.

Last summer, after one of his concerts at Waterloo Village, Miss Horne raved backstage to us that her husband was a genius. He can now return the compliment.

If you'd like to hear these protagonists in records, you have a wide choice. Leinsdorf and the Boston have a recording featuring the overtures to the "Flying Dutchman" and "Tanhaeuser" and the preludes to "Tristan and Isolde" and "Die Meistersinger." (RCA LSC-3011). For Beethoven you can try an unusual Symphony No. 4 and the Leonore Overture No. 2. (RCA LSC-3006). Then if you want find out how Leinsdorf is as an accompanying conductor in a concerto, you can try the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto with Itzhak Perlman as soloist. (RCA LSC-3014).

As for Miss Horne, she used to record quite a bit on London with other artists. Some of the best were the Mozart Requiem with Elly Ameling, Ugo Benelli, and Tugomir Franc. (OSA-1157), and the Beethoven Symphony No. 9 with the Vienna Philharmonic under Hans Schmidt-Isserstedt and Joan Sutherland, James King, and Marti Talvela. (OSA-1159).

With her husband wielding the baton, she has done "Souvenir of a Golden Era" (OSA-1263), arias from "The Barber of Seville", "Otello", and others. The orchestra is L'Orchestre de la Suisse Roamnde. Also "Presenting Marilyn Horne", with Mr. Lewis leading the orchestra of the Royal Opera House at Covent Garden (OSA-25910). Recently she has recorded an album of French arias which I haven't heard yet.

I'll have to, and soon.

Hackensack, N.J.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 840,495 SUN. 1,494,704

OCT 21 1968

BOSTONIANS PLAY WAGNER EXCERPTS

Leinsdorf Leads Orchestra in First of Four Concerts

By ALLEN HUGHES

The 1968-69 series of four Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts sponsored by Carnegie Hall opened there on Saturday night with a kind of sumptuous music-making that only a great orchestra can provide.

The major offering of the evening was a selection of excerpts from Wagner's "Die Götterdämmerung" that included all the major instrumental portions of the opera score. The orchestra sounded magnificent as it played Wagner's ever-amazing music under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf. The color, richness and brilliance could not have been surpassed.

Mr. Leinsdorf conducted these excerpts from memory, and he apparently had every leitmotif in every one of its uses and meanings clearly in mind. Thus, for those acquainted with the Wagner's tetralogy of "Ring" operas, the performance became, quite properly, a recapitulation through music of the entire "Ring" cycle.

Brünhilde's Immolation was the one vocal excerpt presented. It was sung by Marilyn Horne, who seems well along the way to proving that she can sing anything composed for treble voice and sing it well. Her voice can flit through all sorts of intricate ornamentation in the fussiest of Italian music, but it adapted remarkably well to Wagner's demands for breadth and nobility of statement and, at times, sheer volume. Miss Horne does not sound like an ideal Brünnhilde just yet, but in this concert situation she was quite welcome.

Earlier she had sung Beethoven's "Ah, perfido" effectively, if not thrillingly.

The concert got off to a tedious beginning with a performance of Mozart's Symphony No. 39 that was so polished in detail and homogenized in sound that the music was absolutely without savor or spirit.

Horne Stars
Boston Concert

By JOSEPH GALE
Staff Correspondent

NEW YORK—It was a mighty spell: the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf, in the first of Carnegie Hall's orchestra series on Saturday night, and Marilyn Horne in two terrifying arias.

Miss Horne was equally at home in Beethoven's concert aria, "Ah perfido!" as in Brunnhilde's Immolation, though here her voice had more of Sieglinde's warmth than of Brunnhilde's imperiousness.

In opera, the voice would be considered rather light, even warm, if I may say, for this sort of thing, but with Leinsdorf holding back the orchestra, Horne's intelligent singing, the full upper register and the organ-like lower notes blanketed the hall in this most awesome scene ever written for the musical theater. Why has no one tried to film "Der Ring des Nibelungen?"

In "Ah perfido!," though the orchestration is still considerable, Horne's musical vibrato soared above it in an attack that was clear and true. She sang simply and without strain. If there is the equivalent of a Boston sound (as is often said of the orchestra) in vocalism, she has it.

Leinsdorf opened with Mozart's Symphony No. 39 in E flat Major. It was interesting to watch him. Though he is by no means quiescent on the podium, most of his direction emanates from the wrists, which appear to rotate. He is an epicurean stylist, phrasing with clarity and refinement. The silken-stringed orchestra gave him a crystal-pure reading.

Newark Evening News
NEWARK, N. J.
D. 278,235 SUN. 423,157

OCT 21 1968

At Municipal Auditorium

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Play Lively, Lovely Music Monday Evening

The program to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Municipal Auditorium tomorrow evening has been announced by the office of Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the orchestra, and is as follows:

Mozart

Sympony No. 39 in E flat K.543

Weill

Suite from "Kleine Dreigroschenmusik fur Blasorchester"
(Suite from "The Threepenny Opera" for Wind Orchestra)

Brahms

Symphony No. 4 in E minor op. 98

This augurs well for an evening of both lively and lovely music — a program that should please concert-goers with a variety of tastes.

Mystery Surrounds Origin

Certain great works of art have come down to us surrounded with mystery as to the how and why of their being. Such are Mozart's last three symphonies, all composed in the summer of 1788, a time when he was beset by debts, worry and discouragement. The demand for his work had fallen off following the poor reception accorded his opera "Don Giovanni" in Vienna in May, 1788.

He had been forced to curtail his activities for the previous year to ready the opera for production and had to borrow money from friends to support himself and his ailing wife — hardly an atmosphere conducive to the creation of the proud, happy E flat major symphony, which overflows with optimism, power and beauty and has a particularly exuberant, festive introduction.

Although Mozart had composed one or more symphonies almost every year since the age of eight, he wrote no more after this summer (of 1788) before his death three and a half years later. Furthermore, there is no record of any performances of these last three symphonies during his lifetime.

Published After Death

Shortly after he died they were published, performed, and their extraordinary qualities received with amazement. In his last symphonies Mozart abandoned his former habit of using unrelated material in his development sections; he now organized everything in the best symphonic traditions established by Haydn. The development sections are strictly thematic, material often being taken from the subsidiary themes.

ERICH LEINSDORF

In lighter vein is Kurt Weill's musical suite "Kleine Dreigroschenmusik" for wind orchestra, adapted from his opera score for German playwright Bertolt Brecht's "Die Dreigroschenoper," a modernized version of "The Beggar's Opera" written by John Gay in 1728. "Die Dreigroschenoper" was first produced in Berlin in 1928, and Weill published this musical suite during the following year. It was compiled, according to Weill's widow, actress Lotte Lenya, for his own amusement.

The movements of "Kleine Dreigroschenmusik" are taken from the opera score, the vocal parts allotted to an instrument such as the saxophone, clarinet or flute.

When "Die Dreigroschenoper" opened in Berlin, after many difficulties in meshing the somewhat unconventional libretto and score and actors' temperaments, the press was mixed but the show was an immediate success with the public. "From that day," writes Lotte Lenya, "Berlin was swept by a Dreigroschenoper fever. In the streets no other tunes were whistled."

Not Successful

In American the first production in 1933 was not very successful, but the revival in 1955 (in the brilliant English adaptation by Marc Blitzstein), "The Threepenny Opera," ran for over 2000 performances at the Theatre de Lys in New York. In this version Lotte Lenya recreated her original role of Ginny Jenny.

Brahms' Fourth Symphony, interestingly enough, was scheduled to be premiered in Amerina by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Nov. 27, 1886. The orchestra's music director, Wilhelm Gericke, conducted the symphony at the public rehearsal on Friday, Nov. 26, but was dissatisfied with the performance and withdrew the score for further preparation.

Since the Friday performance was officially a rehearsal, although, according to a newpaper account, Gericke did not at any point stop the orchestra, this was not called a "premiere" and the honor went to Walter Damrosch and the Symphony Society of New York for a performance on Dec. 11 of that year. The work was played in Boston officially for the first time on Dec. 23, 1886.

Little Enthusiasm

Brahms composed the first two movements of the Fourth Symphony in the summer of 1884, the other two the following summer. He, himself, conducted the premiere, at Meiningen in October, 1885. It was greeted at its first performance with somewhat less than the enthusiasm generated by the Second and Third Symphonies. The introspective Brahms had feared this, brooding as he attempted to harness his romantic creativity to reconstructions of the heroic age of classic orchestral music.

The Fourth Symphony, time tested, is now frequently called the greatest of this series. It is the most melancholy and archaic — "a great autumnal picture opening with a theme of extraordinary length and complexity which would have defeated any other composer of the second half of the nineteenth century," according to Paul Henry Land.

The culminating point of the symphony, and perhaps of Brahms' whole art, says Mrs. Lang, is the last movement in which the composer leads us into "the immense halls of baroque music." This is indeed an excellent vehicle for Brahms' magnificent mastery of contrapuntal and variation technique, and we are fortunate to have an opportunity to hear it at the hands of Mr. Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert will begin at 8.30 p. m.

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 113,750

NOV 10 1968

New England Newsclip

57

Boston Symphony Performance Set at Auditorium

In response to popular demand, the Junior League Concert Series has brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Springfield 17 times since 1936, the date of its first appearance under the auspices of the Concert Association of Greater Springfield.

On Nov. 18, at 8.30 p.m. the orchestra will appear at the Municipal Auditorium for the 18th time—the last under the baton of its present conductor, Erich Leinsdorf, who will retire at the end of this season.

Mr. Leinsdorf became music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the beginning of its 82d season in 1962. In so doing, he became the 11th maestro to lead the orchestra in its history and only the third over the previous 38 years.

Orchestra Complete

When a major change is made in the guidance of an orchestra other changes are bound to follow, but Erich Leinsdorf early stated his delight with his new charge, saying: "I am particularly happy about coming here not as a bricklayer. I don't have to build. I find a magnificent orchestra and a magnificent organization. This enables one to make music without having to go to collect the materials."

And make music they do, year round—with their seven series and the open rehearsals

Erich Leinsdorf and Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall from September through April generally sold out on season subscription. These do not include two series, of five concerts each, in Philharmonic Hall, Lincoln Center, New York.

Pops Concerts

In May and June approximately 90 members of the Boston Symphony present nine weeks of Boston Pops concerts under Arthur Fiedler who also conducts orchestra members in 14 free, open-air Esplanade Concerts at the Hatch Memorial Shell on the Charles River Embankment for two weeks at the conclusion of the Pops season.

The Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood begins the first week in July and lasts for eight weeks, running concurrently with the Berkshire Music Center's "training through performance" school.

In addition, the Boston Symphony several years ago established a new role for its first desk members with the formation of the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. More flexible than a single ensemble with a fixed number of performers, they take advantage of their special situation to draw upon the wide variety of instrumental combinations available among the orchestra's virtuoso principal players.

Chamber Music

This enables them to present chamber music which is not frequently performed, from duos to septets and nonets, as well as works for the more standard ensembles. Because the first desk players do not participate in the nine-week Boston Pops season each spring, their most extensive tours take place in May and June.

In 1966 the Chamber Players toured across the United States and in 1967 they traveled in England, the Soviet Union and West Germany.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was never simply a small community ensemble. It's founder's policies and his financial support led the orchestra into early and continuous visits to other cities in the East and throughout the country. Boston accepted its early accomplishments with pride and has watched it grow into one of the major musical organizations of the world.

Tickets for the Nov. 18 concert, or subscriptions for the Junior League Series may be obtained at the Forbes & Wallace Box Office, Main Floor, Nov. 13 through 18 between 11 a.m. and 3 p.m. or at the Municipal Auditorium Box Office at 7 p.m. the night of the concert.

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 113,750

NOV 17 1968

New England Newsclip

Junior League Will Celebrate 35th Concert Season Monday

The Junior League Concert Series will celebrate its 35th season with the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf Monday night at 8.30 in the Municipal Auditorium.

Mr. Leinsdorf was named director of the orchestra in 1962, the 11th in its history and only the third in the last 42 years. Concert marks his final appearance in Springfield, as he will retire at the end of the season.

Members of the concert committee include: Mrs. John A. Reardon, chairman; Mrs. Philip A. Brooks, cochairman, Mrs. Donald E. Mahall, secretary; Mrs. James Weldon, president's representative; Mrs. Crawford Lincoln, artists.

Also, Mrs. John W. Robinson, floor chairman; Mrs. Bradford Parker, program; Mrs. Thomas Richardson and Mrs. Lincoln, publicity; Mrs. Robert Gelinas, refreshments; Mrs. Kenneth N. Kinsley, music scholarship; Mrs. Royce A. Cort, Jr., schools, and Mrs. Gilbert P. Ahrens, ushers.

Also assisting are Mrs. David E. Birkhauser, Mrs. Wilfred G. Drouin, Mrs. Richard L. Fenn, Miss Diane Gallan, Mrs. John G. Gallup, Miss Leslie Simons and Mrs. Emanuel S. Tesoro.

Tickets will be on sale Monday from 11 to 3 at the Forbes & Wallace box office. Mrs. Evelyn Macauley will accept orders for subscriptions and individual tickets.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424

NOV 15 1968

New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony and Brahms: A Musical Embrace

By DON E. KERR

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave last night in Springfield's Municipal Auditorium a performance of Brahm's Fourth Symphony that equals and perhaps surpasses any in our relatively short experience, including superlative ones by Boehm and Von Karajan.

It has been said that a Classicalist expresses less than he feels and a Romantic more than he feels. Anyone who would agree with the former part of the statement exhibits a fundamental lack of understanding of the Classical Period, and where the Romantic is concerned it would be more accurate to say that most Romantics tried to express more than they were technically equipped to do with complete success. The exception above all is Johannes Brahms. Opus 98 is a monument of Western Man by one who was surely one of the loneliest of Western men. Eric Leinsdorf's recreation let one feel it all. No need to say more.

Mozart's Symphony 39 came off generally well, the first movement a bit slick (though brought to a smashing good finish), the Andante somewhat ponderous, and the final Allegro approaching indolence (except, again, at conclusion).

The selections from Kurt Weill's music for Bertolt Brecht's "Die Dreigroschenoper" were disappointing. The Overture was much too fast, and the performance generally lacked the derisiveness that the music is sure to have when performed in context and could have had here with a nastier treatment. We wonder if the audience that applauded so loud and long understood what Brecht, and Weill too, was saying about them. ("Nur we im Wohlstand lebt, lebt angenehm.")

This may be one of the last performances in Springfield by a major outside orchestra, unless the Concert Association of Greater Springfield (now assuming the part the Junior League has so valiantly played) receives the support of this area's people. Judging from last night's attendance, the prospects are not good. Springfield people have their heads collectively buried in the sand (as we who live in Winchester Square know only too well).

People get offended if one suggests that there may come a day when the only live performances of symphonic music may be in recording sessions, yet they hasten the day when they leave as many seats vacant as they did last night. Musical circles here are almost hopelessly in-bred and utterly provincial, and will die of attrition without the influence of outside performing groups. Musical life in this city is likewise unthinkable without its own orchestra, but that organization will not last forever with the kind of support it got last week.

Those who really want to see these things survive are going to have to go beyond the price of a ticket. More people are going to have to give sacrificially to music in this area. Nothing good and lasting and worthwhile comes without pain and sacrifice and struggle. Ask Mr. Leinsdorf Ask Robert Staffanson.

NEWS (e)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 96,932

NOV 19 1968

New England Newsclip

58.

Greet Boston Symphony Conductor

The Boston Symphony opened the Junior League concert series Monday at the Municipal Auditorium under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf. Meeting backstage prior to the concert were, from left, Mrs. Philip C. Steiger, Jr., Junior League president; William P. Simons, 2d, president of the Concert Association of Greater Springfield, and Leinsdorf.

Concert by Boston Symphony Indicates Change in Taste

By R. C. HAMMERICH

The enthusiastic reception given Kurt Weill's little 14-minute suite drawn from his "Threepenny Opera" in Municipal Auditorium Monday night is a sign of the times.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was laying the first of two concerts sponsored this season by the Junior League, and the other music on the program offered formidible competiton: Mozart's Symphony No. 39 (K.543) and Brahm's Symphony No. 4, both acknowledged masterpieces.

The enthusiasm was another bit of evidence that the taste of the live-music listening public is changing more rapidly than the programs usually offered to them.

Weill's little suite was put together in 1929 for his own amusement a year after he composed the music for the opera.

There were fewer than 1700 in the auditorium to hear it, but they were vastly amused. Weill must have had uncanny musical insight. The suite, composed in the midst of the jazzy '20s, could hardly have been a more entertaining satire of the music of the period.

The score calls for a wind orchestra of 17 or 18 players including such colorful rhythm instruments as banjo and timpani, wood blocks and bells. There is listed, also, a bandoneon, which is a member of the accordion family with a giant keyboard.

The piece is presented in six sections and is an incredible blend of near-dissonance, modified ragtime, jazzy dance rhythms, catchy melodies (i.e., "Mack the Knife") and off-beat tone colors played with a kind of threadbare elegance, a dignified rickytick.

The Mozart symphony which preceded it, I regret to say, was stodgy in comparison. I seldom get sleepy when Mozart is in the air, but I did Monday.

The vaunted Boston sonority was there all right, and the impeccable ensemble unity. But the atmosphere was more pedantic than is usual with this orchestra. . .although there are those listeners who feel that all of conductor Erich Leinsdorf's Mozart is pedantic.

I disagree with that opinion, but the evidence was against me Monday.

The big symphony of the evening was the Brahm's fourth. It came after intermission, and I stayed only long enough to hear the first two movements. I heard nothing to alter my expectation that it was a masterpiece played by a great orchestra. . .but without excitement.

Of course, the Brahms' fourth is not a theatrical piece. It is wide and deep and thoughtful. It should generate a kind of quiet excitement.

I'm afraid after 80 years it becomes difficult not to take Brahms for granted, even when played without noticeable fault, as it was Monday.

The opening piece on the program was Faure's "Death of Melisande," a five-minute lament played to honor Charles Munch, former conductor of Boston's orchestra, who died recently.

UNION (m)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 77,424

NOV 19 1968

New England Newsclip

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Wednesday, November 20, 1968

047

Boston Symphony on Tour

1905 Hall Is the Music Hub of Springfield

By JAKE SHERMAN

SPRINGFIELD — Civic boosters and music lovers in this central Massachusetts city of 175,000 recall with pride the night the Philadelphia Orchestra played here last year and Eugene Ormandy, in rare remarks from the podium, hailed Municipal Auditorium as "one of the world's great performing halls."

Judging from the diamond-like clarity and brilliance of sound which marked the performance of the Boston Symphony here Monday night, the conductor was quite right.

Strangely enough, Municipal Auditorium is not one of the ultra-modern halls incorporating the very latest acoustical refinements. It was built in 1905, a latter-day Greek temple a few steps away from the banks of the Connecticut River. Actually, the auditorium is part of a downtown civic complex which also includes an identical City Hall and a 200-foot campanile, said to provide on those fabled clear summer days a remarkable panorama of the river valley.

The auditorium, with its two balconies, plunging red drapes and ample gold leaf ornamentation, remains the hub of Springfield musical life. And this seems to consist for the most part of the Springfield Symphony.

Anniversary Season

This orchestra has been giving six concerts a season in the hall since it was organized in 1944, and plans for the big 25th anniversary season coming up next year are undeway. The symphony is said to attract musicians from as far away as Hartford and Boston, though few, oddly, from central Massachusetts' many colleges and universities. Robert Staffanson, a violinist originally from Montana, has conducted the orchestra for the past 14 years.

In addition to its regular schedule, the Symphony offers ten children's concerts. There is also a 150-voice Symphony chorus and a Young People's Symphony, consisting of musicians between the ages of 12 and 21. The latter unit, supported by the Women's Symphony League, gives about a dozen concerts a season.

The other organization — which sponsors concerts here and the one which brought in the Boston Symphony Monday night is the so-called Concert Association of Greater Springfield. The financial power behind this group is actually exerted by the local Junior League which in the past has guaranteed that concerts by name outside orchestras will break even at the box office.

A Mere Two

Selling tickets to these concerts has proved unaccountably difficult, however, with the result that in recent years the League's series has shriveled to a mere two, albeit worthy, events per season. Last year, the group presented the Philadelphia and the Czech Philharmonic. This year, in addition to the Boston, it will bring in the Cleveland Symphony under George Szell Feb. 12.

The burden of underwriting the series has apparently become too much for the League, and it will no longer do so after this year. It is no doubt a decision regrettably taken, but judging from the great patches of empty seats in the 3200-seat auditorium Monday night, at least an understandable one. Greater Springfield, after all, takes in a population of half a million and it is not a poor area. At intermission the audience was told in the most polite fashion, that it had better get on the ball financially if the community were to continue to attract visiting musicians of the highest calibre.

Dedicated to Conductors

Monday night's concert, led by Erich Leinsdorf, was dedicated to Charles Munch, who replaced Serge Koussevitsky as the Boston Symphony's music director in 1949 and continued in that capacity until 1962. Munch died in his sleep two weeks ago in Richmond, Va., after having conducted the Orchestra de Paris in a concert in North Carolina two days earlier.

The orchestra paid homage to its former conductor by playing "The death of Melisande" from Faure's incidental music to "Pelleas and Melisande." Munch, a lover of French impressionist music, had requested many a time that this piece be played to commemorate his death, and the Boston rendered it in truly tender and compelling fashion.

The remainder of the program — Mozart's lovely Symphony No. 39 in E flat, Kurt Weill's jaunty and acrid "Threepenny Opera Suite," and Brahms' introspective Fourth Symphony — was uniformly excellent. The Boston Symphony seems to be a much more cohesive and energetic unit when it plays indoors rather than at Tanglewood. But, no doubt, Springfield's superb acoustics contributed to this impression.

The inclusion of the Threepenny Opera suite was a rare bit of programming and, as a big fan of Weill's music, to me a most welcome one. The selections included the famous Mac the Knife song, the sad and wistful "Polly's Song," the bittersweet "Tango-Ballad" and the "Kanonen-Song" with its Charleston tempo and ironic mockery of war.

The orchestra used Weill's original instrumentation which calls for about 18 musicians and such orchestral novelties as the banjo and bandoneon. The latter, a relative of the piano, contributes much of the tinniness so characteristic of Weill's music.

"Tango Ballad" evoked some clearly uncharacteristic Latin body movements from Leinsdorf. In fact, it looked as if what the normally super-serious conductor were doing was less conducting and more dancing.

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 113,750

DEC 8 1968

New England Newsclip

Music Beat

Boston Jazz Band Setup Is Unusual

By SKITCH HENDERSON

Distribution was strange for a jazz band: the drums and two timpani down in front, followed up by a small upright piano, then by a man doubling on banjo and guitar and next to him an accordionist. To the right of the leader (opposite the drums): three flutes, a pair of clarinets, bassoons and trumpets, one trombone and a tuba. The small brass section was conspicuous because of the number of mutes needed for the evening's performance.

Lights Too Bright

The house lights dimmed and the stage lights came on much too bright for most of the players. The band leader came on stage to polite applause, resplendent in Italian - tailored white tie, and stomped off the first number with his right foot a la Stan Kenton.

Among the selections were "Mack the Knife" and other familiar Kurt Weill melodies. The audience was in ecstasy as the band swung up a storm. Even the lady flutist was seen discreetly tapping her foot. The drummer tapped his symbols, pounded on his traps and took shy pokes at other paraphernalia.

This band had played one - nighters from Boston to Belgrade. They had played the good houses and knew their way around. After all, they were the Boston Symphony.

Believe it or not, there they were in this lovely city of Springfield, Mass., with music director Erich Leinsdorf going "one and a two and a. . ."

I had a very interesting talk with the maestro after the concert. "Why shouldn't I do it?" he said. "We are probably the only symphony orchestra in the world that can play a piece like this. No, I didn't call the Plaza for the accordion player; our first cellist happens to play very good accordion. And Charles Smith is known as one of the greatest drummers in the country, even though from the standpoint of protocol we always refer to him as a percussionist. Our banjo man plays in the second violin section and gets a hell of a lot of practice during the Pops season with Arthur Fiedler.

Fun to Hear

"I cannot understand why people should question my programming this kind of a piece. It is music that is fun to hear and that is more than you can say about most of the things written nowadays. Tonight we played music by Schoenberg, Weill, Stravinsky and Rachmaninoff, and you know what sounded modern? Weill."

Mr. Leinsdorf then launched into a dissertation on how much he disliked Rachmaninoff. I had the audacity to disagree and about a half - hour later withdrew under the verbal abuse heaped upon my obvious romantic attitude which simply had nothing to do with good music.

In retrospect, I am amazed at this orchestra. With the exception of Charles Smith and his happy drum set, they played the "Threepenny Opera" music without a change of expression in their classical faces, but it did swing.

The audience also interested me. For some stupid reason, people come to concerts wearing a kind of phony halo. They must never betray their emotions, must always applaud in the right place and above all must look as though they were really having a wonderful time (of course, catching a nap now and then).

But on this occasion, they didn't have to pretend their enjoyment. Lawrence Welk with his South Dakota Bavarian accent could not have topped this. The ultra - conservative Leinsdorf gave the audience a genuine smile when he took his bow.

59.

Woolsey Hall Concert Series

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf (Nov. 19)

The 1968-'69 Woolsey Hall Series will mark its 40th consecutive season of presenting to the music-loving public of the New Haven area, a number of the world's greatest symphony orchestras, concert artists and renowned musical organizations

To celebrate properly the reaching of this two-score milestone, the most exciting group of concert events in the history of the nationally-known series has been arranged. The usual format of seven evening performances will be adhered to, starting on Thursday, October 24, with the local bow of the new "prestige" French symphony, the Orchestre de Paris, and concluding on Tuesday, May 13, with a rare solo performance by the distinguished Soviet cellist, Mstislav Rostropovich.

Dated between these auspicious musical occasions will be the Boston Symphony Orchestra on November 19; the great Italian pianist, Arturo Benedetti Michelangeli, December 10; the young American sensation of the piano world, Andre Watts, January 21; the Cleveland Orchestra. February 11, and the Israel Chamber Orchestra, March 4.

Conducting the group offerings will be Jean Maretinon for the Parisians, Erich Leinsdorf doing the honors for the Bostonians, George Szell on the podium for the Clevelanders, and Gary Bertini directing the 21-member ensemble from Tel Aviv which is making its American debut this season.

Although the Woolsey Hall Series always comprises the leading foreign and American artists, the forthcoming schedule is particularly varied, with performers from France, Italy, Russia and Israel vying with two of America's premier symphonies and one of the newest additions to the pianistic world.

Perhaps another feature worthy of mention is the unusual newness of the performers (to local audiences) on the season's schedule, for outside of the two American symphonic aggregations — without which no Woolsey Hall Series would be complete — all the other artists will be making their first visit to our concert platform.

During its past thirty-nine seasons the Woolsey Hall Series has seen the last twenty-three years sold out by subscription before the open concert, an achievement not enjoyed by any similar group of concert presentations in this country. The far-reaching appeal of the series brings this about, for in addition to the large list of local patrons, many other subscribers come from distant points in the state.

As usual, the Tuesday evening schedule will be followed this season, the one exception being the dating of the Orchestre de Paris on a Thursday, made necessary because of its touring schedule. Curtain time for all concerts will be promptly at 8:30 p.m.

REGISTER (e)
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
CIRC. 104,800

NOV 17 1968 New England Newsclip

Boston's Erich Leinsdorf

Leinsdorf Lists Weill

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has been an annual fixture on the Woolsey Hall Series since this nationally-known group of concert offerings was founded in 1929, comes to Woolsey Hall Tuesday evening to give the second concert of the current series. The performance will be under the baton of Music Director Erich Leinsdorf, who has guided the renowned ensemble since the 1962-63 season.

Long recognized as one of the world's foremost program planners, Mr. Leinsdorf has arranged an interesting trio of works for the forthcoming fine music occasion. The opening selection will be Mozart's Symphony No. 39 in E flat, K 543, following which will be heard Kurt Weill's Suite from Kleine Dreigroschemmusik fur Blasorchester.' The concluding programmed work will be Dvorak's Symphony No. 8 in G major, Op. 88.

Tuesday's concert will mark the seventy-third visit of the famed Boston Orchestra to highlight our fine music schedule. Some seasons the Bostonians have come twice, and a few times made three appearances here. In recent years, however, with the increasing demand for their concerts elsewhere, the local showing in recent seasons has been cut to a single visit.

The Woolsey Hall Series will continue with a performance by the distinguished Italian pianist, Arturo Benedetti Michelangeli, on December 10; the young American keyboard sensation, Andre Watts, January 22; the Cleveland Orchestra under the baton of George Szell, February 11; the Israel Chamber Orchestra, making its first American tour, on March 4, and Mstislav Rostropovich, great Russian cellist, on May 13.

REGISTER (e)
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
CIRC. 104,800

NOV 19 1968 New

Boston Symphony Appearing Tonight In Concert Series

The second concert of the current Woolsey Hall Series will take place tonight when the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its annual local appearance. The 110-member symphonic ensemble will be under the baton of Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the orchestra, and the performance wil begin at 8:30.

The opening selection will be Mozart's Symphony No. 39 in E flat, K 543, to be followed by Kurt Weill's Suite from 'Klein Dreigroschen musik fur Blasorche' from 'The Threepenny Opera.' The last half of the program will be given over to Antonin Dvorak's Symphony No. 8 in G major, Op. 88.

On Dec. 10 Arturo Benedetti Michelangeli, Italian pianist, will give the third concert of the series, followed by Andre Watts, pianist, Jan. 22; the Cleveland Orchestra, Feb. 11; the Israel Chamber Orchestra, March 4, and Mstislav Rostropovich, cellist, on May 13.

POST (e)
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
CIRC. 81,900

NOV 20 1968 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Displays Warm Tone, Precision

Precision attacks, tonal warmth, and ebullient spirits were abundant last night as Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony orchestra returned to New Haven's Woolsey hall.

Judging from the serenity and vivacity of Mozar's Symphony No. 39, one would be hard put indeed to discover signs of the composer's depressed state at the time of its composition.

Warming to their work after a four square opening movement, the ensemble gave a large scale reading of the symphony, replete with vitality and technical refinement. The Menuetto, with its dance element, was exquisitely played, while the Allegro had the essential effervescence.

Hearty Mozart

Mr. Leinsdorf prefers his Mozart (and other classical works) a trifle hearty, but the finesse of the orchestra should have mollified the purists attending.

In a departure from traditional concert fare, Mr. Leinsdorf programmed an orchestra potpourri from Weill's "Der Dreigroschenoper." The rhythms had appropriate swing and zest, and the interpretation caught the irreverent tone and wit which abound in this score. The humor of Die Ballade vom angenehmen Leben" was splendidly apparent, as was the delicacy and wistful air of "Polly's Lied." It was something of a relief to hear "Die Moritat von Mackie Messer" without the dubious ministrations of pops singers and studio orchestras.

Although the program did not supply the information, readers may be interested to learn that the last mentioned song is based on the moritats sung at European street fairs which detailed the ghastly deeds of notorious criminals of the last century.

Dvorak's G Major Symphony, variously known as the "English," "Pastoral," and "Bohemian," received an expansive, well articulated airing. As the various choirs displayed their rich, molded voices, it was almost possible to forget the unsubtle nature of the work. Little depth, yes, but all the same, a good opportunity for a conductor to revea the quality of his band.

Honoring the memory of Charles Munch, its recently deceased former musical director, the orchestra played "The death of Melisande" from Faure's incidental music to "Pelleas et Melisande."

—RICHARD DAY

Music In Review

'Mack' Cuts Fine Figure

Shades of Beethoven- "Mack the Knife" came to Woolsey Hall Tuesday night with the Boston Symphony Orchestra giving a swinging rendition of Kurt Weill's provocative music for the Three Penny Opera.

Director Erich Leinsdorf appeared to enjoy this bit of whimsicality as much as his audience, and the freely moving dance forms were given a most colorful performance. With guitar, saxaphones, flutes and percussion among other instruments, the suite from "Kleine Dreigroschenmusik fur Blasorchester" included the ballads, tangoes, "Polly's Song" and the pulsing "Mack the Knife" episode and the audience, with toes tapping, (softly) enjoyed it all.

Leinsdorf responded to several recalls at the conclusion, bowing deeply from the waist in mock solemnity. It was a new look at the Boston Symphony from the Woolsey viewpoint.

Mozart's "Symphony No. 39 in E flat K 543" opened the program following a reverent performance of Faure's "Death of Melisande" from "Pelleas et Melisande" in memory of Charles Munch, retired director of the orchestra, who died suddenly two weeks ago in Richmond, Va., where he was to conduct the new Orchestre de Paris.

The Mozart work, one of his last three symphonies, was given an inspired reading by Leinsdorf who built up the emotional span of unusual harmonic combinations to a great degree. Considered one of the finest examples of classic symphony form, it contains the famous, delightful minuet which finds its way into so many concert programs.

The big work was Dvorak's colorful "Symphony No. 8, in G major Op. 88."Rich in melodic content, this "music from the heart" is filled with Slavic melodies which form fanciful elaborations in dance rhythms given graceful emphasis by Leinsdorf and his men.

The program as a whole was sheer delight to hear, and the novelty of introducing the Weill suite was most acceptable to the audience — a change over from wholly formal, classical programs.

Florence Johnson

NEWS
SOUTHINGTON, CONN
WEEKLY CIRC. 5,450

NOV 13 1968 New England Newsclip

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor, will be at Yale University, New Haven, as part of the Woolsey Hall Concert Series on Tuesday, Nov. 19. The program will start at 8:30 p.m.

An evening of the music of Argentina with Argentine cellist Adolfo Odnoposoff is scheduled for 8 p.m. next Wednesday, Nov. 20, at Engleman Hall, Southern Connecticut State College, New Haven.

Also planned for next Wednesday is a lecture and musical at the piano and by the Glee Club on "Music in America at the Time of the Revolution" to be given by Roger Ermili, in Alumni Hall, Quinnipiac College, Hamden, at 4 p.m.

JOURNAL-COURIER (m)
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
CIRC. 32,000

NOV 20 1968 New England Newsclip

60.

Boston Symphony to Honor Munch in Rutgers Concert

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 840,495 SUN. 1,494,704

NOV 21 1968

—A special gymnasium concert at Rutgers University, in memory of Charles Munch, will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday, Nov.21, at 8:30 p.m.

Munch, one of the outstanding musical figures of modern time, retired in 1962 after 13 years as the Boston Symphony Orchestra's music director. He died Nov. 6.

The concert, under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, features performances by the Rutgers University Choir and soloists Saramae Endich, soprano, and Sherrill Milnes, baritone.

The program consists of Bach's Cantata No. 202 and Brahms' German Requiem.

Also next week on Nov. 19 the celebrated Hungarian Quartet will perform the first of five weekly recitals of all of Beethoven's string quartets. The concerts will be held weekly on Tuesday evenings at 8:30 p.m. in Voorhees Chapel at Douglass College. The Beethoven cycle is heralded as one of the most important and exciting musical events of the Rutgers concert season.

Under Munch's tenure, the Boston Symphony made its first tours abroad. Munch also restored a policy of permitting the public to hear rehearsals. Munch gave strong support to the music of contemporary composers and introduced much music from the French repertoire.

Miss Endich, who frequently appears with the Boston Symphony, has sung with major orchestras on both sides of the Atlantic and throughout the United States, Canada and Mexico. She is as well known as an opera singer and recitalist as she is as an orchestral soloist.

Milnes, who started late on his professional career, is now a regular member of the Metropolitan Opera Company. He has made several recordings and has appeared outside the United States at the operas in Venice, Florence, Milan and Mexico City.

The Rutgers University Choir, which has a long record of fine performances with major symphonies, will be directed by F. Austin Walter.

Tickets for the special concert and the Beethoven cycle are available from the University Concerts Office, 542 George St., this city.

amusements - theater

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 840,495 SUN. 1,494,704

NOV 22 1968

Music: Boston Symphony

Leinsdorf Leads Suite From '3-Penny Opera'

Erich Leinsdorf

THE unusual program that Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony gave Wednesday night in Philharmonic Hall had as its highlight a performance of the "Three Penny Opera" Suite that Kurt Weill worked up for his famous score. Seldom does one hear this kind of music at symphony concerts, though it is better than most of the now-languishing material of its period—Germany in the mid-twenties.

There was not only novelty in hearing the Suite, there also was novelty looking at it. Weill scored the music for wind orchestra plus percussion. The tympanist was placed up front, the other players on the side. Arthur Press, blinking in the unaccustomed glare of being a soloist, presided over tympani ,traps, cymbals and the other paraphernalia of 1928-seen through German eyes. Mr. Press is the percussionist of the Boston Symphony.

•

It was fun to hear the music, fun to watch Mr. Press counting his way through the score, fun to watch the staid Boston Symphony players slumming, as it were. There is precedent for this kind of material on the concert stage. Even so solemn a conductor as Otto Klemperer used to do it and, indeed, made a recording of the suite in pre-war days. What was not so much fun was Mr. Leinsdorf's interpretation. Can he ever relax? He led the "Three Penny" music in a relentless manner, full of tension, virtually devoid of charm or period flavor.

On the first half of the program were the two antipodes of 20th-century music, Arnold Schoenberg and Igor Stravinsky. Schoenberg's "Kammersymphonie" was followed by three excerpts from Stravinsky's "Chant du Rossignol." North and South, positive and negative, proton and electron: Schoenberg with his lush, thick, Wagnerian and Mahlerian harmonies, his seriousness, his strong roots in the 19th century; Stravinsky with his complete anti-Wagnerianism, his clarity, sharp intelligence, pointed writing, wit.

Jorge Bolet was soloist on the last work of the program, Rachmaninoff's "Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini." For the last 30 years this work has been beloved of all pianists. Everybody plays it, and everybody plays it much the same way, with driving rhythm, clarity above all, pushing left hand, little pedal, infinite pains to clarify articulation. The idea has been, it would appear, to duplicate Rachmaninoff's own playing.

Mr. Bolet had different ideas. Some of them did not always come off, but at least he brought some original viewpoints to this overplayed work. His tempos were a little slower than most, he lingered over phrases, he used a greatly reduced scale of dynamics. He also was content to let the orchestra often take the lead. Passages where the piano accompanied were very subdued.

As a technician, Mr. Bolet is in a class virtually by himself. Without exerting himself in the least he is on top of every note, and they roll out, no matter how complicated the figuration, in the most unforced and elegant possible. The cadenza leading into the 12th variation was a shower of perfectly placed sparks. And when he decided it was time, Mr. Bolet demonstrated that he could take charge in an authoritative fashion.

•

But often he underplayed. Or, to put it another way, the orchestra overplayed. Mr. Bolet brought unusual color and and sublety to this performance, but some of it was wasted because the orchestra drowned him out. Better liaison between him and the conductor was needed. Nevertheless, it was a pleasure for once to hear a performance of the "Paganini" that was not punched out.

As a preface to the program, Mr. Leinsdorf conducted "The Death of Melisande" from the Fauré suite, in memory of Charles Munch.

HAROLD SCHOMBERG.

The Program

BOSTON SYMPHONY, Erich Leinsdorf conducting, with Jorge Bolet, pianist. At Philharmonic Hall.

The Death of Melisande, from Pelleas and Melisande ..... Faure
Kammersymphonie ..... Schoenberg
Kleine Dreigroschenmusik ..... Weill
Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini ..... Rachmaninoff
Le Chant du Rossignol ..... Stravinsky

Symphony To Entertain

NEW BRUNSWICK—The Boston Symphony will give a special concert at 8:30 p.m. next Thursday in the Rutgers gymnasium in memory of Charles Munch.

Munch, who died Nov. 6, retired in 1962 after 13 years as music director of the Boston Symphony.

The concert, under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, features performances by the Rutgers University Choir and soloists Saramae Endich, soprano, and Sherrill Milnes, baritone.

The program consists of Bach's Cantata No. 202 and Brahms' German Requiem.

On Tuesday, the Hungarian Quartet will give the first of five weekly recitals which will include all of Beethoven's string quartets. The concerts will be at 8:30 p.m. Tuesdays in Voorhees Chapel on the Douglass College campus.

THE COURIER-NEWS
PLAINFIELD, N. J.
D. 51,539

NOV 14 1968

CONCERT—Soloist Saramae Endich, will perform Nov. 21 in concert at Rutgers homoring Charles Munch, above, while at right, Erich Leinsdorf will conduct Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Home News
NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
D. 50,429 SUN. 51,726

NOV 14 1968

Boston Symphony Performing At Rutgers Tonight

A special Gymnasium concert at Rutgers University, in memory of Charles Munch, will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight at 8:30 p.m.

Mr. Munch, one of the outstanding musical figures of modern time, retired in 1962 after 13 years as the Boston Symphony Orchestra's music director. He died Nov. 6.

The concert, under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, features performances by the Rutgers University Choir and soloists Saramae Endich, soprano, and Sherrill Milnes, baritone.

The program consists of Bach's Cantata No. 202 and Brahms' German Requiem.

Tickets for the special concert are available from the University Concerts Office, 542 George St., New Brunswick.

MANVILLE, N. J.
NEWS
W. 2,500

NOV 21 1968

SOMERSET, N. J.
FRANKLIN NEWS-RECORD
W. 3,000

NOV 21 1968

Leinsdorf at Rutgers

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will perform a special concert Thursday in memory of Charles Munch, late director of the orchestra, at the Rutgers University Gymnasium in New Brunswick.

The concert, under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, will feature the Rutgers University Choir and soloists Saramae Endich, soprano, and Sherrill Milnes, baritone. The program will include Bach's Cantata No. 202 and Brahms' German Requiem.

Miss Endich has sung with major orchestras throughout the United States and Europe. Milnes is a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The Sunday Star-Ledger
NEWARK, N. J.
SUN. 403,863

NOV 17 1968

MEMORIAL CONCERT — Erich Leinsdorf conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra which along with the Rutgers University Choir paid tribute last night to the late conductor, Charles Munch with a concert at the Rutgers University Gymnasium.

Symphony Announces New Brunswick Date

NEW YORK — The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give New York concerts on Nov. 20 and 22 in Philharmonic Hall and on Nov. 23 in Carnegie Hall. It will also play in Springfield, Mass. on Nov. 18; New Haven on Nov. 19; and New Brunswick on Nov. 21. All concerts will begin at 8:30 p.m. and will be conducted by the Orchestra's music director, Erich Leinsdorf.

THE MORNING CALL
PATERSON, N. J.
D. 25,812

NOV 11 1968

The Home News
NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
D. 50,429 SUN. 51,726

NOV 22 1968

61.

NEW YORK
AND BROOKLYN DAILY
D. 35,343

NOV 11 1968

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Saturday, November 23 in Bach's Cantata No. 51 and Brahm's German Requiem. Sololists will be Saramae Endich, soprano, Sherrill Milnes, baritone and the Rutgers University choir.

▶ The Boston Symphony, marking its last season under conductor Erich Leinsdorf, made some of the biggest roof-raising Wagnerian sounds Carnegie Hall has reverberated to since Toscanini's death—in a program highlighted by Leinsdorf's own arrangement of scenes from Wagner's Gotterdammerung. A few weeks later Leinsdorf reversed the sonic effect in Lincoln Center, using just a dozen or so BSO players to perform Kurt Weill's light and jazzy Threepenny Opera Suite, the type of non-stuffy work more concerts nowadays could use.

Senior Scholastic 1-10-69
Scholastic Teacher

THE NEW YORK TIMES, TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 26, 1968

s loo anish hifting her and again. It composit
but in these da ng-but-inno cent writing it is e narily fresh and charming. Mr. Dia apparently a guitarist of special technical endowments and an artist of sensibility. The evening ended with Debussy's "Trois Nocturnes."

IF the American Symphony's program was an unusual one, it was outdone in Philharmonic Hall last Wednesday evening by the Boston Symphony, under Erich Leinsdorf. Following a ceremonial performance of "The Death of Mélisande," from Gabriel Fauré's incidental music for Maeterlinck's play, in memory of Charles Munch, Mr. Leinsdorf conducted Arnold Schoenberg's Kammersymphonie, Opus 9b, an early work, which, despite all the fuss about its containing chords built out of fourths instead of thirds, sounds like a sort of "Tristan und Isolde" pushed to an unhealthily neurotic extreme. I have never particularly admired it, though I prefer it by far to Schoenberg's later, twelve-tone compositions. Next came Stravinsky's symphonic poem "Le Chant du Rossignol," a concert version of the ballet by the same title, which was in turn excerpted from an early opera. It dates from the time when Stravinsky was playing the barbaric Slav, and it has some appealing moments, though it consists largely of rhythmic and instrumental tricks and has little musical substance. After the intermission, Mr. Leinsdorf performed a suite from the "Kleine Dreigroschenmusik" for wind instruments, by Kurt Weill, which made the Boston Symphony players sound like a timid jazz band. All the same, there was a refreshing vulgarity about this work that contrasted with what went before. Weill was no great melodist, but he did write one unforgettable melody in "The Moritat of Mac the Knife," and this in itself made the suite worth listening to. To top things off, the formidable Cuban pianist Jorge Bolet appeared as soloist in Rachmaninoff's "Rhapsody on a Theme by Paganini"—a great showoff piece for piano virtuoso, and played in an especially sensitive manner. —WINTHROP SARGEANT

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN MUNCH TRIBUTE

It was a fine gesture for Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra to dedicate their Carnegie Hall concert on Saturday night to the memory of the orchestra's late music director, Charles Munch. The major work on the program was the Brahms "German Requiem."

Mr. Leinsdorf has this music in his bones and as he led the work it became a worthy tribute to his predecessor. By weighting the etxture in favor of the upper winds and strings, Mr. Leinsdorf achieved a crystalline clarity and lean orchestral sonority that would warm the heart of any Toscanini devotee.

The Rutgers University Choir abetted the conductor's conception by producing a full yet precisely focused choral tone. Adding to the list of excellences were the floating soprano of Saramae Endich and Sherrill Milnes's virile declamation of the baritone solos.

The Requiem was preceded by Bach's Cantata No. 202, delightfully sung by Miss Endich. Mr. Leinsdorf's handpicked chamber ensemble provided wonderfully clean and stylish accompaniments.

PETER G. DAVIS.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 473,000

NOV 30 1968

61.

NEW YORK
AND BROOKLYN DAILY
D. 35,343

NOV 11 1968

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Saturday, November 23 in Bach's Cantata No. 51 and Brahm's German Requiem. Sololists will be Saramae Endich, soprano, Sherrill Milnes, baritone and the Rutgers University choir.

▸ The Boston Symphony, marking its last season under conductor Erich Leinsdorf, made some of the biggest roof-raising Wagnerian sounds Carnegie Hall has reverberated to since Toscanini's death—in a program highlighted by Leinsdorf's own arrangement of scenes from Wagner's Gotterdammerung. A few weeks later Leinsdorf reversed the sonic effect in Lincoln Center, using just a dozen or so BSO players to perform Kurt Weill's light and jazzy Three-Penny Opera Suite, the type of non-stuffy work more concerts nowadays could use.

Senior Scholastic 1-10-69
Scholastic Teacher

THE NEW YORK TIMES, TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 26, 1968

s. foor anish hifting chor her and again. It composit
but in these da ng-but-inno cent writing it is e inarily fresh and charming. Mr. Diaz apparently a guitarist of special technical endowments and an artist of sensibility. The evening ended with Debussy's "Trois Nocturnes."

IF the American Symphony's program was an unusual one, it was outdone in Philharmonic Hall last Wednesday evening by the Boston Symphony, under Erich Leinsdorf. Following a ceremonial performance of "The Death of Mélisande," from Gabriel Fauré's incidental music for Maeterlinck's play, in memory of Charles Munch, Mr. Leinsdorf conducted Arnold Schoenberg's Kammersymphonie, Opus 9b, an early work, which, despite all the fuss about its containing chords built out of fourths instead of thirds, sounds like a sort of "Tristan und Isolde" pushed to an unhealthily neurotic extreme. I have never particularly admired it, though I prefer it by far to Schoenberg's later, twelve-tone compositions. Next came Stravinsky's symphonic poem "Le Chant du Rossignol," a concert version of the ballet by the same title, which was in turn excerpted from an early opera. It dates from the time when Stravinsky was playing the barbaric Slav, and it has some appealing moments, though it consists largely of rhythmic and instrumental tricks and has little musical substance. After the intermission, Mr. Leinsdorf performed a suite from the "Kleine Dreigroschenmusik" for wind instruments, by Kurt Weill, which made the Boston Symphony players sound like a timid jazz band. All the same, there was a refreshing vulgarity about this work that contrasted with what went before. Weill was no great melodist, but he did write one unforgettable melody in "The Moritat of Mac the Knife," and this in itself made the suite worth listening to. To top things off, the formidable Cuban pianist Jorge Bolet appeared as soloist in Rachmaninoff's "Rhapsody on a Theme by Paganini"—a great showoff piece for piano virtuoso, and played in an especially sensitive manner. —WINTHROP SARGEANT

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN MUNCH TRIBUTE

It was a fine gesture for Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra to dedicate their Carnegie Hall concert on Saturday night to the memory of the orchestra's late music director, Charles Munch. The major work on the program was the Brahms "German Requiem."

Mr. Leinsdorf has this music in his bones and as he led the work it became a worthy tribute to his predecessor. By weighting the etxture in favor of the upper winds and strings, Mr. Leinsdorf achieved a crystalline clarity and lean orchestral sonority that would warm the heart of any Toscanini devotee.

The Rutgers University Choir abetted the conductor's conception by producing a full yet precisely focused choral tone. Adding to the list of excellences were the floating soprano of Saramae Endich and Sherrill Milnes's virile declamation of the baritone solos.

The Requiem was preceded by Bach's Cantata No. 202, delightfully sung by Miss Endich. Mr. Leinsdorf's handpicked chamber ensemble provided wonderfully clean and stylish accompaniments.

PETER G. DAVIS.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 473,000

NOV 30 1968

62.

Concert Time

Boston Symphony a Hartford Custom

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has been performing for Hartford audiences since the 1890's, will be heard again Dec. 17 at 8:15 p.m. Erich Leinsdorf, who will leave the orchestra at the end of next summer, will conduct.

For this program Dr. Leinsdorf has selected: Beethoven's First Symphony; Weill's Kleine Dreigroschenmusik; and Brahms' Symphony No. 4 in E minor. The Weill work, from his "Three-Penny Opera," has not previously been performed in a Bushnell Symphony Series concert.

The Boston concert is the third in this season's Bushnell series, which has already presented the Philadelphia and Pittsburgh Symphony orchestras. Coming later in the season are the Cleveland, under George Szell and the Toronto Symphony, under Seiji Ozawa. Tickets for the Dec. 17 concert are now available in the Bushnell box office.

Of interest to music lovers is the fact that Leinsdorf will be succeeded in Boston by William Steinberg, Pittsburgh Symphony conductor. Steinberg has indicated that next season he will conduct both the Pittsburgh and Boston orchestras, a feat he expects to be able to handle by giving up guest-conducting the New York and many other orchestras.

TIMES (E)
HARTFORD, CONN.
CIRC. 134,700

DEC 15 1968 New England Newsclip

CONDUCTOR ERICH LEINSDORF

Leinsdorf on Farewell Tour

ERICH LEINSDORF, retiring next summer as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, makes his final Hartford appearance in that role Tuesday at 8:15 p.m. at the Bushnell Memorial Hall. Tickets are available at the Bushnell box office.

COURANT (m)
HARTFORD, CONN.
CIRC. 150,750

DEC 1 1968 New England Newsclip

MILFORD CITIZEN
MILFORD, CONN.
DAILY - CIR. 7400

DEC 8 1968 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony In Hartford Concert

The third tour week of the current Boston Symphony Orchestra season opens Tuesday December 17 in Hartford, with an all-orchestral concert conducted by the Orchestra's Music Director, Erich Leinsdorf. Two symphonies, Beethoven's first and Brahms's fourth, will be played, as well as the Suite from the Threepenny Opera by Kurt Weill.

In New York City, the Orchestra's third Philharmonic Hall programs, Wednesday/Friday December 18/20, will feature pianist Earl Wild in a performance of the Scharwenka piano concerto no. 1, a work performed by the Orchestra this season for the first time since 1913. Also to be played are Schoenberg's Variations op. 31 and Scenes from Romeo and Juliet, by Prokofiev.

For the second of this season's concerts at the Brooklyn Academy, Thursday, December 19, the program will be the same as the Hartford program.

On Saturday, December 21 at Carnegie Hall, Mr. Leinsdorf will open the concert with the Debussy Rhapsody for saxophone and orchestra. Felix Viscuglia, who will play the saxophone solo, is the bass clarinetist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Pianist Claude Frank also appears as soloist at Carnegie Hall, joining Mr. Leinsdorf and the Orchestra for a performance of Mozart's piano concerto in B flat, K.595. The concluding works are the Kurt Weill Suite from the Threepenny Opera, and Stravinksy's Le sacre du printemps.

TIMES (E)
HARTFORD, CONN.
CIRC. 134,700

DEC 3 1968 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Comes to Bushnell

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, will perform works by Beethoven, Brahms, and Kurt Weill when it appears in Hartford Dec. 17 for the third concert in this year's Bushnell Symphony Series.

Since Leinsdorf will retire from his position with the orchestra next summer, the concert will mark his final appearance in Hartford as its conductor.

The program will be Beethoven's Symphony No. 1 in C major; Kurt Weill's Suite from "The Threepenny Opera"; and Brahms' Symphony No. 4.

The Weill suite has never been performed in the Bushnell series, though it incorporates six pieces from the opera, which ran off-Broadway for more than 2,000 performances.

The Boston Symphony has performed more concerts in Hartford than any other visiting orchestra. Since the Bushnell was opened in 1930, it has played at least one concert annually in the auditorium.

PRESS (e)
BRISTOL, CONN.
CIRC. 15,900

DEC 2 1968 New England Newsclip

ext. 425)
Dec. 17 — BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor. Bushnell Memorial Hall, Hartford. 8:15 p.m. (525-3177)

BEE
NEWTOWN, CONN.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,900

DEC 13 1968 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony In Hartford December 17

The third tour week of the current Boston Symphony Orchestra season opens Tuesday, December 17 in Hartford, with an all - orchestral concert conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

Two symphonies, Beethoven's first and Brahm's fourth, will be played, as well as the Suite from the Threepenny Opera by Kurt Weill.

COURANT (m)
HARTFORD, CONN.
CIRC. 150,750

DEC 18 1968 New England

Leinsdorf And Boston At Bushnell

Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony were presented in the Bushnell Symphony Series at the Memorial auditorium Tuesday night.

The program:
Symphony No. 1 ——— Beethoven
Suite, "Threepenny Opera" —— Weill
Symphony No. 4 ——— Brahms

Well, Hartford audiences have always gone for that longhair stuff, of course. And last night it was with the three B's again — Beethoven, Brahms and Mac the Knife — that Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony fetched 'em at the Bushnell.

German apparently isn't the language of greatest familiarity here, and numerous customers were unable to translate with certainty the yardlong title of the Weill score as it appeared on the program: "Kleine Dreigroschenmusik feur Blasorchester." But by the time the players were into the first bars of "Mac the Knife," came the dawn. A huge chuckle of happy recognition rolled across the house. And when the Suite came to its rousing end, the delighted audience was ready to cheer. 'Tis, as the man said, 'Tis the season to be jolly. Jolly it was.

Fault of Perfection

This is not to say it was the best performance of music from the "Dreigroschenoper" I have heard. The fault, such as it was, lay in the very perfection of the playing by the combo of a dozen men from Boston. They were slick and suave as all get out. For symphony halls, perhaps this is the ticket. But for essence of Weill, something less virtuostic, something more flavored with honkytonk, is what the doctor ordered. I could see Mr. Leinsdorf and the boys in the Persian Room. It was a little harder to imagine them in some smoky dive of Weill's gone-by Germany. Jazz, and all the jazz—you have to be careful not to smooth it off too much.

Well, anyway, perhaps this is carping. It was all very pleasant fun. And where virtuosity counts, the Boston Symphony surely had it last night. The performances of the Beethoven First Symphony and of the Brahms Fourth, were splendid. Mr. Leinsdorf took the first two movements of the Beethoven in lovely lyric style. Doubtless it won't be considered authentic by some that they should have been given an almost Mendelssohnian quality, but it sounded very enchanting indeed. And the last two movements sprang into great elan and vitality, which was very stimulating. Whether this was an entirely calculated contrast I couldn't say. Why bother, when it's fine?

The Halcyon Days

In the Brahms, the Boston orchestra had returned to its halcyon days. Following the regime of the late great Dr. Koussevitzky, it had developed something of a French manner of playing, a very transparent, sparse, cool kind of statement. Mr. Leinsdorf has performed the miracle of retaining the clarity and melding the sound. The first quality arises from the marvelous balance of instruments he has attained. The second lies in Mr. Leinsdorf's very fluid readings of the music, plus a more romantic temper. Thus last night's Brahms came off golden in sound and in sentiment. It was big and Olympian, intense and emotional. The orchestra played it simply handsomely. All in all, this was a resplendent occasion, tinged, I suppose, with a feeling of parting's sweet sorrow and that Mr. Leinsdorf isn't likely to be back here with the Boston again. He gave us a lot to remember him by.

—T.H.P.

63.

Music

Now There's a Forgotten Composer for You

By HAROLD C. SCHONBERG

I NEVER thought I'd live to see the day, but here it is — or will be, on Wednesday. Earl Wild will play the Piano Concerto in B flat minor by Franz Xaver Scharwenka, with the Boston Symphony conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

Now there's a forgotten composer for you, though I imagine that piano students still play his Polish Dance in E flat minor. He himself recorded it, shortly before World War I, along with two other disks for the Columbia company in New York. Scharwenka was no stranger here, having run a conservatory in this city and having made extensive tours of the country. There are photographs of him at the time. He wears a fur hat and fur-trimmed coat, has a strong face and a virile mustache: very much the dashing, romantic Pole. His Piano Concerto in B flat minor was composed in 1877 and was highly regarded in its day. Liszt was impressed when he heard it, and that connoisseur of piano music and piano playing, James Gibbons Huneker, thought the second subject of the first movement one of the most beautiful inspirations of the then modern school.

*

But the concerto disappeared after World War I. Perhaps it occasionally turns up at conservatory concerts here and there, but there has been no public performance in my time. It is music that ran counter to the esthetic of the new schools of the 20th century, and in the last 50 years if anybody mentioned it, it was only to sneer. Scharwenka's music had vanished, like the horse, the two-cylinder motor car, the Gibson girl, potted palms and the piano concertos of Rubinstein, Moszkowski, Herz, Litolff, d'Albert, Dreyschock and the other virtuoso composers of the 19th century.

Scharwenka (1850-1924) was born in a section of Poland that was part of Prussia, studied in Berlin, made his debut in 1869 and went on to a fine career as pianist and teacher. In 1881 he opened his own conservatory in Berlin, and 10 years later came to New York as head of the Scharwenka Conservatory of Music. Then he went back to Berlin, in 1898, and opened another conservatory. He was very well known as a pianist, and there is a flattering description of his playing in the 1910 edition of Grove's Dictionary. "As a pianist," says Grove's, "Xaver Scharwenka is renowned above all his other qualifications for the beautiful quality of his tone, which is rich, round, soft, yet great, and singing, for which it would be difficult to name another living pianist as his equal. His power is enormous, yet he never bangs, and has no mannerisms, his arms and body at the piano appearing to be almost without movement. If he is a specialist . . . it is of Chopin, whose nationality he partly shares, but of the other great masters his readings are always grand and musicianly, while to hear him play a waltz of Strauss is as dance-inspiring as the magic bells of Papageno." Those Columbia records do not support so great a tribute, and the playing is sloppy, though the famous Polish Dance does go with elegance and spirit.

To understand the B flat minor Concerto, it is necessary to understand the spirit in which it was written. The score is representative of an entire class of 19th-century works—the virtuoso salon concerto. The idea was, primarily, to entertain. It is doubtful if Scharwenka, when writing this concerto, had any ideas about immortality or competing with Brahms and Beethoven.

The music, like nearly all other examples in this genre, followed a pattern. There is a first movement in sonata form, with an orchestral introduction and an entrance of the piano in which great chords, arpeggios and scale passages are hurled around. One of the movements that follows is sure to be fluffy, cute and salon-like. The last movement is always a fast-moving, energetic affair in which the musical substance is light and the fireworks heavy.

All right. Nobody, not even the composer, was going to pretend that this is great music. What it does have is pianistic ingenuity. It was written in an era when the pupils of Liszt were flooding the market (shortly to be followed by the pupils of Leschetizky), an era when the virtuoso was king. The idea was to provide the virtuoso with a brilliant, effective showpiece. If the composer could get some ingenuity and melodic appeal into his music, so much the better. A few composers did. The Henselt F minor Concerto held on to the 1920's, and the Rubinstein D minor a generation after that.

*

On all accounts the Scharwenka B flat minor Concerto succeeds in achieving what it set out to do. Melodically it has a good deal of charm — period charm, to be sure, but authentic of its kind. And the writing for solo piano is dazzling — full of ideas, full of brilliance, and even a good deal of originality. No wonder the concerto became as popular as it did, and no wonder virtually every important pianist rushed to play it. And, it naturally follows, no wonder audiences loved it. Only a more severe age would turn its nose up at such innocent, good-natured, sparkling music. But it so happened that a severe age did come, and the Scharwenka, along with the other works of its kind, was swept into the dustbin.

Works like the Scharwenka should be revived, and Leinsdorf is to be congratulated for his enterprise in programing it. Not only enterprise, but daring. It actually takes daring to program so dated a work, one so utterly out of fashion, one so despised by the taste-makers. But if nothing else, the Scharwenka will be a relief from the endless rounds of Beethoven and Brahms concertos that have been so prevalent the last few years. Infinitely greater as music, those works have nevertheless been overexposed. The way young musicians act, these days, you'd think no other music had been written. Yet there is the whole 19th century to explore, and the Scharwenka next Wednesday will illustrate a facet of the repertory that could well be occasionally examined.

*

We already have gone through the baroque revival, in which one wretched work after the other has been revived. Those dry, impersonal, tonic-dominant, pattern-ridden concerti grossi and trio sonatas, one sounding like the other! Yet they are being listened to seriously, and nobody condemns a Pugnani or a Locatelli baroque concerto for not being on the level of a Bach work. Yet when it comes to romantic music there is a double standard. There will be those next Wednesday who will laugh at the Scharwenka, mentally measuring it against the Brahms B flat or the Beethoven G major. And that is exactly the wrong way to approach the B flat minor Concerto. It must be taken as a period piece, just as the concertos of Locatelli, Pugnani et al. are period pieces. It must be judged not in relation to our time, but in relation to its time. Anyway, I will make a prediction. I predict that the audience on Wednesday will have a ball, will find the concerto enchanting and will go wild at the end.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 840,495 SUN. 1,494,704
DEC 15 1968

Music: Scharwenka's Rare Piano Concerto No. 1 in B Flat Minor

Earl Wild Is Pianist for Bravura Work

By HAROLD C. SCHONBERG

THERE was an unexpected change in last night's program of the Boston Symphony in Philharmonic Hall. Erich Leinsdorf, just recovering from the flu (he had to skip last week's concerts in Boston) opened the evening with Rossini's "L'Italiana in Algeri" Overture instead of the Variations for Orchestra by Arnold Schoenberg. Presumably he did not have the chance to rehearse the very difficult Variations, and he put in something that he and the orchestra would have no trouble speeding through.

But the real novelty of the program went on as scheduled. That was the Piano Concerto No. 1 in B flat minor by Xaver Scharwenka, a work that has not turned up in this city for a couple of generations (as a guess). Earl Wild was the pianist.

The concerto is a period piece—a bravura work in the late 19th-century rhetoric. It is not an original work. Scharwenka was not one of music's original thinkers, and one can have fun tracing the various composers who play a part in this work. Grieg is there, and Tchaikovsky, and Liszt and Schumann, and Chopin, and Anton Rubinstein, and Saint-Saëns. Toward the end of the last movement there is a theme that prefigures Rachmaninoff and the "Warsaw" Concerto, which is something of a feat considering that Scharwenka's was composed in 1877.

•

That said, the concerto nevertheless was great fun. It is a wing-ding of a romp, one in which the pianist starts with a great splurge and scarcely removes his hands from the keys for the next half hour. It has pretty melodies, and it has a fiendishly difficult solo part. Nobody but a very experienced virtuoso could have put this concerto together, and the writing here tells us a great deal about Scharwenka himself as a pianist. He must have been a powerhouse.

Christian Steiger

Earl Wild

It is easy to sneer at music like this, but it has value. Somebody once observed that difficulties overcome are a part of art. The B flat minor Concerto poses all kinds of problems for the soloist, and it takes a very clever and very proficient pianist to solve them.

This kind of music is not to be judged in terms of Brahms or Beethoven. It should be judged (to jump into another art) in terms of "Trilby" or "The First Violin." Period composers do reflect their age, and Scharwenka did, completely. It was a comfortable age, an age when the virtuoso was king, an age where sentiment ruled. The big composers could transcend it by expressing a monumental inner vision. The minor ones like Scharwenka reflected the superficial aspects of an age, and did it with style and grace.

And so the Scharwenka B flat minor Concerto was a charming, lightweight and exhibitionistic work. It was done to a turn by Mr. Wild, Mr. Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony. Mr. Wild is an underestimated pianist. As a technician he belongs up with the big boys—Horowitz, Bolet, name anybody. As an artist he has developed to a point where his style is secure, his phrasing has authority, and his tone is varied by constant delicate applications of color.

The second movement of the concerto whirls along with unison scale passages, prestissimo, and the way Mr. Wild played it was actually startling. It was sheer control all the way through with a feathery touch, minimum pedal and absolutely clear articulation. But there was not one place in the concerto where he was not master of the writing, and there is some very complicated as well as very massive writing. Mr. Wild played it like a romantic hero of the keyboard, and he had a fine accompaniment from Mr. Leinsdorf.

Now that the ice has been broken, how about some more? The Hummel A minor, Moszkowski E major, the d'Albert, the Saint-Saëns Third, the Rubinstein D minor? There is so much to explore.

•

Mr. Leinsdorf conducted a lively "Italiana in Algeri" and closed his program with an extended suite from Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet" Ballet. Whatever one thinks of the music, and some of it is uncomfortably trivial, there was no denying the splendor of the interpretation. The Boston Symphony played like the great orchestra it is, and Mr. Leinsdorf conducted with strong rhythm, suavity and taste. You could tell that he loves this music.

The Program

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, with Earl Wild, pianist. At Philharmonic Hall.
L'Italiana in Algeri Overture ..... Rossini
Piano Concerto No. 1 in B-flat minor ..... Scharwenka
Scenes from "Romeo and Juliet" ..... Prokofiev

Leinsdorf, Over Flu, Conducts the Boston

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 840,495 SUN. 1,494,704
DEC 20 1968

An additional review of this is on p. 20.

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 348,294 SUN. 406,966
DEC 15 1968

the village VOICE, January 9, ...

and finale had more effective power per line than I had heard since the days of Toscanini and, way back in his first Boston season, Charles Munch.

Between the Hindemith and Brahms was sandwiched Martinu's Second Piano Concerto, with Rudolf Firkusny breezing and storming through its showy difficulties in great spirits.

Great pianistic spirits continued on December 20 in the same hall, when Earl Wild, accompanied by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony, exhibited the lush Rachmaninoff-cum-Grieg luxuriance and super-Lisztian fireworks of Xavier Scharwenka's First Piano Concerto. This piece is unknown to two generations of concert goers, who seem to have been willing to hear only masterworks. But have they? The joyous cheers and applause that greeted Mr. Wild's tremendous playing would indicate otherwise.

Of course, Christmas wouldn't be Christmas in New York without Alexander Schneider, and, one often feels, neither would music be music. The spirit exuded

At Carnegie

The American Symphony Orchestra conducted by Everett Lee, with pianist Jeanne-Marie Darre, will perform Hindemith's "Music for Brass, Percussion, and Strings," Saint-Saens' Piano Concerto No. 2, and Sibelius' Symphony No. 1 on Sunday, January 12, at 3 p. m. and Monday, January 13, at 8.30 p. m. at Carnegie Hall.

New York Post
D. 628,146 SAT. 354,497
DEC 19 1968

...aven-
example, he
...n's Kammermusick
...rmonic Hall with Alvaro
..., making his debut as conductor
of a very interesting program with The Little Orchestra Society.

* * *

ANOTHER VIRTUOSO who has worked hard to escape type casting is pianist Earl Wild. On Wednesday and Friday, also at Philharmonic Hall, Wild will appear in a magnificent program which Erich Leinsdorf will present with the Boston Symphony.

Wild will perform a rarely heard Concerto No. 1 by the post-Romantic German composer Xaver Scharwenka, on a program including the Schoenberg Variations, Opus 31 and scenes from Prokofieff's ballet "Romeo and Juliet."

New York Post
D. 628,146 SAT. 354,497
DEC 18 1968

LE...
McBride, Ea...
anne Farrell,
N. Y. State Theater,
American Ballet Th...
Brooklyn Academy of Musi...
2:30 and 8:30.

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting; Earl Wild, soloist in Scharwenka's "Piano Concerto No. 1"; program also includes Rossini's Overture to "The Italian Women in Algiers" and excerpts from Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet", Philharmonic Hall, 8:30.

New York Post
D. 628,146 SAT. 354,497
DEC 20 1968

American Ballet ...
Brooklyn Academy of ...
8:30.

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor; Earl Wild, piano soloist in Scharwenka's "Concerto No. 1"; program also includes Rossini's Overture to "The Italian Women in Algiers," excerpts from Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet"; Philharmonic Hall, 8:30.

Words and Music

By Harriett Johnson

Wild, Leinsdorf Spring Surprise

Pianist Earl Wild, Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony came up with a forgotten piece last night in Philharmonic Hall. Its success was so great it might well bring about a resurge of romanticism in concerto programming. Wild sat about 29 minutes playing consistently more notes per minute than I ever remember hearing during that period before. And they were good notes, brilliantly played.

A Polish Don Juan, Xaver Scharwenka, was composer-pianist, and he wrote his Piano Concerto No. 1 in B Flat Minor in 1877 when he was 27. He played the Hanover premiere himself, and also the first performance by the Boston Symphony, Arthur Nikisch conducting in 1891. Appropriately for its virtuosity, the composition is dedicated to Franz Liszt.

Even authorities on the piano literature have dismissed Scharwenka, whose brother, three years older, was also a composer. I telephoned one such authority after the concert to verify. He had never bothered to look at the score.

Harold Schonberg, my N. Y. Times colleague, is an exception, and he suggests also that there are at least 20 other glowing romantic concerts which might well be revived.

No Slow Movement

In three movements, the piece has no slow movement, only a melodic interlude here and there and some secondary themes of lyrical feeling. But no matter how lyrical the mood, the accompaniment frolics along with zest, high jinks and pertinence.

The stunning performance brought not only an ovation for pianist and conductor, but an ovation of words during intermission from the audience. Everywhere one heard, "Wasn't that great?"—or "great fun?"

Schwarwenka's themes either had a disarmingly spontaneous virtuosity or an immediate melodic appeal.

They appeared to emerge from folk origins into a sophistication which vouched for a composer of sizable inspiration and skill. He obviously loved his instrument and wrote for it with unqualified joy and awareness. The Concerto is more than a display piece. True, it doesn't invade the psychological underground. It loves life, revels in the sun, and says so in music.

Wild's performance, executed with musical fanfare but without theatrics, must be summed up in superlatives. In its way, it was simply astounding. He began with a Niagara Falls of notes and kept pouring them out with scintillation for a half hour. Wild once studied with a pupil of Scharwenka and his interpretation indicated that the lessons were part seance.

The program opened with the Overture to Rossini's "L'Italiana in Algeri," and closed with scenes from Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet."

Music

Now There's a Forgotten Composer for You

By HAROLD C. SCHONBERG

I NEVER thought I'd live to see the day, but here it is — or will be, on Wednesday. Earl Wild will play the Piano Concerto in B flat minor by Franz Xaver Scharwenka, with the Boston Symphony conducted by Erich Leinsdorf.

Now there's a forgotten composer for you, though I imagine that piano students still play his Polish Dance in E flat minor. He himself recorded it, shortly before World War I, along with two other disks for the Columbia company in New York. Scharwenka was no stranger here, having run a conservatory in this city and having made extensive tours of the country. There are photographs of him at the time. He wears a fur hat and fur-trimmed coat, has a strong face and a virile mustache: very much the dashing, romantic Pole. His Piano Concerto in B flat minor was composed in 1877 and was highly regarded in its day. Liszt was impressed when he heard it, and that connoisseur of piano music and piano playing, James Gibbons Huneker, thought the second subject of the first movement one of the most beautiful inspirations of the then modern school.

*

But the concerto disappeared after World War I. Perhaps it occasionally turns up at conservatory concerts here and there, but there has been no public performance in my time. It is music that ran counter to the esthetic of the new schools of the 20th century, and in the last 50 years if anybody mentioned it, it was only to sneer. Scharwenka's music had vanished, like the horse, the two-cylinder motor car, the Gibson girl, potted palms and the piano concertos of Rubinstein, Moszkowski, Herz, Litolff, d'Albert, Dreyschock and the other virtuoso composers of the 19th century.

Scharwenka (1850-1924) was born in a section of Poland that was part of Prussia, studied in Berlin, made his debut in 1869 and went on to a fine career as pianist and teacher. In 1881 he opened his own conservatory in Berlin, and 10 years later came to New York as head of the Scharwenka Conservatory of Music. Then he went back to Berlin, in 1898, and opened another conservatory. He was very well known as a pianist, and there is a flattering description of his playing in the 1910 edition of Grove's Dictionary. "As a pianist," says Grove's, "Xaver Scharwenka is renowned above all his other qualifications for the beautiful quality of his tone, which is rich, round, soft, yet great, and singing, for which it would be difficult to name another living pianist as his equal. His power is enormous, yet he never bangs, and has no mannerisms, his arms and body at the piano appearing to be almost without movement. If he is a specialist . . . it is of Chopin, whose nationality he partly shares, but of the other great masters his readings are always grand and musicianly, while to hear him play a waltz of Strauss is as dance-inspiring as the magic bells of Papageno." Those Columbia records do not support so great a tribute, and the playing is sloppy, though the famous Polish Dance does go with elegance and spirit.

To understand the B flat minor Concerto, it is necessary to understand the spirit in which it was written. The score is representative of an entire class of 19th-century works—the virtuoso salon concerto. The idea was, primarily, to entertain. It is doubtful if Scharwenka, when writing this concerto, had any ideas about immortality or competing with Brahms and Beethoven.

The music, like nearly all other examples in this genre, followed a pattern. There is a first movement in sonata form, with an orchestral introduction and an entrance of the piano in which great chords, arpeggios and scale passages are hurled around. One of the movements that follows is sure to be fluffy, cute and salon-like. The last movement is always a fast-moving, energetic affair in which the musical substance is light and the fireworks heavy.

All right. Nobody, not even the composer, was going to pretend that this is great music. What it does have is pianistic ingenuity. It was written in an era when the pupils of Liszt were flooding the market (shortly to be followed by the pupils of Leschetizky), an era when the virtuoso was king. The idea was to provide the virtuoso with a brilliant, effective showpiece. If the composer could get some ingenuity and melodic appeal into his music, so much the better. A few composers did. The Henselt F minor Concerto held on to the 1920's, and the Rubinstein D minor a generation after that.

*

On all accounts the Scharwenka B flat minor Concerto succeeds in achieving what it set out to do. Melodically it has a good deal of charm — period charm, to be sure, but authentic of its kind. And the writing for solo piano is dazzling — full of ideas, full of brilliance, and even a good deal of originality. No wonder the concerto became as popular as it did, and no wonder virtually every important pianist rushed to play it. And, it naturally follows, no wonder audiences loved it. Only a more severe age would turn its nose up at such innocent, good-natured, sparkling music. But it so happened that a severe age did come, and the Scharwenka, along with the other works of its kind, was swept into the dustbin.

Works like the Scharwenka should be revived, and Leinsdorf is to be congratulated for his enterprise in programing it. Not only enterprise, but daring. It actually takes daring to program so dated a work, one so utterly out of fashion, one so despised by the taste-makers. But if nothing else, the Scharwenka will be a relief from the endless rounds of Beethoven and Brahms concertos that have been so prevalent the last few years. Infinitely greater as music, those works have nevertheless been overexposed. The way young musicians act, these days, you'd think no other music had been written. Yet there is the whole 19th century to explore, and the Scharwenka next Wednesday will illustrate a facet of the repertory that could well be occasionally examined.

*

We already have gone through the baroque revival, in which one wretched work after the other has been revived. Those dry, impersonal, tonic-dominant, pattern-ridden concerti grossi and trio sonatas, one sounding like the other! Yet they are being listened to seriously, and nobody condemns a Pugnani or a Locatelli baroque concerto for not being on the level of a Bach work. Yet when it comes to romantic music there is a double standard. There will be those next Wednesday who will laugh at the Scharwenka, mentally measuring it against the Brahms B flat or the Beethoven G major. And that is exactly the wrong way to approach the B flat minor Concerto. It must be taken as a period piece, just as the concertos of Locatelli, Pugnani et al. are period pieces. It must be judged not in relation to our time, but in relation to its time. Anyway, I will make a prediction. I predict that the audience on Wednesday will have a ball, will find the concerto enchanting and will go wild at the end.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 840,495 SUN. 1,494,704

DEC 15 1968

Music: Scharwenka's Rare Piano Concerto No. 1 in B Flat Minor

Earl Wild Is Pianist for Bravura Work

By HAROLD C. SCHONBERG

THERE was an unexpected change in last night's program of the Boston Symphony in Philharmonic Hall. Erich Leinsdorf, just recovering from the flu (he had to skip last week's concerts in Boston) opened the evening with Rossini's "L'Italiana in Algeri" Overture instead of the Variations for Orchestra by Arnold Schoenberg. Presumably he did not have the chance to rehearse the very difficult Variations, and he put in something that he and the orchestra would have no trouble speeding through.

But the real novelty of the program went on as scheduled. That was the Piano Concerto No. 1 in B flat minor by Xaver Scharwenka, a work that has not turned up in this city for a couple of generations (as a guess). Earl Wild was the pianist.

The concerto is a period piece—a bravura work in the late 19th-century rhetoric. It is not an original work. Scharwenka was not one of music's original thinkers, and one can have fun tracing the various composers who play a part in this work. Grieg is there, and Tchaikovsky, and Liszt and Schumann, and Chopin, and Anton Rubinstein, and Saint-Saëns. Toward the end of the last movement there is a theme that prefigures Rachmaninoff and the "Warsaw" Concerto, which is something of a feat considering that Scharwenka's was composed in 1877.

•

That said, the concerto nevertheless was great fun. It is a wing-ding of a romp, one in which the pianist starts with a great splurge and scarcely removes his hands from the keys for the next half hour. It has pretty melodies, and it has a fiendishly difficult solo part. Nobody but a very experienced virtuoso could have put this concerto together, and the writing here tells us a great deal about Scharwenka himself as a pianist. He must have been a powerhouse.

Christian Steiger

Earl Wild

It is easy to sneer at music like this, but it has value. Somebody once observed that difficulties overcome are a part of art. The B flat minor Concerto poses all kinds of problems for the soloist, and it takes a very clever and very proficient pianist to solve them.

This kind of music is not to be judged in terms of Brahms or Beethoven. It should be judged (to jump into another art) in terms of "Trilby" or "The First Violin." Period composers do reflect their age, and Scharwenka did, completely. It was a comfortable age, an age when the virtuoso was king, an age where sentiment ruled. The big composers could transcend it by expressing a monumental inner vision. The minor ones like Scharwenka reflected the superficial aspects of an age, and did it with style and grace.

And so the Scharwenka B flat minor Concerto was a charming, lightweight and exhibitionistic work. It was done to a turn by Mr. Wild, Mr. Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony. Mr. Wild is an underestimated pianist. As a technician he belongs up with the big boys—Horowitz, Bolet, name anybody. As an artist he has developed to a point where his style is secure, his phrasing has authority, and his tone is varied by constant delicate applications of color.

The second movement of the concerto whirls along with unison scale passages, prestissimo, and the way Mr. Wild played it was actually startling. It was sheer control all the way through with a feathery touch, minimum pedal and absolutely clear articulation. But there was not one place in the concerto where he was not master of the writing, and there is some very complicated as well as very massive writing. Mr. Wild played it like a romantic hero of the keyboard, and he had a fine accompaniment from Mr. Leinsdorf.

Now that the ice has been broken, how about some more? The Hummel A minor, Moszkowski E major, the d'Albert, the Saint-Saëns Third, the Rubinstein D minor? There is so much to explore.

•

Mr. Leinsdorf conducted a lively "Italiana in Algeri" and closed his program with an extended suite from Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet" Ballet. Whatever one thinks of the music, and some of it is uncomfortably trivial, there was no denying the splendor of the interpretation. The Boston Symphony played like the great orchestra it is, and Mr. Leinsdorf conducted with strong rhythm, suavity and taste. You could tell that he loves this music.

The Program

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, with Earl Wild, pianist. At Philharmonic Hall.
L'Italiana in Algeri Overture ..... Rossini
Piano Concerto No. 1 in B-flat minor ..... Scharwenka
Scenes from "Romeo and Juliet" ..... Prokofiev

Leinsdorf, Over Flu, Conducts the Boston

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 840,495 SUN. 1,494,704

DEC 20 1968

An additional review of this is on p. 20.

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 348,294 SUN. 406,966

DEC 15 1968

the village VOICE, January 9,

and finale had more effective power per line than I had heard since the days of Toscanini and, way back in his first Boston season, Charles Munch.

Between the Hindemith and Brahms was sandwiched Martinu's Second Piano Concerto, with Rudolf Firkusny breezing and storming through its showy difficulties in great spirits.

Great pianistic spirits continued on December 20 in the same hall, when Earl Wild, accompanied by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony, exhibited the lush Rachmaninoff-cum-Grieg luxuriance and super-Lisztian fireworks of Xavier Scharwenka's First Piano Concerto. This piece is unknown to two generations of concert goers, who seem to have been willing to hear only masterworks. But have they? The joyous cheers and applause that greeted Mr. Wild's tremendous playing would indicate otherwise.

Of course, Christmas wouldn't be Christmas in New York without Alexander Schneider, and, one often feels, neither would music be music. The spirit exuded

At Carnegie

The American Symphony Orchestra conducted by Everett Lee, with pianist Jeanne-Marie Darre, will perform Hindemith's "Music for Brass, Percussion, and Strings," Saint-Saens' Piano Concerto No. 2, and Sibelius' Symphony No. 1 on Sunday, January 12, at 3 p. m. and Monday, January 13, at 8.30 p. m. at Carnegie Hall.

New York Post
D. 628,146 SAT. 354,497

DEC 19 1968

...adven-
example, he
...n's Kammermusick
...rmonic Hall with Alvaro
..., making his debut as conductor
of a very interesting program with The Little Orchestra Society.

* * *

ANOTHER VIRTUOSO who has worked hard to escape type casting is pianist Earl Wild. On Wednesday and Friday, also at Philharmonic Hall, Wild will appear in a magnificent program which Erich Leinsdorf will present with the Boston Symphony.

Wild will perform a rarely heard Concerto No. 1 by the post-Romantic German composer Xaver Scharwenka, on a program including the Schoenberg Variations, Opus 31 and scenes from Prokofieff's ballet "Romeo and Juliet."

New York Post
D. 628,146 SAT. 354,497

DEC 18 1968

Lin...
McBride, Ea...
anne Farrell,
N. Y. State Theater,
American Ballet Th...
Brooklyn Academy of Music,
2:30 and 8:30.

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting; Earl Wild, soloist in Scharwenka's "Piano Concerto No. 1"; program also includes Rossini's Overture to "The Italian Women in Algiers" and excerpts from Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet", Philharmonic Hall, 8:30.

New York Post
D. 628,146 SAT. 354,497

DEC 20 1968

American Ballet ...
Brooklyn Academy of ...
8:30.

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor; Earl Wild, piano soloist in Scharwenka's "Concerto No. 1"; program also includes Rossini's Overture to "The Italian Women in Algiers," excerpts from Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet"; Philharmonic Hall, 8:30.

Words and Music

By Harriett Johnson

Wild, Leinsdorf Spring Surprise

Pianist Earl Wild, Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony came up with a forgotten piece last night in Philharmonic Hall. Its success was so great it might well bring about a resurge of romanticism in concerto programming. Wild sat about 29 minutes playing consistently more notes per minute than I ever remember hearing during that period before. And they were good notes, brilliantly played.

A Polish Don Juan, Xaver Scharwenka, was composer-pianist, and he wrote his Piano Concerto No. 1 in B Flat Minor in 1877 when he was 27. He played the Hanover premiere himself, and also the first performance by the Boston Symphony, Arthur Nikisch conducting in 1891. Appropriately for its virtuosity, the composition is dedicated to Franz Liszt.

Even authorities on the piano literature have dismissed Scharwenka, whose brother, three years older, was also a composer. I telephoned one such authority after the concert to verify. He had never bothered to look at the score.

Harold Schonberg, my N. Y. Times colleague, is an exception, and he suggests also that there are at least 20 other glowing romantic concerts which might well be revived.

No Slow Movement

In three movements, the piece has no slow movement, only a melodic interlude here and there and some secondary themes of lyrical feeling. But no matter how lyrical the mood, the accompaniment frolics along with zest, high jinks and impertinence.

The stunning performance brought not only an ovation for pianist and conductor, but an ovation of words during intermission from the audience. Everywhere one heard, "Wasn't that great?"—or "great fun?"

Schwarwenka's themes either had a disarmingly spontaneous virtuosity or an immediate melodic appeal.

They appeared to emerge from folk origins into a sophistication which vouched for a composer of sizable inspiration and skill. He obviously loved his instrument and wrote for it with unqualified joy and awareness. The Concerto is more than a display piece. True, it doesn't invade the psychological underground. It loves life, revels in the sun, and says so in music.

Wild's performance, executed with musical fanfare but without theatrics, must be summed up in superlatives. In its way, it was simply astounding. He began with a Niagara Falls of notes and kept pouring them out with scintillation for a half hour. Wild once studied with a pupil of Scharwenka and his interpretation indicated that the lessons were part seance.

The program opened with the Overture to Rossini's "L'Italiana in Algeri," and closed with scenes from Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet."

64.

Leinsdorf To Conduct

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday in a concert at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The 8:30 p.m. program will feature Beethoven's "Symphony No. 1 in C Major, Op. 21" and Brahms' "Symphony No. 4 in E Minor, Op. 98."

SUNDAY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
SUN. 3,099,658
DEC 15 1968

Boston at Carnegie

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Erich Leinsdorf, with piano soloist Claude Frank, will perform on Saturday, December 21, at 8.30 p. m. at the Carnegie Hall. The program will include the Mozart Piano Concerto in B-flat major, K. 595, Debussy's Rhapsodie for Saxophone and Orchestra (with soloist Felix Viscuglia), Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring," and Kurt Weill's Suite for Winds from "The Threepenny Opera" ("Kleine Dreigroschenmusik fuer Blasochester"). Available tickets range from $3 to $7.

On Thursday, December 19, at 8.30 p. m. at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, the Boston Symphony will be heard in the Weill work, Brahms' Symphony No. 4, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 1.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
VILLAGE VOICE
W. 35,500
DEC 19 1968

The Evening Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 309,245 SUN. 358,738
DEC 23 1968

Symphony Borrows Key Man in Concert

NEW YORK (UPI)—A sold-out house at Carnegie Hall Saturday night heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra's full program despite a last-minute emergency that threatened to upset it.

Flu struck the orchestra's virtuose kettle-drum player, Everett Firth, one of the key men in the programmed performance of Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring."

Conductor Erick Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony, knew that much of the audience had come to hear this particular work. So he arranged to borrow the New York Philharmonic's world famous Saul Goodman for the evening performance.

Goodman played the first half of the Philharmonic's concert, then joined the Boston Symphony to bring off its performance without a hitch.

Hub Symphony Conductor Foils Flu With Sub

NEW YORK (UPI)—A sold-out house at Carnegie Hall Saturday night heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra's full program despite a last minute emergency that threatened to upset it.

Flu struck the orchestra's virtuoso kettle-drum player, Everett Firth, one of the key men in the programmed performance of Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring."

Conductor Erick Leinseorf, music director of the Boston Symphony, knew that much of the audience had come to hear this particular work. He decided a sold-out audience should not be disappointed so he arranged to borrow the New York Philharmonic's world famous Saul Goodman for the evening performance.

So Goodman played the first half of the Philharmonic's concert, then joined the Boston Symphony to bring off its performance without a hitch.

The audience did indeed hear "The Rite of Spring" and few were aware they were hearing the combined talents of the Boston Symphony and the New York Philharmonic.

PRESS-HERALD (m)
PORTLAND, ME.
CIRC. 55,900
DEC 23 1968
New England Newsclip

'Rite of Spring' Periled by Flu

NEW YORK (UPI) — A sold-out house at Carnegie Hall Saturday night heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra's full program despite a last minute emergency that threatened to upset it.

Flu struck the orchestra's virtuoso kettle-drum player, Everett Firth one of the key men in the programmed performance of Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring."

Conductor Erick Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony, knew that much of the audience had come to hear this particular work. He decided a sold-out audience should not be disappointed so he arranged to borrow the New York Philharmonic's world famous Saul Goodman for the evening performance.

So Goodman played the first half of the Philharmonic's concert, then joined the Boston Symphony to bring off its performance without a hitch.

COURANT (m)
HARTFORD, CONN.
CIRC. 150,750
DEC 23 1968
New England Newsclip

THE NEW YORK TIMES, SUNDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1968

Office Absenteeism Up 50% Here in Flu Outbreak

By WILLIAM E. FARRELL

Absenteeism from offices here is 50 per cent greater than last year because or the flu epidemic, the head of the Commerce and Industry Association of New York said yesterday.

Ralph C. Gross, the president of the association, which represents a majority of the city's big businesses, said that an informal survey of personnel managers of banks, insurance companies, retail stores and other businesses was taken on Friday.

Mr. Gross said that the personnel policy of the concerns surveyed was "stay home until you're no longer contagious." He added that the total number of persons employed by the businesses contacted was "literally in the hundreds of thousands."

The flu epidemic, which poses hazards for the old, the weak and the chronically ill, "has cut into Christmas business to some extent," Mr. Gross added. He said precise figures on the extent of the decline in buying were not yet available.

Stores Crowded

David C. Hickey, the president of the Hotel Association of New York, confirmed Mr. Gross's assessment of the absentee rate. Normally 5 per cent of the city's thousands of hotel employes are out sick, he said, adding that the current figure was between 7 and 8 per cent.

Despite estimates that retail buying was sluggish, hordes of shoppers crowded into midtown stores yesterday, one of the three major shopping days of the Christmas season.

Several liquor dealers reported that a few office parties were being canceled.

Harry Englander, owner of the Commuters Wine and Liquor Stores, Inc., 211 West 34th Street, said: "The big headache is deliveries. The flu has hit the truckmen, and it's cut down deliveries."

A Rite Performed

At Carnegie Hall last night, the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented its full program despite the fact that the orchestra's virtuoso kettle-drum player, Everett Firth, had been struck by the flu. Mr. Firth was to be one of the key men in the performance of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring."

Erick Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony, arranged to borrow Saul Goodman of the New York Philharmonic for the performance before a sell-out audience.

Mr. Goodman played the first half of the Philharmonic's concert at Lincoln Center, then joined the Boston Symphony to bring off its performance.

A spokesman for the City Health Department, which has estimated that about 20 per cent of the city's population will contract the flu, restated a warning that the aged and people susceptible to respiratory ailments should avoid large gatherings. Pneumonia is a major complication of flu.

The spokesman also said that the department had enough flu vaccine for only two more days and that another batch of 40,000 units would not be shipped to the city until Jan. 2.

The department has been giving vaccinations to the elderly and the chronically ill at the city's 22 district health centers. It will resume the shots Monday from 9 to 11 A.M.

In Washington, C. Joseph Stetler, the president of the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association, announced that the six companies making the vaccine hoped to produce 20 million doses by Feb. 1.

Mr. Stetler said that the plants were operating 24 hours a day and would be functioning on Christmas Day.

Boston Symphony, Watts (Leinsdorf)

There are any number of young pianists around who can tear a piano to pieces with their dazzling technique. The music conservatories of Europe and the United States have been turning them out for years, and audiences today have come to expect absolute technical mastery, if nothing else, as a matter of course. A performer of prodigious facility is therefore admired, but not necessarily acclaimed. Why then is André Watts not only admired and acclaimed, but exalted as well? The answer was found in his January 15th Philharmonic Hall concert with the Boston Symphony.

It is because Watts plays the piano with love, and in some ways it's a very old-fashioned way to go about it. Remember the days when one unabashedly talked about a pianist's singing tone or his beautiful touch? Watts has both. Or a perfect legato and complete dynamic control? Score two more. By approaching his instrument as a friend to be enjoyed and respected, and not as an enemy to be conquered, André Watts achieves a potent combination of old-time virtues with new-time technique. The result is irresistible.

These qualities were displayed in the Symphonic Variations of Franck and Liszt's First Piano Concerto. With sprightly tempos and sharply articulated rhythms, the pianist made the most of the Franck's thin material. In the Liszt, the close rapport between the conductor Erich Leinsdorf and the soloist added another old-fashioned touch of music making for the love of it. The opening work of the evening, Walter Piston's Prelude and Allegro for organ and strings, enlisted the excellent aid

HIGH FIDELITY / musical america
Apr. '69

of organist Berj Zamkochian, but the acerbic counterpoint of the piece managed to sound more dated and less energetic than it had at earlier hearings.

Leinsdorf also led the orchestra into the bosky copses of Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony. Although meticulously painted, the sylvan scene suffered from a surfeit of serenity. (Sibilants are irresistible too.) But perhaps even babbling brooks have less babble in and around Boston than they do elsewhere.

ARTHUR SATZ

64.

Leinsdorf To Conduct

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday in a concert at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The 8:30 p.m. program will feature Beethoven's "Symphony No. 1 in C Major, Op. 21" and Brahms' "Symphony No. 4 in E Minor, Op. 98."

SUNDAY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
SUN. 3,099,658

DEC 15 1968

Boston at Carnegie

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Erich Leinsdorf, with piano soloist Claude Frank, will perform on Saturday, December 21, at 8.30 p. m. at the Carnegie Hall. The program will include the Mozart Piano Concerto in B-flat major, K. 595, Debussy's Rhapsodie for Saxophone and Orchestra (with soloist Felix Viscuglia), Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring," and Kurt Weill's Suite for Winds from "The Threepenny Opera" ("Kleine Dreigroschenmusik fuer Blasochester"). Available tickets range from $3 to $7.

On Thursday, December 19, at 8.30 p. m. at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, the Boston Symphony will be heard in the Weill work, Brahms' Symphony No. 4, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 1.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
VILLAGE VOICE
W. 35,500

DEC 19 1968

The Evening Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 309,245 SUN. 358,738

DEC 23 1968

Symphony Borrows Key Man in Concert

NEW YORK (UPI)—A sold-out house at Carnegie Hall Saturday night heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra's full program despite a last-minute emergency that threatened to upset it.

Flu struck the orchestra's virtuoso kettle-drum player, Everett Firth, one of the key men in the programmed performance of Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring."

Conductor Erick Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony, knew that much of the audience had come to hear this particular work. So he arranged to borrow the New York Philharmonic's world famous Saul Goodman for the evening performance.

Goodman played the first half of the Philharmonic's concert, then joined the Boston Symphony to bring off its performance without a hitch.

Hub Symphony Conductor Foils Flu With Sub

NEW YORK (UPI)—A sold-out house at Carnegie Hall Saturday night heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra's full program ~~despite a~~ last minute emergency that threatened to upset it.

Flu struck the orchestra's virtuoso kettle-drum player, Everett Firth, one of the key men in the programmed performance of Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring."

Conductor Erick Leinseorf, music director of the Boston Symphony, knew that much of the audience had come to hear this particular work. He decided a sold-out audience should not be disappointed so he arranged to borrow the New York Philharmonic's world famous Saul Goodman for the evening performance.

So Goodman played the first half of the Philharmonic's concert, then joined the Boston Symphony to bring off its performance without a hitch.

The audience did indeed hear "The Rite of Spring" and few were aware they were hearing the combined talents of the Boston Symphony and the New York Philharmonic.

PRESS-HERALD (m)
PORTLAND, ME.
CIRC. 55,900

DEC 23 1968

New England Newsclip

'Rite of Spring' Periled by Flu

NEW YORK (UPI) — A sold-out house at Carnegie Hall Saturday night heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra's full program despite a last minute emergency that threatened to upset it.

Flu struck the orchestra's virtuoso kettle-drum player, Everett Firth one of the key men in the programmed performance of Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring."

Conductor Erick Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony, knew that much of the audience had come to hear this particular work. He decided a sold-out audience should not be disappointed so he arranged to borrow the New York Philharmonic's world famous Saul Goodman for the evening performance.

So Goodman played the first half of the Philharmonic's concert, then joined the Boston Symphony to bring off its performance without a hitch.

COURANT (m)
HARTFORD, CONN.
CIRC. 150,750

DEC 23 1968

New England Newsclip

THE NEW YORK TIMES, SUNDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1968

Office Absenteeism Up 50% Here in Flu Outbreak

By WILLIAM E. FARRELL

Absenteeism from offices here is 50 per cent greater than last year because or the flu epidemic, the head of the Commerce and Industry Association of New York said yesterday.

Ralph C. Gross, the president of the association, which represents a majority of the city's big businesses, said that an informal survey of personnel managers of banks, insurance companies, retail stores and other businesses was taken on Friday.

Mr. Gross said that the personnel policy of the concerns surveyed was "stay home until you're no longer contagious." He added that the total number of persons employed by the businesses contacted was "literally in the hundreds of thousands."

The flu epidemic, which poses hazards for the old, the weak and the chronically ill, "has cut into Christmas business to some extent," Mr. Gross added. He said precise figures on the extent of the decline in buying were not yet available.

Stores Crowded

David C. Hickey, the president of the Hotel Association of New York, confirmed Mr. Gross's assessment of the absentee rate. Normally 5 per cent of the city's thousands of hotel employes are out sick, he said, adding that the current figure was between 7 and 8 per cent.

Despite estimates that retail buying was sluggish, hordes of shoppers crowded into midtown stores yesterday, one of the three major shopping days of the Christmas season.

Several liquor dealers reported that a few office parties were being canceled.

Harry Englander, owner of the Commuters Wine and Liquor Stores, Inc., 211 West 34th Street, said: "The big headache is deliveries. The flu has hit the truckmen, and it's cut down deliveries."

A Rite Performed

At Carnegie Hall last night, the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented its full program despite the fact that the orchestra's virtuoso kettle-drum player, Everett Firth, had been struck by the flu. Mr. Firth was to be one of the key men in the performance of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring."

Erick Leinsdorf, conductor of the Boston Symphony, arranged to borrow Saul Goodman of the New York Philharmonic for the performance before a sell-out audience.

Mr. Goodman played the first half of the Philharmonic's concert at Lincoln Center, then joined the Boston Symphony to bring off its performance.

A spokesman for the City Health Department, which has estimated that about 20 per cent of the city's population will contract the flu, restated a warning that the aged and people susceptible to respiratory ailments should avoid large gatherings. Pneumonia is a major complication of flu.

The spokesman also said that the department had enough flu vaccine for only two more days and that another batch of 40,000 units would not be shipped to the city until Jan. 2.

The department has been giving vaccinations to the elderly and the chronically ill at the city's 22 district health centers. It will resume the shots Monday from 9 to 11 A.M.

In Washington, C. Joseph Stetler, the president of the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association, announced that the six companies making the vaccine hoped to produce 20 million doses by Feb. 1.

Mr. Stetler said that the plants were operating 24 hours a day and would be functioning on Christmas Day.

Boston Symphony, Watts (Leinsdorf)

There are any number of young pianists around who can tear a piano to pieces with their dazzling technique. The music conservatories of Europe and the United States have been turning them out for years, and audiences today have come to expect absolute technical mastery, if nothing else, as a matter of course. A performer of prodigious facility is therefore admired, but not necessarily acclaimed. Why then is André Watts not only admired and acclaimed, but exalted as well? The answer was found in his January 15th Philharmonic Hall concert with the Boston Symphony.

It is because Watts plays the piano with love, and in some ways it's a very old-fashioned way to go about it. Remember the days when one unabashedly talked about a pianist's singing tone or his beautiful touch? Watts has both. Or a perfect legato and complete dynamic control? Score two more. By approaching his instrument as a friend to be enjoyed and respected, and not as an enemy to be conquered, André Watts achieves a potent combination of old-time virtues with new-time technique. The result is irresistible.

These qualities were displayed in the Symphonic Variations of Franck and Liszt's First Piano Concerto. With sprightly tempos and sharply articulated rhythms, the pianist made the most of the Franck's thin material. In the Liszt, the close rapport between the conductor Erich Leinsdorf and the soloist added another old-fashioned touch of music making for the love of it. The opening work of the evening, Walter Piston's Prelude and Allegro for organ and strings, enlisted the excellent aid of organist Berj Zamkochian, but the acerbic counterpoint of the piece managed to sound more dated and less energetic than it had at earlier hearings.

HIGH FIDELITY / musical america
Apr. '69

Leinsdorf also led the orchestra into the bosky copses of Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony. Although meticulously painted, the sylvan scene suffered from a surfeit of serenity. (Sibilants are irresistible too.) But perhaps even babbling brooks have less babble in and around Boston than they do elsewhere.

ARTHUR SATZ

65

SCARSDALE INQUIRER
Thursday, January 9, 1969

Erich Leinsdorf To Conduct In New York City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will perform in New York City Wednesday and Friday evenings at 8:30, January 15 and 17. The orchestra will be conducted by its Music Director, Erich Leinsdorf, in the two Philharmonic Hall concerts featuring Andre Watts as soloist in the Franck Symphonic variations and the Liszt Concerto no. 1 in E flat. The seventy-fifth birthday of Walter Piston will be marked by a performance of his Prelude and allegro for organ and strings.

On Saturday evening January 18, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the orchestra in the first New York performance of the original 1912 version of Richard Strauss's opera "Ariadne auf Naxos." Claire Watson, Beverly Sills, Robert Nagy, and John Reardon head the concert performance cast as they did two weeks earlier in Boston when the work received its American premiere.

New York Post
D. 628,146 SAT. 354,497

JAN 16 1969

Words and Music

By Harriett Johnson

Leinsdorf Leads Watts in 2 Works

Erich Leinsdorf's program last night with the Boston Symphony in Philharmonic Hall was non-controversial and doubly exciting because 22-year-old Andre Watts was on-stage at the piano during the entire second half of the concert. He played the Cesar Franck "Symphonic Variations for Piano and Orchestra," and the Liszt Piano Concerto No. 1 in E Flat Major.

So much has been written about Watts in superlatives that it becomes boring repeatedly to pile them on. But we must give him his due. There is little doubt that for his age bracket, he is the most extraordinarily gifted, most mature, most musically expansive and unneurotic American concert pianist currently playing the major circuit.

There is an emotional fierceness in his personality which, when it counted, made him play as if he were attacking a prey. Part of this is his strong, intense rhythmic control. His stance made it look as if the prey were Leinsdorf but the musical results denied any such nonsense. He and the maestro were superbly sympathetic collaborators in both works.

Leinsdorf embraced him like a son, and Watts grinned at the applause like the prince of modesty he is away from the piano. Once he touches the keys he becomes the commanding general.

While Watts' playing wasn't musically tense, and while his performances were spectacularly clear, (the opening octaves in the Liszt were amazing in this respect) he did show some tension in tonal quality. There was a wiry timbre, not noticeable in my previous experience. It showed through all the astonishing and most rewarding aspects of his playing.

Piston's Birthday Honored

For the most part, his phrasing was deeply sensitive but his opening statements in the Franck lacked something in communicating the theme. Unfairly neglected in recent years as a concert piece, the Franck is individual in its chromatic style and immensely effective. Certainly Watts made it brilliantly so. The Liszt was performed as if electrified by a dozen generators.

Leinsdorf opened the program with Walter Piston's "Prelude and Allegro for Organ and Strings," a noble piece which takes pride in its debt to Bach. It was performed in honor of Piston's 75th birthday which is Monday. Berj Zamochian was the expert soloist. Beethoven's Symphony No. 6 in F Major, Op. 68, "The Pastoral," followed, in an interpretation which was extremely precise, but still sprinted along fluidly and buoyantly when this behavior was beneficial. It was as if spring were just around the corner.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 840,495 SUN. 1.494.704

JAN 16 1969

BROOKVILLE REPORTER
Thursday, January 9, 1969

Boston Symphony To Make Appearance

Following the fourth Symphony Hall concert of its Tuesday "B" series, conducted by Charles Wilson, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will spend the rest of the week in New York City.

On Wednesday and Friday evenings at 8:30 p.m. Jan. 15 and 17, the Orchestra will be conducted by its Music Director, Erich Leinsdorf, in two Philharmonic Hall concerts featuring Andre Watts as soloist in two works, the Franck Symphonic variations and the Liszt Concerto no. 1 in E flat. The seventy-fifth birthday of Walter Piston will be marked by a performance of his Prelude and allegro for organ and strings.

On Saturday evening January 18, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the first New York performance of the original 1912 version of Richard Strauss' opera Ariadne auf Naxos. Claire Watson, Beverly Sills, Robert Nagy, and John Reardon head the concert performance cast as they did two weeks earlier in Boston when the work received its American premiere.

BROOKLYN DAILY EAGLE
Saturday, January 18, 1969

BROOKLYN KINGS COURIER
Saturday, January 18, 1969

Boston Symphony At Philharmonic

Following the fourth Symphony Hall concert of its Tues. "B" series, conducted by Charles Wilson, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will spend the rest of the week in New York City.

On Wed. and Fri. evenings at 8:30, Jan. 15 and 17, the Orchestra will be conducted by its Music Director, Erich Leinsdorf, in two New York Philharmonic Hall concerts featuring Andre Watts as soloist in two works, the Franck Symphonic variations and the Liszt Concerto No. 1 in E flat. The seventy-fifth birthday of Walter Piston will be marked by a performance of his Prelude and allegro for organ and strings

On Sat. evening, Jan. 18, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the first New York performance of the original 1912 version of Richard Strauss's opera Ariadne auf Naxos. Claire Watson, Beverly Sills, Robert Nagy, and John Reardon head the concert performance cast as they did two weeks earlier in Boston when the work received its American premiere.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
VILLAGE VOICE
W. 35,500

JAN 30 1969

THE BOSTONIANS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's January 15 concert at Philharmonic Hall came to life in its second half with the taking of center stage by Andre Watts as piano soloist in Franck's "Symphonic Variations" and Liszt's E-flat Concerto. The Franck went rippling along, and Erich Leinsdorf's conducting gave glistening support. But if the Franck rippled, the Liszt exploded. Young Mr. Watts poured the octaves on with power that seemed to feed on itself. And the trills and other cascades of notes that light up the Liszt style were tossed off in a great illusion of ease.

The concert began with Walter Piston's short, Koussevitzky-era Prelude and Allegro for Organ and Strings, and its solidly built, fluent euphony provided real musical pleasure. Less happy was Leinsdorf's way with the Beethoven Pastoral Symphony. Its first two movements are perhaps the most boring Beethoven in the repertoire, and the conductor's weird tempo changes in the opening movement only added discomfort to the boredom. Leinsdorf simply could not seem to make the music move, not even in the songful finale.

—Leighton Kerner

Music: Watts and Liszt

Pianist Triumphs With Boston Symphony

By HAROLD C. SCHONBERG

WHATEVER excitement there was in last night's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Philharmonic Hall came from André Watts. The young pianist had the last half of the program, and rather than a large-scale concerto he chose two one-movement works—Franck's Symphonic Variations and the Liszt E flat Concerto.

Mr. Watts from the beginning has identified himself with the romantic repertory, and he has developed into a whale of a virtuoso pianist. He has many things going for him. By now his flashy technique is rock-solid dependable, he can achieve a massive sonority without banging, and the sheer momentum with which he engulfs the keyboard has something kinetic about it. He races along and never loses breath. It is the audience that gets out of breath. This kind of playing may not be a profound experience, but it, certainly is an exciting one.

●

In addition he has a decided charisma that comes right over the footlights. This cannot be taught. The great pianists are born with it—an ability to communicate, an ability to impress one's personality on the music. Mr. Watts has this in good measure. Part is natural showmanship, and that is not to be despised in the virtuoso literature. A good deal of the fun comes from the sport the pianist makes of the music. But part also is instinctive, and Mr. Watts seems to know exactly when to let loose, when to take the audience with him.

He played the Franck Symphonic Variations in a lively manner, with fast tempos, perfect articulation and bracing rhythm at the end. The Liszt, which was the work that brought him fame, went in an athletic, exuberant manner. There were some liberties, there were a few sections where Mr. Watts verged on bad taste.

But overriding everything was the red-blooded attack, the concept of Artist-as-Hero so integral to the Liszt E flat. Mr. Watts, a throwback to an older generation of pianists, stormed through the work, taking chances, not worrying about a missed note or two (not that there were any). It was terribly exciting, and in this kind of literature Mr. Watts impresses as the greatest thing that has come along since Johann Sebastian Namath.

●

Erich Leinsdorf's accompaniments were perfectly integrated. No matter where Mr. Watts went, there was the orchestra, anticipating everything. It also could be said that there was Mr. Watts, anticipating the orchestra. He may be a throwback, but he is also a musician who listens to the orchestra and looks at the conductor. Ensemble as well as virtuosity has been part of his schooling.

The first half of the concert had two works—Walter Piston's Prelude and Allegro for Organ and Strings, played in honor of his 75th birthday, and the Beethoven "Pastoral" Symphony. Berj Mankochian was the organist in the characteristically smooth, logical, impersonal Piston score. In the Beethoven the orchestra played well, naturally, and faithfully followed Mr. Leinsdorf's clear, cold, metronomic ideas about the music.

Henry Grossman

André Watts

The Program

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, with Erich Leinsdorf conducting; Andre Watts, pianist; Charles Wilson, organist. At Philharmonic Hall.

Prelude and Allegro for Organ and Strings ..... *Piston
Symphony No. 6 ("Pastoral") ..... Beethoven
Symphonic Variations ..... Franck
Piano Concerto No. 1 ..... Liszt

Meet Andre Watts, A Piano Virtuoso

By PERDITA DUNCAN

Andre Watts will give his only New York recital this season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Saturday evening, January 25 at 8:30 p.m. His program will include works by Liszt, Chopin, Schubert and Castaldo. (The latter is his teacher of theory and composition.)

In February 1963, when he was almost 17, Mr. Watts was introduced to the television audience by Leonard Bernstein as soloist for a New York Philharmonic Young People's Concert. Twenty days later, he substituted for the ailing Glen Gould at a regular Philharmonic concert and received the season's wildest ovation.

In the intervening six years, he has made successful appearances with a dozen major U.S. symphony orchestras; European debuts with the London and the Berlin Philharmonic orchestras; a world tour for the U.S. State Department playing in Paris, Munich, Milan, Athens, Teheran, etc. In each city his triumph was unprecedented, with critics runinng out of superlatives to afford him the highest critical acclaim.

5th Anniversary

In January 1968, Mr. Watts celebrated the fifth anniversary of his historic debut in a reunion performance with Leonard Bernstein and the N.Y. Philharmonic. That appearance made him a legend in his own lifetime at the age of 22.

Yet, Andre Watts has retained a boyish charm, a warmth and simplicity that is disarming. In talking to him, one gets the feeling that he accepts all the acclaim with a sense of wonder that it is all happening to him. He is thoroughly dedicated to his art and regards the long hours of practice as bringing him nearer to his goal.

When he is not on tour, he maintains a tight, busy schedule, leaving New York at 6 a.m. to go to Baltimore, where he is studying at the Peabody Conservatory of Music for his Bachelor of Music Degree with Leon Fleisher. After a full day's session, he returns to New York late at night, and when time permits, he practicse 6-8 hours a day.

Hsi favorite composers are Haydn, Beethoven, Schubert, Chopin and Liszt. He could not name a favorite composition not indicate the most difficult work he had ever played. He did point out that the introspective works require intense concentration.

As easy as it appears for him, he is ever concerned with how the hammers strike the piano strings, for only in keeping this in mind can he achieve an iridescent play of tone color.

Mr. Watts' closest companion is his mother, Maria Alexandra Watts. Hungarian by birth, she married an Afro-American career soldier in Germany. A good pianist herself, she gave young Andre his first lessons. She has reared her phenomenally gifted child with great insight and affection, yet maintaining a certain discipline. She is not unduly awed by his prodigious talent and keeps all that has happened in his career in proper perspective.

It is a certainty that Mr. Watts achievements in the world of music have kindled the admiration of the world and that he stands tall among the elite of pianists, who give the highest spiritual pleasure to their audiences.

Watts' Glowing Performance Lights Up Hall

NEW YORK — Andre Watts gave a stunning performance in Liszt's "Piano Concerto No. 1" with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony at Philharmonic Hall on Jan. 17. Watts' impeccable technique and strong personality have established him as a young sensation, and the Columbia Records artist, playing before a sold-out house, as usual, lived up to his growing reputation.

For the 22-year-old artist, who also was superb in Franck's "Symphonic Variations for Piano and Orchestra," the Liszt concerto, which he has recorded for Columbia with Leonard Bernstein and the New York Philharmonic, is a specialty and his dynamism brought new life to the warhorse.

Leinsdorf and the Boston, RCA artists, played splendidly in the two works with Watts, as well as in Beethoven's "Symphony No. 6 (Pastoral)." Leinsdorf and the Boston are recording the Beethoven symphonies for RCA. The program opened with Piston's "Prelude and Allegro for Organ and Strings" in honor of the composer's 75th birthday. Berj Zamkochian, who has recorded for RCA and the Gregorian Institute of America, was excellent as the soloist in the Piston work.

FRED KIRBY

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000

FEB 1 1969

Music in Review

by Perdita Duncan

Watts With Boston Symphony

Andre Watts, pianist, appeared as guest artist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Wednesday and Friday evening at Philharmonic Hall.

He played two works in the second half of the program, Cesar Franck's "Symphonic Variations for Piano and Orchestra" and Liszt's "Piano Concerto No. 1 in E-flat Major".

His performance held the audience spellbound as he delved into the inner sonorities of the music, playing them with a tender passion, a soaring beauty and an individual virtuosity that was breathtaking in its scope.

Mr. Watts has always been an artist who has perfect rapport with the conductor. He and Erich Leinsdorf were a perfect team to bring off the musical event of the season. As Mr. Leinsdorf leaned affectionately toward Mr. Watts, the young artist projected every nuance of the Liszt, giving it a refinement, delicacy, subtle color and crystalline brilliance.

The trills were shimmering and evanescent as moonbeams and his fingers raced up and down the piano as lightly as scudding clouds. Liszt had no better interpreter than the young virtuoso, Andre Watts.

The other works on the program were Walter Piston's "Prelude and Allegro for Organ and Strings", and Berj Zamkochian as organist and Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony.

ANDRE WATTS

N. Y. AMSTERDAM NEWS, Sat., Jan. 25, 1969

SCARSDALE INQUIRER
Thursday, January 9, 1969

Erich Leinsdorf To Conduct In New York City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will perform in New York City Wednesday and Friday evenings at 8:30, January 15 and 17. The orchestra will be conducted by its Music Director, Erich Leinsdorf, in the two Philharmonic Hall concerts featuring Andre Watts as soloist in the Franck Symphonic variations and the Liszt Concerto no. 1 in E flat. The seventy-fifth birthday of Walter Piston will be marked by a performance of his Prelude and allegro for organ and strings.

On Saturday evening January 18, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the orchestra in the first New York performance of the original 1912 version of Richard Strauss's opera "Ariadne auf Naxos." Claire Watson, Beverly Sills, Robert Nagy, and John Reardon head the concert performance cast as they did two weeks earlier in Boston when the work received its American premiere.

New York Post
D. 628,146 SAT. 354,497
JAN 16 1969

Words and Music

By Harriett Johnson

Leinsdorf Leads Watts in 2 Works

Erich Leinsdorf's program last night with the Boston Symphony in Philharmonic Hall was non-controversial and doubly exciting because 22-year-old Andre Watts was on-stage at the piano during the entire second half of the concert. He played the Cesar Franck "Symphonic Variations for Piano and Orchestra," and the Liszt Piano Concerto No. 1 in E Flat Major.

So much has been written about Watts in superlatives that it becomes boring repeatedly to pile them on. But we must give him his due. There is little doubt that for his age bracket, he is the most extraordinarily gifted, most mature, most musically expansive and unneurotic American concert pianist currently playing the major circuit.

There is an emotional fierceness in his personality which, when it counted, made him play as if he were attacking a prey. Part of this is his strong, intense rhythmic control. His stance made it look as if the prey were Leinsdorf but the musical results denied any such nonsense. He and the maestro were superbly sympathetic collaborators in both works.

Leinsdorf embraced him like a son, and Watts grinned at the applause like the prince of modesty he is away from the piano. Once he touches the keys he becomes the commanding general.

While Watts' playing wasn't musically tense, and while his performances were spectacularly clear, (the opening octaves in the Liszt were amazing in this respect) he did show some tension in tonal quality. There was a wiry timbre, not noticeable in my previous experience. It showed through all the astonishing and most rewarding aspects of his playing.

Piston's Birthday Honored

For the most part, his phrasing was deeply sensitive but his opening statements in the Franck lacked something in communicating the theme. Unfairly neglected in recent years as a concert piece, the Franck is individual in its chromatic style and immensely effective. Certainly Watts made it brilliantly so. The Liszt was performed as if electrified by a dozen generators.

Leinsdorf opened the program with Walter Piston's "Prelude and Allegro for Organ and Strings," a noble piece which takes pride in its debt to Bach. It was performed in honor of Piston's 75th birthday which is Monday. Berj Zamochian was the expert soloist. Beethoven's Symphony No. 6 in F Major, Op. 68, "The Pastoral," followed, in an interpretation which was extremely precise, but still sprinted along fluidly and buoyantly when this behavior was beneficial. It was as if spring were just around the corner.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 840,495 SUN. 1,494,704
JAN 16 1969

BRONXVILLE REVIEW REPORT
Thursday, January 9, 1969

Boston Symphony To Make Appearance

Following the fourth Symphony Hall concert of its Tuesday "B" series, conducted by Charles Wilson, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will spend the rest of the week in New York City.

On Wednesday and Friday evenings at 8:30 p.m. Jan. 15 and 17, the Orchestra will be conducted by its Music Director, Erich Leinsdorf, in two Philharmonic Hall concerts featuring Andre Watts as soloist in two works, the Franck Symphonic variations and the Liszt Concerto no. 1 in E flat. The seventy-fifth birthday of Walter Piston will be marked by a performance of his Prelude and allegro for organ and strings.

On Saturday evening January 18, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the first New York performance of the original 1912 version of Richard Strauss' opera Ariadne auf Naxos. Claire Watson, Beverly Sills, Robert Nagy, and John Reardon head the concert performance cast as they did two weeks earlier in Boston when the work received its American premiere.

BROOKLYN DAILY EAGLE
Saturday, January 18, 1969

BROOKLYN HEIGHTS COURIER
Saturday, January 18, 1969

Boston Symphony At Philharmonic

Following the fourth Symphony Hall concert of its Tues. "B" series, conducted by Charles Wilson, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will spend the rest of the week in New York City.

On Wed. and Fri. evenings at 8:30, Jan. 15 and 17, the Orchestra will be conducted by its Music Director, Erich Leinsdorf, in two New York Philharmonic Hall concerts featuring Andre Watts as soloist in two works, the Franck Symphonic variations and the Liszt Concerto No. 1 in E flat. The seventy-fifth birthday of Walter Piston will be marked by a performance of his Prelude and allegro for organ and strings

On Sat. evening, Jan. 18, Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct the first New York performance of the original 1912 version of Richard Strauss's opera Ariadne auf Naxos Claire Watson, Beverly Sills, Robert Nagy, and John Reardon head the concert performance cast as they did two weeks earlier in Boston when the work received its American premiere

NEW YORK, N. Y.
VILLAGE VOICE
W. 35,500
JAN 30 1969

THE BOSTONIANS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's January 15 concert at Philharmonic Hall came to life in its second half with the taking of center stage by Andre Watts as piano soloist in Franck's "Symphonic Variations" and Liszt's E-flat Concerto. The Franck went rippling along, and Erich Leinsdorf's conducting gave glistening support. But if the Franck rippled, the Liszt exploded. Young Mr. Watts poured the octaves on with power that seemed to feed on itself. And the trills and other cascades of notes that light up the Liszt style were tossed off in a great illusion of ease.

The concert began with Walter Piston's short, Koussevitzky-era Prelude and Allegro for Organ and Strings, and its solidly built, fluent euphony provided real musical pleasure. Less happy was Leinsdorf's way with the Beethoven Pastoral Symphony. Its first two movements are perhaps the most boring Beethoven in the repertoire, and the conductor's weird tempo changes in the opening movement only added discomfort to the boredom. Leinsdorf simply could not seem to make the music move, not even in the songful finale.

—Leighton Kerner

Music: Watts and Liszt

Pianist Triumphs With Boston Symphony

By HAROLD C. SCHONBERG

WHATEVER excitement there was in last night's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Philharmonic Hall came from André Watts. The young pianist had the last half of the program, and rather than a large-scale concerto he chose two one-movement works—Franck's Symphonic Variations and the Liszt E flat Concerto.

Mr. Watts from the beginning has identified himself with the romantic repertory, and he has developed into a whale of a virtuoso pianist. He has many things going for him. By now his flashy technique is rock-solid dependable, he can achieve a massive sonority without banging, and the sheer momentum with which he engulfs the keyboard has something kinetic about it. He races along and never loses breath. It is the audience that gets out of breath. This kind of playing may not be a profound experience, but it certainly is an exciting one.

●

In addition he has a decided charisma that comes right over the footlights. This cannot be taught. The great pianists are born with it—an ability to communicate, an ability to impress one's personality on the music. Mr. Watts has this in good measure. Part is natural showmanship, and that is not to be despised in the virtuoso literature. A good deal of the fun comes from the sport the pianist makes of the music. But part also is instinctive, and Mr. Watts seems to know exactly when to let loose, when to take the audience with him.

He played the Franck Symphonic Variations in a lively manner, with fast tempos, perfect articulation and bracing rhythm at the end. The Liszt, which was the work that brought him fame, went in an athletic, exuberant manner. There were some liberties, there were a few sections where Mr. Watts verged on bad taste.

But overriding everything was the red-blooded attack, the concept of Artist-as-Hero so integral to the Liszt E flat. Mr. Watts, a throwback to an older generation of pianists, stormed through the work, taking chances, not worrying about a missed note or two (not that there were any). It was terribly exciting, and in this kind of literature Mr. Watts impresses as the greatest thing that has come along since Johann Sebastian Namath.

●

Erich Leinsdorf's accompaniments were perfectly integrated. No matter where Mr. Watts went, there was the orchestra, anticipating everything. It also could be said that there was Mr. Watts, anticipating the orchestra. He may be a throwback, but he is also a musician who listens to the orchestra and looks at the conductor. Ensemble as well as virtuosity has been part of his schooling.

The first half of the concert had two works—Walter Piston's Prelude and Allegro for Organ and Strings, played in honor of his 75th birthday, and the Beethoven "Pastoral" Symphony. Berj Mankochian was the organist in the characteristically smooth, logical, impersonal Piston score. In the Beethoven the orchestra played well, naturally, and faithfully followed Mr. Leinsdorf's clear, cold, metronomic ideas about the music.

Henry Grossman

André Watts

The Program

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, with Erich Leinsdorf conducting; Andre Watts, pianist; Charles Wilson, organist. At Philharmonic Hall.

Prelude and Allegro for Organ and Strings ..... Piston
Symphony No. 6 ("Pastoral") .. Beethoven
Symphonic Variations ..... Franck
Piano Concerto No. 1 ..... Liszt

Meet Andre Watts, A Piano Virtuoso

By PERDITA DUNCAN

Andre Watts will give his only New York recital this season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Saturday evening, January 25 at 8:30 p.m. His program will include works by Liszt, Chopin, Schubert and Castaldo. (The latter is his teacher of theory and composition.)

In February 1963, when he was almost 17, Mr. Watts was introduced to the television audience by Leonard Bernstein as soloist for a New York Philharmonic Young People's Concert. Twenty days later, he substituted for the ailing Glen Gould at a regular Philharmonic concert and received the season's wildest ovation.

In the intervening six years, he has made successful appearances with a dozen major U.S. symphony orchestras; European debuts with the London and the Berlin Philharmonic orchestras; a world tour for the U.S. State Department playing in Paris, Munich, Milan, Athens, Teheran, etc. In each city his triumph was unprecedented, with critics runinng out of superlatives to afford him the highest critical acclaim.

5th Anniversary

In January 1968, Mr. Watts celebrated the fifth anniversary of his historic debut in a reunion performance with Leonard Bernstein and the N.Y. Philharmonic. That appearance made him a legend in his own lifetime at the age of 22.

Yet, Andre Watts has retained a boyish charm, a warmth and simplicity that is disarming. In talking to him, one gets the feeling that he accepts all the acclaim with a sense of wonder that it is all happening to him. He is thoroughly dedicated to his art and regards the long hours of practice as bringing him nearer to his goal.

When he is not on tour, he maintains a tight, busy schedule, leaving New York at 6 a.m. to go to Baltimore, where he is studying at the Peabody Conservatory of Music for his Bachelor of Music Degree with Leon Fleisher. After a full day's session, he returns to New York late at night, and when time permits, he practicse 6-8 hours a day.

Hsi favorite composers are Haydn, Beethoven, Schubert, Chopin and Liszt. He could not name a favorite composition not indicate the most difficult work he had ever played. He did point out that the introspective works require intense concentration.

As easy as it appears for him, he is ever concerned with how the hammers strike the piano strings, for only in keeping this in mind can he achieve an iridescent play of tone color.

Mr. Watts' closest companion is his mother, Maria Alexandra Watts. Hungarian by birth, she married an Afro-American career soldier in Germany. A good pianist herself, she gave young Andre his first lessons. She has reared her phenomenally gifted child with great insight and affection, yet maintaining a certain discipline. She is not unduly awed by his prodigious talent and keeps all that has happened in his career in proper perspective.

It is a certainty that Mr. Watts achievements in the world of music have kindled the admiration of the world and that he stands tall among the elite of pianists, who give the highest spiritual pleasure to their audiences.

Watts' Glowing Performance Lights Up Hall

NEW YORK — Andre Watts gave a stunning performance in Liszt's "Piano Concerto No. 1" with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony at Philharmonic Hall on Jan. 17. Watts' impeccable technique and strong personality have established him as a young sensation, and the Columbia Records artist, playing before a sold-out house, as usual, lived up to his growing reputation.

For the 22-year-old artist, who also was superb in Franck's "Symphonic Variations for Piano and Orchestra," the Liszt concerto, which he has recorded for Columbia with Leonard Bernstein and the New York Philharmonic, is a specialty and his dynamism brought new life to the warhorse.

Leinsdorf and the Boston, RCA artists, played splendidly in the two works with Watts, as well as in Beethoven's "Symphony No. 6 (Pastoral)." Leinsdorf and the Boston are recording the Beethoven symphonies for RCA. The program opened with Piston's "Prelude and Allegro for Organ and Strings" in honor of the composer's 75th birthday. Berj Zamkochian, who has recorded for RCA and the Gregorian Institute of America, was excellent as the soloist in the Piston work.

FRED KIRBY

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000
FEB 1 1969

Watts With Boston Symphony

Andre Watts, pianist, appeared as guest artist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Wednesday and Friday evening at Philharmonic Hall.

He played two works in the second half of the program, Cesar Franck's "Symphonic Variations for Piano and Orchestra" and Liszt's "Piano Concerto No. 1 in E-flat Major".

His performance held the audience spellbound as he delved into the inner sonorities of the music, playing them with a tender passion, a soaring beauty and an individual virtuosity that was breathtaking in its scope.

Mr. Watts has always been an artist who has perfect rapport with the conductor. He and Erich Leinsdorf were a perfect team to bring off the musical event of the season. As Mr. Leinsdorf leaned affectionately toward Mr. Watts, the young artist projected every nuance of the Liszt, giving it a refinement, delicacy, subtle color and crystalline brilliance.

The trills were shimmering and evanescent as moonbeams and his fingers raced up and down the piano as lightly as scudding clouds. Liszt had no better interpreter than the young virtuoso, Andre Watts.

The other works on the program were Walter Piston's "Prelude and Allegro for Organ and Strings", and Berj Zamkochian as organist and Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony.

ANDRE WATTS

N. Y. AMSTERDAM NEWS, Sat., Jan. 25, 1969

66.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905

JAN 12 1969

New England Newsclip

B.S.O. taking 'Ariadne' to Carnegie Hall

The Boston Symphony will take its concert production of the Strauss opera "Ariadne auf Naxos" to Carnegie Hall Saturday. This will be the New York premiere of the original, 1912 version. It comes two weeks after the U.S. premiere at Symphony Hall.

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct and the leading roles again will be sung by sopranos Claire Watson and Beverly Sills, tenor Robert Nagy and baritone John Reardon.

The orchestra's New York tour also will include concerts Wednesday and Friday at Philharmonic Hall. Tuesday's concert here at 7:30 will be led by assistant conductor Charles Wilson and will include Strauss' "Don Juan," Stravinsky's "Jeu de cartes" and the Sibelius Symphony No. 2.

* * *

The Boston Symphony plays regular Wednesday and Friday concerts at Philharmonic Hall, and various special concerts at Carnegie Hall and the Brooklyn Academy of Music as well. This week features an unusually rich trio of concerts, for which seating is generally available and well worth pursuing.

On Wednesday and Friday evenings at 8:30 the Philharmonic Hall series will feature Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Beethoven "Pastoral" Symphony, Charles Wilson as soloist in Walter Piston's neoclassic and lovely Prelude and Allegro for Organ and Strings, and Andre Watts as soloist in the Liszt First Piano Concerto and the Franck Symphonic Variations. Watts whose solo recital earlier was one of the highlights of the season, is unquestionably one of today's greatest talents.

The Sunday Star-Ledger
NEWARK, N. J.
SUN. 403,863

JAN 12 1969

OPERA NEWS
VOLUME 33/NUMBER 10 JANUARY 4, 1969/35 CENTS

Claire Watson will make her New York opera debut on January 18 in the title role of Strauss' Ariadne auf Naxos, a concert performance to be given at Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf. In September the American soprano starred in a new Munich production of Arabella, an opera she will repeat in Vienna in May.

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 348,294 SUN. 406,966

JAN 12 1969

* * *

CONCERTS for other orchestras are usually available at the box office, frequently at concert time. Since many of these are important and attractive they should not be overlooked.

The Boston Symphony plays regular Wednesday and Friday concerts at Philharmonic Hall, and various special concerts at Carnegie Hall and the Brooklyn Academy of Music as well. This week features an unusually rich trio of concerts, for which seating is generally available and well worth pursuing.

This Wednesday and Friday evenings at 8:30 the Philharmonic Hall series will feature Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Beethoven "Pastoral" Symphony, Charles Wilson as solist in Walter Piston's neoclassic and lovely Prelude and Allegro for Organ and Strings, and fabulous Andre Watts as soloist in the Liszt First Piano Concerto and the Franck Symphonic Variations. Watts, whose solo recital earlier was one of the highlights of the season, is unquestionably one of today's greatest talents.

On Saturday at 8:30 in Carnegie Hall, Leinsdorf will conduct a rare concert of Richard Strauss' exquisite "Ariadne auf Naxos" with Claire Watson in the title role, Beverly Sills as the high vocalizing Zerbinetta, assisted by Robert Nagy and John Reardon. In his last full season as music director, Leinsdorf has the Bostonian playing more superbly than ever.

MT. KISCO PATENT TRADER
Saturday, January 18, 1969

Opera to premiere

NEW YORK — The original version of Richard Strauss' opera "Ariadne auf Naxos," premiered in 1912 in Stuttgart, will be heard for the first time in New York at the Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall at 8:30 p.m. Saturday. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct.

Words and Music

By Harriett Johnson

Leinsdorf in Ariadne #1 Premiere

Thirty-nine members of the Boston Symphony were on-stage Saturday night in Carnegie Hall but what counted were two local daughters, both radiant, youthful personalities: 41-year old Claire Watson, and 39-year old Beverly Sills. Neither one is in the Metropolitan Opera, and both should be.

Erich Leinsdorf conducted the first N. Y. performance of Richard Strauss' "Ariadne auf Naxos," version # 1, with Miss Watson in the title role, and with Miss Sills as the devilishly fascinating, light-weight Zerbinetta who executes the longest, most difficult aria in the coloratura repertoire. Leinsdorf had done the concert-form American premiere Jan. 3 in Boston with the same cast.

Why the revised version is performed by most major opera companies is too involved to recount in detail here. But "Ariadne, No. 1" is much shorter, as there is no half-hour sung prologue as in "Ariadne No. 2" but what is sung, except for Zerbineota's enlarged role, is much the same. And it is glorious music.

Watson Magnificent Ariadne

Karl Boehm, the greatest living expert on Strauss, who will lead the premiere of the Met Opera's new production of "Die Rosenkavalier," Thursday, prefers, as most conductors do, the revised version, and says, in giving his reasons: "In the second 'Ariadne,' the role of Zerbinetta, though still fiendishly difficult, at least become singable."

But Saturday, Miss Sills sang the original and made it also singable. She changed the notes a bit in the big aria to avoid the two high F sharps, but these really are unsingable except for a freak voice, which most certainly couldn't deliver the rest of the 23-page aria as Miss Sills did so brilliantly. And just as Miss Watson was so magnificently, the serious, emotionally elevated, passionate woman, Ariadne, so Miss Sills was the proverbial vacillating flirt, living for a day, not as Ariadne, for eternity.

While Miss Sills is justly known and celebrated here for her rare talents, Miss Watson, has spent most of her professional life in Europe. As Ariadne she demonstrated a glowing musicianship and power of communication that made every note shine with meaning. Her voice was somewhat diffused and unsteady in the beginning, and she overexceeded its limits to the point of roughness in the lower register. Yet, for anyone of Miss Watson's overpowering intensity, and considering the occasion, this is understandable. She improved greatly as she continued.

Leinsdorf's on-stage orchestra was not sympathetic to the singers who were placed backstage on platforms. Many times the ensemble between leading singers and orchestra miscalculated. The same can be said for the four clowns and the three nymphs. Their voices didn't blend among themselves nor with the orchestra. John Reardon, the most important clown, Harlequin, was amusing and soprano Benita Valente, as Najade, was the best of the nymphs.

Met tenor Robert Nagy as Bacchus was a novelty in a leading role. He sings character roles at the Met but judging by this performance, he should be doing more important parts. There is a one-dimensional quality to his style and vocal production which would benefit, I should think, by a stint at the N.Y. City Opera in leading roles, meanwhile continuing at the Met as he has been.

Thus, "Ariadne auf Naxos" under Leinsdorf was far from a perfect evening, but an exciting one. As the opera is a satirical melange, the words of Monsieur Jourdain, the bourgeois gentleman, who had sat silent onstage during the entire show, were in character: He summed it up in [illegible] provising on [illegible] English, from thal's libretto: "When you come right down to it, culture is fabulous."

Well, at least, "Ariadne auf Naxos" is.

New York Post
D. 628,146 SAT. 354,497

JAN 20 1969

CRITIC-AT-LARGE by Byron Belt

Newhouse Newspapers 20 June 69

Boston's 'Ariadne' Superb

Two first performances in New York dominated the weekend music and dance scene with the Boston Symphony and Harkness Ballet providing one hit and one miss.

The hit was Erich Leindorf's superbly conducted concert presentation of the original version of Richard Strauss' glorious romantic opera "Ariadne auf Naxos." The lush score requires only a small orchestral ensemble of virtuoso soloists, and what soloists the Boston Symphony has! The performance featured an almost ideal reading by the conductor and his 36 instrumentalists.

The cast was crowned by Claire Watson's triumphant portrayal of the title role. Miss Watson an American, is a leading singer of the Munich opera but should be far better known here than she is. Her Ariadne was womanly, radiant and vocally magnificent.

The other leading female role of Zerbinetta was sung by Beverly Sills. Appallingly gowned, Miss Sills found the challenging pyrotechnics of the music considerably beyond her. Usually a meticulous singer, the soprano tired halfway through her long scene, and the rather desperate nature of her accomplishment seriously weakened the performance as a whole.

* * *

RISING TO A RARE opportunity in a major role, Met tenor Robert Nagy sang a Bacchus of considerable power and vocal beauty. The concluding duet with Ariadne is one of Strauss' most magnificent creations, and Mr. Nagy and Miss Watson sang it with considerable eloquence.

John Reardon was outstanding as Harlekin, singing with rich, well focused tone. Benita Valente and Carole Bogard sang exquisitely in crucial smaller roles, and James Billings proved a young tenor worth watching.

Saturday's stunning Carnegie Hall opera performance followed upon a pair of concerts at Philharmonic Hall in which Mr. Leinsdorf and his orchestra accompanied pianist Andre Watts in electrifying performances of the Symphonic Variations of Franck and the First Piano Concerto of Liszt.

Dare we add how great it was to have "America the Beautiful," which we feel should be our national anthem, sung at the program's conclusion?

* * *

STAR QUALITY is somewhat lacking in the current Harkness Ballet season, but there are some splendid young dancers in the company.

Do not, however, be fooled by excessively enthusiastic reports of the newest entry into the weak Harkness reportory, "Grand Pas Espagnol." This new work by Benjamin Harkarvy to music of Moszkowski is a pretty anemic attempt to capture the grand spirit of the old-fashioned Spanish flavored Russian ballet of another day.

Of the six dancers, Lonee Isaksen alone presently has the style and quality to carry off the rather feeble flambuoyancy of the latest work, but the remaining dancers should be better once opening night nerves are under stronger control.

Norman Alker's "Night Song" is a much finer ballet, and is danced splendidly in a poetic mixture of classic and modern styles by a large ensemble headed by Bonnie Mathis and Morton Winston.

NEW YORK

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall on January 18, presented a performance of Strauss' Ariadne auf Naxos so exciting that it can only be called historic. Conductor Erich Leinsdorf, giving the New York premiere of the opera's 1912 version, stuck strictly to Strauss' orders for thirty-odd virtuoso instrumentalists. The result proved spectacular: solo violin, trumpet and French horn stood out in an orchestra that sounded rich but never opaque. Leinsdorf also managed to vary the comic and serious elements of the opera so that neither predominated.

This version of Ariadne, composed to be played with Molière's Bourgeois Gentilhomme and lacking the Prologue composed in 1916, has some musical variations from the more familiar score, such as an additional solo for Zerbinetta just before Bacchus' entrance. The most significant change is the amusing ending, in which M. Jourdain (of Molière) comments that Ariadne would of course be a masterpiece if only it had been written by Mozart. This conclusion, of but a few minutes' duration and accompanied by Strauss in a neoclassic vein, takes away the overpowering sweetness of the final duet.

The singing? The kind to tell your grandchildren about, and all done by Americans. As Ariadne, Claire Watson made her local debut and showed off a voice of power, purity and great beauty. She does not show an Italianate vibrancy, but her voice has warmth in its size and production. She sang the lows and highs of Ariadne with no strain and surmounted the glorious line of "Es gibt ein Reich" in the grand manner.

As her comic counterpart, Zerbinetta, Beverly Sills gave New York a performance of the century. Strauss might have written the role to do away with coloratura sopranos, what with a written-out cadenza and incredible fioriture going up to F-sharps in the big aria, "Grossmächtige Prinzessin." This, in its original form, is higher, longer and more intricate than in Strauss' revision. Unfazed by any difficulty, Miss Sills sang every note in spades and received a standing ovation for an interpretation thoroughly in the commedia dell'arte spirit.

Robert Nagy, as Bacchus, lent his stentorian tones to a rhapsodic duet. Though his long suit is not lyricism, he sang everything with style and a degree of charm. John Reardon, sounding full-voiced and virile, made a splendid impression as Harlekin, and Malcolm Smith (Truffaldin), John Ferrante (Brighella) and James Billings (Scaramuccio) all sang their roles well. The three pseudo-Rhinemaidens—Najade, Dryade and Echo, played by Benita Valente, Eunice Alberts and Carole Bogard—made a good impression. Miss Bogard, in her solo work, let go with some glittering sounds equal to the general excellence of the principals. S.J.

OPERA NEWS
NEW YORK, N. Y.
23 TI. A YEAR 73,000

FEB 22 1969

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 348,294 SUN. 406,966

JAN 20 1969

N. Y. DAILY [illegible]
Friday, January 17, 1969

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CARNEGIE HALL

The original version of Richard Strauss' opera, "Ariadne auf Naxos," premiered Oct. 25, 1912, in Stuttgart, will be heard for the first time in New York at the Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall, Saturday, Jan. 18, at 8:30 P.M.

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct, and the soloists will be: Claire Watson, Beverly Sills, Robert Nagy, John Reardon, John Ferrante, James Billings, Eunice Alberis, Malcolm Smith and Benita Valente.

Andrew Raeburn, assistant to Mr. Leinsdorf and program editor for the orchestra, will read the only speaking part.

The operatic collaboration between Richard Strauss and librettist Hugo von Hofmannsthal began (1906-1909) with "Elektra" and reached its apogee with "Der Rosenkavalier" in 1911. The original Ariadne was a promising younger singer later known throughout the world as Maria Jeritza.

Based on the Greek legend of Ariadne (daughter of King Minos of Crete), the myth has provided plots for numerous composers — among them, Monteverdi, Porpora and Handel.

The Strauss version is a play within a play, based on the premise that a certain M. Jourdain has commissioned a young composer (thought to be Mozart) to write an opera on the Ariadne theme. Rehearsals have taken place and the opera begins as the composer is about to conduct the first performance.

66.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905

JAN 12 1969

New England Newsclip

B.S.O. taking 'Ariadne' to Carnegie Hall

The Boston Symphony will take its concert production of the Strauss opera "Ariadne auf Naxos" to Carnegie Hall Saturday. This will be the New York premiere of the original, 1912 version. It comes two weeks after the U.S. premiere at Symphony Hall.

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct and the leading roles again will be sung by sopranos Claire Watson and Beverly Sills, tenor Robert Nagy and baritone John Reardon.

The orchestra's New York tour also will include concerts Wednesday and Friday at Philharmonic Hall. Tuesday's concert here at 7:30 will be led by assistant conductor Charles Wilson and will include Strauss' "Don Juan," Stravinsky's "Jeu de cartes" and the Sibelius Symphony No. 2.

* * *

The Boston Symphony plays regular Wednesday and Friday concerts at Philharmonic Hall, and various special concerts at Carnegie Hall and the Brooklyn Academy of Music as well. This week features an unusually rich trio of concerts, for which seating is generally available and well worth pursuing.

On Wednesday and Friday evenings at 8:30 the Philharmonic Hall series will feature Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Beethoven "Pastoral" Symphony, Charles Wilson as soloist in Walter Piston's neoclassic and lovely Prelude and Allegro for Organ and Strings, and Andre Watts as soloist in the Liszt First Piano Concerto and the Franck Symphonic Variations. Watts whose solo recital earlier was one of the highlights of the season, is unquestionably one of today's greatest talents.

The Sunday Star-Ledger
NEWARK, N. J.
SUN. 403,863

JAN 12 1969

OPERA NEWS
VOLUME 33/NUMBER 10 JANUARY 4, 1969/35 CENTS

Claire Watson will make her New York opera debut on January 18 in the title role of Strauss' Ariadne auf Naxos, a concert performance to be given at Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf. In September the American soprano starred in a new Munich production of Arabella, an opera she will repeat in Vienna in May.

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 348,294 SUN. 406,966

JAN 12 1969

* * *

CONCERTS for other orchestras are usually available at the box office, frequently at concert time. Since many of these are important and attractive they should not be overlooked.

The Boston Symphony plays regular Wednesday and Friday concerts at Philharmonic Hall, and various special concerts at Carnegie Hall and the Brooklyn Academy of Music as well. This week features an unusually rich trio of concerts, for which seating is generally available and well worth pursuing.

This Wednesday and Friday evenings at 8:30 the Philharmonic Hall series will feature Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Beethoven "Pastoral" Symphony, Charles Wilson as solist in Walter Piston's neoclassic and lovely Prelude and Allegro for Organ and Strings, and fabulous Andre Watts as soloist in the Liszt First Piano Concerto and the Franck Symphonic Variations. Watts, whose solo recital earlier was one of the highlights of the season, is unquestionably one of today's greatest talents.

On Saturday at 8:30 in Carnegie Hall, Leinsdorf will conduct a rare concert of Richard Strauss' exquisite "Ariadne auf Naxos" with Claire Watson in the title role, Beverly Sills as the high vocalizing Zerbinetta, assisted by Robert Nagy and John Reardon. In his last full season as music director, Leinsdorf has the Bostonian playing more superbly than ever.

MT. KISCO PATENT TRADER
Saturday, January 18, 1969

Opera to premiere

NEW YORK — The original version of Richard Strauss' opera "Ariadne auf Naxos," premiered in 1912 in Stuttgart, will be heard for the first time in New York at the Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall at 8:30 p.m. Saturday. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct.

Words and Music

By Harriett Johnson

Leinsdorf in Ariadne #1 Premiere

Thirty-nine members of the Boston Symphony were on-stage Saturday night in Carnegie Hall but what counted were two local daughters, both radiant, youthful personalities: 41-year old Claire Watson, and 39-year old Beverly Sills. Neither one is in the Metropolitan Opera and both should be.

Erich Leinsdorf conducted the first N. Y. performance of Richard Strauss' "Ariadne auf Naxos," version # 1, with Miss Watson in the title role, and with Miss Sills as the devilishly fascinating, light-weight Zerbinetta who executes the longest, most difficult aria in the coloratura repertoire. Leinsdorf had done the concert-form American premiere Jan. 3 in Boston with the same cast.

Why the revised version is performed by most major opera companies is too involved to recount in detail here. But "Ariadne, No. 1" is much shorter, as there is no half-hour sung prologue as in "Ariadne No. 2" but what is sung, except for Zerbineota's enlarged role, is much the same. And it is glorious music.

Watson Magnificent Ariadne

Karl Boehm, the greatest living expert on Strauss, who will lead the premiere of the Met Opera's new production of "Die Rosenkavalier," Thursday, prefers, as most conductors do, the revised version, and says, in giving his reasons: "In the second 'Ariadne,' the role of Zerbinetta, though still fiendishly difficult, at least become singable."

But Saturday, Miss Sills sang the original and made it also singable. She changed the notes a bit in the big aria to avoid the two high F sharps, but these really are unsingable except for a freak voice, which most certainly couldn't deliver the rest of the 23-page aria as Miss Sills did so brilliantly. And just as Miss Watson was so magnificently, the serious, emotionally elevated, passionate woman, Ariadne, so Miss Sills was the proverbial vacillating flirt, living for a day, not as Ariadne, for eternity.

While Miss Sills is justly known and celebrated here for her rare talents, Miss Watson, has spent most of her professional life in Europe. As Ariadne she demonstrated a glowing musicianship and power of communication that made every note shine with meaning. Her voice was somewhat diffused and unsteady in the beginning, and she overexceeded its limits to the point of roughness in the lower register. Yet, for anyone of Miss Watson's overpowering intensity, and considering the occasion, this is understandable. She improved greatly as she continued.

Leinsdorf's on-stage orchestra was not sympathetic to the singers who were placed backstage on platforms. Many times the ensemble between leading singers and orchestra miscalculated. The same can be said for the four clowns and the three nymphs. Their voices didn't blend among themselves nor with the orchestra. John Reardon, the most important clown, Harlequin, was amusing and soprano Benita Valente, as Najade, was the best of the nymphs.

Met tenor Robert Nagy as Bacchus was a novelty in a leading role. He sings character roles at the Met but judging by this performance, he should be doing more important parts. There is a one-dimensional quality to his style and vocal production which would benefit, I should think, by a stint at the N.Y. City Opera in leading roles, meanwhile continuing at the Met as he has been.

Thus, "Ariadne auf Naxos" under Leinsdorf was far from a perfect evening, but an exciting one. As the opera is a satirical melange, the words of Monsieur Jourdain, the bourgeois gentleman, who had sat silent onstage during the entire show, were in character: He summed it up in cockney English, improvising on von Hofmannsthal's libretto: "When you come right down to it, culture is fabulous."

Well, at least, "Ariadne auf Naxos" is.

New York Post
D. 628,146 SAT. 354,497

JAN 20 1969

CRITIC-AT-LARGE by Byron Belt

Newhouse Newspapers 20 June 9

Boston's 'Ariadne' Superb

Two first performances in New York dominated the weekend music and dance scene with the Boston Symphony and Harkness Ballet providing one hit and one miss.

The hit was Erich Leindorf's superbly conducted concert presentation of the original version of Richard Strauss' glorious romantic opera "Ariadne auf Naxos." The lush score requires only a small orchestral ensemble of virtuoso soloists, and what soloists the Boston Symphony has! The performance featured an almost ideal reading by the conductor and his 36 instrumentalists.

The cast was crowned by Claire Watson's triumphant portrayal of the title role. Miss Watson an American, is a leading singer of the Munich opera but should be far better known here than she is. Her Ariadne was womanly, radiant and vocally magnificent.

The other leading female role of Zerbinetta was sung by Beverly Sills. Appallingly gowned, Miss Sills found the challenging pyrotechnics of the music considerably beyond her. Usually a meticulous singer, the soprano tired halfway through her long scene, and the rather desperate nature of her accomplishment seriously weakened the performance as a whole.

* * *

RISING TO A RARE opportunity in a major role, Met tenor Robert Nagy sang a Bacchus of considerable power and vocal beauty. The concluding duet with Ariadne is one of Strauss' most magnificent creations, and Mr. Nagy and Miss Watson sang it with considerable eloquence.

John Reardon was outstanding as Harlekin, singing with rich, well focused tone. Benita Valente and Carole Bogard sang exquisitely in crucial smaller roles, and James Billings proved a young tenor worth watching.

Saturday's stunning Carnegie Hall opera performance followed upon a pair of concerts at Philharmonic Hall in which Mr. Leinsdorf and his orchestra accompanied pianist Andre Watts in electrifying performances of the Symphonic Variations of Franck and the First Piano Concerto of Liszt.

Dare we add how great it was to have "America the Beautiful," which we feel should be our national anthem, sung at the program's conclusion?

* * *

STAR QUALITY is somewhat lacking in the current Harkness Ballet season, but there are some splendid young dancers in the company.

Do not, however, be fooled by excessively enthusiastic reports of the newest entry into the weak Harkness reportory, "Grand Pas Espagnol." This new work by Benjamin Harkarvy to music of Moszkowski is a pretty anemic attempt to capture the grand spirit of the old-fashioned Spanish flavored Russian ballet of another day.

Of the six dancers, Lonee Isaksen alone presently has the style and quality to carry off the rather feeble flambuoyancy of the latest work, but the remaining dancers should be better once opening night nerves are under stronger control.

Norman Alker's "Night Song" is a much finer ballet, and is danced splendidly in a poetic mixture of classic and modern styles by a large ensemble headed by Bonnie Mathis and Morton Winston.

NEW YORK

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall on January 18, presented a performance of Strauss' Ariadne auf Naxos so exciting that it can only be called historic. Conductor Erich Leinsdorf, giving the New York premiere of the opera's 1912 version, stuck strictly to Strauss' orders for thirty-odd virtuoso instrumentalists. The result proved spectacular: solo violin, trumpet and French horn stood out in an orchestra that sounded rich but never opaque. Leinsdorf also managed to vary the comic and serious elements of the opera so that neither predominated.

This version of Ariadne, composed to be played with Molière's Bourgeois Gentilhomme and lacking the Prologue composed in 1916, has some musical variations from the more familiar score, such as an additional solo for Zerbinetta just before Bacchus' entrance. The most significant change is the amusing ending, in which M. Jourdain (of Molière) comments that Ariadne would of course be a masterpiece if only it had been written by Mozart. This conclusion, of but a few minutes' duration and accompanied by Strauss in a neoclassic vein, takes away the overpowering sweetness of the final duet.

The singing? The kind to tell your grandchildren about, and all done by Americans. As Ariadne, Claire Watson made her local debut and showed off a voice of power, purity and great beauty. She does not show an Italianate vibrancy, but her voice has warmth in its size and production. She sang the lows and highs of Ariadne with no strain and surmounted the glorious line of "Es gibt ein Reich" in the grand manner.

As her comic counterpart, Zerbinetta, Beverly Sills gave New York a performance of the century. Strauss might have written the role to do away with coloratura sopranos, what with a written-out cadenza and incredible fioriture going up to F-sharps in the big aria, "Grossmächtige Prinzessin." This, in its original form, is higher, longer and more intricate than in Strauss' revision. Unfazed by any difficulty, Miss Sills sang every note in spades and received a standing ovation for an interpretation thoroughly in the commedia dell'arte spirit.

Robert Nagy, as Bacchus, lent his stentorian tones to a rhapsodic duet. Though his long suit is not lyricism, he sang everything with style and a degree of charm. John Reardon, sounding full-voiced and virile, made a splendid impression as Harlekin, and Malcolm Smith (Truffaldin), John Ferrante (Brighella) and James Billings (Scaramuccio) all sang their roles well. The three pseudo-Rhinemaidens—Najade, Dryade and Echo, played by Benita Valente, Eunice Alberts and Carole Bogard—made a good impression. Miss Bogard, in her solo work, let go with some glittering sounds equal to the general excellence of the principals. S.J.

OPERA NEWS
NEW YORK, N. Y.
23 TI. A YEAR 73,000

FEB 22 1969

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 348,294 SUN. 406,966

JAN 20 1969

N. Y. [illegible]
Friday, January 17, 1969

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CARNEGIE HALL

The original version of Richard Strauss' opera, "Ariadne auf Naxos," premiered Oct. 25, 1912, in Stuttgart, will be heard for the first time in New York at the Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall, Saturday, Jan. 18, at 8:30 P.M.

NE

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct, and the soloists will be: Claire Watson, Beverly Sills, Robert Nagy, John Reardon, John Ferrante, James Billings, Eunice Alberts, Malcolm Smith and Benita Valente.

Andrew Raeburn, assistant to Mr. Leinsdorf and program editor for the orchestra, will read the only speaking part.

The operatic collaboration between Richard Strauss and librettist Hugo von Hofmannsthal began (1906-1909) with "Elektra" and reached its apogee with "Der Rosenkavalier" in 1911. The original Ariadne was a promising younger singer later known throughout the world as Maria Jeritza.

Based on the Greek legend of Ariadne (daughter of King Minos of Crete), the myth has provided plots for numerous composers — among them, Monteverdi, Porpora and Handel.

The Strauss version is a play within a play, based on the premise that a certain M. Jourdain has commissioned a young composer (thought to be Mozart) to write an opera on the Ariadne theme. Rehearsals have taken place and the opera begins as the composer is about to conduct the first performance.

67.

Music to My Ears

Irving Kolodin

Beverly Sills Takes Lead Role In Concert 'Ariadne auf Naxos'

Triumphs Over Difficulties as Zerbinetta—Leinsdorf Conducts Bostonians

By ALLEN HUGHES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra provided dazzling and delectable entertainment at Carnegie Hall on Saturday night when it gave, in concert form, the first New York performance of the original version of Richard Strauss's "Ariadne auf Naxos."

The work was given its premiere in Stuttgart more than 56 years ago, in October, 1912. This original version would undoubtedly have attempted here before now had Strauss and his librettist, Hugo von Hofmannsthal, not revised the work into the longer and easier version widely known today.

The original version was intended to replace the Turkish ballet as the entertainment called for by Monsieur Jourdain in Moliere's play "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme." When this idea proved unsatisfactory in early performances, an operatic Prologue was added to "Ariadne" to make it into a full-fledged opera.

Zerbinetta Hard to Find

The part of Zerbinetta is so difficult in the simplified second version that it is virtually impossible to find anyone who can sing it satisfactorily from start to finish, but the original version is even wilder and longer.

The amazing Beverly Sills had a go at it on Saturday night that ended in triumph. Her big scene lasted approximately 15 minutes, and much of the time she was batting out roulades, racing up and down horrendous arpeggios, trilling through scales and doing all sorts of things most sopranos would not even attempt as vocalises in the privacy of their own studios. All the while, Miss Sills was smiling, and she had the audience smiling with and for her. At the end, it roared its approval, and rightly so.

Beverly Sills

Other Principals in Press

Hers was, of course, the most spectacular contribution contribution of the evening, but it was by no means the only good one. Claire Watson was impressive as Ariadne, Robert Nagy was notably strong as Bacchus and John Reardon excellent as Harlekin.

Estimable performances were also given by Benita Valente, Eunice Alberts, and Carol Bogard in the lesser female roles, and Malcolm Smith, John Ferrante and James Billings in the smaller male ones.

The hero of the evening was Erich Leinsdorf, whose control and shaping of the work were masterly. The great reduced Boston Symphony played beautifully, and Mr. Leinsdorf kept its sonorities lustrous and full-bodied without overwhelming the singers at any point. The ensembles were phrased and balanced to perfection.

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 959,600

JAN 20 1969 New England Newsclip

A Week of Novelties, New and Less New

THANKS TO the enterprise of Erich Leinsdorf, the virtuosity of an ensemble of his Boston Symphony musicians, and an able cast headed by Claire Watson and Beverly Sills, enough New Yorkers to fill Carnegie Hall can now claim something denied them previously—acquaintance with Strauss's Ariadne auf Naxos as it was originally (1912) written. That, of course, was as a pendant to Molière's Le bourgeois gentilhomme. It soon became apparent that the production possibilities of this combination were limited, and Strauss, in collaboration with the resourceful Hugo von Hofmannsthal, converted (1916) the pendant into a self-sufficient jewel.

As must be true with any conversion, there are pluses and minuses, as the admirably prepared performance under Leinsdorf made clear. Primary minus, of course, is the absence of the beautifully crafted prologue which Strauss-Hofmannsthal invented to precede their self-sufficiently inimitable (and highly individual) retelling of the myth linking Bacchus and Ariadne. Principal plus is the presence of Zerbinetta's coloratura showpiece "Grossmächtige Prinzessin" in all its original, awesome complexity. Miss Sills's triumphant solution of its technical problems not only earned her a storm of applause which caused the performance to be suspended temporarily, but also demonstrated Strauss's wisdom in reducing its complexities from awesome to merely intimidating, in the revision now commonly heard. Contrary to some opinion, the revision is not so much "easier" to sing as it is less exacting. That is, the order of difficulty is similar, but the second version is more considerate of a high soprano's stamina, and appreciably, if not substantially, shorter. Miss Sills, for this part, had invented a kind of "parody" tone which she made phenomenally manageable, at some sacrifice in fullness and color.

In other respects, the "original" Ariadne, followed with a score of the revised version, proved to be about 94.7 per cent the same as the form in which it is commonly heard. Aside from an extension here, a contraction there, the conspicuous difference was the reappearance of Zerbinetta during the Bacchus-Ariadne duet, just before the latter's agonized "Theseus!" Its elimination was one instance of a second thought being better than the first. Indeed, almost all the changes are contributory to a tighter, better-organized theater piece.

Though Miss Watson, as Ariadne, did not have a platform equal to Miss Sills's on which to exhibit herself (the incipient applause after "Es gibt ein Reich" was waved off by Leinsdorf, though he condoned a complete stop after the Sills aria), she performed in a manner to make her absence from opera stages of her own country (she is American born) a matter of more than curiosity. Somewhat tremulous at the beginning, she not only sustained her effort over the full course, but was singing better at the end than at the start. Also of interest was the emergence of Robert Nagy, familiar as a very loud comprimario at the Met, into the prominence of a leading tenor. His Bacchus was not the most vibrant imaginable, but it was strongly, securely projected. Others included Benita Valente, Carole Bogard, and Eunice Alberts as an uncommonly well-blended trio; John Reardon as Harlekin and Malcolm Smith as Truffaldin.

SR/February 1, 1969

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 443,000

FEB 1 1969

Freitag, 24. Jänner 1969 VOLKSBLATT / KULTUR

Sensationelle Strauss-Premiere

Leinsdorf präsentiert Ur-„Ariadne" auf dem Konzertpodium

Von unserem New-Yorker Korrespondenten Robert Breuer

Elektrisierende Stimmung herrschte in der Carnegie Hall lange vor Beginn der New-Yorker Erstaufführung von Richard Strauss' „Ariadne auf Naxos" in der Stuttgarter Originalfassung als eine „nach dem ‚Bürger als Edelmann' zu spielende Oper in einem Aufzuge". Erich Leinsdorf hatte mit dem Bostoner Sinfonieorchester einen Ausflug nach New York unternommen, um das in Boston viermal aufgeführte Werk auch in der Musikhauptstadt des Landes zu präsentieren.

Zwar gab es keine Sonderzüge wie einst, als solche aus Berlin zum Dresdner „Rosenkavalier" geführt wurden, dennoch: die gesamte Musikwelt und viele Gäste aus nah und fern füllten den großen Konzertsaal bis zum letzten Stehplatz. Die Aufnahme der Aufführung (die einige Schwächen hatte) war ein monumentales und in seiner spontanen Einhelligkeit ein selten erlebtes Bekenntnis des Publikums zur schöpferischen Größe Hugo von Hofmannsthals und Strauss'. Der Komponist wußte, daß er „seinem geliebten P." die Wahrheit schrieb, als er, nach den ersten Orchesterproben zu „Ariadne", am 6. Juni 1912 aus Stuttgart seiner Gattin berichtete: „Es klingt prachtvoll, schöner als alles, was ich bisher gemacht habe. Ein ganz neuer Stil und neue Klangwolken." Das Werk ist das Juwel unter seinen Bühnenwerken geblieben, als das man es am 25. Oktober 1912 im Kleinen Haus des Königlichen Hoftheaters zu Stuttgart noch gar nicht so recht erkannte. Von der Molière-Komödie getrennt und ohne das später entstandene Vorspiel, ist die einaktige Oper an sich einem Torso vergleichbar. Strauss nahm an der Urfassung ein Dutzend größerer Änderungen vor, Striche brachten die Oper in ein ausbalanciertes Verhältnis zu der Länge des köstlichen Vorspiels.

Die ohne Regiezutaten konzertmäßig gebotene Wiedergabe durch die erlesenen Kammermusiker des Bostoner Orchesters übte magische Wirkung. Leinsdorfs absolutes Beherrschen und sicheres Deuten der Partitur ließ deren verborgenste Schönheiten aufstrahlen, auch in den bisher unbekannt gewesenen Passagen, die nach dem Auftritt des Bacchus den Fortgang der Handlung etwas verzögern. Die Rolle des Monsieur Jourdain war auf einige nichtssagende Schlußworte zusammengestrichen; der Darsteller des vornehmen Bürgers saß an der linken Seite des Podiums in einem Straßenanzug und machte, ehe er sprach, auf viele Leute den Eindruck eines an den Vorgängen unbeteiligten Feuerwehrmannes oder Polizisten. In Sportröcken über Rollkragenpullovern konnten sich die Darsteller der Zerbinetta begleitenden Spaßmacher nicht als Commedia-dell'-arte-Figuren entpuppen. Doch von diesen wohl unvermeidbaren Schwächen abgesehen, war die Aufführung eine dem Geist des Werkes entsprechende Großtat.

Claire Watson, die gefeierte Sopranistin der Wiener und Bayerischen Staatsoper, eroberte das Publikum ihrer Vaterstadt durch eine gesanglich makellose Porträtierung der sterbensmüden, verlassenen und dann zu neuem Leben und zu neuer Liebe erwachten Ariadne. Da saß nicht nur jeder Ton, es wurde auch jedem Wort seelischer Gehalt verliehen und das Mysterium der Verwandlung glaubhaft gemacht. Das Fehlen von Kostüm, Kulisse, Gebärde und Spiel wog die sublimierte Verinnerlichung auf, mit der sich die Künstlerin in schlichter Vornehmheit diese Rolle gänzlich zu eigen gemacht hat. Auch wer — von Selma Kurz und Maria Ivogün bis zu Erna Berger, Adele Kern und Erika Köth — Sängerinnen in der Glanzzeit ihrer Laufbahn als Zerbinetta erleben durfte, mußte das Bemühen der rothaarigen Beverly Sills, die figürlich der reizenden, koketten Komödiantin nicht ideal entspricht, anerkennen; nach dem hinreißenden Vortrag der großen Arie brach Jubel los, der Leinsdorf minutenlang an der Fortsetzung der Aufführung hinderte. Prächtiges Heldentenorformat dokumentierte der Amerikaner Robert Nágy als Bacchus: Man hat seit Set Svanholm keinen Künstler gehört, der die etwas statisch gezeichnete Figur mit so echtem, innerem Feuer in einen lebenden Menschen und liebenden Gott verwandeln konnte.

Die Ovationen nach Aufführungsende währten geschlagene zwanzig Minuten und waren von unbeschreiblicher Dankbarkeit für alle und jeden einzelnen der ausführenden Kräfte getragen. Sie erreichten den Höhepunkt, als Leinsdorf — einen befrackten Octavian spielend — mit tiefer Verbeugung jeder der fünf Sängerinnen eine Rose „seiner Anerkennung" überreichte.

LOS ANGELES EVENING & SUNDAY
HERALD EXAMINER
D. 721,397 SUN. 708,047

JAN 25 1969

His Heart May Not Attune Again

By DELOS SMITH

NEW YORK — When Erich Leinsdorf demoted the mighty Boston Symphony to an opera orchestra accompanying singers, he revealed his heart is warming to an old love and may never again attune itself to Boston.

He did it last week, and in Boston, too. One of the world's most renowned symphonic instruments was required to devote two concerts to providing background for 10 singers in a run-through of Richard Strauss' first version of his opera "Aiadne auf Naxos."

It was Leinsdorf's prerogative. He is music director of the Boston Symphony and will be until next summer's end when his resignation becomes effective. And it could have been answer enough for those supporters of the orchestra who had been hoping he would reconsider and also an answer to the question concerning his conductorial future.

When Leinsdorf took over the Boston in 1962, he had even more reputation as an opera conductor than as a symphony conductor. Indeed, he resigned a top artistic post at the Metropolitan Opera to take the Boston job, and no one will doubt the Met or any other opera house would be happy to have him.

But symphony conductors with established international reputations are scarce these days, as the trustees of the New York Philharmonic will tell you. They're still struggling with choosing a successor to their departing music director, Leonard Bernstein.

For that reason if none other, some supporters of the Boston Symphony had been hoping Leinsdorf could be persuaded to stay on. He resigned because he considered the workload too heavy and the hope was that the workload could be negotiated.

These supporters had been made unhappy by the trustees' decision to replace him with William Steinberg, director of the Pittsburgh Symphony. Not because Steinberg lacks international reputation but because he wouldn't give up his Pittsburgh post and intends to be music director of two symphony orchestras simultaneously.

Boston still has its pride. To old-line traditional Bostonians it is humiliating to share a music director with any orchestra, particularly one which was non-existent when the Boston Symphony was already famous.

Whatever the meaning, eyebrows shot up all over operatic and symphonic circles when Leinsdorf hired 10 opera singers and used the Boston Symphony to make an operatic event of little interest to symphonic audiences.

The point is that Strauss abandoned a felicitous scoring when he expanded his first version of "Ariadne auf Naxos" into the opera which remains viable in the opera house to this very day. The first version was not viable. It was originally conceived and performed as a stunt and probably hadn't been performed anywhere for some 50 years until Leinsdorf dusted it off.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 473,000

JAN 25 1969

THE real treat of the week was provided by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall on Saturday night. This was a concert performance of Richard Strauss's opera "Ariadne auf Naxos" in the original, 1912 version, with Beverly Sills in the role of Zerbinetta, Claire Watson as Ariadne, Robert Nagy as Bacchus, and the smaller remaining parts equally well cast. The 1912 version seems to differ from the one we know in that it contains a different arrangement in the sequence of a few passages, and ends not with Bacchus's triumphant aria but with some fireworks by Zerbinetta and a spoken comment about culture by Monsieur Jourdain, the bourgeois gentilhomme, the patron who is supposed, of course, to have commissioned "Ariadne." Miss Sills delivered her most taxing and important aria with extraordinary brilliance, hitting her two high notes right on the bull's-eye. Miss Watson was ideal in the more placid but no less taxing role of Ariadne, and Mr. Nagy was fine in his trumpeting tenor part. As always, "Ariadne" proved to be a total delight, and it is just the sort of thing that Mr. Leinsdorf does well. —WINTHROP SARGEANT

THE MET AS MUSEUM

MUSIC

Eric Leinsdorf

Surely it did not speak well for Ru ment of the Metropolitan Opera wh ment there all season came fro had nothing to do and

There are better Strauss sopranos around than Rysanek or Reri Grist, the Met's charming but woefully small-voiced Sophie, and two of them—both Americans—caused a sensation at Carnegie Hall when the Boston Symphony, under Erich Leinsdorf, did a brisk, if brittle, concert performance of Ariadne auf Naxos, in its original (1912) version. In any version, Ariadne is more of Hofmannsthal's undramatic abstract concepts lathered over with a lot of now soured Strauss schlag. It's to be tolerated only for its vocal fireworks. Beverly Sills simply stopped the show at Carnegie by breezing through Zerbinetta's fiendish coloratura chores with seeming ease, and Claire Watson, making a belated New York debut, sang with great evenness and warmth in the duller title role. Mr. Bing has done without both ladies for ten years. Let's hope Karajan signs them up. HARRIS GREEN

COMMONWEAL
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 46,000

MAY 2 1969

67.

Music to My Ears

Irving Kolodin

Beverly Sills Takes Lead Role In Concert 'Ariadne auf Naxos'

Triumphs Over Difficulties as Zerbinetta—Leinsdorf Conducts Bostonians

By ALLEN HUGHES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra provided dazzling and delectable entertainment at Carnegie Hall on Saturday night when it gave, in concert form, the first New York performance of the original version of Richard Strauss's "Ariadne auf Naxos."

The work was given its premiere in Stuttgart more than 56 years ago, in October, 1912. This original version would undoubtedly have attempted here before now had Strauss and his librettist, Hugo von Hofmannsthal, not revised the work into the longer and easier version widely known today.

The original version was intended to replace the Turkish ballet as the entertainment called for by Monsieur Jourdain in Moliere's play "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme." When this idea proved unsatisfactory in early performances, an operatic Prologue was added to "Ariadne" to make it into a full-fledged opera.

Zerbinetta Hard to Find

The part of Zerbinetta is so difficult in the simplified second version that it is virtually impossible to find anyone who can sing it satisfactorily from start to finish, but the original version is even wilder and longer.

The amazing Beverly Sills had a go at it on Saturday night that ended in triumph. Her big scene lasted approximately 15 minutes, and much of the time she was batting out roulades, racing up and down horrendous arpeggios, trilling through scales and doing all sorts of things most sopranos would not even attempt as vocalises in the privacy of their own studios. All the while, Miss Sills was smiling, and she had the audience smiling with and for her. At the end, it roared its approval, and rightly so.

Beverly Sills

Other Principals in Press

Hers was, of course, the most spectacular contribution contribution of the evening, but it was by no means the only good one. Claire Watson was impressive as Ariadne, Robert Nagy was notably strong as Bacchus and John Reardon excellent as Harlekin.

Estimable performances were also given by Benita Valente, Eunice Alberts, and Carol Bogard in the lesser female roles, and Malcolm Smith, John Ferrante and James Billings in the smaller male ones.

The hero of the evening was Erich Leinsdorf, whose control and shaping of the work were masterly. The great reduced Boston Symphony played beautifully, and Mr. Leinsdorf kept its sonorities lustrous and full-bodied without overwhelming the singers at any point. The ensembles were phrased and balanced to perfection.

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 959,600

JAN 20 1969

New England Newsclip

A Week of Novelties, New and Less New

THANKS TO the enterprise of Erich Leinsdorf, the virtuosity of an ensemble of his Boston Symphony musicians, and an able cast headed by Claire Watson and Beverly Sills, enough New Yorkers to fill Carnegie Hall can now claim something denied them previously—acquaintance with Strauss's Ariadne auf Naxos as it was originally (1912) written. That, of course, was as a pendant to Molière's Le bourgeois gentilhomme. It soon became apparent that the production possibilities of this combination were limited, and Strauss, in collaboration with the resourceful Hugo von Hofmannsthal, converted (1916) the pendant into a self-sufficient jewel.

As must be true with any conversion, there are pluses and minuses, as the admirably prepared performance under Leinsdorf made clear. Primary minus, of course, is the absence of the beautifully crafted prologue which Strauss-Hofmannsthal invented to precede their self-sufficiently inimitable (and highly individual) retelling of the myth linking Bacchus and Ariadne. Principal plus is the presence of Zerbinetta's coloratura showpiece "Grossmächtige Prinzessin" in all its original, awesome complexity. Miss Sills's triumphant solution of its technical problems not only earned her a storm of applause which caused the performance to be suspended temporarily, but also demonstrated Strauss's wisdom in reducing its complexities from awesome to merely intimidating, in the revision now commonly heard. Contrary to some opinion, the revision is not so much "easier" to sing as it is less exacting. That is, the order of difficulty is similar, but the second version is more considerate of a high soprano's stamina, and appreciably, if not substantially, shorter. Miss Sills, for this part, had invented a kind of "parody" tone which she made phenomenally manageab'e, at some sacrifice in fullness and color.

In other respects, the "original" Ariadne, followed with a score of the revised version, proved to be about 94.7 per cent the same as the form in which it is commonly heard. Aside from an extension here, a contraction there, the conspicuous difference was the reappearance of Zerbinetta during the Bacchus-Ariadne duet, just before the latter's agonized "Theseus!" Its elimination was one instance of a second thought being better than the first. Indeed, almost all the changes are contributory to a tighter, better-organized theater piece.

Though Miss Watson, as Ariadne, did not have a platform equal to Miss Sills's on which to exhibit herself (the incipient applause after "Es gibt ein Reich" was waved off by Leinsdorf, though he condoned a complete stop after the Sills aria), she performed in a manner to make her absence from opera stages of her own country (she is American born) a matter of more than curiosity. Somewhat tremulous at the beginning, she not only sustained her effort over the full course, but was singing better at the end than at the start. Also of interest was the emergence of Robert Nagy, familiar as a very loud comprimario at the Met, into the prominence of a leading tenor. His Bacchus was not the most vibrant imaginable, but it was strongly, securely projected. Others included Benita Valente, Carole Bogard, and Eunice Alberts as an uncommonly well-blended trio; John Reardon as Harlekin and Malcolm Smith as Truffaldin.

SR/February 1, 1969

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 443,000

FEB 1 1969

Freitag, 24. Jänner 1969 VOLKSBLATT / KULTUR

Sensationelle Strauss-Premiere

Leinsdorf präsentiert Ur-„Ariadne" auf dem Konzertpodium

Von unserem New-Yorker Korrespondenten Robert Breuer

Elektrisierende Stimmung herrschte in der Carnegie Hall lange vor Beginn der New-Yorker Erstaufführung von Richard Strauss' „Ariadne auf Naxos" in der Stuttgarter Originalfassung als eine „nach dem ‚Bürger als Edelmann' zu spielende Oper in einem Aufzuge". Erich Leinsdorf hatte mit dem Bostoner Sinfonieorchester einen Ausflug nach New York unternommen, um das in Boston viermal aufgeführte Werk auch in der Musikhauptstadt des Landes zu präsentieren.

Zwar gab es keine Sonderzüge wie einst, als solche aus Berlin zum Dresdner „Rosenkavalier" geführt wurden, dennoch: die gesamte Musikwelt und viele Gäste aus nah und fern füllten den großen Konzertsaal bis zum letzten Stehplatz. Die Aufnahme der Aufführung (die einige Schwächen hatte) war ein monumentales und in seiner spontanen Einhelligkeit ein selten erlebtes Bekenntnis des Publikums zur schöpferischen Größe Hugo von Hofmannsthals und Strauss'. Der Komponist wußte, daß er „seinem geliebten P." die Wahrheit schrieb, als er, nach den ersten Orchesterproben zu „Ariadne", am 6. Juni 1912 aus Stuttgart seiner Gattin berichtete: „Es klingt prachtvoll, schöner als alles, was ich bisher gemacht habe. Ein ganz neuer Stil und neue Klangwolken." Das Werk ist das Juwel unter seinen Bühnenwerken geblieben, als das man es am 25. Oktober 1912 im Kleinen Haus des Königlichen Hoftheaters zu Stuttgart noch gar nicht so recht erkannte. Von der Molière-Komödie getrennt und ohne das später entstandene Vorspiel, ist die einaktige Oper an sich einem Torso vergleichbar. Strauss nahm an der Urfassung ein Dutzend größerer Änderungen vor. Striche brachten die Oper in ein ausbalanciertes Verhältnis zu der Länge des köstlichen Vorspiels.

Die ohne Regiezutaten konzertmäßig gebotene Wiedergabe durch die erlesenen Kammermusiker des Bostoner Orchesters übte magische Wirkung. Leinsdorfs absolutes Beherrschen und sicheres Deuten der Partitur ließ deren verborgenste Schönheiten aufstrahlen, auch in den bisher unbekannt gewesenen Passagen, die nach dem Auftritt des Batchus den Fortgang der Handlung etwas verzögern. Die Rolle des Monsieur Jourdain war auf einige nichtssagende Schlußworte zusammengestrichen; der Darsteller des vornehmen Büngers saß an der linken Seite des Podiums in einem Straßenanzug und machte, ehe er sprach, auf viele Leute den Eindruck eines an den Vorgängen unbeteiligten Feuerwehrmannes oder Polizisten. In Sportröcken über Rollkragenpullovern konnten sich die Darsteller der Zerbinetta begleitenden Spaßmacher nicht als Commediadell'-arte-Figuren entpuppen. Doch von diesen wohl unvermeidbaren Schwächen abgesehen, war die Aufführung eine dem Geist des Werkes entsprechende Großtat.

Claire Watson, die gefeierte Sopranistin der Wiener und Bayerischen Staatsoper, eroberte das Publikum ihrer Vaterstadt durch eine gesanglich makellose Porträtierung der sterbensmüden, verlassenen und dann zu neuem Leben und zu neuer Liebe erwachten Ariadne. Da saß nicht nur jeder Ton, es wurde auch jedem Wort seelischer Gehalt verliehen und das Mysterium der Verwandlung glaubhaft gemacht. Das Fehlen von Kostüm, Kulisse, Gebärde und Spiel wog die sublimierte Verinnerlichung auf, mit der sich die Künstlerin in schlichter Vornehmheit diese Rolle gänzlich zu eigen gemacht hat. Auch wer — von Selma Kurz und Maria Ivogün bis zu Erna Berger, Adele Kern und Erika Köth — Sängerinnen in der Glanzzeit ihrer Laufbahn als Zerbinetta erleben durfte, mußte das Bemühen der rothaarigen Beverly Sills, die figürlich der reizenden, koketten Komödiantin nicht ideal entspricht, anerkennen; nach dem hinreißenden Vortrag der großen Arie brach Jubel los, der Leinsdorf minutenlang an der Fortsetzung der Aufführung hinderte. Prächtiges Heldentenorformat dokumentierte der Amerikaner Robert Nágy als Bacchus: Man hat seit Set Svanholm keinen Künstler gehört, der die etwas statisch gezeichnete Figur mit so echtem, innerem Feuer in einen lebenden Menschen und liebenden Gott verwandeln konnte.

Die Ovationen nach Aufführungsende währten geschlagene zwanzig Minuten und waren von unbeschreiblicher Dankbarkeit für alle und jeden einzelnen der ausführenden Kräfte getragen. Sie erreichten den Höhepunkt, als Leinsdorf — einen befrackten Octavian spielend — mit tiefer Verbeugung jeder der fünf Sängerinnen eine Rose „seiner Anerkennung" überreichte.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 473,000

JAN 25 1969

THE real treat of the week was provided by Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall on Saturday night. This was a concert performance of Richard Strauss's opera "Ariadne auf Naxos" in the original, 1912 version, with Beverly Sills in the role of Zerbinetta, Claire Watson as Ariadne, Robert Nagy as Bacchus, and the smaller remaining parts equally well cast. The 1912 version seems to differ from the one we know in that it contains a different arrangement in the sequence of a few passages, and ends not with Bacchus's triumphant aria but with some fireworks by Zerbinetta and a spoken comment about culture by Monsieur Jourdain, the bourgeois gentilhomme, the patron who is supposed, of course, to have commissioned "Ariadne." Miss Sills delivered her most taxing and important aria with extraordinary brilliance, hitting her two high notes right on the bull's-eye. Miss Watson was ideal in the more placid but no less taxing role of Ariadne, and Mr. Nagy was fine in his trumpeting tenor part. As always, "Ariadne" proved to be a total delight, and it is just the sort of thing that Mr. Leinsdorf does well. —WINTHROP SARGEANT

His Heart May Not Attune Again

By DELOS SMITH

NEW YORK — When Erich Leinsdorf demoted the mighty Boston Symphony to an opera orchestra accompanying singers, he revealed his heart is warming to an old love and may never again attune itself to Boston.

He did it last week, and in Boston, too. One of the world's most renowned symphonic instruments was required to devote two concerts to providing background for 10 singers in a run-through of Richard Strauss' first version of his opera "Aiadne auf Naxos."

It was Leinsdorf's prerogative. He is music director of the Boston Symphony and will be until next summer's end when his resignation becomes effective. And it could have been answer enough for those supporters of the orchestra who had been hoping he would reconsider and also an answer to the question concerning his conductorial future.

When Leinsdorf took over the Boston in 1962, he had even more reputation as an opera conductor than as a symphony conductor. Indeed, he resigned a top artistic post at the Metropolitan Opera to take the Boston job, and no one will doubt the Met or any other opera house would be happy to have him.

But symphony conductors with established international reputations are scarce these days, as the trustees of the New York Philharmonic will tell you. They're still struggling with choosing a successor to their departing music director, Leonard Bernstein.

For that reason if none other, some supporters of the Boston Symphony had been hoping Leinsdorf could be persuaded to stay on. He resigned because he considered the workload too heavy and the hope was that the workload could be negotiated.

These supporters had been made unhappy by the trustees' decision to replace him with William Steinberg, director of the Pittsburgh Symphony. Not because Steinberg lacks international reputation but because he wouldn't give up his Pittsburgh post and intends to be music director of two symphony orchestras simultaneously.

Boston still has its pride. To old-line traditional Bostonians it is humiliating to share a music director with any orchestra, particularly one which was non-existent when the Boston Symphony was already famous.

Whatever the meaning, eyebrows shot up all over operatic and symphonic circles when Leinsdorf hired 10 opera singers and used the Boston Symphony to make an operatic event of little interest to symphonic audiences,

The point is that Strauss abandoned a felicitous scoring when he expanded his first version of "Ariadne auf Naxos" into the opera which remains viable in the opera house to this very day. The first version was not viable. It was originally conceived and performed as a stunt and probably hadn't been performed anywhere for some 50 years until Leinsdorf dusted it off.

LOS ANGELES EVENING & SUNDAY
HERALD EXAMINER
D. 77,590 SUN. 702,047

JAN 25 1969

THE MET AS MUSEUM

MUSIC

Eric Leinsdorf

Surely it did not speak well for Ru ment of the Metropolitan Opera wh ment there all season came fro had nothing to do and

There are better Strauss sopranos around than Rysanek or Reri Grist, the Met's charming but woefully small-voiced Sophie, and two of them—both Americans—caused a sensation at Carnegie Hall when the Boston Symphony, under Erich Leinsdorf, did a brisk, if brittle, concert performance of Ariadne auf Naxos, in its original (1912) version. In any version, Ariadne is more of Hofmannsthal's undramatic abstract concepts lathered over with a lot of now soured Strauss schlag. It's to be tolerated only for its vocal fireworks. Beverly Sills simply stopped the show at Carnegie by breezing through Zerbinetta's fiendish coloratura chores with seeming ease, and Claire Watson, making a belated New York debut, sang with great evenness and warmth in the duller title role. Mr. Bing has done without both ladies for ten years. Let's hope Karajan signs them up. HARRIS GREEN

COMMONWEAL
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 46,000

MAY 2 1969

68.

MUSIK

"Ariadne" — neu entdeckt und umjubelt

New Yorker Erstaufführung der Urfassung der Strauss-Oper

Die New Yorker Erstaufführung der Urfassung von Richard Strauss' "Ariadne auf Naxos" als eine "nach dem 'Bürger als Edelmann' des Molière zu spielende Oper in einem Aufzug" begegnete ungeheurem Interesse. Erich Leinsdorf hatte ein auf drei Dutzend Mann reduziertes Ensemble des Bostoner Symphonieorchesters in die Carnegie Hall gebracht, um die viermal in Boston aufgeführte Originalfassung auch in der Musikmetropole des Landes zu präsentieren. Die Aufnahme der Aufführung (die einige Schwächen hatte) im völlig ausverkauften Saal war ein selten erlebtes, spontanes und einhelliges Bekenntnis des Publikums zur schöpferischen Grösse Hugo von Hofmannsthals und des Komponisten, die das Werk "Max Reinhardt in Verehrung und Dankbarkeit gewidmet" haben.

Strauss wusste, dass er "seinem geliebten P." die Wahrheit schrieb, als er nach den ersten Orchesterproben zu "Ariadne" aus Stuttgart seiner Gattin berichtete: "Es klingt prachtvoll, schöner als alles, was ich bisher gemacht habe. Ein ganz neuer Stil und neue Klangwolken." Die Oper ist das einzigartige Juwel unter seinen Bühnenwerken geblieben, als das man es 1912 im Kgl. Hoftheater zu Stuttgart noch gar nicht so recht erkannte. Der Theaterzettel der Uraufführung wies ausser Reinhardt (als "Leiter der Aufführung") und Strauss (als Dirigent) grosse Namen auf: in der Molière-Komödie waren Victor Arnold, Else Heims, Jakob Tiedtke, Josef Danegger, Ernst Matray und Grete Wiesenthal beschäftigt; die Hauptrollen der Oper sangen Mizzi Jeritza, Hermann Jadlowker und Margarethe Siems.

Da die Darbietung eines Sprechstückes und einer Oper Theatern und Zuhörern Schwierigkeiten bereitete, wurde "Ariadne" vom "Bürger als Edelmann" separiert und von den Autoren durch ein Vorspiel ergänzt, in dem der Rolle eines jungen Komponisten sowohl von Hofmannsthal als auch von Strauss Hauptwert beigemessen wurde. Um dem Ganzen entsprechendes Gleichgewicht zu geben, nahm Strauss an der Urfassung ein Dutzend grösserer Änderungen, vor allem Striche, vor und erleichterte auch die Koloraturrolle der Zerbinetta.

* * *

Das ohne Regiezutaten im ursprünglichen Gewand in Konzertform dargebotene Werk übte magische Wirkung. Leinsdorfs restloses Beherrschen der Partitur liess alle verborgensten Schönheiten aufleuchten; die Intimität und Subtilität der Musik, in der ganze Strecken vom Klavierquartett oder -quintett (mit Streichern oder Bläsern) begleitet werden, wurde nicht immer gewahrt. Die markantesten unter den bisher nicht gekannten Passagen sind Einschübe während des Auftritts des Bacchus und im Finale; dort verzögern sie den Fortgang der Handlung, da setzen sie den dithyrambischen Steigerungen nochmals das verspielte Getändel Zerbinettas und ihrer Begleiter entgegen.

Claire Watson (Ariadne)
Die in München und Wien tätige Sopranistin, eine Schülerin Elisabeth Schumanns, sang mit ausserordentlichem Erfolg zum erstenmal in ihrer Geburtstadt New York.
Photo: Fayer (Wien)

Die Sprechrolle des Monsieur Jourdain war auf einige Schlussworte zusammengestrichen; der Darsteller des vornehmen Bürgers trug einen Strassenanzug und sass wie ein unbeteiligt dem Spiel zusehender Polizist in der linken Ecke des Podiums. In Sportröcken über Rollkragen-Pullover konnten sich die von John Reardon (als Harlekin) etwas lustlos angeführten vier Spassmacher nicht als commedia dell'arte-Figuren entpuppen. Von diesen, wohl unvermeidbaren Mängeln abgesehen, war die Aufführung eine dem Geist des Werkes entsprechende Grosstat.

Claire Watson, langjähriges Mitglied der Bayerischen und Wiener Staatsopern, eroberte das Publikum ihrer Vaterstadt New York durch eine vollendete Porträtierung der verlassenen, sterbensmüden und dann zu neuem Leben und zu neuer Liebe erwachenden Ariadne. Sie machte diese Verwandlung mit jedem Ton und jedem Wort glaubhaft. Das Fehlen von Kostüm, Kulisse, Gebärde und Spiel wog die sublimierte Verinnerlichung auf, mit der sich die Künstlerin diese Rolle gänzlich zu eigen gemacht hat. Prächtiges Heldentenorkaliber dokumentierte der Amerikaner Robert Nagy als Bacchus; seit Svanholm wohl der erste Künstler, der aus der statisch gezeichneten Figur mit so echtem inneren Feuer ein gottgleiches Menschenwesen geschaffen hat.

Auch wer (von Selma Kurz und Maria Ivogün bis zu Erna Berger, Adele Kern und Erika Köth) grosse Koloratursängerinnen in der Glanzzeit ihrer Laufbahn als Zerbinetta erleben durfte, musste bedingungslos die überragende Leistung der rothaarigen Beverly Sills anerkennen. Sie ist nicht das Idealbild der koketten Komödiantin; aber nach dem hinreissenden Vortrag der grossen Arie brach Jubel los, der die Aufführung für viele Minuten unterbrach.

Die Ovationen nach Schluss waren von unbeschreiblicher Intensität; sie erreichten nach zahllosen Hervorrufen aller Künstler den Höhepunkt, als Leinsdorf, einen befrackten Octavian spielend, jeder der fünf Solistinnen mit tiefer Verbeugung eine Rose seiner Anerkennung überreichte. Robert Breuer

AUFBAU, FRIDAY, JANUARY 24, 1969

Boston Symphony: Ariadne auf Naxos

During any concert season there are occasions when a performance overrides its shortcomings, whatever they may be, to become an entirely memorable musical experience. Such an evening was that spent in the company of the Boston Symphony, which under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf presented a concert version of Richard Strauss's Ariadne auf Naxos in the early (1912) edition. This was the Strauss-Hofmannsthal pendant to Molière's Le Bourgeois gentilhomme and differs from the later, all-opera, version in the omission of the Prologue and the expansion of various parts of the work. The chief differences, however, are two: one, Zerbinetta's fireworks-display coloratura aria is half-again as long, with one section transposed up a tone; and two, the work ends not on the Verklärung of Ariadne and Bacchus but on Zerbinetta and her troupe, who keep the focus on the wry irony of the situation. In the first instance Strauss's later shortening was sound, on humanitarian if on no other grounds (the embellishments do reach a plateau of unmitigated, wretched excess), but the latter change is a pity, for the opera should not close on the Bacchus-Ariadne duet, which is the weakest part of the score. Otherwise, in both versions, Ariadne is as continuously, sensuously inventive as any opera written in this century and probably as any since Così fan tutte.

The performance grew from the bedrock of Leinsdorf's control and the crisp yet responsive ensemble playing of members of the Boston Symphony, who made one hell of a glorious noise.

Beverly Sills: one is stumm.

The trios of comics and spirits were good if not ideal, the Harlequin of John Reardon combined fine vocalism and excellent characterization. Robert Nagy's Bacchus was appropriately leather-lunged and forceful, and Claire Watson's burnished top tones projected Ariadne with a great deal of nobility and beauty. Before Beverly Sills's Zerbinetta I remain, as she says all women do before a new God, stumm (here to be translated as, struck dumb). She received a standing ovation after her rendition of that fiendish aria, and it was deserved not because she negotiated the course without stumbling but because she did it like a queen. The effortless ease with which she sang was only one facet of her triumph: more amazing was the amount of character she projected while she was singing and the varieties of color and shading she brought to its different sections. This last quality separates her from almost every other coloratura soprano, and gives her singing that warmth and diversity which complement the vocal-exercise side of the voice. Sills also sang beautifully the rest of the way, but her rendition of The Fiend will always remain one of the incredible vocal memories. As Don Giovanni would say, brava, brava, arcibrava.

The memorability of the evening, however, lay in the fact that this one performance did not overshadow the rest, but fitted into it as part of the ensemble. An evening of music-making of the highest order. PATRICK J. SMITH

CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 244,000
FEB 15 1969

JOHNSON ON MUSIC

Inspired Strauss, and uninspired c

Strauss and von Hofmannsthal bequeathed to us two versions of their "Ariadne auf Naxos." The 1912 "original" and shorter of the pair recently came to Carnegie Hall in concert version and it shot forth fireworks. With members of the Boston Symphony, conductor Erich Leinsdorf (who has recorded the longer "Ariadne" for RCA) was exemplary even though he and his men bodily obscured the soloists. What soloists! Incredibly enough, American soprano Claire Watson was making her New York debut as Ariadne—she is good to look at and she sang her noble role nobly and persuasively. From an evening which had no vocal letdowns, I must single out the three nymphs by Benita Valente, Eunice Alberts, and Carole Bogard along with the Harlekin by John Reardon and the Bacchus by Robert Nagy. There remains Beverly Sills. As Zerbinetta, Miss Sills had to execute what is usually called the most difficult coloratura music yet written. She seemed undisturbed by the rumor. Some of the defining things about Miss Sills are these: she seems to find the "impossible" exhilarating; she seems to say, "It was written, so it can be sung"; she is like that famous mountain climber who climbed what was there. She soars with such élan that critiques amount to love letters.

The Sunday Bulletin
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
SUN. 728,276
JAN 26 1969

The Music Beat

A Daring Young Soprano On Strauss Opera Trapeze

5454

By MAX de SCHAUENSEE
Bulletin Music Critic

IT MAY BE of some interest to opera lovers in this city to hear about a thrilling performance of Richard Strauss' "Ariadne auf Naxos," presented by Erich Leinsdorf and his Boston Symphony in New York's Carnegie Hall, last weekend.

Strauss enthusiasts flocked from near and far to hear this original 1912 version of a rarely given opera. The performance constituted a United States premiere. When the opera was revised in 1916, drastic changes were made. That is the version that is generally heard today.

Within the frame of Carnegie Hall, a sharply etched demonstration showed how a very sophisticated and tricky score can be given a reading of surpassing smoothness and suggestibility. This, of course, can only be achieved through many rehearsals which, apparently, the Boston group must have been able to obtain.

• • •

THE EVENING proved a triumph for Beverly Sills as Zerbinetta. That character's famous aria is much more elaborate and extended (15 minutes) in this earlier version. Objections from sopranos who had to negotiate this coloratura nightmare caused Strauss to shorten it and eliminate some of the near-impossible acrobatics.

Miss Sills, however, sang it without flinching. She found her way blithely and securely through a maize of runs, trills, leaps, arpeggios, staccati, and stratospheric notes. What must have been an endurance test won her the ovation of the evening.

Miss Sills is at the moment the most talked-about singer on the horizon. She has enjoyed extended articles in our leading magazines, and her recent recording has won salvos of applause with hardly (if any) dissenting voices. All this she has richly deserved.

What a pity that one of our Philadelphia companies has not had the foresight to secure her before her super-star status sends her skyhigh in price. It would have been nice for Philadelphians to hear her as Lucia the other night. Perhaps we are too apt to bring the same singers back to a city which is already in a rut.

• • •

ANOTHER THOUGHT that came to me while listening to Strauss' score, is that not only do we not hear works of our immediate time (Boston does, thanks to impresario Sarah Caldwell) but for too many years now, we have not even heard the more sophisticated works, the works for which people travel to European festivals.

Philadelphia opera buffs with money at hand can, of course, journey to Munich or to Salzburg to enjoy this jet-set repertoire, for it is the operatic jet set (and there is one) that most loudly proclaims the virtues of such operas.

Besides "Ariadne," New York will hear more Strauss — the Met's "Die Frau Ohne Shatten," and "Rosenkavalier," and performances of "Capriccio," by the New York City Opera next Fall.

Will the new metroliners on the Penn Central to New York tempt Philadelphia fans to be more adventurous? Or how about journeying out to Santa Fe this coming summer where the United States premiere of a Penderecki opera will be given?

It does seem that this city (and I except the newly unearthed Donizetti-Bellini excavations) has its share of old, waning favorites and operas that add up to a dreary and familiar grind.

MUSIC / David Hamilton

NATION
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 30,000
MAR 31 1969

The most interesting Strauss operatic performance of the season took place in Carnegie Hall, where on January 18 the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented a concert performance of the original 1912 score of Ariadne auf Naxos. This opera was first planned and presented in conjunction with Hofmannsthal's adaptation of Molière's Le bourgeois gentilhomme, the simultaneously performed opera seria and commedia dell' arte replacing Molière's Turkish ceremony; later, when it became evident that good performances of the combined play and opera were difficult to arrange, Hofmannsthal devised a prologue for musical setting that would establish the necessary dramatic situation for the opera-pastiche. In his 1916 setting of that Prologue, Strauss makes no attempt to achieve a musical continuity, presumably to throw into relief the opera-within-the-opera. However, the highly stylized libretto of the latter, with its clear articulation into "numbers," called forth from Strauss a consistency of structural coherence and harmonic direction that he rarely achieved in his operatic works. The busy but directionless "symphonic recitative" of Rosenkavalier is avoided here, and within the closed musical forms a high level of craftsmanship is almost continuously evident, especially in harmonic details and in the prodigiously inventive scoring for chamber orchestra (the string divisions, doublings with winds, and the disposition of harmonium, celesta, piano and two harps in the tutti climaxes are brilliantly arranged for maximum sonority).

The additional music found in the 1912 version (mostly for Zerbinetta; in the revision she lost an aria announcing Bacchus' arrival, and her big rondo was abbreviated and simplified) results in a considerable change of emphasis, for the commedia dell' arte characters originally had a much larger role in the later part of the opera. From the correspondence it is clear that Strauss wanted to revise them away entirely at the end, and only at Hofmannsthal's insistence did he insert a single line for Zerbinetta to express her worldly view of what is to Ariadne a mystical transcendence, not just a shift of affections to a new lover. However, the original version makes this point much more satisfactorily and retains a balance between the two elements right to the end of the opera. It is regrettable that the final pages of the 1912 score, with a speech for Monsieur Jourdain and references to the Bourgeois gentilhomme score, effectively preclude its use with the later prologue.

The Carnegie Hall performance was certainly one of the most notable achievements of Leinsdorf's Boston tenure, for the score can rarely have been played so well; in both line and detail, it was masterful. The evening's special pleasure was the spectacularly accurate and endearingly insouciant Zerbinetta of Beverly Sills; Strauss's reductio ad absurdum of the coloratura showpiece can fall flat on its face if not tossed off to perfection, but Miss Sills has skill to spare, and her obvious conviction that it was all only slightly more difficult than Heidenröslein added an extra layer of icing to the whole deliciously grotesque confection. Claire Watson's sympathetic Ariadne was also on the positive side, and Robert Nagy offered a powerful, if somewhat unvaried Bacchus. A concurrently released recording of the revised version (see listing below) is a serviceable addition to the catalogue, with some smaller roles better sung than they were in the Boston performance; by comparison, however, Kempe leads a neat and careful performance rather than a brilliant one. What is now called for is a recording of the 1912 Ariadne, not just another duplication of existing recordings.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 130,000
APR 1969

68.

MUSIK

"Ariadne" — neu entdeckt und umjubelt

New Yorker Erstaufführung der Urfassung der Strauss-Oper

Die New Yorker Erstaufführung der Urfassung von Richard Strauss' "Ariadne auf Naxos" als eine "nach dem 'Bürger als Edelmann' des Molière zu spielende Oper in einem Aufzug" begegnete ungeheurem Interesse. Erich Leinsdorf hatte ein auf drei Dutzend Mann reduziertes Ensemble des Bostoner Symphonieorchesters in die Carnegie Hall gebracht, um die viermal in Boston aufgeführte Originalfassung auch in der Musikmetropole des Landes zu präsentieren. Die Aufnahme der Aufführung (die einige Schwächen hatte) im völlig ausverkauften Saal war ein selten erlebtes, spontanes und einhelliges Bekenntnis des Publikums zur schöpferischen Grösse Hugo von Hofmannsthals und des Komponisten, die das Werk "Max Reinhardt in Verehrung und Dankbarkeit gewidmet" haben.

Strauss wusste, dass er "seinem geliebten P." die Wahrheit schrieb, als er nach den ersten Orchesterproben zu "Ariadne" aus Stuttgart seiner Gattin berichtete: "Es klingt prachtvoll, schöner als alles, was ich bisher gemacht habe. Ein ganz neuer Stil und neue Klangwolken." Die Oper ist das einzigartige Juwel unter seinen Bühnenwerken geblieben, als das man es 1912 im Kgl. Hoftheater zu Stuttgart noch gar nicht so recht erkannte. Der Theaterzettel der Uraufführung wies ausser Reinhardt (als "Leiter der Aufführung") und Strauss (als Dirigent) grosse Namen auf: in der Molière-Komödie waren Victor Arnold, Else Heims, Jakob Tiedtke, Josef Danegger, Ernst Matray und Grete Wiesenthal beschäftigt; die Hauptrollen der Oper sangen Mizzi Jeritza, Hermann Jadlowker und Margarethe Siems.

Da die Darbietung eines Sprechstückes und einer Oper Theatern und Zuhörern Schwierigkeiten bereitete, wurde "Ariadne" vom "Bürger als Edelmann" separiert und von den Autoren durch ein Vorspiel ergänzt, in dem der Rolle eines jungen Komponisten sowohl von Hofmannsthal als auch von Strauss Hauptwert beigemessen wurde. Um dem Ganzen entsprechendes Gleichgewicht zu geben, nahm Strauss an der Urfassung ein Dutzend grösserer Änderungen, vor allem Striche, vor und erleichterte auch die Koloraturrolle der Zerbinetta.

* * *

Das ohne Regiezutaten im ursprünglichen Gewand in Konzertform dargebotene Werk übte magische Wirkung. Leinsdorfs restloses Beherrschen der Partitur liess alle verborgensten Schönheiten aufleuchten; die Intimität und Subtilität der Musik, in der ganze Strecken vom Klavierquartett oder -quintett (mit Streichern oder Bläsern) begleitet werden, wurde nicht immer gewahrt. Die markantesten unter den bisher nicht gekannten Passagen sind Einschübe während des Auftritts des Bacchus und im Finale; dort verzögern sie den Fortgang der Handlung, da setzen sie den dithyrambischen Steigerungen nochmals das verspielte Getändel Zerbinettas und ihrer Begleiter entgegen.

Claire Watson (Ariadne)
Die in München und Wien tätige Sopranistin, eine Schülerin Elisabeth Schumanns, sang mit ausserordentlichem Erfolg zum erstenmal in ihrer Geburtstadt New York.
Photo: Fayer (Wien)

Die Sprechrolle des Monsieur Jourdain war auf einige Schlussworte zusammengestrichen; der Darsteller des vornehmen Bürgers trug einen Strassenanzug und sass wie ein unbeteiligt dem Spiel zusehender Polizist in der linken Ecke des Podiums. In Sportröcken über Rollkragen-Pullover konnten sich die von John Reardon (als Harlekin) etwas lustlos angeführten vier Spassmacher nicht als commedia dell'arte-Figuren entpuppen. Von diesen, wohl unvermeidbaren Mängeln abgesehen, war die Aufführung eine dem Geist des Werkes entsprechende Grosstat.

Claire Watson, langjähriges Mitglied der Bayerischen und Wiener Staatsopern, eroberte das Publikum ihrer Vaterstadt New York durch eine vollendete Porträtierung der verlassenen, sterbensmüden und dann zu neuem Leben und zu neuer Liebe erwachenden Ariadne. Sie machte diese Verwandlung mit jedem Ton und jedem Wort glaubhaft. Das Fehlen von Kostüm, Kulisse, Gebärde und Spiel wog die sublimierte Verinnerlichung auf, mit der sich die Künstlerin diese Rolle gänzlich zu eigen gemacht hat. Prächtiges Heldentenorkaliber dokumentierte der Amerikaner Robert Nágy als Bacchus; seit Svanholm wohl der erste Künstler, der aus der statisch gezeichneten Figur mit so echtem inneren Feuer ein gottgleiches Menschenwesen geschaffen hat.

Auch wer (von Selma Kurz und Maria Ivogün bis zu Erna Berger, Adele Kern und Erika Köth) grosse Koloratursängerinnen in der Glanzzeit ihrer Laufbahn als Zerbinetta erleben durfte, musste bedingungslos die überragende Leistung der rothaarigen Beverly Sills anerkennen. Sie ist nicht das Idealbild der koketten Komödiantin; aber nach dem hinreissenden Vortrag der grossen Arie brach Jubel los, der die Aufführung für viele Minuten unterbrach.

Die Ovationen nach Schluss waren von unbeschreiblicher Intensität; sie erreichten nach zahllosen Hervorrufen aller Künstler den Höhepunkt, als Leinsdorf, einen befrackten Octavian spielend, jeder der fünf Solistinnen mit tiefer Verbeugung eine Rose seiner Anerkennung überreichte. Robert Breuer

AUFBAU, FRIDAY, JANUARY 24, 1969

Boston Symphony: Ariadne auf Naxos

During any concert season there are occasions when a performance overrides its shortcomings, whatever they may be, to become an entirely memorable musical experience. Such an evening was that spent in the company of the Boston Symphony, which under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf presented a concert version of Richard Strauss's Ariadne auf Naxos in the early (1912) edition. This was the Strauss-Hofmannsthal pendant to Molière's Le Bourgeois gentilhomme and differs from the later, all-opera, version in the omission of the Prologue and the expansion of various parts of the work. The chief differences, however, are two: one, Zerbinetta's fireworks-display coloratura aria is half-again as long, with one section transposed up a tone; and two, the work ends not on the Verklärung of Ariadne and Bacchus but on Zerbinetta and her troupe, who keep the focus on the wry irony of the situation. In the first instance Strauss's later shortening was sound, on humanitarian if on no other grounds (the embellishments do reach a plateau of unmitigated, wretched excess), but the latter change is a pity, for the opera should not close on the Bacchus-Ariadne duet, which is the weakest part of the score. Otherwise, in both versions, Ariadne is as continuously, sensuously inventive as any opera written in this century and probably as any since Così fan tutte.

The performance grew from the bedrock of Leinsdorf's control and the crisp yet responsive ensemble playing of members of the Boston Symphony, who made one hell of a glorious noise.

Beverly Sills: one is stumm.

The trios of comics and spirits were good if not ideal, the Harlequin of John Reardon combined fine vocalism and excellent characterization. Robert Nagy's Bacchus was appropriately leather-lunged and forceful, and Claire Watson's burnished top tones projected Ariadne with a great deal of nobility and beauty. Before Beverly Sills's Zerbinetta I remain, as she says all women do before a new God, stumm (here to be translated as, struck dumb). She received a standing ovation after her rendition of that fiendish aria, and it was deserved not because she negotiated the course without stumbling but because she did it like a queen. The effortless ease with which she sang was only one facet of her triumph: more amazing was the amount of character she projected while she was singing and the varieties of color and shading she brought to its different sections. This last quality separates her from almost every other coloratura soprano, and gives her singing that warmth and diversity which complement the vocal-exercise side of the voice. Sills also sang beautifully the rest of the way, but her rendition of The Fiend will always remain one of the incredible vocal memories. As Don Giovanni would say, brava, brava, arcibrava.

The memorability of the evening, however, lay in the fact that this one performance did not overshadow the rest, but fitted into it as part of the ensemble. An evening of music-making of the highest order. PATRICK J. SMITH

CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 244,000

FEB 15 1969

JOHNSON ON MUSIC

Inspired Strauss, and uninspired c

Strauss and von Hofmannsthal bequeathed to us two versions of their "Ariadne auf Naxos." The 1912 "original" and shorter of the pair recently came to Carnegie Hall in concert version and it shot forth fireworks. With members of the Boston Symphony, conductor Erich Leinsdorf (who has recorded the longer "Ariadne" for RCA) was exemplary even though he and his men bodily obscured the soloists. What soloists! Incredibly enough, American soprano Claire Watson was making her New York debut as Ariadne—she is good to look at and she sang her noble role nobly and persuasively. From an evening which had no vocal letdowns, I must single out the three nymphs by Benita Valente, Eunice Alberts, and Carole Bogard along with the Harlekin by John Reardon and the Bacchus by Robert Nagy. There remains Beverly Sills. As Zerbinetta, Miss Sills had to execute what is usually called the most difficult coloratura music yet written. She seemed undisturbed by the rumor. Some of the defining things about Miss Sills are these: she seems to find the "impossible" exhilarating; she seems to say, "It was written, so it can be sung"; she is like that famous mountain climber who climbed what was there. She soars with such élan that critiques amount to love letters.

The Sunday Bulletin
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
SUN. 728,276

JAN 26 1969

The Music Beat

A Daring Young Soprano On Strauss Opera Trapeze

By MAX de SCHAUENSEE
Bulletin Music Critic

3454

IT MAY BE of some interest to opera lovers in this city to hear about a thrilling performance of Richard Strauss' "Ariadne auf Naxos," presented by Erich Leinsdorf and his Boston Symphony in New York's Carnegie Hall, last weekend.

Strauss enthusiasts flocked from near and far to hear this original 1912 version of a rarely given opera. The performance constituted a United States premiere. When the opera was revised in 1916, drastic changes were made. That is the version that is generally heard today.

Within the frame of Carnegie Hall, a sharply etched demonstration showed how a very sophisticated and tricky score can be given a reading of surpassing smoothness and suggestibility. This, of course, can only be achieved through many rehearsals which, apparently, the Boston group must have been able to obtain.

• • •

THE EVENING proved a triumph for Beverly Sills as Zerbinetta. That character's famous aria is much more elaborate and extended (15 minutes) in this earlier version. Objections from sopranos who had to negotiate this coloratura nightmare caused Strauss to shorten it and eliminate some of the near-impossible acrobatics.

Miss Sills, however, sang it without flinching. She found her way blithely and securely through a maize of runs, trills, leaps, arpeggios, staccati, and stratospheric notes. What must have been an endurance test won her the ovation of the evening.

Miss Sills is at the moment the most talked-about singer on the horizon. She has enjoyed extended articles in our leading magazines, and her recent recording has won salvos of applause with hardly (if any) dissenting voices. All this she has richly deserved.

What a pity that one of our Philadelphia companies has not had the foresight to secure her before her super-star status sends her skyhigh in price. It would have been nice for Philadelphians to hear her as Lucia the other night. Perhaps we are too apt to bring the same singers back to a city which is already in a rut.

• • •

ANOTHER THOUGHT that came to me while listening to Strauss' score, is that not only do we not hear works of our immediate time (Boston does, thanks to impresario Sarah Caldwell) but for too many years now, we have not even heard the more sophisticated works, the works for which people travel to European festivals.

Philadelphia opera buffs with money at hand can, of course, journey to Munich or to Salzburg to enjoy this jet-set repertoire, for it is the operatic jet set (and there is one) that most loudly proclaims the virtues of such operas.

Besides "Ariadne," New York will hear more Strauss — the Met's "Die Frau Ohne Shatten," and "Rosenkavalier," and performances of "Capriccio," by the New York City Opera next Fall.

Will the new metroliners on the Penn Central to New York tempt Philadelphia fans to be more adventurous? Or how about journeying out to Santa Fe this coming summer where the United States premiere of a Penderecki opera will be given?

It does seem that this city (and I except the newly unearthed Donizetti-Bellini excavations) has its share of old, waning favorites and operas that add up to a dreary and familiar grind.

MUSIC / David Hamilton

NATION
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 20,000

MAR 31 1969

The most interesting Strauss operatic performance of the season took place in Carnegie Hall, where on January 18 the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented a concert performance of the original 1912 score of Ariadne auf Naxos. This opera was first planned and presented in conjunction with Hofmannsthal's adaptation of Molière's Le bourgeois gentilhomme, the simultaneously performed opera seria and commedia dell' arte replacing Molière's Turkish ceremony; later, when it became evident that good performances of the combined play and opera were difficult to arrange, Hofmannsthal devised a prologue for musical setting that would establish the necessary dramatic situation for the opera-pastiche. In his 1916 setting of that Prologue, Strauss makes no attempt to achieve a musical continuity, presumably to throw into relief the opera-within-the-opera. However, the highly stylized libretto of the latter, with its clear articulation into "numbers," called forth from Strauss a consistency of structural coherence and harmonic direction that he rarely achieved in his operatic works. The busy but directionless "symphonic recitative" of Rosenkavalier is avoided here, and within the closed musical forms a high level of craftsmanship is almost continuously evident, especially in harmonic details and in the prodigiously inventive scoring for chamber orchestra (the string divisions, doublings with winds, and the disposition of harmonium, celesta, piano and two harps in the tutti climaxes are brilliantly arranged for maximum sonority).

The additional music found in the 1912 version (mostly for Zerbinetta; in the revision she lost an aria announcing Bacchus' arrival, and her big rondo was abbreviated and simplified) results in a considerable change of emphasis, for the commedia dell' arte characters originally had a much larger role in the later part of the opera. From the correspondence it is clear that Strauss wanted to revise them away entirely at the end, and only at Hofmannsthal's insistence did he insert a single line for Zerbinetta to express her worldly view of what is to Ariadne a mystical transcendence, not just a shift of affections to a new lover? However, the original version makes this point much more satisfactorily and retains a balance between the two elements right to the end of the opera. It is regrettable that the final pages of the 1912 score, with a speech for Monsieur Jourdain and references to the Bourgeois gentilhomme score, effectively preclude its use with the later prologue.

The Carnegie Hall performance was certainly one of the most notable achievements of Leinsdorf's Boston tenure, for the score can rarely have been played so well; in both line and detail, it was masterful. The evening's special pleasure was the spectacularly accurate and endearingly insouciant Zerbinetta of Beverly Sills; Strauss's reductio ad absurdum of the coloratura showpiece can fall flat on its face if not tossed off to perfection, but Miss Sills has skill to spare, and her obvious conviction that it was all only slightly more difficult than Heidenröslein added an extra layer of icing to the whole deliciously grotesque confection. Claire Watson's sympathetic Ariadne was also on the positive side, and Robert Nagy offered a powerful, if somewhat unvaried Bacchus. A concurrently released recording of the revised version (see listing below) is a serviceable addition to the catalogue, with some smaller roles better sung than they were in the Boston performance; by comparison, however, Kempe leads a neat and careful performance rather than a brilliant one. What is now called for is a recording of the 1912 Ariadne, not just another duplication of existing recordings.

HIGH FIDELITY
MUSICAL AMERICA
GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 139,000

APR 1969

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF
Music Director

PROVIDENCE SERIES
VETERANS MEMORIAL AUDITORIUM
THIS THURSDAY AT 8:30
GEORGES PRETRE Guest Conductor
LALO: 'Le Roi d'Ys' Overture
SIBELIUS: Symphony No. 5
MESSIAEN: Chronochromic (1960)
RAVEL: La Valse

Ticket Prices: $4, $5, $6, $7

Tickets may be purchased at:
AVERY PIANO COMPANY
256 Weybosset St., Providence
TELEPHONE: GA 1-1434

Baldwin Piano RCA Records

Third Concert Given By Boston Symphony

By RUTH TRIPP

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series here was marked by two important "firsts." A near capacity audience at Veterans Memorial Auditorium had the pleasure of greeting Georges Pretre, who was making his debut as guest conductor with this orchestra.

In line with true French tradition, his program featured three works by composers of his native land. Of these, Olivier Messiaen's "Chronochromie" for large orchestra was given its first performance by the Boston orchestra and its first performance in Rhode Island, a fact which need not be stated since it would take a group of the size, importance and skill enjoyed by the Boston Symphony to undertake the huge task.

The concert opened with the Overture to Lalo's "Le Roi d'Ys" and closed with the magnificent Ravel ballet "La Valse." We also heard the Symphony No. 5 by Sibelius. It was truly an important concert.

Georges Pretre is a conductor whose stage presence and manner of conducting are a fortunate combination of two of the great conductors who presided over this great orchestra for many years. Pretre has the fire and command which Koussevitzky could muster, plus the grace and innately musical communication which always marked a Charles Munch performance. It was an evening of recollection for the first half of the program.

The Lalo Overture was a magnificent display of pure musical effects and within minutes of the start, the listeners were aware of the refinement of tone, the electric changes of mood and the beauty of phrasing which came from every section of the orchestra. We heard an inspired performance. No small part of the pleasure came from the lovely cello solo by Jules Eskin.

The excitement of the program, however, came with the contemporary work by Messiaen. For this work, the conductor used a score, the only time during the concert. Small wonder, when one considered the size of the orchestra and the wide distribution of the various assignments. The percussion section had a genuine field day and for this part alone, the performance was worth hearing.

All the program notes in the book could not explain or enlighten the audience about the style. Each listener, to his own satisfaction, could determine what he heard. For me, there was a huge water wheel turning laboriously and sending off showers of strange sounds. Words revolved around in one's mind as the music went on.

Georges Pretre went on turning page after page of the voluminous score and at times he turned back two or three as if to make sure that none of the strange sounds had escaped into limbo. It was when the string section took its turn at unfolding its part of the puzzle, that we heard all 12 tones in retrograde and in several other directions simultaneously. It could have been centrifugal or centripetal motion but it had little to do with music.

A hum of conversation began to rise in the audience and when this strophe was finished there was an interruption of applause with a few moderate "boos." Pretre went on turning pages. There were a few more of the grateful pauses between sections and finally the work ended with much applause, a great many loud "boos" and one lusty shout of "encore" (he was a young man who sat near me).

The conductor brought the orchestra to its feet to share in the tumultuous applause, all the while, silencing the objectors with a nonchalant wave of the hand.

What remains to this listener of the impressions of this strange work, is tremendous respect for the virtuosity of the percussion section and the reeds. The strange Messiaen sounds fare much better from those areas than from the strings.

The Ravel interpretation was a tremendous triumph. The baton was once more inspired by the powerful rhythm of the score and, by the final applause, it would seem that all was forgiven and Pretre was once more a great favorite.

His Sibelius reading was of the sort to make one realize the magnificence of the writing. When Pretre builds a climax of tone, it has regal proportions. This was truly a memorable concert, the Messiaen work included.

JOURNAL (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
CIRC. 66,100

JAN 24 1969 New England Newsclip

THURSDAY

THE BOSTON Symphony Orchestra will give a concert at 8:30 p.m. in the Veterans Memorial Auditorium. Georges Pretre will be guest conductor.

The program follows:

Lalo ..... 'Le Roi d'Ys' Overture
Sibelius ..... Symphony No. 5
Messiaen ..... Chronochromie (1960)
Ravel ..... La Valse

The Providence Sunday Journal, January 19, 1969

Some Events Canceled, Postponed

Symphony to Play Tonight

The Boston Symphony will play its scheduled concert at 8:30 tonight in Veterans Memorial Auditorium, but the lingering effects of the snow storm forced several other events to be canceled or postponed.

An official of the Boston Symphony said its 106 members will be here "if they have to come by dog sled to do it."

The program will include Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony and the Beethoven Fourth Piano Concerto. It will be the final appearance of Erich Leinsdorf as the orchestra's music director and conductor.

Among those meetings canceled was the Providence School Committee meeting scheduled for tonight. Louis I. Kramer, acting superintendent of schools, said the meeting has been rescheduled for next Thursday at 8:30 p.m.

At least three other events or meetings scheduled for last night were canceled.

One of these was the Head Start Follow Through Parents Advisory Committee meeting, for which no new date has been set.

Another was the annual meeting of the Travelers Aid Society of Rhode Island, Inc., which was scheduled in the John Brown House at 52 Power St.

The Providence Recreation Department's Nok-Hockey tournament, scheduled yesterday, was postponed until 3:30 p.m. tomorrow at the Joslin Gymnasium.

The United Presbyterian Church on Chalkstone Avenue canceled its Lenten service, which was scheduled for tonight.

A concert by the Rhode Island Civic Chorale and Orchestra, scheduled for Saturday night at the Veterans Memorial Auditorium, also has been postponed. It will be held March 23 at 4 p.m. in the auditorium. Mrs. Richard McKenzie, executive director, said a rehearsal scheduled at Classical High School was postponed last week because of the fire that destroyed the former Big Bear Market nearby. The storm forced the cancellation of rehearsals on Monday and Tuesday this week.

BULLETIN (e)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
CIRC. 147,900

FEB 27 1969 New England Newsclip

PROVIDENCE, R. I. (UPI)—French conductor Georges Pretre makes his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra here Thursday night in the third of the symphony's five annual appearances. Pretre also will be guest conductor in Boston.

ENTERPRISE & TIMES (e)
BROCKTON, MASS.
CIRC. 52,417

JAN 22 1969 New England

FRENCH CONDUCTOR Georges Pretre will make his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday at 8:30 p.m. in the Veterans Memorial Auditorium.

Music In Review

Boston Symphony Applauded Except In 'Conglomeration'

Georges Pretre, guest conductor making his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was enthusiastically welcomed with resounding applause Thursday evening in Veterans Memorial Auditorium, Providence.

His conducting is elegance con fuoco (with fire) as was the sound the orchestra produced in the opening work, Lalo's "Overture to 'Leroi d'Ys' " and it gave him the opportunity to display his own podium mannerisms that seemed to please both audience and musicians. The following Sibelius "Symphony No. 5 in E-Flat" was more sobering, almost grim in some of its passages, but ending on a high pitch of jubilation.

There was a break in the increasing admiration for this capable young maestro when, after intermission, he began to lead this enlarged orchestra — hanging cymbals and gongs, chimes, xylophones and bells, glockenspiel, Chinese cymbals and tom-tom — and it seemed ludicrous at times to see 105 musicians on stage with only six violinists playing each in a different key while the 99 others sat idle. The whole work was a conglomeration of fragmented sounds that ranged from twittering bird calls to steamboat whistles, from tinkling temple bells to the Big Ben's booming stroke. So much of it was boring and the rest so disturbing that the audience began talking and at one point broke into derisive laughter.

It appeared that Pretre sensed the ludicrous mood of the listeners and cut short the performance because the score on his lecturn was as thick as an unabridged Webster and he closed it about one-third way through. There were "boos" among the handclapping and some laughter.

This was entitled "Chronochromie for Large Orchestra" by Messiaen, and, according to the program notes, was translated "Color of Time" from the Greek, and it also was patterned after the ancient Greek tragedy. Also, the note informed that "...it is generally understood that the number of permutations of several distinct objects increases immeasurably with the addition of each new unit...."

And that is exactly what it was, and exactly the way it sounded. I am pleased that it was explained to me.

But the audience forgave Mr. Pretre when he concluded the program with a magnificent performance of Ravel's "La Valse — choreographic poem," that was as colorful, graceful and swirlingly swift as a Degas' painting of a corps de ballet. The applause was deafening.

TIMES (e)
PAWTUCKET-
CENTRAL FALLS, R. I.
CIRC. 38,800

JAN 24 1969 New England

EAGLE (E)
CLAREMONT, N. H.
CIRC. 7,000

JAN 22 1969 New England Newsclip

NEWS (e)
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 96,932

JAN 22 1969 New England Newsclip

TIMES (e)
BEVERLY, MASS.
CIRC. 9,017

JAN 22 1969 New England Newsclip

FRENCH CONDUCTOR

PROVIDENCE, R.I. (UPI)— French conductor Georges Pretre makes his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra here Thursday night in the third of the symphony's five annual appearances. Pretre also will be guest conductor in Boston.

CHRONICLE (e)
NORTH ATTLEBORO, MASS.
CIRC. 4,780

JAN 22 1969 New England Newsclip

NEWS (e)
MALDEN, MASS.
CIRC. 10,832

JAN 22 1969 New England Newsclip

70.

Music Last Night

Leinsdorf in His Farewell Providence Appearance

By EDWIN SAFFORD

Erich Leinsdorf made his final Providence appearance last evening as the Boston Symphony Orchestra's music director at Veterans Memorial Auditorium. Whether by design, as if not to make a big issue of the occasion, or for lack of preparation time, the program was not particularly impressive on paper. It contained the Beethoven Fourth Piano Concerto, with Eugene Istomin as soloist, and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony.

Actually, Mr. Leinsdorf was substituting, on fairly short notice, for the orchestra's assistant conductor, Charles Wilson, originally scheduled to appear. The much-played Tchaikovsky thus took the place of Richard Strauss and Igor Stravinsky, works by whom had been promised earlier. It seemed to matter little to the audience, however, since reaction was very much on the positive side at evening's end.

The conductor and soloist were in close agreement as to how the Beethoven should go. It is not a brilliant display piece and they did not try to make it so. From a seat under the balcony, its dynamic scale did sound somewhat on the quiet side, and that location easily could be responsible.

Nevertheless, work as he might, Eugene Istomin's performance was less than imposing on the whole. There was accuracy enough, and some gratefully delicate playing when called for, but climaxes were lacking. This left the wonderful, short middle movement, with its meditative dialogue between orchestra and piano, the concerto's most effective and moving moment.

As might be expected, Mr. Leinsdorf did not rob the Tchaikovsky Fifth of its romantic essence. Nor did he allow it to sink into pure sentimentality entirely, although with the second theme of the first movement that peril came close. Anyway, at the rousing conclusion he was greeted with an equally rousing applause.

If there were those who were disappointed not to have something more challenging to listen to, the conductor does not leave the orchestra's podium until the end of summer at Tanglewood. Between now and then, presumably, that factor will be different.

JOURNAL (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
CIRC. 66,100

FEB 28 1969

New England Newsclip

Pianist, Boston Orchestra Thrill Providence Audience

Thursday night was a night of sweet fulfillment for Eugene Istomin, young American pianist, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Veterans Memorial Auditorium, Providence.

A nearly filled auditorium arose and cheered at the close of an abbreviated concert that included only two works — Beethoven's "Piano Concerto No. 4 in G-Major," and Tchaikovsky's "Symphony No. 5 in E-Minor."

Istomin's piano art is distinguished by his gift to define and reproduce the idiom of the composer without theatrical enrtitment but with the thoroughness that would have delighted Beethoven as it did his audience, and apparently, the members of the orchestra and Erich Leinsdorf, conductor.

Istomin was marvelous in the exact timing and spacing in his flashing cadenzas with the shrill, bird-like tones in the upper register, and the warmth of sound and shimmering tenderness in the romantic passages.

Leinsdorf guided the orchestral accompaniment with a marchless timing of the soloist's entries and terminations, touching the spirit with the gentleness of the romantic moods and building to almost a frenzy in the measured pace of the mounting crescendos as though he was the pianist and the orchestra was his instrument.

This carried over into the Tchaikovsky after intermission. The almost melancholy first movement, starting with andante, and continuing into allegro con anima, seemed sorrowful even in joy. But the throat-catching horn solo, in the second movement, andante cantabile, followed by the full orchestra enlarging the theme with fervor and eloquence brought a breathless stillness to the audience that resembled mass enchantment.

In the darkly brooding and brightly happy moods, such as the third movement waltz, allegro moderato, there were flashing plays of light and shadow, there was passionate intensity in lovely and lingering melodies, all unsurpassed in artistic grandeur that makes Tchaikovsky's Fifth an immortal work of art, and Leinsdorf's directing a dazzling virtuosity.

G.H.

TIMES (e)
PAWTUCKET-
CENTRAL FALLS, R. I.
CIRC. 38,800

FEB 28 1969

New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony in Providence Concert

Charles Wilson, Assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the fourth Providence concert of the current season at Veterans Memorial Auditorium, Thursday, February 27 at 8:30 p.m. Pianist Eugene Istomin will be soloist in Beethoven's Piano concerto no. 4 in G.

The remainder of the program will consist of Richard Strauss' Don Juan and Igor Stravinsky's ballet 'Jeu de cartes' composed in 1937 for George Ballanchine and the American Ballet.

American Eugene Istomin made his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1952 and has since appeared with the Orchestra in Boston, New York, Tanglewood and on tour. He has perofrmed on all six continents giving extensive recitals, appearing with major orchestras and making records.

SUN (e)
WESTERLY, R. I.
CIRC. 9,300

FEB 16 1969

New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony to Keep Date; Other Events Are Off

The Boston Symphony will play its scheduled concert at 8:30 tonight in Veterans Memorial Auditorium, but the lingering effects of the snow storm forced several other events to be canceled or postponed.

An official of the Boston Symphony said its 106 members ill be here "if they have to come by dog sled to do it."

The program will include Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony and the Beethoven Fourth Piano Concerto. It will be the final appearance of Erich Leinsdorf as the orchestra's music director and conductor.

Among those meetings canceled was the Providence School Committee meeting scheduled for tonight. Louis L. Kramer, acting superintendent of schools, said the meeting has been rescheduled for next Thursday at 8:30 p.m.

At least three other events or meetings scheduled for last night were canceled.

One of these was the Head Start Follow Through Parents Advisory Committee meeting, for which no new date has been set.

Another was the annual meeting of the Travelers Aid Society of Rhode Island, Inc., which was scheduled at the John Brown House at 52 Power St.

The Providence Recreation Department's Nok-Hockey tournament, scheduled yesterday, was postponed until 3:30 p.m. tomorrow at the Joslin Gymnasium.

The United Presbyterian Church on Chalkstone Avenue canceled its Lenten service, which was scheduled for tonight.

A concert by the Rhode Island Civic Chorale and Orchestra, scheduled for Saturday night at the Veterans Memorial Auditorium, also has been postponed. It will be held March 23 at 4 p.m. in the auditorium. Mrs. Richard McKenzie, executive director, said a rehearsal scheduled at Classical High School was postponed last week because of the fire that destroyed th former Big Bear Market nearby. Th storm forced the cancellation of rehearsals on Monday and Tuesday this week.

The chorale and orchestra had hoped to rehearse at the auditorium last night and put on Saturday's concert as scheduled, but snow drifts outside the auditorium made it impossible to move two pianos and an organ inside.

JOURNAL (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
CIRC. 66,100

FEB 27 1969

New England Newsclip

Symphony Tours Southeast U.S.

BOSTON — The Boston Symphony Orchestra leaves this weekend for the Southeastern United States, beginning a two-week tour which includes the orchestra's first appearances in Florida.

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the orchestra, will conduct all concerts and Lilian Kallir will appear as piano soloist in three cities, playing the Mendelssohn g minor concerto.

Opening March 10 and 11 with two already-sold-out concerts in the William Neal Reynolds auditorium in Raleigh, N. C. (which for these concerts has a seating capacity of 9000), the orchestra next goes to Atlanta, Georgia, for a March 12 appearance in 4600-seat Robert Maddow hall of the Atlanta Civic Center.

The first of three Florida cities in which the orchestra performs is St. Petersburg on March 13 at the Bayfront Center Auditorium.

On March 14, the orchestra plays in the 2560-seat War Memorial auditorium in Fort Lauderdale, and on March 15 in the 3500-seat Miami Beach auditorium. These concerts also are already sold out.

From Miami Beach, the Boston Symphony flies to Washington, D. C. for two concerts and then to New York for the 1968-69 season's fifth and final series of concerts in Philharmonic and Carnegie hall and at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. In addition to Miss Kallir in Washington, the noted baritone Hermann Prey will also appear with the orchestra at Philharmonic hall, singing Mahler's Songs of a Wayfarer.

TIMES (e)
BEVERLY, MASS.
CIRC. 9,017

MAR 7 1969

New England Newsclip

Symphony Orchestra On Two-Week Tour

The Boston Symphony Orchestra leaves this weekend for the southeastern United States, beginning a two-week tour which includes the orchestra's first appearances in Florida. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct all concerts and Lilian Kallir will appear as piano soloist in three cities, playing the Mendelssohn G Minor Concerto.

Opening tomorrow and Tuesday with two already-sold-out concerts in the William Neal Reynolds Auditorium in Raleigh, N.C. the orchestra next goes to Atlanta March 12, St. Petersburg on March 13, Fort Lauderdale on March 14 and Miami Beach on March 15.

From Miami Beach, the Boston Symphony flies to Washington D.C. for two concerts and then to New York for the fifth and final series of concerts in Philharmonic and Carnegie Halls and at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. In addition to Miss Kallir in Washington, baritone Hermann Prey will also appear with the orchestra at Philharmonic Hall, singing Mahler's "Songs of a Wayfarer."

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436

MAR 9 1969

New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony to tour Southeast

The Boston Symphony will tour the Southeast for two weeks beginning March 10, opening with two concerts in Raleigh, N.C. The Symphony will return to Boston via Washington, D.C., and New York with concerts in Philharmonic Hall and Carnegie Hall.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150

MAR 8 1969

New England Newsclip

The Raleigh Times
RALEIGH, N. C.
D. 23,979

MAR 11 1969

Orchestra Proves Top Rating

Last night's Boston Symphony concert was top entertainment.

The orchestra, playing two concerts for the Friends of the College, is rated the best in the country. They proved it.

Erich Leinsdorf, the director, is a no-nonsense conductor. He used no score and began conducting swiftly in an authoritative, angular fashion. The music of the Beethoven Eighth Symphony came out crisp.

A Review

He made it sound restrained and joyous, both at the same time with no sloppy sentimentalism.

It is a superb orchestra — average age 44 — and the members show the results of Leinsdorf's seven years of direction.

To many, the hit of the evening was the second selection, the Mendelssohn Piano Concerto No. 1 in G. Minor, with soloist Lilian Kallir. Miss Kallir is a striking, slim, tall young woman who plays with lovely abandon.

As she bent over the keys, she looked more like the advertisement of a "forbidden" perfume than any of the professional pianists we have seen lately in Raleigh.

She has played with the Boston Symphony often and shows perfect rapport with the orchestra and Leinsdorf. Her technique was exciting, and her playing inspired. She was applauded repeatedly, and at the conclusion of the concerto, Leinsdorf bent low and kissed her hand.

After intermission, Leinsdorf led into the Tschaikovsky Fifth in E Minor and gave it such a rousing interpretation it did not sound like the old "war horse" of concerts. The solo horn passage in the second movement was particularly beautiful. The waltz theme was done in an airy fashion, and the upswing of the theme at the end was properly impressive.

The Boston Symphony is judged by some to be the best in the United States. If money talks, its price for the two concerts at the Coliseum is $25,000. Just think, you are hearing it at the proportionate price of $1.

—N. D. Styron

Boston Symphony Concert In Tune With Reputation

The noted Boston Symphony came to Raleigh Monday night and proved worthy of its reputation and that of its director, Erich Leinsdorf.

It was a thoroughly conventional program which Mr. Leinsdorf chose to show off his polished ensemble and expert section leaders in masses of tremendous and glorious sound. And it was a romantic program from the beginning of a rather routine Beethoven Eighth symphony, one of the composer's most charming and melodic, to a smashingly dramatic Tchaikovsky Fifth which completed the program.

In the latter, Mr. Leinsdorf called for an almost frenetic performance with crashing climax on top of crashing climax, and his men were equal to his demands in almost every instance. One wondered if they would ever make the sound he demanded at the pace he set. It was probably the most dramatic Tchaikovsky Fifth ever heard here.

But the real triumph of the evening was Lillian Kallir's performance of Mendelssohn Piano Concerto Number 1 in G minor. Miss Kallir made it a real tour-de-force which was especially characterized by style — that elusive quality which is so often missing in pianists. Her technique was superb and her phrasing a joy. She and Mr. Leinsdorf were obviously en rapport and together produced a polished and stunning performance. Mendelssohn, a piano virtuoso himself, was, one felt, looking down from heaven in approval.

Let us have this superb combination again in the near future.

— NELL HIRSCHBERG

Raleigh News & Observer
3-11-69

Raleigh Times 3-11-69

Boston Maestro No Fiery Long-Hair

By N. D. STYRON
Times Staff Writer

Erich Leinsdorf is no long-haired musician.

The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is direct, down to earth, and even his sideburns are uncompromising.

As he came off the chartered plane yesterday with the more than 100 orchestra members to play at yesterday's and today's Friends of the College concerts, he did not look like a fiery maestro.

In fact, he looked pleasantly relaxed in his golden brown turtle neck shirt. At 57, Erich Leinsdorf is trim, of middle height, with few wrinkles, no sagging chin and little hair. His manner is easy without being overly sauve — and he smiles firmly and often.

"A conductor is a man who stands in front of an orchestra slicing up air," — this, Erich Leinsdorf said, is his wife's description of a conductor.

She couldn't come to Raleigh with him because of her mother's illness, he said. They were married this past August, after Leinsdorf's 29-year-old marriage had terminated. Mrs. Leinsdorf is 33-year-old Vera Graf from Buenos Aires, a former professional violinist.

Where is home since remarrying? "You can say it is on the green wagon — the gypsy wagon," Leinsdorf said.

Then he gave an itinerary for next summer when he retires from the Boston Symphony. It includes new opera productions in South America, films in Vienna, television in Paris, broadcasts in London and guest appearances with various orchestras. He ended his recital of plans with a projected tour in commemoration of the Beethoven year next July, 1970.

And yet the reason he gave for resigning from the Boston Symphony, which he has directed since 1962, is he wanted a "less confining schedule.

He talks fluently without a noticeable foreign accent although he was born in Vienna and came to the United States in the late 1930's.

Asked what he thought of concertizing away from the metropolitan areas such as Raleigh, he said, "This is very important, because I am afraid that too many orchestras will not be able to exist in a few years. This is due to shortages of good players and 'good' money.

"Not all the orchestras will be able to survive. Those that do will have to serve whole sections of the country."

"What do I think of your Coliseum? I haven't seen it, but I have heard that you have the largest two-night audience in the world.

"You ask about the Boston Symphony. We are parting friends. I will go back to guest conduct there next December. I tell them — no tearful farewells. Yes, I love the Boston Symphony ladies. Well, you wouldn't expect me to say anything bad, would you? After all, they have a great many relatives down here who read your papers.

"What is my theory of conducting? It's a constant alternation — leading and following, sometimes in the same measure. Take the first horn solo in Tschaikovsky's Fifth that we play tonight. This solo tests every resource of the horn player — and so you let him pace it.

"Music making is a constant give and take — it is not imposing one's will over the whole," he concluded.

The Atlanta Journal
AND
THE ATLANTA CONSTITUTION
SUN.

FEB 23 1969

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony in a concert sponsored by the Atlanta Music Club March 12 at 8:30 p.m. in the Atlanta Civic Center.

The 106-member orchestra will play "Don Juan" by Richard Strauss; Arnold Schoenberg's Variations, Op. 31, and Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony No. 3.

The Boston Symphony is in its 88th season, has recorded for 50 years and gives annual concert tours of the country.

72.

ATLANTA Music CLUB

ALL-STAR CONCERT SERIES PRESENTS

THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Erich Leinsdorf conducts this internationally renowned 106 member orchestra in the world's greatest music.

TONIGHT - 8:30!

CIVIC CENTER AUDITORIUM

Prices (Incl. Tax) $2.50, $3.50, $5.00, $6.00, $7.50

TICKETS AT CABLE PIANO CO. UNTIL 5 P.M.
TICKETS AT CIVIC CENTER FROM 7 P.M.

GOOD SEATS AVAILABLE AS LATE AS PERFORMANCE TIME!

REGINE CRESPIN

ARTUR RUBENSTEIN

ANDRES SEGOVIA

ERICH LEINSDORF

MENUHIN

COMING ALL-STAR SERIES IS JUST THAT

The 1968-1969 All Star Concert Series might best be described as "a household series" in that every attraction for the coming season is "a household word."

The series includes Yehudi and Hephzibah Menuhin, Nov. 16; Regine Crespin, Feb. 11, 1969; Arthur Rubinstein, Feb. 23; The Boston Symphony, March 12; and Andres Segovia, March 26.

There is no increase in season ticket prices this year and all concerts will be held in the new Robert Maddox Hall of the Atlanta Civic Center at 8:30 p.m., except the Rubinstein offering, which will be at 3 p.m.

OPENING THE star-filled series will be Yehudi Menuhin, world-famous violinist, with his equally famous sister Hephzibah at the piano.

While maintaining their American citizenship, the Menuhins have resided in London with their families. Yehudi Menuhin's annual tours all over the world have established him as a violinist of unquestionable integrity. His sister Hephzibah also established an international reputation before retiring to raise a family. It is only in the last decade that she came out of retirement to perform occasional concerts with her brother and other members of the Menuhin family.

FOLLOWING THE Menuhins will be Regine Crespin—star soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Co., the Paris, Berlin and La Scala operas — one of the world's most universal artists with an international reputation for her combined acting and vocal talents.

Miss Crespin was the first soprano ever to record complete and sing the two leading roles of Brunnhilde and Sieglinde in Wagner's "Die Walkuere".

The immortal Arthur Rubinstein, favorite of the world and Atlanta, comes as the only afternoon offering of the series. There is little that need be said about the brilliant pianism of Rubinstein. His previous appearances in Atlanta to capacity audiences speak for themselves.

ONE OF THE world's leading symphonies, The Boston Symphony, comes to Atlanta under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf. This 106-member orchestra came into existence in 1881 through the endeavors of an enterprising Boston banker, Henry Lee Higginson.

In 1962 Leinsdorf became the eleventh conductor of the symphony. The intensive concert schedule runs throughout the year with a seven-month winter season in Symphony Hall, Boston; and on tour, two months of Pops under Arthur Fiedler each spring, two weeks free open air concerts and eight weeks at Berkshire Festival.

"There is no guitar but the Spanish guitar and Andres Segovia is its prophet," said a New York newspaper of the closing attraction on the All Stars Series.

Andres Segovia gave the first guitar recital ever to be heard in New York.

A native of Spain, Segovia made his first appearance at the age of 14 in Granada, and within a short time his name was known throughout Spain. His concerts have created sensations and have resulted in sold-out houses everywhere.

The Atlanta Journal AND THE ATLANTA CONSTITUTION
SUN. 523,581
JUN 9 1968

THE ATLANTA CONSTITUTION
D. 200,603
MAR 8 1969

Leinsdorf, Symphony Really Fine

Erich Leinsdorf conducted the Boston Symphony in the fourth All Star Concert for the Atlanta Music Club at the Civic Center Wednesday night. What a real joy it is to hear a visiting orchestra in the new Civic Center with its warm acoustics and presence.

From the outset it was evident that Leinsdorf controls a well-oiled musical machine of great capacity.

In Strauss' "Don Juan," Opus 20, we heard the marvelous welling up of the justly famous strings of the Boston Symphony. I frankly doubt that we shall hear a better brass or woodwind section. The in-tuneness was uncanny.

Leinsdorf conducts with considerable bravado and seems to pluck the brass sounds right out of the air with his left hand.

This lush opener was followed with the Schoenberg "Variations," Opus 31. The conductor made some short, pointed remarks about the piece and then proceeded to do excellent justice by a tough score.

The orchestra is to be commended for programming a 12-tone work of modest length for Atlanta. There weren't many people whistling Schoenberg in the lobby at intermission, but that's all right, we heard a significant work exceptionally well played.

After intermission, we settled back to a distinguished reading of the Beethoven "Eroica" with as beautiful an articulation of detail and balance of the several choirs of the orchestra as this reviewer has heard.

Leinsdorf accomplished this delineation with such skill that it never became precious or fussy, just first-class Beethoven. The forward thrust was excellent and the evening ended with a highly musical pleasure for the audience. The programming was fine and the playing first rate.—WILLIAM WEAVER

THE ATLANTA CONSTITUTION
D. 200,603
MAR 13 1969

MUSIC CLUB SERIES

A Noteworthy Night By Boston Symphony

By CHAPPELL WHITE
Atlanta Journal Music Critic

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its regular conductor, Eric Leinsdorff, made its first Atlanta appearance in several years Wednesday night in the Civic Center as part of the Atlanta Music Club's All-Star Series.

The program was made up of two staples of the symphonic repertory, Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, and one major work that is better known by reputation than by performance, Schoenberg's "Variations for Orchestra."

Despite Schoenberg's prestige and the enormous influence he has exerted on the course of music in this century, his works appear infrequently on concert programs. If all the performances could be as this one was, that situation might be remedied.

Leinsdorf, obviously, believes in this music, and he is thoroughly at home both in its ordered complexity and its particular intense expression, and his orchestra, of course, is of the caliber that can handle the difficulties of the style without apparent struggle.

THE "VARIATIONS for Orchestra" is a 12-tone piece, but it really presents no difficulties to a generation that has gone through the post-Webern style, electronic music, and aleatory music.

Even if the tone row itself remains (perhaps intentionally) obscure to the listener, the motivic unity and the musical continuity are clear. The orchestral texture is transparent and quite varied, the climaxes seem well motivated, and the expression, despite its intensity, has a certain reserve. For me, not normally close to the Schoenberg group, the "variations" furnished a consistently absorbing experience.

Leinsdorf introduced "Variations" with a few lucid words of explanation which were, I thought, in good taste and certainly helpful with a work unfamiliar to most of the audience.

The other two works were given solid, well-paced readings, and it is no criticism of Leinsdorf's thoughtful interpretations to say the major interest on this occasion was how beautifully the Boston Symphony played.

It is still a great orchestra. Its virtuosity is dazzling, its tone is perfectly balanced and rich in sound, and hterrsrisaeeeeofv power that gives flexibility at all times.

UNFORTUNATELY, some of the impact seemed lost Wednesday night. This impression was doubtless caused in part by the location of my seats, which are far to the side—the dullest spot in the hall for orchestral music. Others reported the situation was only slightly better elsewhere.

Apparently, the sound shell was not properly adjusted, and certainly the side curtains were allowed to extend onto the stage.

The Civic Center has exceptionally fine acoustics for a hall of its size. It is a pity for a great visiting orchestra not to have the full advantage of them at their best.

The Atlanta Journal
"COVERS DIXIE LIKE THE DEW"
D. 251,203
MAR 13 1969

CONCERT ON MARCH 12

Boston Symphony to Visit

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the world famed Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Atlanta Civic Center at 8:30 p.m. March 12, sponsored by the Atlanta Music Club.

The Boston orchestra came into existence in 1881 and has an illustrious musical history. Among its conductors have been some of the most famous: Wilhelm Gericke, Arthur Nickisch, Pierre Monteux, Serge Koussivitzky, Charles Munch and Arthur Fiedler. In 1962, Erich Leinsdorf took the baton, the 11 conductor of the orchestra and only the third in 38 years.

Almost every music lover has at least one recording of the Boston orchestra, and through tours at home and abroad, recordings, radio and television broadcasts, the orchestra is one of the most widely heard.

To maintain an orchestra of this size and caliber is an enormous undertaking. It has a reputation for its excellence of strings . . . all 57 of them . . . and it has an overall personnel of 106, 102 men and four women. In the 1968-69 season, cost of the orchestra's maintenance, including the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, is well over $3 million, all defrayed by subscriptions and sponsors in its home city.

The Boston symphony has appeared in Atlanta many times, but this will be its first concert at the Atlanta Civic Center.

ERICH LEINSDORFL

Erich Leinsdorf And Symphony Due March 12

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony in a concert March 12 at 8:30 p.m. in the Atlanta Civic Center.

The concert will be sponsored by the Atlanta Music Club and is open to the public.

On the program will be "Don Juan" by Richard Strauss, Arnold Schoenberg's Variations Op. 31; and Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony No. 3.

The 106-member orchestra is in its 88th season, and gives annual concert tours. It will come to Atlanta from Raleigh, N.C., then fly to Florida for three additional concerts with the last being in Miami.

This season is the last for Leinsdorf who has conducted since 1962 and retires this year. A Boston Symphony tradition is that a retiring conductor plays Beethoven's Ninth Symphony closing his last program.

The Atlanta Journal
"COVERS DIXIE LIKE THE DEW"
D. 251,203
FEB 17 1969

IN CIVIC CENTER

Leinsdorf, Symphony To Perform

Erich Leinsdorf will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Atlanta Wednesday in a program of classical, romantic and modern works.

Erich Leinsdorf

The Atlanta Civic Center will be the Boston Symphony's second stop on a two-week tour including Florida, North Carolina, and Washington, D.C.

The group will perform at 8:30 p.m. in the Robert Maddox Hall of the Civic Center.

Works on the program are Richard Strauss' "Don Juan," Arnold Schoenberg's Variations Op. 31 and Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, "Eroica."

THE ATLANTA CONSTITUTION
D. 200,603
MAR 1 1969

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Leinsdorf To Conduct Concert

Erich Leinsdorf, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct it in Atlanta on Wednesday at 8:30 p.m. in the Atlanta Civic Center.

The symphony will be making its third appearance on a five-city Southeastern tour. The program in Atlanta will be "Don Juan" by Strauss; Schoenberg's Variations Op. 31 and Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony No. 3.

FOUNDED IN 1881, the Boston Symphony has grown to a size of 106 musicians and operates on a budget of more than $3 million annually.

Leinsdorf, music director since 1962, is the 11th director of the orchestra. He came to Boston with an outstanding background of opera having worked as music consultant and conductor of the Metropolitan Opera in New York and as director of the New York City Opera.

Leinsdorf has announced he will retire from the symphony after this season.

The Atlanta concert is sponsored by the Atlanta Music Club.

The Atlanta Journal
"COVERS DIXIE LIKE THE DEW"
D. 251,203
MAR 11 1969

Evening Independent
ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
D. 24,299
MAR 5 1969

73.

Leinsdorf Conducts Bayfront Concert

Boston Symphony Conductor Erich Leinsdorf Exhorts His First Violin Section.

Theatre & The Arts

The Bayfront Center theatre tonight will be the scene of music provided by an acclaimed conductor and an equally lauded symphony orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, its musical director, will perform in concert beginning at 8:15.

Featured numbers on the program will be Beethoven's "Symphony No. 8," Mendelssohn's "Concerto No. 1" and Tschaikovsky's "Symphony No. 5."

Featured soloist for the evening will be pianist Lilian Kallir performing the Mendelssohn work.

The Boston Symphony, with a budget of more than $3-million for this season, was first heard in performance in 1881 in the Boston Music Hall. Now, the symphony makes its home in the Symphony Hall in Boston, performing more than a score of concerts there each season.

The 106-member orchestra, for its Bayfront Center appearance, will be led by its musical director since 1962. Leinsdorf, who will retire from that post at the end of this performance season, is the 11th conductor the symphony has had in its lifetime.

Miss Kallir, a native of Austria, made her musical debut at the age of 4. Since, she has performed in solo and with many of the outstanding orchestras in the world.

She and her husband, pianist Claude Frank, are members of the faculty of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood during the summers.

Tickets for tonight's concert are $5.50 to $8.50 and are available at the Bayfront box office.

TONIGHT
THURSDAY, MARCH 13th - 8:15
Bayfront Center
The
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF, Conductor
program
- Beethoven — Symphony No. 8
- Mendelssohn — Concerto No. 1
  Lilian Kallir, Piano
- Tschaikowski — Symphony No. 5

TICKETS: Orch. $5.50, 6.50, 7.50. Balc. $5.50, 6.50
Dress Cir. $8.50
BOX OFFICE OPEN TODAY
9:30 A.M. UNTIL PERFORMANCE

Beethoven's Week

Erich Leinsdorf

By MARY NIC SHENK
Times Music Writer

Ludvig van Beethoven — musical bridge.

He was literally the stylistic bridge between classicism and romanticism. This week he is a performance bridge between the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Florida Gulf Coast Symphony and the choral bridge between Pinellas and Hillsborough counties.

The great B, whose December birthday has been immortalized by Peanuts and Schroeder, this week will have his March (1827) death commemorated in the Tampa Bay area with four concerts in three days by two outstanding orchestras, conductors and choral groups.

The visiting Boston Symphony Orchestra under conductor Erich Leinsdorf, will play the composer's "Symphony No. 8" Thursday at 8:15 p.m. at Bayfront Theatre in St. Petersburg. On the same night in Tampa the Florida Gulf Coast Symphony, under conductor Irwin Hoffman, will play the first of three concerts featuring the Beethoven "Symphony No. 9" with guest soloists and a 150-voice chorus from St. Petersburg, Tampa and Clearwater. The concert will be presented Thursday and Friday in Tampa's McKay Auditorium and Saturday at St. Petersburg's Bayfront Theatre. All concerts are at 8:30 p.m.

Irwin Hoffman

St. Petersburg Times
ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
D. 156,300 SUN. 170,826
MAR 9 1969

Shhhhh! Fine Music On Its Way

Erich Leinsdorf, musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since the initial concert of the orchestra's 82nd season on Sept. 21, 1962, will head his musicians in a program of music 8:15 p.m. March 13 in the Bayfront Center theatre. Guest artist will be pianist Lilian Kallir performing Mendelssohn's "Concerto No. 1." Also on the program will be Beethoven's "Symphony No. 8" and Tschaikowsky's "Symphony No. 5." Tickets for the concert range from $5.50 to $8.50 and are available at the Bayfront Center box office, 400 First St. S.

Evening Independent
ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
D. 24,299
MAR 13 1969

A World Career

Erich Leinsdorf is leaving the Boston Symphony as its permanent conductor at the end of this, his seventh, season. But he is not leaving the world of conducting. If anything, he is really entering worldwide guest conducting.

Definite commitments already are made into 1970 and Leinsdorf opened the door to a possible Florida appearance during a recent interview with The Times.

"YES," HE said, "I would be interested in an invitation to guest conduct the London Symphony Orchestra in Florida next summer (1970)."

After the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) spring season closes, Leinsdorf will go to Europe to conduct in London, Frankfurt, Paris and Zurich. He will return to the U.S. for the Tanglewood Festival in July and August and then go to Buenos Aires to conduct opera. (His 33-year-old wife of seven months, violinist Vera Graf, is from Buenos Aires).

FOLLOWING the South American engagements Leinsdorf will return to Paris to conduct, make some films

(Please See LEINSDORF, 2-G)

Leinsdorf

FROM 1-G

with the Vienna Philharmonic in his native Austria (he left as a refugee in 1937 to join the Metropolitan Opera at the recommendation of Toscanini) and then back to Boston to guest conduct at Thanksgiving. Amsterdam, Milan and London are already on the Leinsdorf agenda for early 1970.

Leinsdorf was relaxing in Boston between a morning rehearsal and evening concert during a telephone interview.

"From where I'm sitting I can see a blizzard outside," the 57-year-old conductor said. "I hope you will have some nice weather for us when we get to Florida."

Despite Leinsdorf's successes with the BSO and the demand for him as a guest conductor, he is more admired than loved by audiences — and orchestras. Some say he doesn't have charisma. Some attribute his leaving the BSO to his lack of "communication" or enthusiasm with people. Leinsdorf's own reason for leaving the permanent conducting position is pressure — from increasing numbers of concerts, from lack of rehearsal time, from programming.

"I DIDN'T want to go on conducting 100 concerts a year," Leinsdorf said in a New York Times interview last month. "Really, the job of musical director is every day more and more an absurdity, and not only in Boston. I might swallow the 100-concerts-a-year routine if as musical director I could do interesting works, too. I speak now not of ordinary premieres, they are a dime a dozen, but of important works."

Although Leinsdorf says he never experienced programming vetoes by the BSO administration during his seven years, he did remark, "I understand now that guest conductors are being asked to include one standard symphony on each program."

"LEINSDORF told The Times, "The problem of programming has increased in order to meet the different tastes of today's subscription audiences. It is a tough problem, because programming must be different for different audiences."

Leinsdorf is optimistic ("I'm a pessimistic optimist today") about the financial futures of orchestras. "Some will drop out of existence because they don't have skillful money raisers. But this may be good. It may shock others into action."

AS A BOARD member of the Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts in Washington, Leinsdorf says there is a "small" crisis which he feels hasn't been properly evaluated. "I wish I knew where the money is coming from to finish the building before they insist on discussing programming."

74.

Fort Lauderdale News
FORT LAUDERDALE, FLA.
D. 73,900
MAR 17 1969

Symphony Gives Stirring Performance

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting. Presented by the Community Concert Assn.

Symphony No. 6 in F Major Op. 68 ..... Beethoven
Variations for Orchestra Op. 31 ..... Schoenberg
Suite from "Der Rosenkavalier" ..... Strauss

By BOB FREUND
(Music Editor)

Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony showed Community Concert Assn. subscribers Friday night just why the organization is dubbed "The Artistocrat of Orchestras."

With the exception of Richard Strauss' suite from "Der Rosenkavalier," there wasn't anything on the program that could be described as a show piece. Even the Beethoven work was one of the composer's least exciting, though marvelously melodic and treasurable. The Arnold Schoenberg piece was another matter entirely.

Beethoven's Symphony No. 6, "The Pastoral" is an odd selection with which to open a virtuoso program. It is enchanting, lovely music and it certainly revealed the Boston musicians as capable of the most delicate tone and superbly wrought phrasing. Leinsdorf, conducting without score, brought a lightness and incredible finesse to this picturesque symphony.

Apparently pleased with the reception to Beethoven, Leinsdorf took it upon himself to explain the ensuing piece, Schoenberg's Variations for Orchestra Op. 31. Despite his eloquent narrative, and what sounded like a plea for acceptance of this work to which he referred as a masterpiece, the audience's attitude at the finish hardly suggested an overwhelming love for Schoenberg.

There is much to be admired in the piece when it gets rambunctious and gallops along with dissonance and percussion. But it often has areas so arid and devoid of musical interest (at least to mere listeners), that one eagerly awaits the conclusion.

The Variations are composed in the 12-tone scale and while we have come to accept this form readily, this does not mean that everything constructed in this fashion is going to be heartily acclaimed. It is strictly intellectual music, appealing to the technical as opposed to the emotional.

Emotionalism came back with a wallop, however, when Leinsdorf returned to the podium for the program's finale, the "Rosenkavalier" Suite.

Rather stern at the beginning, possibly meditating on the audience's lack of reaction to the previous work, Leinsdorf soon warmed to Strauss' erotic score. How could one do otherwise?

This glorious conglomeration of the opera's big tunes is always an audience grabber and Leinsdorf's version was no exception. The orchestra rode those shimmering arcs of sound that no one but Strauss could create, and while the composer may not always be the Boston's "bag," there was no getting away from the superb and sensuous interpretation that sent listeners right up into the clouds.

PICTORIAL LIFE
FORT LAUDERDALE, FLA.
MONTHLY - CIRC. N.AVAIL.
FALL 1968

■ In the cultural life of Fort Lauderdale no organization has offered so many great musical events over a period of 23 years as the Community Concert Association. Under its aegis the most sensational stars in the musical world have appeared here — individual artists, symphony orchestras and ballet companies, with four concerts each season.

The 24th series this year will be a tremendous exciting one, beginning November 26th with a concert by the great Metropolitan Opera singer, Sandor Konya. On January 16th will be a performance by the brilliant pianist, Tamas Vasary, and on February 28th Ruth Page's International Ballet. Climax will be the appearance of the great Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf on March 14th.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the major musical organizations of the world, has had a fascinating history. Founded in 1881, it entered a new era in 1924 under the leadership of the late Serge Koussevitzky, who was conductor for 25 years. In 1940 Dr. Koussevitzky realized a dream of many years when the Orchestra founded the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, where, since 1938, the orchestra has been in annual summer residence. Charles Munch was Music Director for 13 years, and upon his retirement in 1962 the distinguished conductor, Erich Leinsdorf, took his place.

The Boston Symphony has been acclaimed on its European as well as American tours, first performing abroad under the auspices of the United States Government. Its performance here is a triumph for Community Concert Association and an exciting climax for the 1969 season.

All concerts, available to the public on a membership basis.

Those who wish to be put on the membership waiting list may address their request to Community Concert Association, P.O. Bix 2077, Fort Lauderdale. ■

Concert praised

Special to the Times

ST. PETERSBURG — It was instant ovation last night at Bayfront Center for Erich Leinsdorf and his brilliant Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Although the acoustics in this huge building are not the best, the music generally came over strong and sure as the orchestra performed Beethoven's "Symphony No. 8, Mendelssohn's beautiful "Concerto No. 1" and Tchaikovsky's electrifying "Symphony No. 5."

Great orchestras like the Boston Symphony are great in every department, and this was made abundantly clear last night. The stringed instruments were almost terrifyingly beautiful; a French horn gave a caressing quality to its playing; the cellos were strong but perfectly shadowy.

EVERY COMPOSITION was treated with the utmost fidelity and depth it deserved under Leinsdorf's magic baton.

Pianist Lillian Kallir brought Mendelssohn's music to life, giving it shape and meaning.

The Tampa Times
TAMPA, FLA.
D. 37,953
MAR 14 1969

New York Post
D. 628,146 SAT. 354,497
MAR 11 1969

Miami Beach Marches From Winter to Spring

MIAMI BEACH — Tropical winter merges into tropical spring with March in Miami Beach, bringing subtle changes.

The natives will be aware it is just a little warmer, the streets a little less crowded and the fishing getting a little better. The visitor accepts a continuation of thoroughbred racing, lavish night-club shows and other evening entertainment and sunny days on the sand as just what is expected of Miami Beach.

Gulfstream Park takes over from Hialeah and the picturesque northside track will distribute a quarter of its $2 million total purses in stake events. The latter include the Gulfstream Handicap for three-year-olds, March 29. Both carry $100,000 tags.

Greyhound racing has moved to the Miami Beach Kennel club, where the dogs will run through May 3, and jai alai will continue at Miami fronton through May 2.

Golf will be a feature late this month with the top pros battling for $200,000 in prizes in the Nattional Air Lines Open at Miami Country club. Dates for this event are March 25-30. Vacationers can have their own tussles with par over Miami Beach's municipal courses and other links in the area.

Sport & Vacation Show

Miami Beach Convention hall will house the third International Sport and Vacation show March 15-23 featuring more than 150 exhibitors and daily demonstrations in billiards, karate, shooting and scuba diving as well as archery and light tackle casting. An added attraction will be the "Aqua Thrill Circus."

The Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in Miami Beach auditorium March 15 and the Greater Miami Philharmonic March 23. Internationally known artists will sing leading roles in "La Forza del Destino" in the auditorium March 19. The Greater Miami Philharmonic will appear again April 7 and the Miami Beach Symphony April 13.

"Holiday on Ice" will be presented in Convention hall April 1-6, an always-popular exhibition here, contrasting as it does with the usual Miami Beach scene.

Professional basketball is scheduled in Convention hall March 30 and 31 and April 6, 7 and 8.

Sports Anglers

Spring is one of the best times of the years for the sports angler to be living it up in Miami Beach. Dolphin, sailfish, king mackerel and white marlin cruise the Gulf Stream. In a few days, if the past is a guide tarpon will begin showing in ever-increasing numbers in the coastal shallows. Bonefish, snapper and spotted weakfish become more numerous in the bays.

Late March vacationers also will find accommodations more plentiful, can safely count on finding lodgings on arrival without advance reservations. Rates take a downward trend about April 1 in most hotels as they entice guests into staying longer. So many have done this in the past, and found it delightful, that April ranks right along with December as the most popular month not included in the winter season.

MIAMI BEACH, FLA.
SUN.
D. 16,000
MAR 27 1969

To the Editor:

Something should be done to teach the people of Miami Beach to have some respect for the performers at concerts. On Saturday, March 15, Erich Leinsdorf conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra. After listening to such artistry, many of the audience stood up to leave, much to the chagrin of the rest of us who were applauding and expecting an encore. If people do not wish to listen to a full concert, they should leave during intermission.

ARNOLD LEON

An Emotional Charge From Boston

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting; Lillian Kallir, guest pianist. Bayfront Theatre, St. Petersburg. Thursday, March 13, 1969, 8:15 p.m. Program — Symphony No. 8 in F Major, Op. 93 (Beethoven). Piano Concerto No. 1 in G Minor, Op. 25 (Mendelssohn). Symphony No. 5 in E Minor, Op. 64 (Tchaikovsky).

By MARY NIC SHENK
Times Music Writer

In an emotionally charged performance of Tchaikovsky's "Symphony No. 5" last night, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and conductor Erich Leinsdorf showed why they are one of the major performing ensembles in the world.

They got right to the heart of the matter without delay or hesitation. There was no letdown for a tour concert. They gave their all to the excited pleasure of the near-capacity audience, which cheered them with bravos as the rigorous interpretation of the oft-maligned Tchaikovsky ended.

Leinsdorf treated the poignant Russian music with the honor and depth it deserves, conveying the composer's message of loneliness and pathos more emphatically than usually heard. Little touches of interpretation did it, like a delayed pianissimo string chord before the entrance of the lovely French horn solo in the second movement, or a dramatic pause before the recapitulation of the gorgeous solo melody by orchestra in the same movement.

St. P. Times
3-14-69

On the brillance of brass in the final movement, with "herald" trumpets singing with clarion voices over the entire orchestra, even to the point of somewhat obscuring the strings. The question of balance did enter my mind, concerning both trumpet and tuba, but the overall effect was so electric that objection almost gave rise to praise.

Sweeping romanticism in smooth transitions, from the quietest dynamic to the most brilliant fullness, characterized phrasing in the intense melodies of the symphony. And the same controlled technical fluency and tonal range were heard in the opening Beethoven "Symphony No. 8,"

A
St. Petersburg Times
REVIEW

though in appropriately more refined and classical lines. The lilting delicacy of the Allegretto Scherzando stressed beautiful string sound, led by concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, familiar to the area through his chamber music work in Sarasota.

Pianist Lilian Kallir was outstanding with her secure and "instant" involvement in the virtuoso Mendelssohn "Piano Concerto No. 1." Her clarity and speed, plus accuracy, made her runs, arpeggios, trills and octaves joyful mates to her deeply moving tone in the Andante. There was no timidity in her touch or tone, her technique or style, yet it was all grace and control, true to Mendelssohn's happy nature.

74.

Fort Lauderdale News
FORT LAUDERDALE, FLA.
D. 73,000

MAR 17 1969

Symphony Gives Stirring Performance

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting. Presented by the Community Concert Assn.

Symphony No. 6 in F Major Op. 68 ..... Beethoven
Variations for Orchestra Op. 31 ..... Schoenberg
Suite from "Der Rosenhavaler" ..... Strauss

By BOB FREUND
(Music Editor)

Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony showed Community Concert Assn. subscribers Friday night just why the organization is dubbed "The Artistocrat of Orchestras."

With the exception of Richard Strauss' suite from "Der Rosenkavalier," there wasn't anything on the program that could be described as a show piece. Even the Beethoven work was one of the composer's least exciting, though marvelously melodic and treasurable. The Arnold Schoenberg piece was another matter entirely.

Beethoven's Symphony No. 6, "The Pastoral" is an odd selection with which to open a virtuoso program. It is enchanting, lovely music and it certainly revealed the Boston musicians as capable of the most delicate tone and superbly wrought phrasing. Leinsdorf, conducting without score, brought a lightness and incredible finesse to this picturesque symphony.

Apparently pleased with the reception to Beethoven, Leinsdorf took it upon himself to explain the ensuing piece, Schoenberg's Variations for Orchestra Op. 31. Despite his eloquent narrative, and what sounded like a plea for acceptance of this work to which he referred as a masterpiece, the audience's attitude at the finish hardly suggested an overwhelming love for Schoenberg.

There is much to be admired in the piece when it gets rambunctious and gallops along with dissonance and percussion. But it often has areas so arid and devoid of musical interest (at least to mere listeners), that one eagerly awaits the conclusion.

The Variations are composed in the 12-tone scale and while we have come to accept this form readily, this does not mean that everything constructed in this fashion is going to be heartily acclaimed. It is strictly intellectual music, appealing to the technical as opposed to the emotional.

Emotionalism came back with a wallop, however, when Leinsdorf returned to the podium for the program's finale, the "Rosenkavalier" Suite.

Rather stern at the beginning, possibly meditating on the audience's lack of reaction to the previous work, Leinsdorf soon warmed to Strauss' erotic score. How could one do otherwise?

This glorious conglomeration of the opera's big tunes is always an audience grabber and Leinsdorf's version was no exception. The orchestra rode those shimmering arcs of sound that no one but Strauss could create, and while the composer may not always be the Boston's "bag," there was no getting away from the superb and sensuous interpretation that sent listeners right up into the clouds.

PICTORIAL LIFE
FORT LAUDERDALE, FLA.
MONTHLY - CIRC. N.AVAIL.

FALL 1968

Concert praised

Special to the Times

ST. PETERSBURG — It was instant ovation last night at Bayfront Center for Erich Leinsdorf and his brilliant Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Although the acoustics in this huge building are not the best, the music generally came over strong and sure as the orchestra performed Beethoven's "Symphony No. 8, Mendelssohn's beautiful "Concerto No. 1" and Tchaikovsky's electrifying "Symphony No. 5."

Great orchestras like the Boston Symphony are great in every department, and this was made abundantly clear last night. The stringed instruments were almost terrifyingly beautiful; a French horn gave a caressing quality to its playing; the cellos were strong but perfectly shadowy.

EVERY COMPOSITION was treated with the utmost fidelity and depth it deserved under Leinsdorf's magic baton.

Pianist Lillian Kallir brought Mendelssohn's music to life, giving it shape and meaning.

The Tampa Times
TAMPA, FLA.
D. 37,953

MAR 14 1969

■ In the cultural life of Fort Lauderdale no organization has offered so many great musical events over a period of 23 years as the Community Concert Association. Under its aegis the most sensational stars in the musical world have appeared here — individual artists, symphony orchestras and ballet companies, with four concerts each season.

The 24th series this year will be a tremendous exciting one, beginning November 26th with a concert by the great Metropolitan Opera singer, Sandor Konya. On January 16th will be a performance by the brilliant pianist, Tamas Vasary, and on February 28th Ruth Page's International Ballet. Climax will be the appearance of the great Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf on March 14th.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the major musical organizations of the world, has had a fascinating history. Founded in 1881, it entered a new era in 1924 under the leadership of the late Serge Koussevitzky, who was conductor for 25 years. In 1940 Dr. Koussevitzky realized a dream of many years when the Orchestra founded the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, where, since 1938, the orchestra has been in annual summer residence. Charles Munch was Music Director for 13 years, and upon his retirement in 1962 the distinguished conductor, Erich Leinsdorf, took his place.

The Boston Symphony has been acclaimed on its European as well as American tours, first performing abroad under the auspices of the United States Government. Its performance here is a triumph for Community Concert Association and an exciting climax for the 1969 season.

All concerts, available to the public on a membership basis.

Those who wish to be put on the membership waiting list may address their request to Community Concert Association, P.O. Bix 2077, Fort Lauderdale. ■

New York Post
D. 628,146 SAT. 354,497

MAR 11 1969

Miami Beach Marches From Winter to Spring

MIAMI BEACH — Tropical winter merges into tropical spring with March in Miami Beach, bringing subtle changes.

The natives will be aware it is just a little warmer, the streets a little less crowded and the fishing getting a little better. The visitor accepts a continuation of thoroughbred racing, lavish night-club shows and other evening entertainment and sunny days on the sand as just what is expected of Miami Beach.

Gulfstream Park takes over from Hialeah and the picturesque northside track will distribute a quarter of its $2 million total purses in stake events. The latter include the Gulfstream Handicap for three-year-olds, March 29. Both carry $100,000 tags.

Greyhound racing has moved to the Miami Beach Kennel club, where the dogs will run through May 3, and jai alai will continue at Miami fronton through May 2.

Golf will be a feature late this month with the top pros battling for $200,000 in prizes in the Nattional Air Lines Open at Miami Country club. Dates for this event are March 25-30. Vacationers can have their own tussles with par over Miami Beach's municipal courses and other links in the area.

Sport & Vacation Show

Miami Beach Convention hall will house the third International Sport and Vacation show March 15-23 featuring more than 150 exhibitors and daily demonstrations in billiards, karate, shooting and scuba diving as well as archery and light tackle casting. An added attraction will be the "Aqua Thrill Circus."

The Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard in Miami Beach auditorium March 15 and the Greater Miami Philharmonic March 23. Internationally known artists will sing leading roles in "La Forza del Destino" in the auditorium March 19. The Greater Miami Philharmonic will appear again April 7 and the Miami Beach Symphony April 13.

"Holiday on Ice" will be presented in Convention hall April 1-6, an always-popular exhibition here, contrasting as it does with the usual Miami Beach scene.

Professional basketball is scheduled in Convention hall March 30 and 31 and April 6, 7 and 8.

Sports Anglers

Spring is one of the best times of the years for the sports angler to be living it up in Miami Beach. Dolphin, sailfish, king mackerel and white marlin cruise the Gulf Stream. In a few days, if the past is a guide tarpon will begin showing in ever-increasing numbers in the coastal shallows. Bonefish, snapper and spotted weakfish become more numerous in the bays.

Late March vacationers also will find accommodations more plentiful, can safely count on finding lodgings on arrival without advance reservations. Rates take a downward trend about April 1 in most hotels as they entice guests into staying longer. So many have done this in the past, and found it delightful, that April ranks right along with December as the most popular month not included in the winter season.

MIAMI BEACH, FLA.
SUN.
D. 16,000

MAR 27 1969

To the Editor:

Something should be done to teach the people of Miami Beach to have some respect for the performers at concerts. On Saturday, March 15, Erich Leinsdorf conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra. After listening to such artistry, many of the audience stood up to leave, much to the chagrin of the rest of us who were applauding and expecting an encore. If people do not wish to listen to a full concert, they should leave during intermission.

ARNOLD LEON

An Emotional Charge From Boston

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf conducting; Lillian Kallir, guest pianist. Bayfront Theatre, St. Petersburg. Thursday, March 13, 1969, 8:15 p.m. Program — Symphony No. 8 in F Major, Op. 93 (Beethoven), Piano Concerto No. 1 in G Minor, Op. 25 (Mendelssohn), Symphony No. 5 in E Minor, Op. 64 (Tchaikovsky).

By MARY NIC SHENK
Times Music Writer

In an emotionally charged performance of Tchaikovsky's "Symphony No. 5" last night, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and conductor Erich Leinsdorf showed why they are one of the major performing ensembles in the world.

They got right to the heart of the matter without delay or hesitation. There was no letdown for a tour concert. They gave their all to the excited pleasure of the near-capacity audience, which cheered them with bravos as the rigorous interpretation of the oft-maligned Tchaikovsky ended.

Leinsdorf treated the poignant Russian music with the honor and depth it deserves, conveying the composer's message of loneliness and pathos more emphatically than usually heard. Little touches of interpretation did it, like a delayed pianissimo string chord before the entrance of the lovely French horn solo in the second movement, or a dramatic pause before the recapitulation of the gorgeous solo melody by orchestra in the same movement.

Or the brillance of brass in the final movement, with "herald" trumpets singing with clarion voices over the entire orchestra, even to the point of somewhat obscuring the strings. The question of balance did enter my mind, concerning both trumpet and tuba, but the overall effect was so electric that objection almost gave rise to praise.

Sweeping romanticism in smooth transitions, from the quietest dynamic to the most brilliant fullness, characterized phrasing in the intense melodies of the symphony. And the same controlled technical fluency and tonal range were heard in the opening Beethoven "Symphony No. 8," though in appropriately more refined and classical lines. The lilting delicacy of the Allegretto Scherzando stressed beautiful string sound, led by concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, familiar to the area through his chamber music work in Sarasota.

A St. Petersburg Times REVIEW

Pianist Lilian Kallir was outstanding with her secure and "instant" involvement in the virtuoso Mendelssohn "Piano Concerto No. 1." Her clarity and speed, plus accuracy, made her runs, arpeggios, trills and octaves joyful mates to her deeply moving tone in the Andante. There was no timidity in her touch or tone, her technique or style, yet it was all grace and control, true to Mendelssohn's happy nature.

St. P. Times
3-14-69

ALEXANDRIA, VA.
GAZETTE
D. 15,500

MAR 1 8 1969

Boston Symphony To Appear In Constitution Hall

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, music director, is making its final of two Washington appearances of the season tonight in Constitution Hall as part of the Washington National Symphony's series of subscription pairs. Wednesday subscribers attend the Boston Symphony on Monday night, and Tuesday subscribers attend on their regular night. Both concerts will be at 8:30 p.m.

This year will mark Erich Leinsdorf's final appearances as music director of the Boston Symphony, a post he will have held for seven years.

Mr. Leinsdorf will conduct an all-Beethoven program consisting of two symphonies: Symphony No. 6 ("Pastoral") and Symphony No. 3 ("Eroica").

SUNDAY REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
CIRC. 113,750

MAR 1 6 1969 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Orchestra Ends Spring Tour This Week

Concluding its annual spring tour, the Boston Symphony flies from Miami Beach to Washington, D.C. for concerts on Monday and Tuesday at Constitution Hall. Erich Leinsdorf, the orchestra's music director, will conduct both concerts.

Piano Soloist

Lilian Kallir will be piano soloist on Monday for the Mendelssohn Piano concerto No. 1. The remainder of the progra is Varese's Deserts, and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5.

The Tuesday program will consist of two symphonic works by Beethoven, the Symphonies No. 6. 'The Pastoral' and No. Leinsdorf and members of the ward M. Kennedy will host Leinsdorf and membersof the orchestra at a dinner - party following the Monday concert. Sen. Kennedy is a member of the board of trustees of the orchestra.

In Philharmonic Hall

On Wednesday and Friday, the orchestra will play its fifth and final pair of Philharmonic Hall concerts for the 1968 - 1969 season. Erich Leinsdorf will conduct and Hermann Prey will be baritone soloist in Mahler's 'Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen.' The remainder of the program is Varese's Deserts, composed for orchestra and tape recorder and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5.

On Thursday, the orchestra will make its fourth and final appearance at the Brooklyn Academy of Music for the 1968 - 1969 season. erich Leinsdorf will conduct Mozart's Oveture to the 'Marriage of Figaro' and Beethoven's Symphony No. 3. Lilian Kallir will be piano soloist in Mendelssohn's Piano Concerto No 1.

On Saturday, at Carnegie Hall Erich Leinsdorf makes his final appearance in New York City as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Leinsdorf will retire as music director of the orchestra at the conclusion of the 1969 Tanglewood season. He will conduct Beethoven's Symphonies No. 6 'The Pastoral' and No. 3 'Eroica'.

THE NATIONAL OBSERVER
WASHINGTON, D. C.
W. 539,508

MAR 2 4 1969

The Washington concert audience appeared to be its usual glittering, staid self as the people filed into Constitution Hall to hear the visiting Boston Symphony Orchestra perform. But the Washingtonians, long schooled in baroque and romantic music, were shocked to hear Edgar Varese's contemporary work, Deserts. During the three brief electronically taped passages, many in the audience giggled and guffawed. When it was over, the hall erupted with shouts of "Boo!" and "Bravo!" For about five minutes Constitution Hall sounded more like a baseball stadium than a concert hall. At first the boos seemed to be winning, but the bravos were about to tie the score when Boston Symphony conductor Erich Leinsdorf waved his arms for silence. As the uproar subsided, he grinned and said: "We are delighted to learn that in Washington not only politics is controversial." Then the hullabaloo began all over again. Writing in the Washington Post the next day, critic Paul Hume thanked Mr. Leinsdorf for "shaking the National Symphony audience out of its usual lethargy." Wrote Mr. Hume: Mr. Leinsdorf did "his best, and it was a stupendous best to drag that audience, kicking, screaming, talking, snickering, and picking its nose, into the musical arena of its own day."

Los Angeles Times
LARGEST CIRCULATION IN THE WEST
D. 856,621 SUN. 1,145,695

MAR 1 9 1969

'Deserts' Concert Gets Boos, Bravos

BY PAUL HUME
Exclusive to The Times from the Washington Post

WASHINGTON — Such booing I cannot remember ever hearing in Washington's Constitution Hall. It went on for about 5 minutes Monday night after Erich Leinsdorf finished conducting "Deserts" by Edgar Varese.

The Boston Symphony conductor stood in the center of the stage, almost motionless, while around him roared alternating waves of "boo!" and "bravo!" At first it seemed as if the boos were winning but after a while those stoutly on the side of the controversial music tied the score.

Finally Leinsdorf waved his arms for silence. As it gradually emerged from the hullabaloo, he smiled as he said, "We are delighted to learn that in Washington not only politics is controversial."

People who Gape

The uproar began all over again. It was a real tribute to the soon-to-retire leader of the Boston Symphony that he succeeded to an unprecedented degree in shaking the National Symphony subscription audience out of its usual lethargy.

He had done his best, and it was a stupendous best, to drag that audience, kicking, screaming, talking and snickering into the musical arena of its own day.

Here were thousands of people who gape at Apollo 9, marvel in open-mouthed wonder at men walking in space, and contemplate, as if it were their birthright, the prospect of citizens of this country walking on the surface of the moon.

They were booing music whose intent is to suggest "all physical deserts (of sand, sea, snow, of outer space, of empty city streets) but also the deserts in the mind of man . . . also that remote inner space no telescope can reach, where man is alone, a world of mystery and essential loneliness."

Sensations of Sound

All this Varese projects with an orchestra of about 24 players, including an enlarged percussion section. Three times into the music the composer interjects electronically taped sequences that draw the listener near to the edge of the horrors of suffering and desolation.

Leinsdorf and his men worked miraculously to re-create the sensations of sound moving through time and space that reside in the score.

How different the reception would have been for "Deserts" had the audience heard Beethoven Tuesday night's audience head Beethoven all the way, with the symphonies 6 and 3. Leinsdorf's farewell to Washington as music director of the Boston Symphony. He has done us no greater service than to honor us with his tremendous account of "Deserts."

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

MAR 2 0 1969 New England Newsclip

Booed in Washington

Paul Hume is The Washington Post music critic whom President Truman threatened to punch in the nose after Mr. Hume had written that Margaret Truman, then on a concert tour, can't sing.

So his qualifications as a defender of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, roundly booed in Washington Monday night after it finished Edgar Varese's "Deserts," leave us up in the air. If Margaret truly cannot sing, then it follows that Mr. Hume knows what he is talking about, the Boston orchestra's performance was as superb as he says it was, and Washingtonians are barbarians. The vice versa also follows, the whole obviously involving, by indirection, the kind of judgment which is not going to be ventured here by a sensitive-nosed coward.

To be booed in Washington may not have the same wallop as being banned in Boston, but the Boston Symphony, conductor Erich Leinsdorf and composer Varese are in good company for all that, no matter what some of the lovers of the old classics may think of their excursion into "rhythmically and dynamically controlled sounds designed to suggest all physical deserts and also that remote inner space no telescope can reach." Igor Fedorovich Stravinsky is no slouch, for instance, yet his Rites of Spring provoked a riot at its Paris premiere. And in an earlier day, signs were sometimes hung in concert halls of Berlin and Vienna reading, "Exit—in case of Brahms."

This is about as far as we now can go in the way of scolding square Washingtonians. They may not know music but they know what they like. Translate this into German and it transports you right back to the early 19th century when public ridicule almost drove that era's Varese, Richard Wagner, right out of composition.

Anyway, Boston Symphony, come home. WE still love you.

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 467,505 SUN. 600,357

MAR 1 9 1969

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

MAR 1 8 1969 New England Newsclip

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702

MAR 1 9 1969 New England Newsclip

Capital boos BSO's 'Deserts'

By PAUL HUME
Washington Post

WASHINGTON — Such booing I cannot remember ever hearing in Washington's Constitution Hall. It went on for about five minutes Monday night after Erich Leinsdorf finished conducting "Deserts" by Edgar Varese.

The Boston Symphony conductor stood in the center of the stage, almost motionless, while around him roared alternating waves of "boo!" and "bravo!" At first it seemed as if the boos were winning but after a while those stoutly on the side of the controversial music tied the score.

Finally Leinsdorf waved his arms for silence. As it gradually emerged from the hullabaloo, he smiled as he said: "We are delighted to learn that in Washington not only politics is controversial."

The uproar began all over again. It was a real tribute to the soon-to-retire leader of the Boston Symphony that he succeeded to an unprecedented degree in shaking the National Symphony subscription audience out of its usual lehargy. He had done his best, and it was a stupendous best, to drag that audience, kicking, screaming, talking, snickering and picking its nose, into the musical arena of its o vn day.

Here were thousands of people who gape at Apollo 9, marvel in open-mouthed wonder at men walking in space, and contemplate, as if it were their birthright, the prospect of citizens of this country walking the surface of the moon. They were booing music whose intent is to suggest "all physical deserts (of sand, sea, snow, of outer space, of empty city streets, but also the deserts in the mind of man . . . also that remote inner space no telescope can reach, where man is alone, a world of mystery and essential loneliness."

Leinsdorf and his men worked miraculously to recreate the sensations of sound moving through time and space that reside in the score. In the Varese world, sound is paramount, but it must be controlled rhythmically and dynamically. These controls were in superb array last night. The speakers for the taped portions of the music seemed to be placed in the organ chambers, from which points they filled the large hall with ease.

Varese worked several years before he achieved the third and last sequence of taped sounds, the version heard Monday night. He was dissatisfied with earlier attempts, partly because the electronic equipment available at first was not as versatile as the synthesizers that quickly followed.

QUESTION OF TIME

By Alan M. Kriegsman

". . . and all impartial musicians and music lovers were in perfect agreement that never was anything as incoherent, shrill, chaotic and ear-splitting produced in music. The most piercing dissonances clash in a really atrocious harmony, and a few puny ideas only increase the disagreeable and deafening effect."

No, it's not a quote from one of the irate customers at Constitution Hall Monday night, after the Boston Symphony's performance of Varese's "Deserts." It might as well be, though, since it expresses the same sentiments conveyed by the boos of the disaffected. In fact, however, these were the words of a Vietnamese critic in 1806 reacting to the "Fidelio" Overture by Beethoven, whose 3d and 6th Symphonies were roundly cheered last night in a second Boston Symphony program.

Plus ca change, plus c'est la meme chose. Beethoven, who died in 1827, was vilified during his lifetime by those whom Charles Ives used to call the "lily-eared." Varese, dead only a few years, is now castigated for the same sins—daring, imagination and disrespect for convention. This does not make him a Beethoven, though there are many who deem him one of the most visionary, original creators of our time. His music proves clearly how much better tuned in he was to the temper of life around him than some of the "impartial music lovers" who survive him. Two hundred years from now, maybe he'll be sharing the "yeas" with Beethoven, while some kindred free spirit of those days to come is being hooted for his courage.

So much for bygones. But after Monday night's fracas, nearly anything conductor Erich Leinsdorf and the Bostonians might have chosen to do would have seemed anticlimactic. This goes especially for Beethoven, who, at the perspective of nearly two centuries, is so immovably embalmed as a "classic" that it would take a madman like G. B. Shaw to challenge his stature.

As it was, Leinsdorf picked music specially close to his heart for what was his last appearance in Washington as music director of the Boston Symphony. He turned in some good, regulation Beethoven that had some gripping moments, though not enough of them to make more than a ripple in the endless ocean of Beethoven interpretation. The Sixth was the more human of the two, but even the "Eroica" seemed less militant and unbending than Leinsdorf's customary way with this composer.

The orchestra sounded rather out of sorts, though. Balances were poor, and the ensemble was almost embarrassingly frayed in some spots, especially through the "Eroica's" last two movements.

It will not be for his Beethoven, however, that many Washingtonians will remember Leinsdorf's final Boston stint.

Rather he will be recalled as the man who unmasked our symphony audience, who showed us the difference between those who welcome the ongoing adventure of music, and those who merely use it to massage their preconceptions.

They Say . . .

Boston Symphony Conductor Erich Leinsdorf, acknowledging the boos he received after the orchestra's performance of Varese's "Deserts," a weird modern composition: "We appreciate your cheers as well as your boos. Men can explore the outer regions of space and don't know what they're going to find. And now men are trying to explore the outer regions of sound." . . . Anthropologist Margaret Mead, saying students distrust those in power because those in power distrust themselves: "What has happened . . . is that we have displaced onto the young our own sense of malaise, our distrust of our ability to cope with the deep changes we have brought about in the world; and the young are acting on our communication to them."

The Evening Bulletin
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 671,525

MAR 2 0 1969

76.

Booing Varese: Structure, Simplicity and the Effort to Understand

By Paul Hume

It was an old fight that broke out in Constitution Hall the night Erich Leinsdorf played "Deserts" by Edgard Varese. Booing and snorting are no novelties in the history of Varese performances. They have been heard in one form or another almost every time a new work of Varese has been played.

In a way Leinsdorf reminded me of one of his famous predecessors in this country, Theodore Thomas. There was a man who pioneered in the United States both in the repertoire he introduced to this country and in the standards of playing he required from his orchestras. He was the first man to play two of the orchestral suites of Bach in America. He gave the U.S. premieres of Harold in Italy by Berlioz, the Fourth and Seventh Symphonies of Bruckner, the Second of Sibelius, and four Strauss tone poems: Till Eulenspiegel, Don Quixote, Heldenleben, and Macbeth.

Thomas also introduced American audiences to the Second and Third Symphonies of Brahms. All this was back in the last decade of the 19th century, and the opening years of this one.

One day someone asked Thomas, "Why do you play Brahms when your audiences do not like the music?" Thomas smashed his fist on a table and roared his answer, "I will conduct him until they do!"

In the early days of Varese his music was performed by Leopold Stokowski, Eugene Goossens, Vladimir Golschmann, Hermann Scherchen and other conductors who had both an honest interest in new music, and the particular ability to penetrate inside a new work and then persuade their unwilling orchestras to play it for audiences who were rarely inclined to like it.

Karl Muck, one of the most celebrated conductors in the early part of this century, once made a pertinent comment to his close friend, Varese, when he said, "I sometimes play music I don't like, but which I know to be good. And precisely because I don't like it, it is my duty to work harder on the score."

That is, of course, the honest and admirable approach of a musician of conscience and intellect. It takes a man like that to face first an unfriendly ensemble of musicians, and then the predictable disapproval of an audience which would, today, be far easier to rouse to thunderous heights by giving them one more repetition of a symphony by Beethoven or Tchaikowsky.

Edgard Varese

But it is not enough for a conductor, even to satisfy his conscience, to perform new music which he finds difficult, and which he is sure his listeners will not care for at the first hearing. He must find the way to place the new work before them in so persuasive a manner that they, at least some of them, will make the same effort that he has made, to understand it.

The mail in the days immediately following Leinsdorf's playing of "Deserts" was interesting and, generally, thoughtful and pertinent.

One man wrote, " 'Deserts' is simply noise. Noise without melody, harmony, structure, or any of the other elements of what is entitled to be called 'music.' "

My correspondent is, to use his word, "simply" wrong. "Deserts" may sound to him like noise, without melody, harmony, structure. But I assure him that one of its chief elements is that of harmony. That choir of winds, composed of pairs of flutes, clarinet, horns and tubas, with three trumpets and three trombones, was very busy creating harmony. That harmony was heard in a different plane from that which we are accustomed to hearing, in no way prevents it from being a totally valid harmony.

As for structure, it is not likely that there exists any other score that has been so carefully, so minutely worked out in terms of structure. The structure of "Deserts" is not that of, say, Beethoven's C Sharp Minor Quartet, or the Prelude to Wagner's "Tristan," or Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," to name three revolutionary works.

Neither is the structure of the new home of the Berlin Philharmonic that of Chicago's famous Auditorium, or Frank Lloyd Wright's Taliesins or that of the Kreeger house by Philip Johnson. Nor is the structure of El Greco's Vision of Toledo that of Marcel Duchamp's Nude Descending the Staircase. But a structure that exists in time and space is the ground plan of "Deserts."

My most stimulating correspondent clipped one of the Peanuts strips to his letter and wrote on it, "Perhaps this says it best!" There was Schroeder shouting at Lucy, "Beethoven is IT, clear and simple!! Do you understand?"

But that is NOT it! ! Beethoven is neither clear nor simple and anyone who thinks so, while in no way demeaning Beethoven, for that is as impossible as it is to demean Varese, since both men have finished their work and are dead, deludes himself. Is Beethoven's Misso Solemnis simple How ridiculous. Its notes tax the greatest performers, its complexities baffled a Toscanini to the end of his career. Its deepest meanings? Who knows?

Is Beethoven's Great Fugue simple? No one has yet been able to play it without failing somewhere along the line, no matter how glorious the failure. Is the C Sharp Minor Quartet clear? No one who involves himself in playing it or in truly listening to it thinks so. No, Schroeder, clear and simple Beethoven is not. His first symphony began with a series of dissonances and his last symphony created an uproar by the unprecedented addition of a chorus and soloists.

One brief footnote on the matter of the booing. Another letter writer accused me of having switched horses in recent years. He wrote that, whereas for many years I urged people to express their likes and dislikes audibly, he said that after the uproar at the Boston Symphony concert, I chastised those who did just that.

Not at all. I described what I saw and heard: "kicking, screaming, talking, snickering and picking their noses." I did not object to it, I merely reported it. I was delighted at the booing, although I was on the side of the bravoing. What would have appalled me would have been silence from those who so strongly disliked the music. That would have been tragic.

More of our concerts ought to include something novel of sufficient vigor and quality to shake us out of the comfortable lethargy which continued evenings of Rossini-Dvorak-Mendelssohn or unthinking all-Beethoven make so easy. If we do not hear music of this caliber then Leonard Bernstein is right, and our concert halls have indeed become museums where we admire the works of the past. When that happens symphonic music will die, for new growth is essential to the tree of music.

On that tree, Edgard Varese is a solid branch.

SUNDAY JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
CIRC. 204,800
MAR 23 1969
New England Newsclip

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 467,505 SUN. 600,357
MAR 30 1969

To Boo or Not to Boo, That Is the Question

By McLAREN HARRIS

Zounds! Such goings-on as befell the Symphony week before last! The flagship of Bostonian culture makes a voyage to major cities to the south, and what happens? It received a reaction decidedly most untoward. The orchestra was actually—booed!

Now before umbrage overwhelms reason, let us look at that episode once again. During the return leg of its two-week tour the orchestra gave concerts in Washington's Constitution Hall and in New York's Carnegie Hall and were greeted with a mixture of cheers and boos with the latter perhaps predominant. However, the boos were not for the orchestra or for Erich Leinsdorf; they were for Edgar Varese's "Deserts."

"Deserts," you may recall, was played at Symphony Hall on Feb. 28-March 1. It was by no means booed. May we conclude, therefore, that Boston is by comparison to New York and Washington progressive, flexible in its tastes, a fertile ground for the performance of new works?

NO BOSTON is not especially forward-looking or open-minded. Boston is scared. Boston is scared of its Puritan ancestors, who taught us that displays of emotion were improper in public, and of later ancestors who taught us to "respect the arts."

But more particularly, Boston is frightened to death of making a mistake in judgment, of being wrong in assessing some emergent talent. Ever since it was discovered to be in error about Brahms' Second Symphony (as was practically everyone else), Boston has been slow to express musical opinions, especially unfavorable ones.

The Brahms Second incident is brought home to local audiences every time the work is performed here—how both audience and critics, when Georg Henschel introduced it during the BSO's first season in 1882, gave it a hostile greeting, applying such terms to it as "turgid," "evil-sounding," an "unmitigated bore" and "cold-blooded."

This grievous happening now hangs about our subconscious like an albatross, and as if in penance the Symphony's public has now taken the Second to heart as its favorite among Brahms' four.

SEEMINGLY RESOLVED never to let it happen again, audiences here are reluctant to give vocal criticism for fear of incurring the wrath and ridicule of future generations for artistic non-recognition.

Instead, if we don't like a work, we proffer a grudgingly polite reception. We extend a spattering of applause, thereby damning it with faint praise. That may be equally effective, but it's not nearly as much fun.

I'm not arguing against Varese or "Deserts." I rather enjoyed it. I'm against compotent cursing of bureaucracy from the electorate.

IT IS NOT so onerous a sin to be wrong in judging new works; one can always change his mind, and most of us won't be around to account for our judgments to later generations anyway. And it can be argued that audiences are completely within their rights to choose works which have meaning for them and to reject those whose relevance can be found only in a future age.

I suspect that in a viable artistic climate a new work is better hooted than passed without any indication of what the listeners' actual opinions were. And I should think conductors and orchestras would appreciate an audience whose response they knew to be genuine, whether in praise or condemnation. In almost all cases, hooting is not directed at the musicians and they know it. They get paid anyway.

When an audience in Washington or New York boos a demonstrably unpopular work, you know at the least they heard it. In Boston one is never quite certain.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436
MAR 30 1969
New England Newsclip

"We are delighted to find that in Washington not only politics is controversial," said conductor Erich Leinsdorf, 57, gamely smiling at an audience that had just erupted into what one critic called the worst booing he had ever heard at Constitution Hall. There was more of the same when the maestro and his Boston Symphony moved on to New York's Philharmonic Hall to repeat their performance of the late Edgard Varèse's 1954 "Déserts"—which features an earsplitting percussion score interspersed with tape-recorded sounds of police sirens, animal cries, Bronx cheers, gargling and snoring, not to mention somone breaking wind. "I genuinely welcome the booing," Leinsdorf insisted to a reporter. "I am as grateful for it as I am for applause. Anything but indifference."

NEWSWEEK
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 1,935,000
MAR 31 1969

Insights and Outsights

By EDWIN SAFFORD

Booooooooing the BSO

PROVIDENCE HAS THE dubious distinction of beating our nation's capital in booing the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season.

We did it during and after the orchestra's performance of Olivier Messiaen's Chronochromie under Georges Pretre's direction in January. Washington did it for Edgard Varese's Deserts when that work was given in Erich Leinsdorf's final Constitution Hall series as the orchestra's music director last week.

The point of bringing this up here is not booing, although I would like to say I am not against it. Any kind of lively reaction, be it boo or bravo, shows an audience doing something besides listening with half an ear. Nothing is more dispiriting to performers than polite applause that barely outlasts their departure from the stage.

No, my point is why Maestro Leinsdorf, in his last appearance here as the BSO's chief in February did not give us a more interesting program. The Beethoven fourth piano concerto and Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony together hardly inspire excitement.

This may be flogging a dead issue. And I know that scheduling forced a change in conductorial order. Leinsdorf preceded assistant conductor Charles Wilson instead of following him on the season's Veterans Auditorium concert, as originally planned. Rehearsal time could have necessitated relying on the tried and true.

Nevertheless I regret most strongly, indeed jealously, that the importance of the occasion — a farewell of sorts — was overlooked. Would it not have given the event greater significance if a work such as Deserts had been played? Varese, after all, and for all his small output, is one of the most influential composers on our younger musicians.

It is too late, of course, to do anything but sputter. But sputter I will. I would hate to think the BSO, which has been coming to Providence since 1883, might be so timid about our reactions as to risk controversy only once a season.

76.

Booing Varese: Structure, Simplicity and the Effort to Understand

By Paul Hume

It was an old fight that broke out in Constitution Hall the night Erich Leinsdorf played "Deserts" by Edgard Varese. Booing and snorting are no novelties in the history of Varese performances. They have been heard in one form or another almost every time a new work of Varese has been played.

In a way Leinsdorf reminded me of one of his famous predecessors in this country, Theodore Thomas. There was a man who pioneered in the United States both in the repertoire he introduced to this country and in the standards of playing he required from his orchestras. He was the first man to play two of the orchestral suites of Bach in America. He gave the U.S. premieres of Harold in Italy by Berlioz, the Fourth and Seventh Symphonies of Bruckner, the Second of Sibelius, and four Strauss tone poems: Till Eulenspiegel, Don Quixote, Heldenleben, and Macbeth.

Thomas also introduced American audiences to the Second and Third Symphonies of Brahms. All this was back in the last decade of the 19th century, and the opening years of this one.

One day someone asked Thomas, "Why do you play Brahms when your audiences do not like the music?" Thomas smashed his fist on a table and roared his answer, "I will conduct him until they do!"

In the early days of Varese his music was performed by Leopold Stokowski, Eugene Goossens, Vladimir Golschmann, Hermann Scherchen and other conductors who had both an honest interest in new music, and the particular ability to penetrate inside a new work and then persuade their unwilling orchestras to play it for audiences who were rarely inclined to like it.

Karl Muck, one of the most celebrated conductors in the early part of this century, once made a pertinent comment to his close friend, Varese, when he said, "I sometimes play music I don't like, but which I know to be good. And precisely because I don't like it, it is my duty to work harder on the score."

That is, of course, the honest and admirable approach of a musician of conscience and intellect. It takes a man like that to face first an unfriendly ensemble of musicians, and then the predictable disapproval of an audience which would, today, be far easier to rouse to thunderous heights by giving them one more repetition of a symphony by Beethoven or Tchaikowsky.

Edgard Varese

But it is not enough for a conductor, even to satisfy his conscience, to perform new music which he finds difficult, and which he is sure his listeners will not care for at the first hearing. He must find the way to place the new work before them in so persuasive a manner that they, at least some of them, will make the same effort that he has made, to understand it.

The mail in the days immediately following Leinsdorf's playing of "Deserts" was interesting and, generally, thoughtful and pertinent.

One man wrote, " 'Deserts' is simply noise. Noise without melody, harmony, structure, or any of the other elements of what is entitled to be called 'music.' "

My correspondent is, to use his word, "simply" wrong. "Deserts" may sound to him like noise, without melody, harmony, structure. But I assure him that one of its chief elements is that of harmony. That choir of winds, composed of pairs of flutes, clarinet, horns and tubas, with three trumpets and three trombones, was very busy creating harmony. That harmony was heard in a different plane from that which we are accustomed to hearing, in no way prevents it from being a totally valid harmony.

As for structure, it is not likely that there exists any other score that has been so carefully, so minutely worked out in terms of structure. The structure of "Deserts" is not that of, say, Beethoven's C Sharp Minor Quartet, or the Prelude to Wagner's "Tristan," or Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," to name three revolutionary works.

Neither is the structure of the new home of the Berlin Philharmonic that of Chicago's famous Auditorium, or Frank Lloyd Wright's Taliesins or that of the Kreeger house by Philip Johnson. Nor is the structure of El Greco's Vision of Toledo that of Marcel Duchamp's Nude Descending the Staircase. But a structure that exists in time and space is the ground plan of "Deserts."

My most stimulating correspondent clipped one of the Peanuts strips to his letter and wrote on it, "Perhaps this says it best!" There was Schroeder shouting at Lucy, "Beethoven is IT, clear and simple!! Do you understand?"

But that is NOT it! ! Beethoven is neither clear nor simple and anyone who thinks so, while in no way demeaning Beethoven, for that is as impossible as it is to demean Varese, since both men have finished their work and are dead, deludes himself. Is Beethoven's Misso Solemnis simple How ridiculous. Its notes tax the greatest performers, its complexities baffled a Toscanini to the end of his career. Its deepest meanings? Who knows?

Is Beethoven's Great Fugue simple? No one has yet been able to play it without failing somewhere along the line, no matter how glorious the failure. Is the C Sharp Minor Quartet clear? No one who involves himself in playing it or in truly listening to it thinks so. No, Schroeder, clear and simple Beethoven is not. His first symphony began with a series of dissonances and his last symphony created an uproar by the unprecedented addition of a chorus and soloists.

One brief footnote on the matter of the booing. Another letter writer accused me of having switched horses in recent years. He wrote that, whereas for many years I urged people to express their likes and dislikes audibly, he said that after the uproar at the Boston Symphony concert, I chastised those who did just that.

Not at all. I described what I saw and heard: "kicking, screaming, talking, snickering and picking their noses." I did not object to it, I merely reported it. I was delighted at the booing, although I was on the side of the bravoing. What would have appalled me would have been silence from those who so strongly disliked the music. That would have been tragic.

More of our concerts ought to include something novel of sufficient vigor and quality to shake us out of the comfortable lethargy which continued evenings of Rossini-Dvorak-Mendelssohn or unthinking all-Beethoven make so easy. If we do not hear music of this caliber then Leonard Bernstein is right, and our concert halls have indeed become museums where we admire the works of the past. When that happens symphonic music will die, for new growth is essential to the tree of music.

On that tree, Edgard Varese is a solid branch.

SUNDAY JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
CIRC. 204,800

MAR 23 1969

New England Newsclip

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 467,505 SUN. 600,357

MAR 30 1969

To Boo or Not to Boo, That Is the Question

By McLAREN HARRIS

Zounds! Such goings-on as befell the Symphony week before last! The flagship of Bostonian culture makes a voyage to major cities to the south, and what happens? It received a reaction decidedly most untoward. The orchestra was actually—booed!

Now before umbrage overwhelms reason, let us look at that episode once again. During the return leg of its two-week tour the orchestra gave concerts in Washington's Constitution Hall and in New York's Carnegie Hall and were greeted with a mixture of cheers and boos with the latter perhaps predominant. However, the boos were not for the orchestra or for Erich Leinsdorf; they were for Edgar Varese's "Deserts."

"Deserts," you may recall, was played at Symphony Hall on Feb. 28-March 1. It was by no means booed. May we conclude, therefore, that Boston is by comparison to New York and Washington progressive, flexible in its tastes, a fertile ground for the performance of new works?

NO BOSTON is not especially forward-looking or open-minded. Boston is scared. Boston is scared of its Puritan ancestors, who taught us that displays of emotion were improper in public, and of later ancestors who taught us to "respect the arts."

But more particularly, Boston is frightened to death of making a mistake in judgment, of being wrong in assessing some emergent talent. Ever since it was discovered to be in error about Brahms' Second Symphony (as was practically everyone else), Boston has been slow to express musical opinions, especially unfavorable ones.

The Brahms Second incident is brought home to local audiences every time the work is performed here—how both audience and critics, when Georg Henschel introduced it during the BSO's first season in 1882, gave it a hostile greeting, applying such terms to it as "turgid," "evil-sounding," an "unmitigated bore" and "cold-blooded."

This grievous happening now hangs about our subconscious like an albatross, and as if in penance the Symphony's public has now taken the Second to heart as its favorite among Brahms' four.

SEEMINGLY RESOLVED never to let it happen again, audiences here are reluctant to give vocal criticism for fear of incurring the wrath and ridicule of future generations for artistic non-recognition.

Instead, if we don't like a work, we proffer a grudgingly polite reception. We extend a spattering of applause, thereby damning it with faint praise. That may be equally effective, but it's not nearly as much fun.

I'm not arguing against Varese or "Deserts." I rather enjoyed it. I'm against compotent cursing of bureaucracy from the electorate.

IT IS NOT so onerous a sin to be wrong in judging new works; one can always change his mind, and most of us won't be around to account for our judgments to later generations anyway. And it can be argued that audiences are completely within their rights to choose works which have meaning for them and to reject those whose relevance can be found only in a future age.

I suspect that in a viable artistic climate a new work is better hooted than passed without any indication of what the listeners' actual opinions were. And I should think conductors and orchestras would appreciate an audience whose response they knew to be genuine, whether in praise or condemnation. In almost all cases, hooting is not directed at the musicians and they know it. They get paid anyway.

When an audience in Washington or New York boos a demonstrably unpopular work, you know at the least they heard it. In Boston one is never quite certain.

SUNDAY HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 302,436

MAR 30 1969

New England Newsclip

"We are delighted to find that in Washington not only politics is controversial," said conductor Erich Leinsdorf, 57, gamely smiling at an audience that had just erupted into what one critic called the worst booing he had ever heard at Constitution Hall. There was more of the same when the maestro and his Boston Symphony moved on to New York's Philharmonic Hall to repeat their performance of the late Edgard Varèse's 1954 "Déserts"—which features an earsplitting percussion score interspersed with tape-recorded sounds of police sirens, animal cries, Bronx cheers, gargling and snoring, not to mention somone breaking wind. "I genuinely welcome the booing," Leinsdorf insisted to a reporter. "I am as grateful for it as I am for applause. Anything but indifference."

NEWSWEEK
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 1,935,000

MAR 31 1969

Insights and Outsights

By EDWIN SAFFORD

Booooooooing the BSO

PROVIDENCE HAS THE dubious distinction of beating our nation's capital in booing the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season.

We did it during and after the orchestra's performance of Olivier Messiaen's Chronochromie under Georges Pretre's direction in January. Washington did it for Edgard Varese's Deserts when that work was given in Erich Leinsdorf's final Constitution Hall series as the orchestra's music director last week.

The point of bringing this up here is not booing, although I would like to say I am not against it. Any kind of lively reaction, be it boo or bravo, shows an audience doing something besides listening with half an ear. Nothing is more dispiriting to performers than polite applause that barely outlasts their departure from the stage.

No, my point is why Maestro Leinsdorf, in his last appearance here as the BSO's chief in February did not give us a more interesting program. The Beethoven fourth piano concerto and Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony together hardly inspire excitement.

This may be flogging a dead issue. And I know that scheduling forced a change in conductorial order. Leinsdorf preceded assistant conductor Charles Wilson instead of following him on the season's Veterans Auditorium concert, as originally planned. Rehearsal time could have necessitated relying on the tried and true.

Nevertheless I regret most strongly, indeed jealously, that the importance of the occasion — a farewell of sorts — was overlooked. Would it not have given the event greater significance if a work such as Deserts had been played? Varese, after all, and for all his small output, is one of the most influential composers on our younger musicians.

It is too late, of course, to do anything but sputter. But sputter I will. I would hate to think the BSO, which has been coming to Providence since 1883, might be so timid about our reactions as to risk controversy only once a season.

77.

NEWS OF MUSIC

The Boston's Varese Stirs Audience Boos

By DONALD MINTZ
Star Staff Writer

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor. Soloist: Lilian Kallir, piano. At Constitution Hall. Program: Deserts, Varese; Piano Concerto No. 1 in G minor, Op. 25, Mendelssohn; Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Op. 64, Tchaikowsky.

They finally booed at Constitution Hall. Not particularly lustily, perhaps, but firmly and convincingly.

The object of this demonstration is unfortunately no longer with us, having died four years ago at the age of 82. Still, Edgar Varese's Deserts, which was written in 1954 and recorded about nine years ago, apparently retains a capacity to shock those who customarily turn up at subscription concerts. And, it must be added, to please those who, judging by their appearance, do not regularly attend such events but seem to have been brought in by the program Erich Leinsdorf conducted last night.

Leinsdorf, too, seemed pleased — or possibly just amused. After a bit of demonstration and counter-demonstration, he raised his arms for silence, got it, and said, "We are delighted that in Washington not only politics is controversial."

The piece that caused all this is scored for a relatively modest wind and percussion ensemble and a two-channel tape. It is based primarily on the exploration of limited sets of intervals, though not in the twelve-tone sense. Sometimes it bunches into dissonant chords. Sometimes it remains fairly thin for substantial lengths of time. More often than not, a single, reiterated pitch takes on some of the feeling of a center; in this sense Deserts, however dissonant, is distinctly tonal music.

The taped sounds, most of them electronic though some are distorted "natural" sounds, are essentially an expansion of Varese's earlier instrumental vocabulary. What in his early years he had to do crudely with an enormous percussion group (including, of course, his favorite sirens) could in his last years be achieved far better by electronic means.

Still, 1954 is a long time ago as electronic music goes, and Varese's tape already has a distinctly historical sound about it, a fact that does not, however, make it one whit less valid now than it was when it was conceived.

Leinsdorf's performance seemed a distinct improvement over Robert Craft's recording in one important particular. Where the music seems to want a sense of pulse, he supplied it. Craft, on the other hand, appears to assume that the beat is purely for purposes of measurement and is not to be heard as such. Leinsdorf's way supplies a degree of strength the piece needs.

In another respect, however, the Boston Symphony was no improvement at all over Craft's studio group. The members of the celebrated orchestra were as careless about intonation as the anonymous freelance players.

Then, to the relief of some and the distress of others, the program turned conventional. Lilian Kallir appears to slam through the Mendelssohn G minor piano concerto, a work the composer seems to have begun sketching during a card game. Perhaps he won the game; certainly he lost the concerto, as he perfectly well knew.

And finally, the Tchaikowsky Fifth, played straightforwardly and vigorously, though not particularly precisely. The guitar-style pizzicati and patches of really poor woodwin intonation are not what one expects from the Boston Symphony.

At the end, a vast ovation. Partly because for all its faults, the Tchaikowsky was stirring, and partly, one may hope, because the orchestra brought the Varese to town. But mostly, no doubt, by way of a fond farewell to a great conductor. Last night was the last time the Wednesday subscribers to the National Symphony will hear Leinsdorf as music director of the Boston Symphony. Tonight, the Tuesday subscribers get their chance. And tomorrow, nothing, because that evening's regular audience was in the hall last night.

The Evening Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 309,245 SUN. 358,738
MAR 18 1969

THE WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 224,056 SAT. 173,587
MAR 18 1969

Leinsdorf Was Happy About the Booing

A Constitution Hall audience finally lost its cool last night.

After the performance of the late avante-garde composer Edgar Varese's Deserts, which opened the first of two Boston Symphony concerts, a barrage of "boos" rang out.

For a moment the antagonists held sway, but the applauders quickly intensified their efforts and turned the tide.

When conductor Erich Leinsdorf came out for his second bow after the Varese, he waved his arms for silence, and said: "We are delighted that in Washton not only politics is controversial."

To followers of contemporary music, Deserts, completed in 1954, is certainly on the conservative side. But to many of last night's National Symphony series subscribers, it represented the ultimate in tonal torture . . . a seemingly disconnected sequence of rude noises in woodwinds, brass and percussion, with electronic contributions via tape deck and speakers.

I think Deserts has power and musical meaning and while it is not "enjoyable" in the usual limited sense, it accomplishes what the talented Varese set out to do. It says something.

It was rather interesting that tho Deserts pained one of the more persistent booers, to the 5 or 6-year-old boy he held in his lap it was apparently a lullaby. The youngster had fallen sound asleep during the performance.

In any case, there was nothing controversial in the Mendelssohn Piano Concerto No. 1 and the Tchaikowsky Symphony No. 5 which closed the program. The acclaim was unanimous. And for Lilian Kallir, the brilliantly persuasive soloist in the Mendelssohn, there was an ovation of rarely reached intensity.

M.B.

Sen. and Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy visit backstage with Boston Symphony Orchestra Conductor and Mrs. Erich Leinsdorf during intermission at Constitution Hall.
AP Wirephoto

"The Boston Symphony conductor stood in the center of the stage, almost motionless, while around him roared alternating waves of 'Boo!' and 'Bravo!'"

Music

BRAVOS AND BOOS

By Paul Hume

Such booing I cannot remember ever hearing in Constitution Hall. It went on for about five minutes after Erich Leinsdorf finished conducting "Deserts" by Edgar Varese.

The Boston Symphony conductor stood in the center of the stage, almost motionless, while around him roared alternating waves of "Boo!" and "Bravo!" At first it seemed as if the boos were winning but after awhile those stoutly on the side of the controversial music tied the score.

Finally Leinsdorf waved his arms for silence. As it gradually emerged from the hullabaloo, he smiled as he said, "We are delighted to learn that in Washington not only politics is controversial."

Then the uproar began all over again. It was a real tribute to the soon-to-retire leader of the Boston Symphony that he succeeded to an unprecedented degree in shaking the National Symphony subscription audience out of its usual lethargy. He had done his best, and it was a stupendous best, to drag that audience, kicking, screaming, talking, snickering and picking its nose, into the musical arena of its own day.

Here were thousands of people who gape at Apollo 8, marvel in open-mouthed wonder at men walking in space, and contemplate, as if it were their birthright, the prospect of citizens of this country walking on the surface of the moon. They were booing music whose intent is to suggest "all physical deserts (of sand, sea, snow, of outer space, of empty city streets) but also the deserts in the mind of man . . . also that remote inner space no telescope can reach, where man is alone, a world of mystery and essential loneliness."

All this Varese projects with an orchestra of about 24 players, including an enlarged percussion section. Three times into their music the composer interjects electronically taped sequences that draw the listener near to the edge of the horrors of suffering and desolation. "Deserts" is one of the last compositions by a man whose total output numbers around 15. It is one of the largest conceptions of a man

See BOSTON, B5, Col. 3

Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony will be featured tonight at 8:30 in Constitution Hall.

The Bravos vs. the Boos

BOSTON, From B1

who was wholly occupied with creating music that moved in new planes, acknowledging no past limitations.

Leinsdorf and his men worked miraculously to recreate the sensations of sound moving through time and space that reside in the score. In the Varese world, sound is paramount, but it must be controlled rhythmically and dynamically. These controls were in superb array last night. The speakers for the taped portions of the music seemed to be placed in the organ chambers, from which points they filled the large hall with ease.

Varese worked several years before he achieved the third and last sequence of taped sounds, the version heard last night. He was dissatisfied with earlier attempts, partly because the electronic equipment available at first was not as versatile as the synthesizers that quickly followed. The final result is an awesome thing compared to the puerile and experimental clothes that still roll out of electronic laboratories around the country.

History has already come down solidly on the side of those who last night shouted "Bravo!" It does not matter at all that many shouted "Boo! Though his music was little played until toward the end of his 82 years, the world whose door Varese opened has already become familiar ground to those writing the music of today and tomorrow. While it is not likely to be matched, it is already exerting an irresistible force.

How different the reception last night would have been for "Deserts" had the audience been 30 and under. For those who prefer their music from the 19th century, Leinsdorf took his listeners into a different world with the polished refinements of Mendelssohn's genteel Piano Concerto in G Minor. Lilian Kallir played it with a brilliant, poetical inflection. From there it was an easy step to the heady fragrance of the Fifth Symphony of Tschaikowsky.

Tonight's audience will hear Beethoven all the way, with the Symphonies 6 and 3, Leinsdorf's farewell to Washington as music director of the Boston Symphony. He has done us no greater service than to honor us with his tremendous account of "Deserts."

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 467,505 SUN. 600,357
MAR 18 1969

REGISTER (e)
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
CIRC. 104,800
MAR 18 1969
New England Newsclip

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000
MAR 29 1969

Classical Notes

Zero Mostel debuts as a symphony conductor April 27, when leads the Symphony of the New York's Philhar- ing in ist with Erick Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony in Washington Monday (17). Leinsdorf led a second Washington program with the orchestra on Tuesday (18). Cellist Jesse Levy gives a Queens recital April 15.

NEWS OF MUSIC

The Boston's Varese Stirs Audience Boos

By DONALD MINTZ
Star Staff Writer

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf, conductor. Soloist: Lilian Kallir, piano. At Constitution Hall. Program: Deserts, Varese; Piano Concerto No. 1 in G minor, Op. 25, Mendelssohn; Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Op. 64, Tchaikowsky.

They finally booed at Constitution Hall. Not particularly lustily, perhaps, but firmly and convincingly.

The object of this demonstration is unfortunately no longer with us, having died four years ago at the age of 82. Still, Edgar Varese's Deserts, which was written in 1954 and recorded about nine years ago, apparently retains a capacity to shock those who customarily turn up at subscription concerts. And, it must be added, to please those who, judging by their appearance, do not regularly attend such events but seem to have been brought in by the program Erich Leinsdorf conducted last night.

Leinsdorf, too, seemed pleased — or possibly just amused. After a bit of demonstration and counter-demonstration, he raised his arms for silence, got it, and said, "We are delighted that in Washington not only politics is controversial."

The piece that caused all this is scored for a relatively modest wind and percussion ensemble and a two-channel tape. It is based primarily on the exploration of limited sets of intervals, though not in the twelve-tone sense. Sometimes it bunches into dissonant chords. Sometimes it remains fairly thin for substantial lengths of time. More often than not, a single, reiterated pitch takes on some of the feeling of a center; in this sense Deserts, however dissonant, is distinctly tonal music.

The taped sounds, most of them electronic though some are distorted "natural" sounds, are essentially an expansion of Varese's earlier instrumental vocabulary. What in his early years he had to do crudely with an enormous percussion group (including, of course, his favorite sirens) could in his last years be achieved far better by electronic means.

Still, 1954 is a long time ago as electronic music goes, and Varese's tape already has a distinctly historical sound about it, a fact that does not, however, make it one whit less valid now than it was when it was conceived.

Leinsdorf's performance seemed a distinct improvement over Robert Craft's recording in one important particular. Where the music seems to want a sense of pulse, he supplied it. Craft, on the other hand, appears to assume that the beat is purely for purposes of measurement and is not to be heard as such. Leinsdorf's way supplies a degree of strength the piece needs.

In another respect, however, the Boston Symphony was no improvement at all over Craft's studio group. The members of the celebrated orchestra were as careless about intonation as the anonymous freelance players.

Then, to the relief of some and the distress of others, the program turned conventional. Lilian Kallir appears to slam through the Mendelssohn G minor piano concerto, a work the composer seems to have begun sketching during a card game. Perhaps he won the game; certainly he lost the concerto, as he perfectly well knew.

And finally, the Tchaikowsky Fifth, played straightforwardly and vigorously, though not particularly precisely. The guitar-style pizzicati and patches of really poor woodwin intonation are not what one expects from the Boston Symphony.

At the end, a vast ovation. Partly because for all its faults, the Tchaikowsky was stirring, and partly, one may hope, because the orchestra brought the Varese to town. But mostly, no doubt, by way of a fond farewell to a great conductor. Last night was the last time the Wednesday subscribers to the National Symphony will hear Leinsdorf as music director of the Boston Symphony. Tonight, the Tuesday subscribers get their chance. And tomorrow, nothing, because that evening's regular audience was in the hall last night.

The Evening Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 309,245 SUN. 358,738
MAR 18 1969

THE WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 224,056 SAT. 173,587
MAR 18 1969

Leinsdorf Was Happy About the Booing

A Constitution Hall audience finally lost its cool last night.

After the performance of the late avante-garde composer Edgar Varese's Deserts, which opened the first of two Boston Symphony concerts, a barrage of "boos" rang out.

For a moment the antagonists held sway, but the applauders quickly intensified their efforts and turned the tide.

When conductor Erich Leinsdorf came out for his second bow after the Varese, he waved his arms for silence, and said: "We are delighted that in Washton not only politics is controversial."

To followers of contemporary music, Deserts, completed in 1954, is certainly on the conservative side. But to many of last night's National Symphony series subscribers, it represented the ultimate in tonal torture . . . a seemingly disconnected sequence of rude noises in woodwinds, brass and percussion, with electronic contributions via tape deck and speakers.

I think Deserts has power and musical meaning and while it is not "enjoyable" in the usual limited sense, it accomplishes what the talented Varese set out to do. It says something.

It was rather interesting that tho Deserts pained one of the more persistent booers, to the 5 or 6-year-old boy he held in his lap it was apparently a lullaby. The youngster had fallen sound asleep during the performance.

In any case, there was nothing controversial in the Mendelssohn Piano Concerto No. 1 and the Tchaikowsky Symphony No. 5 which closed the program. The acclaim was unanimous. And for Lilian Kallir, the brilliantly persuasive soloist in the Mendelssohn, there was an ovation of rarely reached intensity.

M.B.

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 467,505 SUN. 600,357
MAR 18 1969

REGISTER (e)
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
CIRC. 104,800
MAR 18 1969
New England Newsclip

Sen. and Mrs. Edward M. Kennedy visit backstage with Boston Symphony Orchestra Conductor and Mrs. Erich Leinsdorf during intermission at Constitution Hall.
AP Wirephoto

"The Boston Symphony conductor stood in the center of the stage, almost motionless, while around him roared alternating waves of 'Boo!' and 'Bravo!'"

Music

BRAVOS AND BOOS

By Paul Hume

Such booing I cannot remember ever hearing in Constitution Hall. It went on for about five minutes after Erich Leinsdorf finished conducting "Deserts" by Edgar Varese.

The Boston Symphony conductor stood in the center of the stage, almost motionless, while around him roared alternating waves of "Boo!" and "Bravo!" At first it seemed as if the boos were winning but after awhile those stoutly on the side of the controversial music tied the score.

Finally Leinsdorf waved his arms for silence. As it gradually emerged from the hullabaloo, he smiled as he said, "We are delighted to learn that in Washington not only politics is controversial."

Then the uproar began all over again. It was a real tribute to the soon-to-retire leader of the Boston Symphony that he succeeded to an unprecedented degree in shaking the National Symphony subscription audience out of its usual lethargy. He had done his best, and it was a stupendous best, to drag that audience, kicking, screaming, talking, snickering and picking its nose, into the musical arena of its own day.

Here were thousands of people who gape at Apollo 8, marvel in open-mouthed wonder at men walking in space, and contemplate, as if it were their birthright, the prospect of citizens of this country walking on the surface of the moon. They were booing music whose intent is to suggest "all physical deserts (of sand, sea, snow, of outer space, of empty city streets) but also the deserts in the mind of man . . . also that remote inner space no telescope can reach, where man is alone, a world of mystery and essential loneliness."

All this Varese projects with an orchestra of about 24 players, including an enlarged percussion section. Three times into their music the composer interjects electronically taped sequences that draw the listener near to the edge of the horrors of suffering and desolation. "Deserts" is one of the last compositions by a man whose total output numbers around 15. It is one of the largest conceptions of a man

See BOSTON, B5, Col. 3

Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony will be featured tonight at 8:30 in Constitution Hall.

The Bravos vs. the Boos

BOSTON, From B1

who was wholly occupied with creating music that moved in new planes, acknowledging no past limitations.

Leinsdorf and his men worked miraculously to recreate the sensations of sound moving through time and space that reside in the score. In the Varese world, sound is paramount, but it must be controlled rhythmically and dynamically. These controls were in superb array last night. The speakers for the taped portions of the music seemed to be placed in the organ chambers, from which points they filled the large hall with ease.

Varese worked several years before he achieved the third and last sequence of taped sounds, the version heard last night. He was dissatisfied with earlier attempts, partly because the electronic equipment available at first was not as versatile as the synthesizers that quickly followed. The final result is an awesome thing compared to the puerile and experimental clothes that still roll out of electronic laboratories around the country.

History has already come down solidly on the side of those who last night shouted "Bravo!" It does not matter at all that many shouted "Boo! Though his music was little played until toward the end of his 82 years, the world whose door Varese opened has already become familiar ground to those writing the music of today and tomorrow. While it is not likely to be matched, it is already exerting an irresistible force.

How different the reception last night would have been for "Deserts" had the audience been 30 and under. For those who prefer their music from the 19th century, Leinsdorf took his listeners into a different world with the polished refinements of Mendelssohn's genteel Piano Concerto in G Minor. Lilian Kallir played it with a brilliant, poetical inflection. From there it was an easy step to the heady fragrance of the Fifth Symphony of Tschaikowsky.

Tonight's audience will hear Beethoven all the way, with the Symphonies 6 and 3, Leinsdorf's farewell to Washington as music director of the Boston Symphony. He has done us no greater service than to honor us with his tremendous account of "Deserts."

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000
MAR 29 1969

Classical Notes

Zero Mostel debuts as a symphony conductor April 27, when leads the Symphony of the New York's Philhar- in ist with Erick Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony in Washington Monday (17). Leinsdorf led a second Washington program with the orchestra on Tuesday (18). Violist Jesse Levy gives a Queens recital April 15.

78.

NEWS OF MUSIC

Leinsdorf Conducts Patricianly in Finale

By LAWRENCE SEARS
Contributing Critic

Boston Symphony Orchestra Erich Leinsdorf, conductor. At Constitution Hall. All-Beethoven Program: Symphony No. 6 in F, Op. 68 (Pastoral); Symphony No. 3 in E-Flat, Op. 55 (Eroica).

Last night Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra treated their capacity Constitution Hall audience to an evening of superlative programming, patrician conducting and indifferent playing.

They purified the air (and their listener's ears) by playing two Beethoven symphonies, the "Pastoral" and the "Eroica." This was quite a change from their Monday program that featured the electronic music of "Deserts" by Edgar Varese, plus the melancholy meanderings of Mendelssohn and Tschaikovsky. The former roused the audience to boos and the latter put critics into a lethargy. Last night we were safe in the conservative haven of tonic-dominant harmony.

Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, No. 6 in F, Op. 68, opened the concert, and Leinsdorf injected a little personality into his glacial baton style.

There were several rubatos, notably at the end of the first movement, just after Beethoven imitates the Nightingale, Quail and the Cuckoo. The Andante made lavish use of the lower strings in their accompaniment to the solos. It was one of the few times we can recall hearing these elaborate figurations at their proper dynamic marking. The composer indicated "piano," but too many conductors read this as "pianissimo," and the details are lost.

Flat horn chords heralded the Summer Storm movement. The magic which Beethoven works with the orchestra helped distract us. Not so much, however, that we failed to appreciate the tight rein which Leinsdorf exerted on the last five measures of the closing movement, delivering the arched string phrases and the horn call to merge precisely with the final chords.

Intermission brought an unusual promenade of unisex outfits which often had us guessing. This was as colorful an audience as you would find at the opening of the opera.

There seemed to be a different Leinsdorf and orchestra in charge of the "Eroica." The mood was olympian, but unpredictable, like a god beserk. The opening chords contained majesty, yet they did not try to stop the world in its orbit. A Funeral March came and went its way, unaccountably fitting easily into the context of the other movements. The Scherzo began dangerously fast. After the Trio, it resumed the headlong plunge.

And so it went, an "Eroica" filled with tremendous possibilities, yet strangely underrehearsed. The enthusiastic audience cried Bravo! but this must be considered in recognition of other performances than this one.

This was the last of the two farewell appearances here by Leinsdorf before his retirement.

There also was a third one on the radio Sunday afternoon, a delayed broadcast by WGMS of the January presentation of the opera "Ariadne auf Naxos, by Richard Strauss. It featured superlative work by a stunning cast, headed by soprano Beverly Sills as Zerbinetta. This served to recall Leinsdorf to one of his earliest loves — opera.

There are rumors of more opera in his future. We would be fortunate, indeed, if the Kennedy Center would bring him back for more symphonic and operatic dates.

The Evening Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 309,245 SUN. 358,738
MAR 19 1969

...ng extra- ... as well as playing. In ... at the Library of Congress this ... program will include Satie's "Three Pieces in the Shape of a Pear" and "Carnival at New Orleans" by Milhaud.

Speaking of visiting orchestras, it is great news that Erich Leinsdorf will play "Deserts," by Edgar Varese on the first of his two concerts here for National Symphony subscribers on March 17 and 18. But why is he gypping the second night audience with two Beethoven symphonies? Now there's a pair of novelties for you, and with the Beethoven 200th anniversary staring us in the face next season. Come, come, Mr. Leinsdorf!

An Unusual Setting

The Old Presbyterian Meeting House in Alexandria will be the unusual setting for a concert of chamber music on Friday at 8:30 p.m. The Northern Virginia Fine Arts Association is presenting the University of Maryland Woodwind Quintet with pianist Emerson Meyers. Tickets at the Atheneum, 201 Prince St., Alexandria.

—Paul Hume

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 467,505 SUN. 600,357
MAR 4 1969

MUSIC ARTISTS
NEW YORK, N. Y.
6 TI. A YR. CIRC. N. AVAIL.
APR MAY 1969

Philharmonic Hall; March 19, 1969; Boston Symphony Orchestra; Erich Leinsdorf, conductor; Hermann Prey, baritone.

A stimulating trio of contrasting selections found the Bostonians (on their last visit here during Mr. Leinsdorf's tenure) giving a rather mixed account of themselves. Edgar Varèse had long anticipated recent trends in music. In his 1953 Déserts he alternated four instrumental sections (without strings) with three of "organized sounds", prepared electronic tapes emanating from two speakers on stage. While electronic music has come a long way since, Mr. Varèse here exploited the field as comprehensively as most latter-day tinkerers. Unlike these, he achieved combinations, contrasts and descriptions with definite emotional charges through imaginative and pointillistically transparent use of the gamut of sounds in both media. Mahler's Wayfarer Songs found in Mr. Prey a most sympathetic protagonist. Despite the handicap of having to grapple with its high tessitura against some overenthusiastic orchestral levels, he projected the hero's suffering with virile, warmly colored and clearly enunciated singing. Meanwhile Mr. Leinsdorf, perhaps still Varèse-oriented, appeared to be striving for harsh and coldly analytical sonorities. The concluding Tchaikovsky Fifth Symphony featured high speeds, sharp brass-percussion accents, some unconvincingly mannered slow themes, and almost embarrassingly cheap treatment of the obvious in the Finale.—Harry Fuchs.

And the press says . . .
"(Prey) fine artist . . . stylish . . . interpretation . . . smoothness of voice, exemplary diction . . . exquisite phrasing . . . the Tchaikovsky Fifth Symphony received a well-planned . . . beautifully rendered performance." — N.Y. Times; 3/20/69; Harold C. Schonberg.

Varese Gets Booed In New York, Too

Edgar Varese's "Deserts," which drew both boos and cheers when Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra performed it here Monday night, produced the same reaction in New York on Wednesday.

Though the work is 15 years old and has been available on a record for nearly a decade, part of the New York audience, though supposedly more sophisticated than its Washington counterpart, seems to have had its troubles with the piece.

According to United Press International, Leinsdorf turned to the crowd and said, "We appreciate your cheers as well as your boos. Men can explore the outer regions of space and don't know what they're going to find. And now men are trying to explore the outer regions of sound."

The Sunday Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
SUN. 358,738
MAR 23 1969

Maestro Cheers The Booing

Special to Buffalo Evening News

NEW YORK, March 20—When boos sounded through Philharmonic Hall after the ultramodern "Deserts" of the late Edgar Varèse, conductor Erich Leinsdorf of the visiting Boston Symphony Orchestra wasn't at all disturbed. The maestro turned to the audience and said:

"We appreciate your cheers as well as your boos. Men can explore the outer regions of space and don't know what they're going to find.

"And now men are trying to explore the outer regions of sound." The Varese "Deserts" was presented in the first Buffalo of the Arts under Lukas Foss a couple of seasons ago, to an appreciative audience and a favorable press.

Buffalo Evening News
D. 284,568 SAT. 299,069
MAR 20 1969

Staten Island Advance
STATEN ISLAND, N. Y.
D. 62,892 SUN. 56,019
MAR 20 1969

CRITIC-AT-LARGE by Byron Belt

Leinsdorf Quiets Boos

Erich Leinsdorf milked the boos which greeted last evening's Boston Symphony Orchestra performance of Edgar Varese's "Deserts" with all the aplomb of a prima donna milking applause.

The boos and the conductor's handling of them constituted one of Leinsdorf's finest moments and a short speech transformed the boos to cheers.

The cause of all the uproar was a 1954 score by the late Edgar Varese, who himself just a few seasons back had bowed to unrelenting booing when Leonard Bernstein conducted "Deserts" in a New York Philharmonic concert devoted to the avant garde.

The piece itself is not all that wild. True, its scoring for winds and percussion plus three putbursts of pre-recorded "organized sound" does still fall a little uneasily upon the conservative ears of subscription audiences, but "Deserts," for all its din and doodles is a remarkably clean-textured and beautifully organized composition.

Varese was one of the first composers to carry 20th century music into new sounds in pre-electronic days, and he was one of the first to work effectively with electronic sounds, which may or may not one day be accepted as music.

* * *

LEINSDORF put the entire situation beautifully when he said, "We appreciate the boos as much as the applause. Men want to explore space to discover they know not what. We think he should explore new worlds of sound too!"

If the audience was really listening, it heard some strong percussive hints of what Varese was later to build upon in the third of the four "Songs of a Wayfarer" of Gustav Mahler which baritone Hermann Prey sang with the orchestra.

Mahler's songs fell upon the ears of the disturbed audience like cool balm. In truth, the balm was probably just a bit too cool, for Prey and Leinsdorf seemed to share a rather aloof conception of Mahler's high powered romanticism.

Since Prey is one of the most elegant and expert of today's lieder singers, it was a joy to hear his aristocratic interpretation, and to revel in the beautiful sounds of the great Boston Symphony.

Maestro Leinsdorf is conducting his final concerts as music director of the Bostonians, and with a repeat of this concert at Philharmonic Hall on Friday, a program in Brooklyn tonight and one at Carnegie Hall on Saturday, a distinguished period in the history of one of America's most magnificent orchestras will conclude.

* * *

There were only cheers for the American debut of young Spanish soprano Montserrat Alavedra on Monday and for the masterful recital by Rudolf Serkin on Tuesday evening.

In lieder of Mozart, Brahms and Wolf and songs by six Spanish composers, Miss Alavedra, who is a pretty as the proverbial picture, revealed a small but exquisite voice placed at the service of remarkable musicianship. With her able pianistic partner, Jean Pierre Faber, Miss Alavedra whetted the appetite for an early return in concert and opera.

Montserrat Alavedra appeared through the good offices of the Carnegie Hall-Jejuesses Musicales, Inc., which provides a most worthy service to young artists and audiences here and abroad.

Youth in fullest flower was manifested by Rudolf Serkin, whose Philharmonic Hall recital found every seat in the house and the entire stage filled. It was a fitting tribute to one of today's few titans.

In music of Mozart, Haydn and Beethoven, Serkin was, as he always has been, supreme. In the Variations and Fugue on a Theme of Bach by Max Reger, whose music Serkin has long championed, the pianist opened up new and astonishing aural vistas of tremendous power.

If Serkin didn't convince his hearers of Reger's genius, he never will—for the performance was absolutely fabulous.

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 348,294 SUN. 406,966
MAR 20 1969

Director changes boos to cheers

By BYRON BELT

Erich Leinsdorf milked the boos which greeted last evening's Boston Symphony Orchestra performance of Edgar Varese's "Deserts" with all of the aplomb of a prima donna milking applause.

The boos and the conductor's handling of them constituted one of Leinsdorf's finest moments, and a short speech changed the boos to cheers.

The cause of all the uproar was a 1954 score by the late composer, who just a few seasons back had bowed to unrelenting booing when Leonard Bernstein conducted "Deserts" in a New York Philharmonic concert devoted to the avant-garde.

Leinsdorf put the entire situation beautifully when he said, "We appreciate the boos as much as the applause. Men want to explore space to discover they know not what. We think we should explore new worlds of sound, too."

Leinsdorf Unfazed By Boos in New York

NEW YORK (UPI). — Conductor Erich Leinsdorf led the Boston Symphony Orchestra through Varese's "Deserts" and drew the usual response—boos.

Leinsdorf, accustomed to similar reactions to the weird modern composition which includes tape recorded sounds, claims the boos mean the audience has become involved with the music.

During the performance at New York's Philharmonic Hall last night, Leinsdorf turned to the crowd and said:

"We appreciate your cheers as well as your boos. Men can explore the outer regions of space and don't know what they're going to find. And now men are trying to explore the outer regions of sound."

PHILADELPHIA DAILY
NEWS
D. 238,837
MAR 20 1969

78.

NEWS OF MUSIC

Leinsdorf Conducts Patricianly in Finale

By LAWRENCE SEARS
Contributing Critic

Boston Symphony Orchestra Erich Leinsdorf, conductor. At Constitution Hall. All-Beethoven Program: Symphony No. 6 in F, Op. 68 (Pastoral); Symphony No. 3 in E-Flat, Op. 55 (Eroica).

Last night Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra treated their capacity Constitution Hall audience to an evening of superlative programming, patrician conducting and indifferent playing.

They purified the air (and their listener's ears) by playing two Beethoven symphonies, the "Pastoral" and the "Eroica." This was quite a change from their Monday program that featured the electronic music of "Deserts" by Edgar Varese, plus the melancholy meanderings of Mendelssohn and Tschaikovsky. The former roused the audience to boos and the latter put critics into a lethargy. Last night we were safe in the conservative haven of tonic-dominant harmony.

Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, No. 6 in F, Op. 68, opened the concert, and Leinsdorf injected a little personality into his glacial baton style.

There were several rubatos, notably at the end of the first movement, just after Beethoven imitates the Nightingale, Quail and the Cuckoo. The Andante made lavish use of the lower strings in their accompaniment to the solos. It was one of the few times we can recall hearing these elaborate figurations at their proper dynamic marking. The composer indicated "piano," but too many conductors read this as "pianissimo," and the details are lost.

Flat horn chords heralded the Summer Storm movement. The magic which Beethoven works with the orchestra helped distract us. Not so much, however, that we failed to appreciate the tight rein which Leinsdorf exerted on the last five measures of the closing movement, delivering the arched string phrases and the horn call to merge precisely with the final chords.

Intermission brought an unusual promenade of unisex outfits which often had us guessing. This was as colorful an audience as you would find at the opening of the opera.

There seemed to be a different Leinsdorf and orchestra in charge of the "Eroica." The mood was olympian, but unpredictable, like a god beserk. The opening chords contained majesty, yet they did not try to stop the world in its orbit. A Funeral March came and went its way, unaccountably fitting easily into the context of the other movements. The Scherzo began dangerously fast. After the Trio, it resumed the headlong plunge.

And so it went, an "Eroica" filled with tremendous possibilities, yet strangely underrehearsed. The enthusiastic audience cried Bravo! but this must be considered in recognition of other performances than this one.

This was the last of the two farewell appearances here by Leinsdorf before his retirement.

There also was a third one on the radio Sunday afternoon, a delayed broadcast by WGMS of the January presentation of the opera "Ariadne auf Naxos, by Richard Strauss. It featured superlative work by a stunning cast, headed by soprano Beverly Sills as Zerbinetta. This served to recall Leinsdorf to one of his earliest loves — opera.

There are rumors of more opera in his future. We would be fortunate, indeed, if the Kennedy Center would bring him back for more symphonic and operatic dates.

The Evening Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 309,245 SUN. 358,738

MAR 19 1969

...g extra-
...as well as playing. In
... at the Library of Congress this ... program will include Satie's "Three Pieces in the Shape of a Pear" and "Carnival at New Orleans" by Milhaud.

Speaking of visiting orchestras, it is great news that Erich Leinsdorf will play "Deserts," by Edgar Varese on the first of his two concerts here for National Symphony subscribers on March 17 and 18. But why is he gypping the second night audience with two Beethoven symphonies? Now there's a pair of novelties for you, and with the Beethoven 200th anniversary staring us in the face next season. Come, come, Mr. Leinsdorf!

An Unusual Setting

The Old Presbyterian Meeting House in Alexandria will be the unusual setting for a concert of chamber music on Friday at 8:30 p.m. The Northern Virginia Fine Arts Association is presenting the University of Maryland Woodwind Quintet with pianist Emerson Meyers. Tickets at the Atheneum, 201 Prince St., Alexandria.

—Paul Hume

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 467,505 SUN. 600,357

MAR 4 1969

MUSIC ARTISTS
NEW YORK, N. Y.
6 TI. A YR. CIR. N. AVAIL.

APR MAY 1969

Philharmonic Hall; March 19, 1969; Boston Symphony Orchestra; Erich Leinsdorf, conductor; Hermann Prey, baritone.

A stimulating trio of contrasting selections found the Bostonians (on their last visit here during Mr. Leinsdorf's tenure) giving a rather mixed account of themselves. Edgar Varèse had long anticipated recent trends in music. In his 1953 Déserts he alternated four instrumental sections (without strings) with three of "organized sounds", prepared electronic tapes emanating from two speakers on stage. While electronic music has come a long way since, Mr. Varèse here exploited the field as comprehensively as most latter-day tinkerers. Unlike these, he achieved combinations, contrasts and descriptions with definite emotional charges through imaginative and pointillistically transparent use of the gamut of sounds in both media. Mahler's Wayfarer Songs found in Mr. Prey a most sympathetic protagonist. Despite the handicap of having to grapple with its high tessitura against some overenthusiastic orchestral levels, he projected the hero's suffering with virile, warmly colored and clearly enunciated singing. Meanwhile Mr. Leinsdorf, perhaps still Varèse-oriented, appeared to be striving for harsh and coldly analytical sonorities. The concluding Tchaikovsky Fifth Symphony featured high speeds, sharp brass-percussion accents, some unconvincingly mannered slow themes, and almost embarrassingly cheap treatment of the obvious in the Finale.—Harry Fuchs.

And the press says . . .
"(Prey) fine artist . . . stylish . . . interpretation . . . smoothness of voice, exemplary diction . . . exquisite phrasing . . . the Tchaikovsky Fifth Symphony received a well-planned . . . beautifully rendered performance." — N.Y. Times; 3/20/69; Harold C. Schonberg.

Varese Gets Booed In New York, Too

Edgar Varese's "Deserts," which drew both boos and cheers when Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra performed it here Monday night, produced the same reaction in New York on Wednesday.

Though the work is 15 years old and has been available on a record for nearly a decade, part of the New York audience, though supposedly more sophisticated than its Washington counterpart, seems to have had its troubles with the piece.

According to United Press International, Leinsdorf turned to the crowd and said, "We appreciate your cheers as well as your boos. Men can explore the outer regions of space and don't know what they're going to find. And now men are trying to explore the outer regions of sound."

The Sunday Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
SUN. 358,738

MAR 23 1969

Maestro Cheers The Booing

Special to Buffalo Evening News

NEW YORK, March 20—When boos sounded through Philharmonic Hall after the ultramodern "Deserts" of the late Edgar Varèse, conductor Erich Leinsdorf of the visiting Boston Symphony Orchestra wasn't at all disturbed. The maestro turned to the audience and said:

"We appreciate your cheers as well as your boos. Men can explore the outer regions of space and don't know what they're going to find.

"And now men are trying to explore the outer regions of sound." The Varese "Deserts" was presented in the first Buffalo of the Arts under Lukas Foss a couple of seasons ago, to an appreciative audience and a favorable press.

Buffalo Evening News
D. 284,568 SAT. 299,069

MAR 20 1969

Staten Island Advance
STATEN ISLAND, N. Y.
D. 62,892 SUN. 56,019

MAR 20 1969

CRITIC-AT-LARGE by Byron Belt

Leinsdorf Quiets Boos

Erich Leinsdorf milked the boos which greeted last evening's Boston Symphony Orchestra performance of Edgar Varese's "Deserts" with all the aplomb of a prima donna milking applause.

The boos and the conductor's handling of them constituted one of Leinsdorf's finest moments and a short speech transformed the boos to cheers.

The cause of all the uproar was a 1954 score by the late Edgar Varese, who himself just a few seasons back had bowed to unrelenting booing when Leonard Bernstein conducted "Deserts" in a New York Philharmonic concert devoted to the avant garde.

The piece itself is not all that wild. True, its scoring for winds and percussion plus three putbursts of pre-recorded "organized sound" does still fall a little uneasily upon the conservative ears of subscription audiences, but "Deserts," for all its din and doodles is a remarkably clean-textured and beautifully organized composition.

Varese was one of the first composers to carry 20th century music into new sounds in pre-electronic days, and he was one of the first to work effectively with electronic sounds, which may or may not one day be accepted as music.

* * *

LEINSDORF put the entire situation beautifully when he said, "We appreciate the boos as much as the applause. Men want to explore space to discover they know not what. We think he should explore new worlds of sound too!"

If the audience was really listening, it heard some strong percussive hints of what Varese was later to build upon in the third of the four "Songs of a Wayfarer" of Gustav Mahler which baritone Hermann Prey sang with the orchestra.

Mahler's songs fell upon the ears of the disturbed audience like cool balm. In truth, the balm was probably just a bit too cool, for Prey and Leinsdorf seemed to share a rather aloof conception of Mahler's high powered romanticism.

Since Prey is one of the most elegant and expert of today's lieder singers, it was a joy to hear his aristocratic interpretation, and to revel in the beautiful sounds of the great Boston Symphony.

Maestro Leinsdorf is conducting his final concerts as music director of the Bostonians, and with a repeat of this concert at Philharmonic Hall on Friday, a program in Brooklyn tonight and one at Carnegie Hall on Saturday, a distinguished period in the history of one of America's most magnificent orchestras will conclude.

* * *

There were only cheers for the American debut of young Spanish soprano Montserrat Alavedra on Monday and for the masterful recital by Rudolf Serkin on Tuesday evening.

In lieder of Mozart, Brahms and Wolf and songs by six Spanish composers, Miss Alavedra, who is a pretty as the proverbial picture, revealed a small but exquisite voice placed at the service of remarkably musicianship. With her able pianistic partner, Jean Pierre Faber, Miss Alavedra whetted the appetite for an early return in concert and opera.

Montserrat Alavedra appeared through the good offices of the Carnegie Hall-Jejuesses Musicales, Inc., which provides a most worthy service to young artists and audiences here and abroad.

Youth in fullest flower was manifested by Rudolf Serkin, whose Philharmonic Hall recital found every seat in the house and the entire stage filled. It was a fitting tribute to one of today's few titans.

In music of Mozart, Haydn and Beethoven, Serkin was, as he always has been, supreme. In the Variations and Fugue on a Theme of Bach by Max Reger, whose music Serkin has long championed, the pianist opened up new and astonishing aural vistas of tremendous power.

If Serkin didn't convince his hearers of Reger's genius, he never will—for the performance was absolutely fabulous.

Director changes boos to cheers

By BYRON BELT

Erich Leinsdorf milked the boos which greeted last evening's Boston Symphony Orchestra performance of Edgar Varese's "Deserts" with all of the aplomb of a prima donna milking applause.

The boos and the conductor's handling of them constituted one of Leinsdorf's finest moments, and a short speech changed the boos to cheers.

The cause of all the uproar was a 1954 score by the late composer, who just a few seasons back had bowed to unrelenting booing when Leonard Bernstein conducted "Deserts" in a New York Philharmonic concert devoted to the avant-garde.

Leinsdorf put the entire situation beautifully when he said, "We appreciate the boos as much as the applause. Men want to explore space to discover they know not what. We think we should explore new worlds of sound, too."

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 348,294 SUN. 406,966

MAR 20 1969

Leinsdorf Unfazed By Boos in New York

NEW YORK (UPI). — Conductor Erich Leinsdorf led the Boston Symphony Orchestra through Varese's "Deserts" and drew the usual response—boos.

Leinsdorf, accustomed to similar reactions to the weird modern composition which includes tape recorded sounds, claims the boos mean the audience has become involved with the music.

During the performance at New York's Philharmonic Hall last night, Leinsdorf turned to the crowd and said:

"We appreciate your cheers as well as your boos. Men can explore the outer regions of space and don't know what they're going to find. And now men are trying to explore the outer regions of sound."

PHILADELPHIA DAILY
NEWS
D. 238,837

MAR 20 1969

79.

Music

Bostonians' Audience Boos Varese 'Deserts'

By HAROLD C. SCHONBERG

THERE was booing in Philharmonic Hall Wednesday night, and from the sedate Boston Symphony audience yet. The occasion was the conclusion of Edgard Varese's "Déserts." During the performance there was considerable laughter and talking. At the end there was a volley of boos. There were also cheers from sveral young people in the audience, who rose from their seats and let Erich Leinsdorf know that somebody was on his side.

Mr. Leinsdorf cocked his head and listened to the booing. Then he held up his hand. There was silence.

"We are just as thankful for the boos as for the applause," he said. He paused. "If man wants to explore space—we don't know for what purpose—he wants to explore sound, too." There was appreciative laughter and applause. But it cannot be said that "Déserts" was a success. The majority of the audience reacted to it as though coming into contact with original sin for the first time.

•

Varèse composed "Déserts" in 1954, and it is considered one of his most important scores. For years he had been pointing toward it. In such pieces as his famous "Ionization" he had, in effect, composed electronic music before there was any such thing as electronic music. Eventually the tape process was developed, and Varèse took advantage of it. Using a wind and percussion orchestra, he alternated the live sounds with electronic ones.

The tapes that Varèse put together for "Déserts" represent an early phase in the development of the medium. Composers working in electronic music in the early nineteen-fifties had a limited amount of experience and were apt to fall back on much the same vocabulary of sound. Varèse, like all the others, used a mixture of pitched and unpitched sounds, with the usual whooshes and static-like noises. There is more interest in the orchestral writing, in which a post-serial kind of writing can be heard, together with Varèse's preoccupation with explosive sonorities and layers of sounds.

•

The remainder of the program was more conventional. It consisted of Mahler's "Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen" and the Tchaikovsky Fifth Symphony. Hermann Prey was the baritone soloist, and this fine artist served up his usual stylish kind of interpretation. There were smoothness of voice, exemplary diction, exquisite phrasing and a dignified approach to Mahler's sentimental world. This is the cycle that contains so many of the tunes that were to find their way into Mahler's First Symphony.

The Tchaikovsky Fifth received a well-planned and beautifully rendered performance. How those Boston strings can sing out! Mr. Leinsdorf had no unconventional ideas about the music, although the way he slowed the lyric subject of the first movement was something entirely his own. It worked, however. Elsewhere there was the characteristic Leinsdorf emphasis on clarity, the expert balances and the unflagging rhythm. The conductor seems to like this score, and he himself seemed to enter into it and make himself at home, something that cannot be said of his work in other phases of the repertory.

Carnegie Bills

The Vienna Choir boys will give their second and last concert of the season at 3 p.m. today at Carnegie Hall. Soviet pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy will make his final New York appearance of the season at 8:30 p.m. tomorrow at Carnegie Hall. Both concerts are being presented by S. Hurok. . . . Erich Leinsdorf will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in an all-Beethoven program at Carnegie Hall at 8:30 p.m., Saturday.

SUNDAY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
SUN. 3,099,658

MAR 16 1969

Boston Symphony Bows Out

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will conclude the Carnegie Hall Series with an All-Beethoven Concert tomorrow, at 8:30 P.M.

The program consists of the Symphony No. 6 in F Major ("Pastoral") and the Symphony No. 3 in E-flat, Opus 55 ("Eroica"). The concert is almost completely sold out. Some few seats, if available, at Carnegie Hall box office.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EAST SIDE NEWS
W. CIRC. N. AVAIL.

MAR 21 1969

New York Post
D. 628,146 SAT. 354,497

MAR 20 1969

Leinsdorf Plays Last Concert as Boston Leader

Bob Greene
Erich Leinsdorf

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Carnegie Hall on Saturday night marked Erich Leinsdorf's final New York City appearance in his official capacity as the orchestra's principal conductor and music director. At the end of this summer's Tanglewood season, Mr. Leinsdorf will relinquish his post to William Steinberg to concentrate on extensive freelance concert and opera activities in this country, Europe and South America.

So the occasion was very much of an "Auf Wiedershn" affair. Mr. Leinsdorf is bound to be a frequent contributor to New York's musical life in the coming years—he will, in fact, appear here as the Boston orchestra's guest conductor next December.

Whatever historians will have to say about Mr. Leinsdorf's six-year tenure, one fact is surely incontestable: He has built the Boston Symphony into a trim, athletic precision instrument well schooled in the classic German repertory. It was therefore wholly appropriate that Mr. Leinsdorf's farewell program Saturday night consisted simply of two symphonies by Beethoven, the "Pastoral" and the "Eroica."

The performances were precisely what one has come to expect from the Boston Symphony: lean instrumental tone, admirable textural clarity, sensible tempos, letter-perfect execution. Both scores were presented for inspection with complete impersonality; the character of the music flowed purely from Beethoven's notes, with the conductor acting only as the humble intermediary.

Whether one warms to this somewhat noninterpretational approach is very much a matter of personal taste. For all its perfection of execution, the "Pastoral" emerged as a rather chilly, graceless and unsmiling statement. In the "Eroica," on the other hand, Mr. Leinsdorf's objectivity was not only less damaging, but actually resulted in a performance overwhelming for its austere beauty and dramatic power.

PETER G. DAVIS.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 810,495 SUN. 1,494,704

MAR 24 1969

Words and Music

By Harriett Johnson

Leinsdorf Opens Final Boston Week

Erich Leinsdorf began his final Philharmonic Hall appearances last night as music director of the Boston Symphony and the event was notable for the speech he made if not for his interpretations of the works performed.

He opened the program, which will be repeated tomorrow night, with "Deserts" by Edgar Varese, French-born avant-garde pioneer who died in 1965. Varese's widow was in the audience.

For many ears, the brassy, percussive short snorts and long agonies of this composer make most difficult listening, and "Deserts" went on for 25 minutes. At his mildest, Varese is not easy but when he is expressing deserts of earth, of sea, of outer space and particularly "the deserts in the mind of man," as in this music, the purpose accentuates the idiom.

As James Lyons' program notes described it, "Deserts stands beyond events. It is suffering, horror, desolation themselves."

Uses Amplified Tapes

The composition is scored for brass, percussion and electronically organized tapes. Thus the vibrations sent forth last night were from the complex instrumental stentorian ensemble plus tapes transmitted through two amplifiers placed at stage left and right. The general impression was that of listening to grandiose sound effects for a doomed invasion of a planet far gloomier and colder than Mars. Pluto or Jupiter would do.

At the work's conclusion there was a volume of boos as well as mild applause. Eventually Leinsdorf raised his hand for silence and said: "We are just as grateful for the boos as for the applause. If man wants to explore [illegible] can also explore sound."

He followed with a somewhat indifferent performance of Mahler's beautiful song cycle, "Songs of a Wayfarer," sung in German baritone Hermann Prey. Neither Prey nor the conductor plumbed deeply into the music but the result, nonetheless, by contrast from the Varese, thrilled the audience and the comment from the couple behind me appeared to be typical: "Wasn't that beautiful?"

Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5 in E Minor closed the program in an interpretation that fussed over detail more than it explored the big line and Slavic impact of the music. Leinsdorf, however, whipped up the orchestra to some tingling climaxes, and the audience burst into applause before the final chords as if to say, "This really is it." The ovation continued as I left the hall.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 840,495 SUN. 1,494,704

MAR 20 1969

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 840,495 SUN. 1,494,704

MAR 21 1969

Review of repeat concert on p. 80

The Houston Post
D. 274,248 SUN. 304,238

MAR 21 1969

Debbie Bryant, Miss America of 1966, will be the TV hostess for the Miss America Pageant in Atlantic City, NJ, next September. Bert Parks will be master of ceremonies for the 14th year . . . Mrs Dwight D. Eisenhower, saying she has lost 15 pounds during the long vigil by her husband's hospital bedside in Washington, reports the former President "has some good days and some bad days." He's being treated after a series of heart attacks, plus intestinal surgery and pneumonia. She has spent most of 10 months in a suite near her husband . . . Former Secretary of State Dean Rusk smiled at co-ed pickets at Mills College in Oakland, Calif, but declined to accept their anti-war leaflets. Rusk appeared at a student-faculty question-and-answer meeting . . . Conductor Erich Leinsdorf led the Boston Symphony Orchestra through Varese's "Deserts" at New York's Philharmonic Hall and drew the usual response—boos. Leinsdorf, accustomed to similar reactions to the weird modern composition which includes tape-recorded sounds, says the boos mean the audience has become involved with the music . . .

NEW YORK POST
Thursday, March 20, 1969

47

Music and Dance Tonight

Metropolitan Opera: "Adriana Lecouvreur," with Renata Tebaldi, Regina Resnik, Placido Domingo, Anselmo Colzani, Morley Meredith; Fausto Cleva conducting; Metropolitan Opera House, 8.

New York City Opera: "Rigoletto" premiere, new production; with Patricia Brooks, Louis Quilico, Michele Molese, Malcolm Smith, William Ledbetter; Gabor Otvos conducting (debut); directed by Frank Corsaro, sets by Lloyd Evans, costumes by Jose Varona; N.Y. State Theater, 7:45.

City Center Joffrey Ballet: Scotch Symphony," "Opus 65." "Nightwings," "William Tell Variations"; N.Y. City Center, 8:30.

Julliard Dance Ensemble; Julliard Concert Hall, 130 Claremont Av., 8:15.

New York Philharmonic: Pierre Boulez conducting; Malcolm Frager, soloist in Bartok's "Concerto No. 1 for Piano and Orchestra"; Philharmonic Hall, 8:30. Program repeated tomorrow at 2.

Moscow State Symphony: Evgeni Svetlanov conducting; Larisa Avdeyeva, mezzo-soprano; Carnegie Hall, 8:

Boston Symphony Orchestra: Erich Leinsdorf conducting; Lilian Kallir, soloist in Mendelssohn's "Piano Concerto No. 1 in G minor"; Brooklyn Academy of Music, 8:30

NE

Carnegie Hall

Beethoven Concert

By ALAN BRANIGAN
Evening News Music Critic

NEW YORK — An all Beethoven concert, which used to be common occurence, has achieved the status of a rarity in these days of peculiar programming. That it is still a good idea was made plain Saturday night at Carnegie Hall. Only two Beethoven works, both symphonies, No. 3 and No. 6, were on the list. A standing-room-only audience turned out to hear them, and responded with evident pleasure to the music of the greatest symphonist.

Beyond a doubt there were other factors in the evening that added to the public interest. The performing group was the Boston Symphony and the concert marked the final appearance in the orchestra's Carnegie series of the departing conductor, Erich Leinsdorf. And so, in a way, it was a salute to the artists as well as to the material on hand.

Somewhat surprisingly, in the Symphony No. 6, the "Pastorale," the results were not quite as laudable as one might have expected. The Boston should be able to play Beethoven's famous hymn to nature with utter perfection, and often has done, but this is not what happened. Various choirs of the orchestra seemed to be out of step with others, the accompaniments to themes did not mesh with the subjects on hand and it seemed that an unpleasant, coarse wind was blowing across the Viennese countryside where Beethoven heard the quail, the cuckoo and the nightingale and saw the peasants dancing.

The jagged playing ceased after the first two movements and a new spirit of accuracy set in, leading up to a finale of splendid sound and considerable drama, as the countryside was drenched in a summer storm.

Rapid March

Following an unusually lengthy intermission, Leinsdorf and his men — and a few women who have joined up — trooped back onto the stage and gave one of the most astonishing and beautiful performances of the Symphony No. 3 that one could ever wish to hear. One might have quarreled with parts of the interpretation — the slow movement seemed quite fast for a funeral march — but surely this is a matter of taste.

But even at the unusually hot pace, the movement worked. The moods of tragedy were there, in Beethoven's agonized chords on the woodwinds, and the hushed solemnity of the somber main theme as well as in the cheerful major melodies that were present to assuage all grief. The scherzo ticked along like a well-oiled clock, the trio's horns rollicked in amusing fashion and the finale's playful moods were captured to perfection. Best of all was the headlong opening movement of the "Eroica," which somehow imparted a truly Napoleonic flavor.

Part of the perfection was certainly the flawless way in which the Boston players established the various fugal passages. Each voice was heard in exactly the right proportion to the whole, even when four themes were going at once, and the intensity and warm bright tone marked the performance as something quite special.

Leinsdorf's presided over the evening with something approaching majesty in every gesture. One of the visual pleasures of the musical scene resides in watching this maestro as he signals an entrance, sustains a note on the trumpets, cuts off a fermata with a casual wave and, at the end, clutches the final chord to his bosom, as if he didn't want to let it go. The Boston has been fortunate to have him as a guide and mentor.

N. Y. EAST SIDE NEWS
Friday, March 21, 1969

Boston Symphony Bows Out

NE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will conclude the Carnegie Hall Series with an All-Beethoven Concert tomorrow, at 8:30 P.M.

The program consists of the Symphony No. 6 in F Major ("Pastoral") and the Symphony No. 3 in E-flat, Opus 55 ("Eroica"). The concert is almost completely sold out. Some few seats, if available, at Carnegie Hall box office.

Evening News
NEWARK, N. J.
D. 278,235 SUN. 423,157

MAR 24 1969

90.

Music In Review

Boston Symphony Ends Concert Series Pleasingly

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concluded its Providence series of concerts with a pleasingly varied program Thursday evening in Veterans Memorial Auditorium.

Charles Wilson conducted the orchestra in a splendid interpretation of Beethoven's heroic "Overture to 'Egmont'," and James Browning, one of America's great, young pianists, thrilled his audience with a brilliant performance of Prokofiev's "Piano Concerto No. 5 in F."

Browning made this sparkling work a dazzling opus with his youthful zest, and his crisp staccato keyboard manners with Prokofiev's exciting harmonics and dynamics showed him to be a performer who loves what he plays.

Prokofiev is difficult to take for the traditionalist and Browning is on the youthful side of the generation gap. He has been conditioned by his contemporaries to like the non-traditional and to consider it trite. However, his young freshness and self assurance, his vigor and enthusiasm, compels his audience to love him and whatever he chooses to play. Hewas cheered for last night's performance.

All critics disagree on what the composer intended in his compositions, and there will be a hundred opinions. The composer may explain publicly that he is depicting in music the loves, joys, terrors, angers and oppressions of his time. Yet, out of the host of opinions for any given work, one critic will say that he is portraying a summer day in a shaded glen near a whispering brook.

So, a critic's appraisal comes from the visions or memories that the music evokes. Sometimes I feel that Prokofiev's sequences sound like an artist trying to imitate a child, and the rest of the time like a child trying to imitate an artist. But Browning's performance, backed by this great orchestra under the guiding hand of Maestro Wilson, made the grandeur of Prokofiev's 5th sharply discernible.

The critics have disagreed for years on what Sibelius was trying to say even though Sibelius said that his "Symphony No. 2 in D-Major" had no literary significance. The magnificent music he wrote was evident in the concluding work of this program, and the Boston Spmphony Orchestra proved last night that his Symphony No. 2 is a masterpiece as musically grand as Beethoven's beloved Fifth.

C.H.L.

TIMES (e)
PAWTUCKET-
CENTRAL FALLS, R. I.
CIRC. 38,800
APR 11 1969
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Excels —Prey in Excellent Form

NEW YORK — The proficiency of the Boston Symphony was put to the test at Philharmonic Hall on March 21 and the superb aggregation came through with flying colors under the expert baton of Erich Leinsdorf. The program, which featured Mahler's "Songs of a Wayfarer" with baritone Hermann Prey and Tchaikovsky's "Symphony No. 5," opened with Varese's "Deserts," which still is a difficult work for musicians and audience.

The orchestra, which records for RCA, was in fine form as it accompanied Prey and in the Tchaikovsky. The latter, which the Boston has recorded for Red Seal, was yet another example of Leinsdorf getting the most out of a warhorse. The second movement was especially sparkling.

Prey's interpretation of the Mahler was exceptional and the distinguished baritone was in excellent voice. Both Angel and London cited him in program ads. His current release for the former is the complete "St. Matthew Passion" of Bach, while he has a new song recital disk for London. Prey also also recorded for Deutsche Grammophon, Electrola, Odeon Seraphim and Vox.

The Varese piece, which drew boos from the March 19 audience fared better in the program's repeat on March 21. Using tape, brasses, woodwinds and varied percussion, the avant-garde piece stretched the audience's receptiveness, but maintained its interest. Even occassional laughter did not break the piece's spell. "Deserts," has been recorded on Columbia under Robert Craft.

The concert concluded the Boston's 1968-1969 Philharmonic Hall series. Next season, William Steinberg, who succeeds Leinsdorf as music director, will conduct two of the five concerts here. The others will be conducted by Leinsdorf, Claudio Abbado, and Colin Davis. Soloists will include pianists Alexis Weisenberg, violinist Joseph Silverstein and cellist Jules Eskin. FRED KIRBY

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000
APR 5 1969

Music Last Night

Boston Symphony Heard In 84th Season's Finale

By RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played the final concert of its 84th season last evening at Veterans Memorial Auditorium. Charles Wilson, the assistant conductor of the orchestra, had the honor of conducting the program which was their 400th Providence concert. The usual enthusiastic audience approved both the choices and the interpretations. The one regret seemed to be that the series is over for this year.

John Browning was soloist in Prokofiev's Piano Concerto No.5 in F,Op.55. The concert opened with Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont" and closed with the Sibelius Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op.43.

Charles Wilson has a decisive approach to his task and the vigorous manner with which he delineates the score before him shows visually what one may expect to hear. His "Egmont" interpretation was clear and traditional and the orchestra responded with its usual virtuosity.

The Prokoiev concerto was the high point. There was perfect understanding between soloist and conductor and the amazing changes of rhythm in the difficult work were accompanied with perfect smoothness. The accompaniment was as hope for. John Browning is one of the rare pianists of the percussive school of playing who can also settle in to the melodic portions of a work and make them a beautiful song. There were only a few sections in the Prokoviev but they were real gems. His technique is extraordinary and there was a sharp point to the tones of the rhythmic patterns of the score which brought them to the listeners with a telling effect.

It was great fun to hear the finality of the endings of each of the four brilliant movements. There is no question about the business of closing out a movement in a Prokoviev work. When he has finished, he stops. The orchestra and soloist followed his idea with a flourish. This was a brilliant performance.

The Sibelius rolled along with all of its familiar thematic material set forth deliberately and in some sections rather too slowly to hold the interest. Yet this is a giant of a score and it was good to hear it once more. None of its cool Scandinavian atmosphere, however, penetrated the auditorium which was far too warm for April. There actually was considerable discomfort from the heat. It made one wish for the open air shed at Tanglewood and the coolness of a Berkshire evening.

JOURNAL (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
CIRC. 66,100
APR 11 1969
New England Newsclip

ENSEMBLES OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Six concerts in the 1968-1969 series at Jordan Hall:

November 4	Boston Musica Antiqua
RAMEAU	V Concert
TELEMANN	Quartet in G minor
VIVALDI	Sonata no. 1
TELEMANN	Trio in C minor
LOEILLET	Sonata à trois
TELEMANN	Quartet in G
January 8	Boston Symphony String Trio with Gilbert Kalish piano
SCHUMANN	Piano quartet in E flat op. 47
EPSTEIN	String trio (1964)
BEETHOVEN	Piano trio in D op. 70 no. 1
January 27	The Violone Ensemble
MOZART	Quartet in B flat K. 458 'The Hunt'
SKORZENY	Second suite (1954)
DVOŘÁK	Quintet in G op. 77
April 2	The Boston String Sinfonietta with James Pappoutsakis flute
BOYCE	Symphony no. 1 in B flat
MOZART	Divertimento in F K. 138
C.P.E. BACH	Concerto in C minor for flute and strings
ROUSSEL	Sinfonietta for strings op. 52
MEKEEL	String figures disentangled by a flute first performance
HANDEL	Concerto grosso in A minor op. 6 no. 4
April 14	Boston Symphony Chamber Players with Gilbert Kalish piano
BEETHOVEN	Trio in G for flute, bassoon and piano (1787)
LOEFFLER	Two rhapsodies for oboe, viola and piano
DIEMENTE	Quartet for flute, clarinet, vibraphone and bass
SCHOENBERG	String trio op. 45
BEETHOVEN	String trio in G op. 9
May 7	The Boston Symphony Wind Quintet with Gilbert Kalish piano Armando Ghitalla trumpet William Gibson trombone
ROSSINI	First quartet (1808) for flute, clarinet, bassoon and horn
BLACHER	Trio for trumpet, trombone and piano op. 31
FINE	Partita for wind quintet (1948)
THUILLE	Sextet op. 6

80.

Music In Review

Boston Symphony Ends Concert Series Pleasingly

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concluded its Providence series of concerts with a pleasingly varied program Thursday evening in Veterans Memorial Auditorium.

Charles Wilson conducted the orchestra in a splendid interpretation of Beethoven's heroic "Overture to 'Egmont'," and James Browning, one of America's great, young pianists, thrilled his audience with a brilliant performance of Prokofiev's "Piano Concerto No. 5 in F."

Browning made this sparkling work a dazzling opus with his youthful zest, and his crisp staccato keyboard manners with Prokofiev's exciting harmonics and dynamics showed him to be a performer who loves what he plays.

Prokofiev is difficult to take for the traditionalist and Browning is on the youthful side of the generation gap. He has been conditioned by his contemporaries to like the non-traditional and to consider it trite. However, his young freshness and self assurance, his vigor and enthusiasm, compels his audience to love him and whatever he chooses to play. Hewas cheered for last night's performance.

All critics disagree on what the composer intended in his compositions, and there will be a hundred opinions. The composer may explain publicly that he is depicting in music the loves, joys, terrors, angers and oppressions of his time. Yet, out of the host of opinions for any given work, one critic will say that he is portraying a summer day in a shaded glen near a whispering brook.

So, a critic's appraisal comes from the visions or memories that the music evokes. Sometimes I feel that Prokofiev's sequences sound like an artist trying to imitate a child, and the rest of the time like a child trying to imitate an artist. But Browning's performance, backed by this great orchestra under the guiding hand of Maestro Wilson, made the grandeur of Prokofiev's 5th sharply discernible.

The critics have disagreed for years on what Sibelius was trying to say even though Sibelius said that his "Symphony No. 2 in D-Major" had no literary significance. The magnificent music he wrote was evident in the concluding work of this program, and the Boston Spmphony Orchestra proved last night that his Symphony No. 2 is a masterpiece as musically grand as Beethoven's beloved Fifth.

C.H.L.

TIMES (e)
PAWTUCKET-
CENTRAL FALLS, R. I.
CIRC. 38,800

APR 11 1969

New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Excels —Prey in Excellent Form

NEW YORK — The proficiency of the Boston Symphony was put to the test at Philharmonic Hall on March 21 and the superb aggregation came through with flying colors under the expert baton of Erich Leinsdorf. The program, which featured Mahler's "Songs of a Wayfarer" with baritone Hermann Prey and Tchaikovsky's "Symphony No. 5," opened with Varese's "Deserts," which still is a difficult work for musicians and audience.

The orchestra, which records for RCA, was in fine form as it accompanied Prey and in the Tchaikovsky. The latter, which the Boston has recorded for Red Seal, was yet another example of Leinsdorf getting the most out of a warhorse. The second movement was especially sparkling.

Prey's interpretation of the Mahler was exceptional and the distinguished baritone was in excellent voice. Both Angel and London cited him in program ads. His current release for the former is the complete "St. Matthew Passion" of Bach, while he has a new song recital disk for London. Prey also also recorded for Deutsche Grammophon, Electrola, Odeon Seraphim and Vox.

The Varese piece, which drew boos from the March 19 audience fared better in the program's repeat on March 21. Using tape, brasses, woodwinds and varied percussion, the avant-garde piece stretched the audience's receptiveness, but maintained its interest. Even occassional laughter did not break the piece's spell. "Deserts," has been recorded on Columbia under Robert Craft.

The concert concluded the Boston's 1968-1969 Philharmonic Hall series. Next season, William Steinberg, who succeeds Leinsdorf as music director, will conduct two of the five concerts here. The others will be conducted by Leinsdorf, Claudio Abbado, and Colin Davis. Soloists will include pianists Alexis Weisenberg, violinist Joseph Silverstein and cellist Jules Eskin. FRED KIRBY

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W 21 40

APR 5 1969

Music Last Night

Boston Symphony Heard In 84th Season's Finale

By RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played the final concert of its 84th season last evening at Veterans Memorial Auditorium. Charles Wilson, the assistant conductor of the orchestra, had the honor of conducting the program which was their 400th Providence concert. The usual enthusiastic audience approved both the choices and the interpretations. The one regret seemed to be that the series is over for this year.

John Browning was soloist in Prokofiev's Piano Concerto No.5 in F,Op.55. The concert opened with Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont" and closed with the Sibelius Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op.43.

Charles Wilson has a decisive approach to his task and the vigorous manner with which he delineates the score before him shows visually what one may expect to hear. His "Egmont" interpretation was clear and traditional and the orchestra responded with its usual virtuosity.

The Prokoiev concerto was the high point. There was perfect understanding between soloist and conductor and the amazing changes of rhythm in the difficult work were accompanied with perfect smoothness. The accompaniment was as hope for. John Browning is one of the rare pianists of the percussive school of playing who can also settle in to the melodic portions of a work and make them a beautiful song. There were only a few sections in the Prokoviev but they were real gems. His technique is extraordinary and there was a sharp point to the tones of the rhythmic patterns of the score which brought them to the listeners with a telling effect.

It was great fun to hear the finality of the endings of each of the four brilliant movements. There is no question about the business of closing out a movement in a Prokoviev work. When he has finished, he stops. The orchestra and soloist followed his idea with a flourish. This was a brilliant performance.

The Sibelius rolled along with all of its familiar thematic material set forth deliberately and in some sections rather too slowly to hold the interest. Yet this is a giant of a score and it was good to hear it once more. None of its cool Scandinavian atmosphere, however, penetrated the auditorium which was far too warm for April. There actually was considerable discomfort from the heat. It made one wish for the open air shed at Tanglewood and the coolness of a Berkshire evening.

JOURNAL (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
CIRC. 66,100

APR 11 1969

New England Newsclip

ENSEMBLES OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Six concerts in the 1968-1969 series at Jordan Hall:

November 4	Boston Musica Antiqua
RAMEAU	V Concert
TELEMANN	Quartet in G minor
VIVALDI	Sonata no. 1
TELEMANN	Trio in C minor
LOEILLET	Sonata à trois
TELEMANN	Quartet in G
January 8	Boston Symphony String Trio with Gilbert Kalish piano
SCHUMANN	Piano quartet in E flat op. 47
EPSTEIN	String trio (1964)
BEETHOVEN	Piano trio in D op. 70 no. 1
January 27	The Violone Ensemble
MOZART	Quartet in B flat K. 458 'The Hunt'
SKORZENY	Second suite (1954)
DVOŘÁK	Quintet in G op. 77
April 2	The Boston String Sinfonietta with James Pappoutsakis flute
BOYCE	Symphony no. 1 in B flat
MOZART	Divertimento in F K. 138
C.P.E. BACH	Concerto in C minor for flute and strings
ROUSSEL	Sinfonietta for strings op. 52
MEKEEL	String figures disentangled by a flute first performance
HANDEL	Concerto grosso in A minor op. 6 no. 4
April 14	Boston Symphony Chamber Players with Gilbert Kalish piano
BEETHOVEN	Trio in G for flute, bassoon and piano (1787)
LOEFFLER	Two rhapsodies for oboe, viola and piano
DIEMENTE	Quartet for flute, clarinet, vibraphone and bass
SCHOENBERG	String trio op. 45
BEETHOVEN	String trio in G op. 9
May 7	The Boston Symphony Wind Quintet with Gilbert Kalish piano, Armando Ghitalla trumpet, William Gibson trombone
ROSSINI	First quartet (1808) for flute, clarinet, bassoon and horn
BLACHER	Trio for trumpet, trombone and piano op. 31
FINE	Partita for wind quintet (1948)
THUILLE	Sextet op. 6

B. S. O. CHAMBER CONCERTS

Will Offer Concert

This Violone Ensemble of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, from left to right, Joseph Hearne, bass; Max Hobart, violin; Earl Hedberg, viola; Alfred Schneider, violin; and Robert Ripley, cello, will present a concert of chamber music Monday, Sept. 30, at 3 p.m. in the Mount Wachusett College library. This program, open to the public at no charge, is the second in the President's Hour series sponsored to promote art and culture among the students and public.

NEWS (e)
GARDNER, MASS.
CIRC. 7,893

SEP 27 1968 New England Newsclip

Hub Symphony To Give Concert At Mt. Wachusett

Five members of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, billed as the Violone Ensemble, will present a concert of chamber music Monday, at 3:00 p.m. in the Mount Wachusett Community College library, according to Edward J. Hall, Jr., chairman of The President's Hour Committee.

The concert is the second Hour program of the current school year to promote culture and the arts among students, faculty and the general public in the North Worcester County community.

The string quintet will perform selections by such great composers as Mozart, Skorzeny, Rossini and Dvorak which were so enthusiastically received at the Berkshire Festival in Tanglewood this summer.

The ensemble is composed of Max Hobert, violin; Alfred Schneider, violin; Earl Hedberg viola; Robert Ripley, cello; and Joseph Hearne, bass.

The following musical selections will be offered:

From Mozart: String Quartet in B flat Major K. 458; Allegro vivace assai; Menuetto moderato, Adagio; Allegro assai.

From Skorzeny: Second suite (1954) for violin, viola and double bass; Pradudium; Intermezzo canonico; Lied, Kehraus.

From Rossini: Sonata No. 6 in D major for strings; Allegro spiritoso; Andante assai, Tempesta allegro.

From Dvorak: Quintet in G major opus 77; Allegro con fuoco; Scherzo allegro vivace; Poco andante, Allegro assai.

The concert is free to students and the public.

SENTINEL (e)
FITCHBURG, MASS.
CIRC. 20,496

SEP 27 1968 New England Newsclip

trumpets, ... Ingraham, French horn, and Thompson Hanks, tuba.

Memorial Concert

The annual Thomas Hovey Gage Memorial Concert will be given on April 13 by the Boston Symphony String Trio. All are principals with the Boston Symphony.

Joseph Silverstein was appointed concertmaster in 1962; Burton Fine became first violist in 1964, and Jules Eskin, first cellist in 1964.

All are graduates of the Curtis Institute at Philadelphia and faculty member of the Berkshire Music Center, Tangelwood.

One couldn't ask for a better balanced series — music for strings, woodwinds, brasses, chorus, two pianos, and jazz.

Following the example of the Boston Symphony, the Cleveland Orchestra has formed a chamber ensemble which will make its debut on Sept. 15. It has 20 musicians from the parent orchestra and will be conducted by concertmaster Rafael Druian.

Gunther Schuller, president of the New England Conservatory, visited the conservatory's summer school at Castle Hill, Ipswich two weeks ago.

... the

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 107,550

SEP 1 1968 New England Newsclip

Pequot Concerts Feature Boston Trio Next Sunday

FAIRFIELD — The Boston Symphony String trio will be featured in the opening concert of the Pequot library association's three program fall series, it was announced yesterday.

The Boston trio will perform Oct. 13 at 4 p.m. in the Pequot avenue auditorium.

An ensemble of principal players of the Boston Symphony orchestra, the trio features Joseph Silverstein, violinist; Burton Fine, violist, and Jules Eskin, cellist.

They will play Schubert's "String Trio in B flat Major," Dohnanyi's "Serenade in C major, opus 10," and the "String Trio in G major, opus 9" by Beethoven.

Concertmaster of the Boston symphony, Joseph Silverstein was appointed to that post in 1962. He has played 19 concertos with the symphony and the Boston Pops orchestra since his appointment. He records frequently with the Boston Symphony Chamber Players and also is featured in Bartok and Stravinsky concertos recorded by the full symphony.

Former Research Chemist

Burton Fine came to the Boston Symphony in 1963 as a second violinist and was appointed Principal Viola the following year. Previously he was for nine years a research chemist with the National Aeronautics and Space administration in Cleveland, and was active there in leading chamber groups.

Jules Eskin became Principal Cellist in 1964 when he joined the Boston symphony after several seasons in that chair with the Cleveland orchestra. He has appeared in recital throughout this country and Europe and also played several seasons in Puerto Rico with Pablo Casals and at Marlboro with Rudolf Serkin.

Each of the String Trio musicians studied at the Curtis institute. All are now on the faculty of the Berkshire Music center.

D. Frederic DeHaven, library music director, with Mrs. Lawrence J. Hughes and Mrs. Davis A. Sill, co-chairmen of the Pequot Concerts committee, are in charge of arrangements for the three programs which comprise the library's 16th annual musical series.

Programs to follow are performances by the Venetian Brass ensemble of New York, Nov. 1, and by the Trio Flauto Dolce, Jan. 24.

Concert Committee

Area residents, serving on the concerts committee include Mrs E. Dean Edmonds, Mrs. Richard Hall, Mrs. Morehead Patterson, Mrs. H. Boone Porter, Mrs. Samuel G. Waugh, and Frederick R. Lack, all of Southport; Mrs. Charles D. Cox, Mrs. Radley Daly, Mrs. Hubert T. Mandeville, Mrs. Henry Rudkin, and Mrs. Harry Shaw, of Greenfield Hill; Mrs. Herbert Cohen, Mrs. Winnifred Merrifield, Mrs. Sanford J. Perlis, Mrs. John Senior, Jr., and Mrs. George Silk of Westport and Green Farms; Mrs. Roy Witmer of Bridgeport; and Manson Welch of Newtown.

Fairfield County music organizations as well as school music departments are cooperating to insure the widest possible participation in the series by serious young local musicians, the chairmen indicated.

A limited number of general student tickets also will be available at reduced prices. Tickets are being distributed through committee members and also may be obtained or reserved through the Pequot library.

SUNDAY POST
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
CIRC. 82,450

OCT 6 1968 New England Newsclip

POST (e)
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
CIRC. 81,900

OCT 14 1968 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Trio To Open Concert Series

WATERTOWN — The annual membership drive of the Watertown Concert Association is currently under way for the 1968-69 concert series which opens on Oct. 21 at 8:30 p.m. in Bingham Auditorium of Taft School with the appearance of The Boston Symphony String Trio.

The membership drive is being conducted under the chairmanship of Mrs. John Atwood and Mrs. John Ferguson, and captains for the Watertown phase of the drive are Mrs. Eldridge Camp and Mrs. Harold Crepon.

Adult membership for the 1968-69 series is available for $8, and student series membership is available for $5.

The association has announced that, due to the generosity of Taft School, the series this year will include five concerts, or two concerts in addition to the regular three offered in previous season, with the additional two concerts offered in collaboration with the Alfred E. Hart Series of The Taft School, and offered free of charge.

The first concert of the 1968-69 series is scheduled for Oct. 21, and will feature the appearance of The Boston Symphony String Trio with Joseph Silverstein, violinist, Burton Fine, on viola, and Jules Eskin, cello. The three are principal players of the violin, viola, and cello sections of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and will perform a program of selections by Schubert, Dohnanyi, and Beethoven.

The second concert, one of the Alfred E. Hart Series, will feature the appearance of The Lyric Winds, featuring Susan Alder on flute, Marsha Heller, oboe, and Peter Simmons on bassoon. This concert is scheduled for Nov. 25.

The third concert will be held on Feb. 3, and will feature Nina Dova, soprano-guitarist, who previously performed locally in the association's 1966 series.

The fourth concert, scheduled for March 3, will feature William Matthews, and will be the second concert of the Alfred E. Hart Series. Matthews is a classical guitarist, who has delighted audiences throughout the east and mid-western states since his successful performances on television.

The fifth and final concert of the series will be held on May 5.

Headliners are Patricia and William Medley, duo-pianists, described as one of the outstanding duo-piano teams in the nation today.

All concerts are held at 8:30 p.m.

AMERICAN (e)
WATERBURY, CONN.
CIRC. 41,850

OCT 3 1968 New England Newsclip

Polish Shown In Boston Symphony Trio's Concert

From the "home of the bean and the cod" to Southport's Pequot library yesterday came yet another formidable ensemble devoted to the furtherance of the chamber music literature, the Boston Symphony String Trio.

Comprised of Joseph Silverstein, Boston Symphony concert master, Burton Fine and Jules Eskin, respectively, principal violist and cellist of that august body, the group played trios by Schubert, Beethoven and Dohnanyi in a manner which belied its comparatively recent formation.

After a bit of dryness in the Schubert first movement, the musicians experienced no difficulty in realizing the second movement air of repose or the weightlessness of the scherzo. The concluding rondo was played with such finesse that a conception of sound transformed to soft, warm sunlight rose unbidden in the listener's mind.

Food For Thought

The Dohnanyi Serenade in C major, Op. 10, small, but effective for its revelation of the composer's maturing style, reminded that the Hungarian is entitled to more frequent airings and quite possibly larger recognition.

Characteristic of Dohnanyi's musical personality, which was early influenced by Brahms, and swayed not a jot by contemporary musical theories, are the commanding melodic line, engaging rhythmic structure, sharply defined athletic form, and consistent freshness.

The trio fully matched the quality and vitality of the score, playing incisively and maintaining unsullied balance between economic expression and emotional outpouring. The dream like passages of the third movement found exquisiteness with a rhapsodic quality.

Last on the program was Beethoven's early Trio in G major, one of three comprising Op. 9. Dedicated to the Russian Count Browne (out of gratitude for the presentation of a horse), these works are serious rather than diverting in nature. Perhaps their most remarkable quality is the texture, so rich as to suggest a quartet.

The reading was one of massive technical finish, the restrained instead of the virtuoso variety, with superb fidelity as regards style and content.

Indigenous to the ensemble are polished ease and clarity, an interpretational style inclined not to the academic coldness exhibited by many American string groups, but to a sort of controlled warmth, with a tonal quality agreeable, yet never extravagant. Such playing reminds of a mixture of champagne and rocket fuel; it's very exhilarating.

RICHARD DAY

82.

BSO ensembles opener

By Craig Stinson

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra announced that the first in its series of chamber concerts this year would feature a new ensemble called Boston Musica Antiqua, this listener conceived high hopes of hearing some out-of-the-way older music played by first-rate professional musicians. Since one ordinarily has to go to amateur societies or to specialist organizations not resident in Boston for a broadening of one's music-historical horizons, there is room here for our symphony players to make an important cultural contribution.

Unfortunately these hopes were brought crashing to the ground by the concert Monday evening at Jordan Hall. In the first place, the ensemble picked for its program works by Rameau, Telemann, and Vivaldi, those very contemporaries of J. S. Bach who have been for years among the staples of the music appreciation business, and who are in no sense really old composers.

Secondly—and what is far more important—the approach taken by this ensemble embodied just about everything that is old-fashioned in performances of the pre-symphonic literature. Harpsichordist Betsy G. Moyer's realization of the continuo part consisted of the barest chords, played with a minimum of embellishment and none of the other kinds of extemporization that were expected of a baroque keyboard player. And as for the rest of the group (Phillip Kaplan, John Holmes, Roger Shermont, and Martin Hoherman on flute, oboe, violin, and cello, respectively), they gave one heavy, somnambulant reading after another in what seemed like a deliberate effort to prove that baroque music is dull.

There was one unusual piece, a Trio by someone with the surname Loeillet. But it was typical of the evening's abuse of history that the program did not say which Loeillet, offering instead a combination of the birth date of brother Jacques with the death date of brother Jean-Baptiste.

MONITOR (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 202,150
NOV 7
New England Newsclip

At Jordan Hall

Musica Antiqua Is Disappointing

By McLAREN HARRIS

Last night's opening Ensembles of the Boston Symphony concert at Jordan Hall, presented by the five-member Boston Musica Antiqua, was largely a disappointment in matters of both program and execution.

The music consisted of six works by four composers — Rameau, Telemann, Vivaldi and Loeillet — whose lives almost exactly paralleled each other, having all been born within a span of six years (Jean) Baptiste Loeillet was born in 1680, not 1685 as the program states). Further, five out of the six works were cast in the same slow-fast-slow-fast sonata da chiesa pattern (with liberties in Telemann's G major Quartet). The concert was essentially a one-idiom, single-scheme affair.

THE LONE EXCEPTION. was Rameau's "V Concert" (Concerto No. 5, we suppose) for flute, cello and harpsichord, but it was also given poor representation. The opening fugue was too slow, clicking away like the ticking of a clock, without contrapuntal life; it formed a limp contrast with the middle slow movement, which remained overly bound to meter and dynamically flat, especially in Phillip Kaplan's flute-playing. The finale was again timid.

Violinist Roger Shermont, cellist Martin Hoherman and harpsichordist Betsy Moyer seemed prepared to make something out of the following G minor Quartet of Telemann, but again a monochromatic flute performance hindered the overall result.

One of the evening's highlights was Hoherman's performance of Vivaldi's Cello Sonata No. 1, in which he combined virtuosity and sustained energy with a keen sense for contrast, treating each thematic repetition with differing intensity. Mrs. Moyer's keyboard work was likewise capable, though there was scant relief in registration between the two manuals, the only apparent difference being a four-foot stop in the upper.

THE OTHER TRUE highlight was John Holmes' oboe-playing in the second movement of Telemann's G major Quartet for violin, flute, oboe and continuo, when he added some dazzling ornamentation to the return of the Vivace. Shermont, Hoherman and Moyer handled Loeillet's Sonata a trois well, Shermont's playing being particularly con amore, while Telemann's Trio in C minor (flute, oboe, cello) sounded a trifle thin in the absence of the harpsichord, resembling the trio-sonata texture of treble-treble-bass.

Extra points go to Hoherman, who kept his cool after missing his music for the final Telemann and passing an anxious moment trying to find the trap-door stage exit.

If you're wondering why you haven't heard about this series before or why so few attended, it's because it wasn't publicized. The second of six programs, featuring the Boston Symphony String Trio, will be on Jan 8.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
NOV 5 1968
New England

Epstein's impressive 'String Trio' well done by Symphony group

By HARRY NEVILLE
Associate Critic

BOSTON SYMPHONY STRING TRIO, with pianist Gilbert Kalish. Schumann, Piano Quartet; Epstein, String Trio (1964); Beethoven, Piano Trio in D, Op. 70, No. 2. Wednesday evening at Jordan Hall.

The Boston Symphony String Trio played only one string trio during its Jordan Hall recital Wednesday night, and it was not surprising to find them functioning best in the kind of music for which they were founded. By far the most enjoyable performance of the evening was that of the String Trio (1964) by a composer identified simply but unhelpfully as Epstein.

This sample of his work was quite effective — very forthright in its appeal, yet not blatantly so. Epstein's harmonic, melodic and rhythmic language could hardly be called "modern" at this date; in all these respects he clearly owes a debt, whether consciously or not, to Bartok — more specifically to that composer's string quartets, of whose instrumental devices the Trio is virtually a thesaurus.

That Epstein has not translated these into a language completely his own is true, but this is not a crucial consideration. Antecedents and labels are unimportant in view of the fact that he speaks convincingly and has made a fine contribution to the rather meager string trio literature.

Undoubtedly Epstein's work received the lion's share of rehearsal time, but this alone would not account for the much less impressively quality of the Schumann and Beethoven performances. These were characterized by some very timid string playing, which one would gather was intentional since it was so persistent.

Perhaps, it was meant to convey some very restrained notion of the music. Infortunately it resulted in bad balances, because the pianist had quite different ideas. Although not distinguished, his playing at least had the virtue of being direct. Viola and violin lines were often barely audible in the resulting clash — especially in the Schumann where much of the violin part lies in a rather low register.

It was as though the string players had wanted to avoid any suggestion of vulgarity in some of Schumann's more obvious tunes, but what they served in its place was no more acceptable.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
JAN 9 1969
New England Newsclip

At Jordan Hall

Superior Chamber Music

By McLAREN HARRIS

Pianist Gilbert Kalish joined Boston Symphony principals Joseph Silverstein (Violin), Burton Fine (viola) and Jules Eskin (cello) to produce some superior chamber music-making in a quartet by Schumann and trios by David Epstein and Beethoven last night at Jordan Hall.

Kalish is both a fine chamber partner and an excellent musician. His work in Schumann's E flat Piano Quartet, Op. 47, and in Beethoven's E flat Piano Trio, Op. 70, No. 2, was strong and sturdy, and for a moment early in the Schumann I even worried about the strings being able to keep up with him. But this feeling quickly subsided, for nowhere was his playing heavy; it was energetic, and sensitively so. He keeps a metric pulse flowing evenly, yet not rigidly, and he knows what to do with the dynamic shape of a line without shaking the stage timbers with horrendous accents.

The Schumann, after all, does contain a prominent piano role, and thus its success in all but a few bars of the final presto owed much to Kalish's execution. It was still a true partnership, however, and the strings were responsible for the beautifully sustained melodic thread in the Andante as well as a nimble Scherzo.

Such success was repeated by Kalish-Silverstein-Eskin in the Beethoven (the D major Trio, Op. 70, No. 1, subtitled "The Ghost" was listed but Silverstein stated "we feel somewhat more material than that, and as No. 2 is the work we prepared, we'll play it." Material indeed; the beauties of line, especially during the inner movements, were nearly tangible.

The central work was the String Trio composed in 1964 by David Epstein, MIT music professor. I was rather impressed with his work—its lucid serial scheme, its dynamic and textural variety, the relative brevity of its movements (and that is no backhanded compliment). Although the first movement is an Andante, the strength of its motives, dynamics and instrumental effects (notably tremolos) give it the weight of the customary first Allegro. The Lento contains both tenderness and mystery, to look at it subjectively, and the final Passacaglia fantastica is well-constructed, the theme remaining distinctive throughout its various guises.

Silverstein's, Fine's and Eskin's collective effort here was as strong as elsewhere. This program was without any soft spots to complain about, either in program or execution, and who can ask for more?

Herald Traveler

RECORD-AMERICAN (m) (e)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 455,873
JAN 10 1969
New England Newsclip

BSO String Trio Most Consistent

By GEORGE GELLES
MUSIC CRITIC

Among the ensemble moonlighting under BSO aegis, the Bosto Symphony String Trio—Joseph Silverstein, Burton Fine and Jules Eskin—does the most consistently interesting work, and though its Monday night concert at Jordan Hall was no knock-out, it did have three special pleasures: two pieces and a pianist.

David Epstein, professor of music at MIT and conductor of the school's orchestra, is unlike so many young composers in that he turns for inspiration—or, at least, did in his "String Trio," which was heard—not to Stravinsky or Schoenberg—but to Bartok.

In sound, in gesture, in style, the Bartok quartets are inescapable in Epstein's score, yet is it very much his own piece. It has a rhythmic ingenuity and liveliness, shows a fine ear for finding unhackneyed sonorities, and in its brevity is becomingly modest. It was the first piece I've heard by Epstein and I'd like to hear more.

It was also good to hear Beethoven's Trio, Opus 70, No. 2, the least played of his half dozen piano trios and in many ways the most wonderful—unique, for instance, in the expansiveness of its third movement, its gentleness and its very figuration, all quintessentially Schubert.

The pianist who lent so much to this performance and to that of Schumann's Piano Quartet, Op. 47—one of the very best chamber players around—was Gilbert Kalish. His work had intelligence, an excellent sense of ensemble; and even if performances didn't always come off, Kalish's playing had a purposeful direction about it

The Cchumann fared least well. While the Aanante went nicely, the gorgeous opening melody beautifully played by Eskin, the Scherzo lacked the taut Mendelsshon-like tension it needed, and the outer movements hectically barreled alons without really settling down.

In the Beethoven, too, it wa the relaxed, lyrical movement (the third especially that wes the smoothest. And lastly, th Epstein sounded fine.

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
JAN 4 1969
New England Newsclip

4 BSO Players In Quartet Concerts

Four players involved in the annual Boston Symphony-Japan Philharmonic exchange of musicians are giving quartet concerts. Personnel are the B.S.O.'s Ronald Knudsen, violin, and George Humphrey, viola, and Eiichi Tanaka, a violinist currently with the B.S.O, and cellist Soichi Katsuta, 1966-67 who is continuing his study in Boston.

Their program, which was given first on Feb. 2 at the Harvard Music Assn., will be repeated Feb. 16 in Paine Hall of the Harvard University Music Building. Works include the Arriaga Quartet No. 1, Yashiro's Quartet, the Schubert Quartetsatz and Thompson's Quartet No. 2.

Violone Ensemble To Play Monday

The Violone Ensemble, comprised of members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will appear on Monday at 8:30 p.m. in Jordan Hall as the third in a series of six chamber music concerts offered by the Ensembles of the Boston Symphony.

Members of the Violone Ensemble are Max Hobert and Alfred Schneider, violins, Earl Hedberg, viola, Robert Ripley, cello, and John Hearne, bass. The program includes Mozart's Quartet, K. 458, "The Hunt," Skorzeny's Second Suite (1954) and Dvorak's Quintet in G major.

Remaining tickets from $1.50 to $5 are on sale at the Jordan Hall box office.

Harold Traveler 1-25

MORNING GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 241,702
JAN 21 1969
New England Newsclip

Violone Ensemble

The Violone Ensemble, comprised of members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will appear on Monday, Jan. 27, at 8:30 p.m., in Jordan Hall as the third in a series of six chamber music concerts by ensembles of the Boston Symphony.

The program includes Mozart's Quartet K. 458, "The Hunt"; Skorzeny's Second Suite (1954); and Dvorak's Quintet in G Major.

Violone a Fine Ensemble

By McLAREN HARRIS

If one may go by past experience with the Ensembles of the Boston Symphony, last night at Jordan Hall we heard both the first and last of the Violone Ensemble. And if true, it's a pity, for the five members play as if they have put some work into it; the result is a group worth keeping around.

Of course, Alfred Schneider and Max Hobart, violins, Earl Hedberg, viola, Robert Ripley, cello, and Joseph Hearne, double bass, don't comprise a violone ensemble at all; a violone is an obsolete form of double-bass viol. But they do make up an aggregation of strings individually and collectively full-toned and closely attuned to one another in both technical and interpretive intentions.

Last night they performed works for three, four and five strings: Mozart's Quartet in B flat, "The Hunt," a Second Suite (1954) for violin, viola and double bass by Fritz Skorzeny (who seems to be a new name to me) and Dvorak's Quintet in G, Opus 77.

THE TONAL WARMTH of the four strings (minus Hearne) was immediately apparent in Mozart's K. 458. The "dark" tones were produced with no hindrance to lightness of motion, and energy was always bound with expression. The Menuetto, slightly on the fast side of Moderato, had a welcome lyric quality which softened the usual jounciness of meter.

Skorzeny's four-movement Second Suite, despite its somewhat unusual combination, is a pleasant, well-crafted work bringing out contrapuntal and lyric elements in a chromatic but always tonal harmonic scheme. The Praeludium, with its ostinato underpinnings, and the Intermezzo canonico, are principally of contrapuntal order; the following Lied contains melody which waxes quite tender, and the final Kehraus (quite appropriately the "last dance") combines both.

Not the least of the Skorzeny's success was due to Hearne's double-bass playing —agile, accurately placed and tonally secure. Hobart and Hedberg were in solid straits as well.

THE DVORAK QUINTET, having the resources of highest to lowest strings, is nearly symphonic in outlook, offering the variety of expression and rhythm (those familiar dactyls) one may find in Opus 88 and Opus 95. In this romantic mold, full of determination and passion, the full tonal weight of the ensemble could be brought to bear, and the result was wel done, without intonational squabbles, with internal balance and common conviction.

Violones or no, these five are a fine Ensemble.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817
JAN 28 1969
New England

BSO Chamber Players On Channel 2 Jan. 28

A color telecast of a concert by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players will be on Channels 2 and 44 Tuesday, Jan. 28 at 9 p.m.

The Chamber Players perform Sextet, for Piano and Winds by Poulenc, featuring pianist Richard Goode and Boston Symphony principals Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarnet; Sherman Walt, bassoon and James Stagliano, French Horn.

Also on the program will be Schubert's "Trout Quintet." With Goode again at the piano, work is performed by Boston Symphony concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, violin; Burton Fine, Jules Eskin, cello and Henry Portnoi, bass.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000
JAN 16 1969
New England Newsclip

TELEGRAM (m)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 62,682
APR 2 1969
New England Newsclip

Jules Eskin

Joseph Silverstein

Boston Trio To Perform At Museum

Burton Fine

The 16th annual Thomas Hovey Gage Memorial Concert at the Worcester Art Museum will be given Sunday, April 13, at 3 p.m. by the Boston Symphony String Trio.

Concluding the museum's 50th musical season, the concert is free and open to the public.

The Gage Concert is presented annually as a memorial to the former president and corporator of the museum who was instrumental in inaugurating its free Sunday afternoon concerts.

It is appropriate that the Boston trio should appear on this occasion. The first musical season at the museum, 1918-1919, featured the Boston Symphony Ensemble, a group drawn from the Boston Symphony.

Members of the present trio are Joseph Silverstein, violinist, Burton Fine, violist, and Jules Eskin, cellist. Each is a principal of the Boston Symphony.

The program will include Schubert's String Trio No. 2 in B flat major, Opus 99, Schoenberg's String Trio, Opus 45, and Beethoven's String Trio in G major, Opus 9.

DENVILLE, N.J.
CITIZEN OF MORRIS CO.
W. 8,000
MAR 27 1969

Boonton Appearance is Reviewed

Boston Symphony is Front Rank

By Llewellyn Watts Jr.

Sunday afternoon a most interesting and unusual concert was offered by the Boonton Area Concert Association. It consisted of a program by eight artists; four woodwinds, three brass players, first desk members of the Boston Symphony orchestra and a pianist. For such an instrumental combination the chamber literature is not too well known. It is in fact somewhat limited but the program played Sunday was an excellent variety of noteworthy quality.

An early Beethoven trio for flute, bassoon and piano opened the concert. This is an enjoyable, melodious Haydnesque work in more of a serenade form of three movements. A trio for trombone, trumpet and piano by Blacher followed. The composer is not known to this reviewer, but it is in the comtemporary or modern idiom; that is, if anyone over 30 years old can be called contemporary.

The partita for wind quintet by Irving Fine for oboe, flute, clarinet, bassoon and horn came next. This is an extraordinary composition, quite modern superbly constructed and splendidly played. Fine lived from 1914 to 1962. He is unfamiliar to me, but from this most interesting modernistic piece it's a pity that his voice is stilled.

The entire second half of the afternoon's program was taken up by a sextet for the same five winds joined by the piano, composed by Ludwig Wilhelm Andreas Maria Thuille. Thuille was born in the Tyrol in 1861 and died in Munich in 1907. This is an early work (opus 6) and most interesting in its romanticism. It is very melodious and its 19th Century flavor is quite Brahmsian with overtones, if that's the word, of Schumann.

The members of the Boston Symphony Players are virtuosi of the first rank and they deserve to be remembered. Their names: Mrs. Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; James Stagliano, horn; Armando Ghitalla, trumpet; William Gibson, trombone; and the hard-working talented pianist, Gilbert Kalish.

84

Jordan Hall Concert

Some Moderns Join Beethoven

By MCLAREN HARRIS

Beethoven was in some warm company during last night's Jordan Hall concert by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players. Two Trios in G major, Opus 9 for strings and an earlier one for piano, flute and bassoon, enclosed works by Charles Martin Loeffler, Edward Diemente and Arnold Schoenberg.

Schoenberg we all know; Loeffler, for most, rings a distant bell; Diemente is yet no ranking celebrity—after all, he is the only one of these three still alive. His Quartet for flute, clarinet, vibraphone and bass, composed in 1966 in memory of Adlai Stevenson, combines a free-motivic, incidental-harmonic approach with more conventional rhythmic and phrase structures.

IT THUS BECOMES a comfortable piece for almost any ear, motivic brevity and bass harmonics notwithstand; and in this aggregation the vibraphone becomes a combining, even adhesive tonal element. Diemente's quartet is quite accessible, yet no less imaginative for that—no mean accomplishment.

Loeffler, Alsatian-born American of the early 20th century, lies somewhere around Jacques Ibert in idiom. His Two Rhapsodies for oboe, viola and piano, "L'Etang" (fish pond) and "La cornemuse" (bagpipe) have a slight mystical ring in a style reminiscent of impressionism. They represent musical pictorialism only in the most subjective, idealistic vein, delicate in tone color, liquid and flexible in melodic contour.

THE SYMPHONY Chamber Players with Gilbert Kalish, pianist, did up each package rather neatly, including Schoenberg's String Trio, Opus 45, which began at a real gallop—or, in more delicate terms, in a light dash—against which the quiescent middle section stood out in complete serenity. The Schoenberg and Beethoven's Opus 9 were perhaps best received, and deservedly so for matters of intrinsic value. The piano-flute-bassoon trio tended toward some instability and lack of identity among the parts and was also the least memorable for musical content.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

APR 15 1969 New England Newsclip

GAZETTE (e)
WORCESTER, MASS.
CIRC. 94,543

APR 10 1969 New England Newsclip

The Boston Symphony String Trio: (from left) Burton Fine, Jules Eskin and Joseph Silverstein.

Gage Memorial Concert

Trio to Play at Art Museum

The 16th annual free public Thomas Hovey Gage Memorial Concert will be given by the Boston Symphony String Trio at 3 p.m. Sunday in the court of Worcester Art Museum. The concert will conclude the museum's 50th musical season.

The concert is given annually as a memorial to Thomas Hovey Gage, former president and corporator of the museum. He was instrumental in starting the museum's free Sunday afternoon concert program.

The appearance of the trio is noteworthy since the museum's first musical season in 1918-19 featured the Boston Symphony Ensemble, a group drawn from the Boston Symphony Orchestra of that time.

Members of the trio are Joseph Silverstein, violinist; Burton Fine, violist; and Jules Eskin, cellist. Each is a principal of the orchestra.

Silverstein was named concertmaster of the orchestra in 1962. Fine, formerly a research chemist with the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, joined the orchestra in 1963. He became principal violinist the next year. Eskin became principal cellist in 1964 after several seasons with the Cleveland Orchestra and a number of performances with Pablo Casals and Rudolf Serkin.

The program will include: String Trio No. 2 in B flat, Opus 99 by Schubert, String Trio, Opus 45 by Schoenberg and String Trio in G Major, Opus 9 by Beethoven.

Wind Quintet at Jordan Hall

Concert Anything but Cold

By McLAREN HARRIS

The Boston Symphony Wind Quintet recalled wintry days of yore last night at Jordan Hall when it performed a program postponed from Feb. 26 because of snow. This performance, however, was anything but cold.

Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute, Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon, and James Stagliano, horn, were together as such for only one work out of four—Irving Fine's Partita for wind quintet, a five-movement series of variations on a theme introduced at the beginning. Its melodic contours and polyharmonic tinges reflect a Boulanger orientation, but its material and rhythmic configuration breathe a life all its own.

The Partita is perhaps the most popular of the late composer's chamber pieces, and deservedly so; the Symphony players accorded it a dynamically light, easily-phrased treatment.

The same quintet plus pianist Gilbert Kalish played the Septet, Opus 6, of Ludwig Thuille, an Austrian of the late 19th century associated with Alexander Ritter in much the same way as Strauss was. The Ritter influence doesn't show up in the Septet; its flavor is strongly Brahmsian in the first pair of movements, then moving on to a lighter, more individual style for the Gavotte (in place of a Scherzo) and finale. It makes an excellent, easy-listening repertory piece.

The evening's finest playing came from guests—Kalish with Armando Ghitalla, trumpet, and William Gibson, trombone—in Boris Blacher's Trio, Opus 31. The seven movements, mostly brief, are delightfully spirited, ranging from flashing trumpet arpeggios in the third section to an elegaic, hushed Andantino for piano and trombone. There seems to be a hint of Milhaud in its jauntiness, and the three performers took relish in whipping it off with note-perfect clarity.

Gioacchino Rossini may not have been much of a symphonist, but he certainly couldn't write quartets. His Quartet No. 6 for flute, clarinet, bassoon and horn, the opening work, is packed with melodic and rhythmic cliches, even to the extreme of a Dixieland style now-it's-your-turn variation movement. The four players, too, required some time to come to agreement about intonation and small matters of phrasing, and it is just as well that they accomplished their adjustments on such expendable merchandise.

HERALD TRAVELER (M)
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 230,817

MAY 8 1969 New England

PORT CHESTER TIMES
Wednesday, September 4, 1968

OSSINING CITIZEN REGISTER
Wednesday, September 4, 1968

NEW ROCHELLE STANDARD
Wednesday, September 4, 1968

PEEKSKILL STAR
Friday, September 20, 1968

White Plains Reporter Dispatch
Thursday, September 5, 1968

Sleepy Hollow Series Slated

TARRYTOWN—

Season tickets for the Sleepy Hollow Concerts Association season opening Oct. 18 will go on sale during the week of Sept. 8 through Sept. 14.

The non-profit educational organization devoted to bringing fine concerts to Hudson River communities in Westchester will offer four concerts beginning with pianist L'li Kraus, followed by the Beaux Arts String Quartet, Jean Pierre-Rampal and Robert Veyron-Lacrois, flute and keyboard duo, and the Boston Symphony Players.

Lili Kraus noted Hungarian pianist who performed the complete cycle of piano concerti at Town Hall last season accompanied by Stephen Simon, conductor, of Scarsdale and the Mozart Chamber Orchestra, will open the season Friday, Oct. 18 at 8:30 p.m.

The second concert on Sat., Nov. 23 at 8:30 p.m. will feature the Beaux Arts String Quartet, a group that has won unanimous acclaim throughout the U.S., Europe and the Far East. The quartet won the Walter W. Naumberg Foundations first Chamber Music Award in 1965 and is described as a "quartet of utmost delicacy, finesse and interpretive sensitivity."

The third concert on March 5 will feature the artistry of Jean-Pierre Rampal and Robert Veyron-Lacroix, flute and keyboard duo.

The artists have appeared together in Europe's major festivals as well as throughout North America.

The fourth and final concert will take place on Sunday, April 20 at 3 p.m. and will feature the Boston Symphony Players. The chamber group of 10 players consists of principal musicians in the Boston Symphony. While each is a virtuoso musician in his own right, the ensemble group performs varied and unusual works. Claude Frank, celebrated concert pianist, plays with the group.

All concerts will be presented at the recently-refurbished Washington Irving auditorium, South Broadway, Tarrytown.

Tickets for the four concerts, sold by series subscription only, at $12.50 for adults and $6 for students, are available from Mrs. Lawrence Fine, or at headquarters at John Charles, Ltd., 94 White Plains Road, Tarrytown.

MT. KISCO PATENT TRADER
Saturday, April 26, 1969

Sleepy Hollow Series hears Boston Players

Boston Symphony Chamber Players, Sleepy Hollow Community Concert Series, Washington Irving High School, Sunday, April 20. Program: Beethoven Trio in G Major for Flute, Bassoon and Piano; Schubert String Trio No. 2 in B Flat; Diemente Quartet (1966) in memory of Adlai Stevenson; Loffler Two Rhapsodies; Beethoven String Trio in G Major Op. 9.

TARRYTOWN — The Boston Symphony Players is made up of the first desk men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. One can assume therefore that the level of competence and musicianship is pretty high. Their Sunday afternoon concert in Tarrytown the last of the Sleepy Hollow Concert Series, presented ample proof of that incontestable fact.

With 10 string, wind and percussion players to choose from, the musical fare was diversified. Beethoven was represented by two trios, one for flute, bassoon and piano; the other for strings. There was a string trio by Schubert; two rhapsodies for piano, oboe and viola by Loeffler; and a quartet for flute, clarinet, double bass and xylophone by Edward Diemente.

Even the Beethoven and Schubert were rarely heard works. The Beethoven Trio in G Major for flute, bassoon and piano is an early composition and a slight one. Unlike Mozart and Bach, who never turned out a second rate composition, Beethoven was occasionally less than a master. The trio is pleasant enough and shows off the two wind instruments nicely but that is about all. The performance by flutist Doriot Anthony Dwyer, bassoonist Sherman Walt and Gilbert Kalish, pianist was excellent.

THE STRING TRIO Op. 9, also in G Major, is a different case. This is full fledged Beethoven. It was given a fine reading by Joseph Silverstein, violin "Burton Fine, viola; and Jules Eskin, cello. The string tone, ensemble, balance and unanimity of ideas were exemplary. Their playing of the Schubert trio was equally impressive.

That trio was erroneously listed as Op. 99 in the program. Opus 99 is also a trio in B Flat, but it is a piano trio of much later and greater vintage. The B Flat string trio bears no opus number. It was written in 1817 and, though early, has the true Schubert charm and touches. It is rarely performed. Too bad, for it is a lovely work.

Even more rarely performed are the two rhapsodies by Charles Martin Loeffler. Loeffler, an American composer who died in 1935 was a professional violinist as well as a composer. He joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it was first organized in 1882 and from 1885 to 1903 shared the first desk with Franz Kneisel, the concertmaster. Many of his works were given their first performance by the Boston Symphony.

The rhapsodies L'Etang" and La Cornemuse" were written in 1905 after poems by Maurice Rollinat. They are in the grand romantic tradition with impressionist effects throughout. The piano parts represent good pianistic writing in that style. The oboe is dealt with kindly but, strangly enough, the viola is lost in the thickness of the texture of the time. It is pitched on the lower strings primarily and therefore has less brilliance. Against the oboe, which can cut through any amount of sound and the brilliant modern grand piano, the poor viola with its mellow tone had no chance at all. The excellent oboist was Ralph Gomberg.

ANOTHER NOVELTY was the quartet by Edward Diemente written in 1966 in memory of Adlai Stevenson. The scoring was certainly unusual. . . flute, clarinet, double bass and xylophone. Some of the effects obtained were interesting; some, like the final note of the first movement on the double bass, were anything but musical.

The second movement utilized the tone colors of the strange instrumental combination for greatest effect, creating quite a lovely mood, ending with a plaintive note on the flute.

The writing has elements of the disjointed serial technique, but features larger melodic lines as well that were of some interest. A second hearing would be necessary for fuller judgement.

Joining Mrs. Dwyer were Gino Cioffi, clarinet, Henry Portnoi, double bass, and Everett Firth, xylophone. Once again exemplary playing marked the performance.

This was the last of the Community Concert Series in Tarrytown. Their subscription drive for next season runs through next week.

—MURIEL BROOKS

OSSINING CITIZEN REGISTER
Thursday, April 17, 1969

Chamber Players To Give Concert

The fourth and final concert of the Sleepy Hollow Community Concerts Association of Tarrytown will be held Sunday afternoon at 3 in Washington Irving Junior High School Auditorium, Broadway, Tarrytown. The Boston Symphony Chamber Players will present the final concert.

The group is composed of principal players from the Boston Symphony. Each musician is a virtuoso performer and many of the concert selections are frequently performed works. The program will include a range of musical compositions from duos to septets and monets, as well as works for the standard ensemble.

The concert is open to the public.

85

TV - RADIO - General Announcements

TV WHAT'S ON? RADIO

NEW YORK
AND BROOKLYN DAILY
D. 35,348

JUN 21 1968

up. Not so long ago, no network would even acknowledge the existence of another. But scheduled for last night's Johnny Carson period on NBC was a tribute to Ed Sullivan, observing the 20th anniversary of his champ CBS variety show.

Viewer's Notebook:

If you're not tuning in those Boston Symphony concerts on Channel 13, you are missing the greatest series of concerts on the air. Last evening's performance of Mozart's "Prague Symphony," conducted by Erich Leinsdorf, was a delight.

Boston Symphony on Channel 13

8 to conclusion (11) Baseball. The New York Yankees vs. the Washington Senators, from New York's Yankee Stadium. (Color).

* * *

8 - 10 (13) Boston Symphony Concert. Erich Leinsdorf conducts the Boston Symphony in Beethoven's Symphony No.2 in D major, Op. 36; "As Quiet As" by Michael Colgrass; and Brahm's Violin Concerto in D major, Op 77, with guest soloist Joseph Silverstein.

* * *

MIDDLETOWN, N. Y.
TIMES HERALD RECORD
D. 33,000

JUL 18 1968

Boston Symphony To Be Heard On Radio Beginning Sept. 27

The Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its 88th season on Friday, Sept. 27, and WGBH radio will once again broadcast the concerts live from Symphony Hall.

To inaugurate his final season with the orchestra, conductor Erich Leinsdorf has invited distinguished American soprano Marilyn Horne to be the soloist, Friday, Sept. 27 at 2 p.m., and Saturday, Sept. 28 at 8:30 p.m.

Miss Horne will be remembered by New Englanders for her outstanding performances with Sarah Caldwell's Boston Opera, and for the Channel 2 Special "An Hour With Joan Sutherland" in which she also appeared.

For her Boston Symphony concert Miss Horne has chosen the taxing concert aria "Ah, perfido" by Beethoven. Also on the program will be Mozart's Symphony No. 39 in E Flat and excepts from Wagner's opera "Gotterdammerung."

FREE PRESS
MELROSE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,000

SEP 26 1968

New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Concerts Begin On WGBH Sept. 27

The Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its 88th season on Friday, Sept. 27. WGBH radio (89.7 FM) will broadcast the concerts live from Symphony Hall.

Conductor Erich Leinsdorf has invited distinguished American soprano Marilyn Horne to be soloist, Friday, Sept. 27 at 2 p.m. and Saturday, Sept. 28 at 8:30 p.m. She will sing the aria "Ah, perfido" by Beethoven. Also on the program will be Mozart's Symphony No. 39 in E Flat and excerpts from Wagner's "Gotterdammerung."

Preceding each Friday and Saturday concert G. Wallace Woodworth analyzes the music. His first broadcast will be Thursday, Sept. 26 at 5:30 p.m. with a repeat scheduled Saturday, Sept. 28 at 4:30 p.m.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 26,000

SEP 19 1968

New England Newsclip

Staten Island Advance
STATEN ISLAND, N. Y.
D. 62,892 SUN. 56,019

JUL 18 1968

Erich Leinsdorf conducts the Boston Symphony tonight at 8 on Channel 13.

COURIER
LITTLETON, N. H.
WEEKLY CIRC. 2,150

JUN 27 1968

New England Newsclip

Continuing its presentation of fine music, the New Hampshire Network will feature a series of concerts by the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA each Tuesday at 9, beginning July 2 on Channel 49. Erich Leinsdorf conducts the orchestra at Symphony Hall in Boston in a performance of Beethoven's Symphony No. 2, Colgrass' "As Quiet As," and Brahms' Violin Concerto with soloist Joseph Silverstein on the initial program.

WARREN, PA.
TIMES-MIRROR
D. 9,500

JUL 6 1968

Selected Viewing

Saturday, 9 p. m. — NET FESTIVAL tonight presents "Chopin: A Question of Stature." The program examines the romantic legends surrounding the composer's life and music.

Sunday, 9:30 p. m. — SUNDAY SYMPHONY presents the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf performing works of Beethoven, Colgrass, and Brahms.

PATRIOT-LEDGER (e)
QUINCY, MASS.
CIRC. 62,736

SEP 20 1968

New England Newsclip

Live-Concert Radio

WGBH radio will once again broadcast the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts live from Symphony Hall as the BSO begins its 88th season Friday, Sept. 27. The Friday afternoon and Tuesday evening programs will be in stereo.

Preceding each Friday and Saturday concert, Harvard University's G. Wallace Woodworth once again analyzes the music for the FM station. Soprano Marilyn Horne helps conductor Erich Leinsdorf inaugurate his last season with the orchestra.

Albany Knickerbocker News
Tuesday, September 24, 1968

Boston Concerts To Be Broadcast

The Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its 88th season on Friday and WAMC-FM (90.3 mc.) will once again broadcast the concerts from Symphony Hall on Fridays at 2 p.m. and Tuesdays at 8:30 p.m.

To inaugurate his final season with the orchestra, conductor Erich Leinsdorf has invited distinguished American soprano Marilyn Horne to be the soloist at the opening concert (Friday, Sept. 27).

For her debut with the orchestra, Miss Horne has chosen the taxing concert aria "Ah, perfido" by Beethoven.

86

Fort Lauderdale News
FORT LAUDERDALE, FLA.
D. 78,900
OCT 4 1968

Boston Symphony

Concert Sunday On WFtL-FM

One of Beethoven's few relaxed and placid compositions, Symphony No. 6 in F Major Op. 68, will open the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program at 8 p.m. Sunday on WFTL-FM.

THE ARIZONA REPUBLIC
PHOENIX, ARIZ.
D. 155,995 SUN. 231,269
OCT 30 1968

Boston symphony concert on KMEO

KMEO-FM radio will present a new series of four Wednesday evening programs beginning at 9 p.m. today. The program, entitled "Koussevitsky and the Boston Sound: A Study in Greatness," features performances and rehearsal tapes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Koussevitsky.

Moderator of the one-hour program is Roger W. Jensen, who has transcribed the tapes for the program from 78 rpm recordings, stainless steel wire recordings, and a few 33⅓ rpm recordings.

THIS SERIES includes four Wednesday evening programs. More programs may be added later, with different conductors whose performances Jensen has collected, like Artur Nikisch, Siegfried Wagner (the son of Richard Wagner), Felix Weingartner, Wilhelm Furtwaengler, and Charles Munch.

DAYTONA BEACH, FLA.
NEWS-JOURNAL
SUN. 43,500
DEC 8 1968

Boston Symphony On WNDB During 1969

The News-Journal's radio station, WNDB, has a magnificent Christmas present for the community — one that can be enjoyed every week of 1969.

Beginning Saturday night, Jan. 4, WNDB will broadcast weekly two hour concerts by the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra. The broadcasts will begin at 8 p.m., and will be available either in full stereo on WNDB-fm, or in mono on WNDB-am. WNDB-fm stereo is 94.5 on your dial, and the am station is 1150.

Tape Transcription

These concerts are being made possible by tape transcription, according to Bill Deem, WNDB manager. Radio stations across the country subscribe to a taped concert series provided through the Boston Symphony Transcription Trust, a subsidiary of the orchestra established in 1958. Net proceeds of the trust benefit the Pension Institute of the orchestra.

The Boston Symphony, with Erich Leinsdorf as its music director, is one of the most distinguished in the World. Established in 1881, it regularly gives concerts in Boston's Symphony Hall, which has been its home since 1900.

Its series of Summer concerts — at the Berkshire Music Center in the hills of Tanglewood, Mass. — have become internationally famous and annually attract thousands.

Costly Undertaking

Maintaining an orchestra of the size and quality of the Boston Symphony is an enormous undertaking. In the 1966-'67 season the total cost for salaries, administration, music, transportation, upkeep, etc., was more than $3 million — including the maintenance of two properties, Symphony Hall and Tanglewood.

The orchestra's season begins in late September, and ends in August at the conclusion of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood.

The Boston Pops, composed of 90 players from the 106 member Boston Symphony, has a season in May and June. Arthur Fiedler conducts 54 concerts during this series.

Announcement of the programs to be heard during the WNDB broadcasts of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will be announced regularly in The News-Journal papers.

JOURNAL (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
CIRC. 67,050
NOV 11 1968
New England Newsclip

Stereo Sound on the Air

Now that the Journal's good-music station WPJB-FM has begun broadcasting live concerts by the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestras, may we expect it finally to serve listeners with stereo sound soon?

More than three years ago, I inquired through the Bulletin's "Ask Us" column when we might expect WPJB-FM to go along with the trend and convert from monaural to stereo broadcasting. I was told then that the management was "studying" the possibility.

Providence has five FM stations, three of which broadcast in stereo sound (one of these is the Brown University station; if students can offer stereo sound, why not the Journal station?).

It is puzzling why WPJB continues to shun the really obvious way to render good music with the most realism, especially when you consider how progressive and forward-looking are the company's newspapers. A monaural receiver produced by high fidelity manufacturers today is about as rare as a two-dollar bill. With most homes undoubtedly equipped today with some sort of stereo apparatus, listening to WPJB's outmoded broadcasting delivery is like shunning concert hall realism for crystal set reception.

Practically all the major phonograph record manufacturers are producing only stereo discs today, and local record outlets are falling over themselves to get rid of their monaural ("hi-fi") stock.

Even should WPJB convert to stereo, homeowners who still retain only monaural equipment could receive broadcasts without apparent change in the signal they are receiving, since there is compatibility.

I've spoken to many persons living in Rhode Island about reception and they, like me, cannot understand why WPJB continues to ignore stereo broadcasting.

Why is this, and can we ever hope to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra in live concert over a local radio station in stereo sound?

Bernard A. DuPont
Providence

BULLETIN (e)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
CIRC. 147,150
NOV 21 1968
New England Newsclip

7:10—WJAR, [illegible]
8:15—WEAN, R.I. Newsbeat. [illegible] dent of the Rhode Island Chapter of the [illegible] can Academy of General Practice, will be interviewed.
9:00—WPJB-FM, Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert: Wagner's Siegfried Idyll, Strauss' Also Sprach Zarathustra and Rachmaninoff's Second Piano Concerto.
11:30—WLKW-FM, Night Call: Greg M[illegible] sion Impossible" will [illegible] Associati[illegible]

Week's Highlights

Festive Viewing

By Elizabeth L. Sullivan
Globe TV-Radio Editor

TV is filled this week with goodies as toothsome as those you'll find on the Thanksgiving feast table.

Starting with today (Sunday), Olympic skating champ Peggy Fleming performs on-and-off the ice, and actor James Daly emerges as a scuba diver.

On Monday, Frank Sinatra has a music special with lovely Diahann Carroll among his guests, and the King Family entertains in their music special.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Erich Leinsdorf, is seen in the first of the season's TV performances, Tuesday night, live and in color from Symphony Hall. There will be others, about once a month.

Bob Hope's specia[illegible] Wednesday origin[illegible] the Univers[illegible] Califor[illegible]

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905
NOV 24 1968
New England Newsclip

TWIN CITIAN
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
MONTHLY 9,000
NOV 1968

fm guide program notes

BY CONNIE RYKS

FROM MONDAY THROUGH THURSDAY EVENINGS this month, as usual, KSJN listeners have the opportunity of listening to four of the finest American orchestras. These programs by the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Cleveland Orchestra, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Chicago Symphony Orchestra are recorded in concert each week and rebroadcast via stereo tape.

CLEVELAND ORCHESTRA

Two of this month's Cleveland Orchestra concerts originate from the new Blossom Music Center. George Szell conducts the orchestra in selections by Mozart and Richard Strauss, assisted by soprano Elisabeth Schwarzkopf in the Four Last Songs of Strauss, on November 5. Louis Lane conducts the following week on November 12 as the orchestra presents Carmina Burana by Carl Orff. The program on November 19 originates at Severance Hall, Cleveland, and includes Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony; George Szell, conducting. The final November concert, on the 26th, features pianist Peter Frankl in a performance of Mozart's Concerto in E-flat, K. 271. The Cleveland Orchestra is heard Tuesday evenings at 7:30 on KSJN.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is heard in concert every Wednesday night beginning at 8:00. The first program, of November 6, features pianist Malcolm Frager in Schumann's "Concerto in A minor," Op. 54. Erich Leinsdorf conducts.

CHICAGO ORCHESTRA

Andre Vandernoot conducts the Chicago Orchestra on November 7 in concert of the works of Moz[illegible] bern, Prokofiev and D[illegible] November 14 conce[illegible] Joaquin Achuc[illegible] in the Ga[illegible] other [illegible]

Leinsdorf on Audio

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, guest speaker at the Audio Engineering Society's recent convention banquet, gave a spirited talk that was all the more admirable since it came at the end of interminable award-giving and award-acceptance speeches.

One of the themes voiced by Dr. Leinsdorf was the need for acoustic insulation to improve home sound reproduction and to shut out extraneous noise. Concerning the latter, he likened the acoustic environment in many homes to that of "Luna Park." Another theme was a pointed attack on the poor audio quality available from television receivers. He observed that WGBH FM in Boston alleviates the problem somewhat by broadcasting TV audio so that hi-fiers can listen to good quality sound on their hi-fi systems while viewing the video portion of a program on a TV set. Wouldn't it be nice if more FM stations did this?

AUDIO
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
MONTHLY 24,000
DEC 1968

STAR
WINCHESTER, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 5,450
JAN 16 1969
New England Newsclip

TV Concert January 28

A special color telecast of a concert by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players will be on channels 2 and 44 Tuesday, January 28 at 9 p.m.

The Chamber Players perform Sextet for Piano and Winds by Francis Poulenc featuring pianist Richard Goode and Boston Symphony members Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; and James Stagliano, French Horn.

Also on the program will be—Quartet for Piano and Strings, Op. 114 by Schubert, better known as the "Trout Quintet." With Goode again at the piano, the Quintet is performed by Boston Symphony concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, violin; Burton Fine, viola; Jules Eskin, cello; and Henry Portnoi, bass.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 840,495 SUN. 1,494,704
FEB 23 1969

Bob Greene

Erich Leinsdorf conducts "Great Albums of Opera" on WVNJ at 9:05 P.M. tonight

86.

Fort Lauderdale News
FORT LAUDERDALE, FLA.
D. 78,900

OCT 4 1968

Boston Symphony

Concert Sunday On WFtL-FM

One of Beethoven's few relaxed and placid compositions, Symphony No. 6 in F Major Op. 68, will open the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program at 8 p.m. Sunday on WFTL-FM.

JOURNAL (m)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
CIRC. 67,050

NOV 11 1968

New England Newsclip

Stereo Sound on the Air

Now that the Journal's good-music station WPJB-FM has begun broadcasting live concerts by the Boston Symphony and Boston Pops Orchestras, may we expect it finally to serve listeners with stereo sound soon?

More than three years ago, I inquired through the Bulletin's "Ask Us" column when we might expect WPJB-FM to go along with the trend and convert from monaural to stereo broadcasting. I was told then that the management was "studying" the possibility.

Providence has five FM stations, three of which broadcast in stereo sound (one of these is the Brown University station; if students can offer stereo sound, why not the Journal station?).

It is puzzling why WPJB continues to shun the really obvious way to render good music with the most realism, especially when you consider how progressive and forward-looking are the company's newspapers. A monaural receiver produced by high fidelity manufacturers today is about as rare as a two-dollar bill. With most homes undoubtedly equipped today with some sort of stereo apparatus, listening to WPJB's outmoded broadcasting delivery is like shunning concert hall realism for crystal set reception.

Practically all the major phonograph record manufacturers are producing only stereo discs today, and local record outlets are falling over themselves to get rid of their monaural ("hi-fi") stock.

Even should WPJB convert to stereo, homeowners who still retain only monaural equipment could receive broadcasts without apparent change in the signal they are receiving, since there is compatibility.

I've spoken to many persons living in Rhode Island about reception and they, like me, cannot understand why WPJB continues to ignore stereo broadcasting.

Why is this, and can we ever hope to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra in live concert over a local radio station in stereo sound?

Bernard A. DuPont
Providence

Leinsdorf on Audio

Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, guest speaker at the Audio Engineering Society's recent convention banquet, gave a spirited talk that was all the more admirable since it came at the end of interminable award-giving and award-acceptance speeches.

One of the themes voiced by Dr. Leinsdorf was the need for acoustic insulation to improve home sound reproduction and to shut out extraneous noise. Concerning the latter, he likened the acoustic environment in many homes to that of "Luna Park." Another theme was a pointed attack on the poor audio quality available from television receivers. He observed that WGBH FM in Boston alleviates the problem somewhat by broadcasting TV audio so that hi-fiers can listen to good quality sound on their hi-fi systems while viewing the video portion of a program on a TV set. Wouldn't it be nice if more FM stations did this?

AUDIO
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
MONTHLY 24,000

DEC 1968

THE ARIZONA REPUBLIC
PHOENIX, ARIZ.
D. 155,995 SUN. 231,269

OCT 30 1968

Boston symphony concert on KMEO

KMEO-FM radio will present a new series of four Wednesday evening programs beginning at 9 p.m. today. The program, entitled "Koussevitsky and the Boston Sound: A Study in Greatness," features performances and rehearsal tapes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Koussevitsky.

Moderator of the one-hour program is Roger W. Jensen, who has transcribed the tapes for the program from 78 rpm recordings, stainless steel wire recordings, and a few 33⅓ rpm recordings.

THIS SERIES includes four Wednesday evening programs. More programs may be added later, with different conductors whose performances Jensen has collected, like Artur Nikisch, Siegfried Wagner (the son of Richard Wagner), Felix Weingartner, Wilhelm Furtwaengler, and Charles Munch.

BULLETIN (e)
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
CIRC. 147,150

NOV 21 1968

New England Newsclip

7:10—WJAR, [illegible]
8:15—WEAN, R.I. Newsbeat. [illegible] dent of the Rhode Island Chapter of the [illegible] can Academy of General Practice, will be interviewed.
9:00—WPJB-FM, Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert: Wagner's Siegfried Idyll, Strauss Also Sprach Zarathustra and Rachmaninoff's Second Piano Concerto.
11:30—WLKW-FM, Night Call: Greg M[illegible] sion Impossible" will [illegible] Associati[illegible]

Week's Highlights

Festive Viewing

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905

NOV 24 1968

New England Newsclip

By Elizabeth L. Sullivan
Globe TV-Radio Editor

TV is filled this week with goodies as toothsome as those you'll find on the Thanksgiving feast table.

Starting with today (Sunday), Olympic skating champ Peggy Fleming performs on-and-off the ice, and actor James Daly emerges as a scuba diver.

On Monday, Frank Sinatra has a music special with lovely Diahann Carroll among his guests, and the King Family entertains in their music special.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Erich Leinsdorf, is seen in the first of the season's TV performances, Tuesday night, live and in color from Symphony Hall. There will be others, about once a month.

Bob Hope's speci[illegible] Wednesday origin[illegible] the Univer[illegible] Califor[illegible]

STAR
WINCHESTER, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 5,450

JAN 16 1969

New England Newsclip

TV Concert January 28

A special color telecast of a concert by the Boston Symphony Chamber Players—will be on channels 2 and 44 Tuesday, January 28 at 9 p.m.

The Chamber Players perform Sextet for Piano and Winds by Francis Poulenc featuring pianist Richard Goode and Boston Symphony members Doriot Anthony Dwyer, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Gino Cioffi, clarinet; Sherman Walt, bassoon; and James Stagliano, French Horn.

Also on the program will be—Quartet for Piano and Strings, Op. 114 by Schubert, better known as the "Trout Quintet." With Goode again at the piano, the Quintet is performed by Boston Symphony concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, violin; Burton Fine, viola; Jules Eskin, cello; and Henry Portnoi, bass.

DAYTONA BEACH, FLA.
NEWS-JOURNAL
SUN. 43,500

DEC 8 1968

Boston Symphony On WNDB During 1969

The News-Journal's radio station, WNDB, has a magnificent Christmas present for the community — one that can be enjoyed every week of 1969.

Beginning Saturday night, Jan. 4, WNDB will broadcast weekly two hour concerts by the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra. The broadcasts will begin at 8 p.m., and will be available either in full stereo on WNDB-fm, or in mono on WNDB-am. WNDB-fm stereo is 94.5 on your dial, and the am station is 1150.

Tape Transcription

These concerts are being made possible by tape transcription, according to Bill Deem, WNDB manager. Radio stations across the country subscribe to a taped concert series provided through the Boston Symphony Transcription Trust, a subsidiary of the orchestra established in 1958. Net proceeds of the trust benefit the Pension Institute of the orchestra.

The Boston Symphony, with Erich Leinsdorf as its music director, is one of the most distinguished in the World. Established in 1881, it regularly gives concerts in Boston's Symphony Hall, which has been its home since 1900.

Its series of Summer concerts — at the Berkshire Music Center in the hills of Tanglewood, Mass. — have become internationally famous and annually attract thousands.

Costly Undertaking

Maintaining an orchestra of the size and quality of the Boston Symphony is an enormous undertaking. In the 1966-'67 season the total cost for salaries, administration, music, transportation, upkeep, etc., was more than $3 million — including the maintenance of two properties, Symphony Hall and Tanglewood.

The orchestra's season begins in late September, and ends in August at the conclusion of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood.

The Boston Pops, composed of 90 players from the 106 member Boston Symphony, has a season in May and June. Arthur Fiedler conducts 54 concerts during this series.

Announcement of the programs to be heard during the WNDB broadcasts of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will be announced regularly in The News-Journal papers.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. [illegible] SUN. 1,494,704

FEB 23 1969

Bob Greene

Erich Leinsdorf conducts "Great Albums of Opera" on WVNJ at 9:05 P.M. tonight

TWIN CITIAN
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
MONTHLY 9,000

NOV 1968

fm guide
program notes

BY CONNIE RYKS

FROM MONDAY THROUGH THURSDAY EVENINGS this month, as usual, KSJN listeners have the opportunity of listening to four of the finest American orchestras. These programs by the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Cleveland Orchestra, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Chicago Symphony Orchestra are recorded in concert each week and rebroadcast via stereo tape.

CLEVELAND ORCHESTRA

Two of this month's Cleveland Orchestra concerts originate from the new Blossom Music Center. George Szell conducts the orchestra in selections by Mozart and Richard Strauss, assisted by soprano Elisabeth Schwarzkopf in the Four Last Songs of Strauss, on November 5. Louis Lane conducts the following week on November 12 as the orchestra presents Carmina Burana by Carl Orff. The program on November 19 originates at Severance Hall, Cleveland, and includes Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony; George Szell, conducting. The final November concert, on the 26th, features pianist Peter Frankl in a performance of Mozart's Concerto in E-flat, K. 271. The Cleveland Orchestra is heard Tuesday evenings at 7:30 on KSJN.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is heard in concert every Wednesday night beginning at 8:00. The first program, of November 6, features pianist Malcolm Frager in Schumann's "Concerto in A minor," Op. 54. Erich Leinsdorf conducts.

CHICAGO ORCHESTRA

Andre Vandernoot conducts the Chicago Orchestra on November 7 in concert of the works of Moz[illegible] bern, Prokofiev and [illegible] November 14 conc[illegible] Joaquin Achuc[illegible] in the Ga[illegible] other [illegible]

11 Classical Stations Form Separate Assn.

WASHINGTON — The Concert Music Broadcasters Association—an organization devoted to furthering classical music radio—was formed here March 23 by 11 of the nation's major classical music radio stations. Sponsoring the association will be the Cleveland Orchestra Syndication Service and the Boston Symphony Transcription Trust. The Cleveland Orchestra records for Columbia Records and has product also on Epic and Angel; the Boston Symphony records for RCA Records.

The direction of the new organization will be similar to that of the Country Music Association in the country music field, according to Bob Conrad, vice-president of programming for WCLV-FM, Cleveland, and Tom Bird, manager of sales and programming at WNCN-FM, New York. "Members attending the first informal meeting felt both the National Association of Broadcasters and the National Association of FM Broadcasters were going off on different tangents," said Conrad.

Bird said the organization was "very eager" for the participation of record labels, recording artists, and composers. The organization will be open to any radio station which considers itself a classical station and, he said, air personalities or stations that have limited classical programming would also be allowed to join. Conrad, at WCLV-FM, Penthouse East, Terminal Tower, Cleveland 44113, will serve temporarily as a clearing house for the new association.

Broadcasters at the first meeting included Walter Neiman, vice-president and general manager of WQXR in New York; Bird of WNCN-FM, New York; Pat Patrick, president, and Conrad of WCLV-FM, Cleveland; Harry Ward, program director of WGMS, Washington; Dick Kaye, vice-president and general manager of WCRB, Boston; Ray Nordstrand, general manager of WFMT-FM, Chicago; Ed Stevens, general manager of KFAC, Los Angeles, Tim O'Connor, general manager of KFML, Denver; Ed Koepke, general manager of KDEN-FM, Denver; Ron Schmidt, general manager of KLEF-FM, Houston; Durwood Tucker, general manager of WRR-FM, Dallas. Herb Groskin, president of the radio representative firm of Herbert Groskin, also attended.

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000
APR 5 1969

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300
AUG 27 1969
New England Newsclip

TV Notes

Channel 12

NET FESTIVAL
Wednesday August 27 at 8:00 PM

"Leinsdorf Recreates" presents a rehersal session in the studios of WGBH-TV in Boston, between Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony, and members of the senior orchestra of the New England Conservatory of Music. The session was specially arranged for this telecast, but considered by the Conservatory as part of the training program for its students. Leinsdorf selected the third movement of the symphony No. 1 by Gustav Mahler to rehersea , feeling it would give the orchestra a full workout in ensemble as well as individual instrumental excellence.

STONINGTON, MAINE
ISLAND AD-VANTAGES
WEEKLY 1,035
047
AUG 22 1969
New England Newsclip

Wednesday's Television Highlights, Previews

7:00 p. m.—(9)—Special—"Indianapolis 500." Highlights of the annual Memorial Day Auto Racing Classic. (C)

7:30 p. m. — (9) — Special—"Heisman Trophy." College Football's most coveted award, the Heisman Trophy, is examined in this special along with the players who won it over the years. Lindsey Nelson is host and narrator. (C)

8:00 p. m.—(2)—NET Festival—"Leinsdorf Recreates." Maestro Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony, rehearses the young players of the senior orchestra of the New England Conservatory of Music in Mahler's Symphony No. 3 (third movement) and takes time to answer their questions.

Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 504,669 SUN. 935,458
JUN 8 1969

Stereo Corner

Last week's brief look at four-channel recordings as the possible next step in home music systems indicated some problems before the idea can take hold commercially.

Four-channel recording, being explored by the recording companies and Acoustic Research, Inc.? of Cambridge, Mass., is part of the search for concert hall realism. Two-track stereo has gone a long way toward realism, but does not go all the way because of the nature of sound in a room. The listener hears sound from the instruments and hears it reflected from the walls and ceiling so that he is enveloped in that acoustical environment, not seated at the focus of two speakers, left and right. Four-channel is a way of developing that environment, the researchers say.

COULD MOVE NOW

The imminence of four-channel recordings leaves time to think about the project, however. Robert Berkovitz, engineer on AR's staff, says, "I know there is big interest in the industry but great reluctance at the management level to launch sales of four-track equipment.

"Unlike stereo, which had to await the means to make it possible, four-channel recordings nad playback are possible now. It could be marketed today.

CASSETTE POTENTIAL

"I think some musical considerations stand in the way. In the Austin book on Debussy he asks what do you do when you no longer have to write in a special way? Well, break down the barriers and send music at a listener from every angle and it's difficult to imagine what will evolve. I've heard a quartet with one instrument coming from a speaker in each corner, and it's not bad. It took a lot of getting used to.

"One tantalizing possibility for four-channel recording is the cassette. It is already a four-track arrangement and if you substituted an electrical speed control and some kind of equalization process, a simplified Dolby process, the cassette could be a fine four-channel means.

"The best records are still better than the best cassettes, but we've come up with only negative answers trying to develop a four-channel disc. It will have to be tape.

"I know that people are already saying, where are you going to put the loudspeakers? It was like that when stereo came out, but four-channel will happen. People will find a place for four speakers. Four-channel is simply a better way to hear music and a better way to produce it. I think it's the only way to match and possibly outdistance concert hall sound," he says.

RECORDING PROJECT

AR is going ahead with plans to place four-channel recordings with FM stations, although Berkovitz stresses that the firm is not going to produce tapes commercially in competition with any of the big companies. And, the firm will broadcast all the Boston Symphony Concerts next fall in Boston, using two FM stations. Listener with two receivers and four speakers will hear the four-channel experiment.

D. W.

MUSIC EDUCATORS JOURNAL
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MONTHLY 54,000
APR 1969

SCHULLER B.S.O. BROADCASTS. Since December 1968, Gunther Schuller, president of the New England Conservatory of Music, Boston, Massachusetts, has been giving ten-minute lectures on various musical subjects during the intermission of the live radio broadcasts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts. Tapes of these lectures have been given to the Boston Symphony Transcription Trust for distribution to over one hundred radio stations that carry the B.S.O. broadcasts.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905
MAR 23 1969
New England Newsclip

87

...e of ...and sub- ...atic pressure ...were the signifi- ...tors. West German ...nomic, cultural and technical aid to South Korea is exected to be resumed now after a suspension of more than a year and a half.

To end on a less serious note: A Cambridge reader proposes something new for the Boston Symphony's Table of Organization. She writes that she has been watching the Channel 2 telecasts of Tuesday night Symphony concerts, and she has been distressed by the tight fit of the jacket on a player whose caloric intake is evidently too high, and even more by having noticed holes in the socks of two cellists. "Good Lord," she concludes, "what they need is a wardrobe mistress."

CATV Authorized To Originate Shows

By ROBERT WINDELER

The Board of Estimate yesterday authorized the three cable television companies now operating in New York to originate their own public service and "social, cultural and artistic programs." At the same time, the board gave the city's Director of Franchises the power to decide what movies and other programs could be shown on subscribers' screens.

The board's action specifically excluded the right of the cable companies to broadcast "pure" entertainment movie films and professional sporting events now normally seen on commercial or educational TV.

It is believed to be the first time in the United States that a city or state government has empowered itself to pass judgment on what is entertainment or culture in tlevision programing.

Continued on Page 95, Column 9

CATV Authorized Shows

Continued From Page 1, Col. 8

Other types of programimg transmitted over the cable, however, would constitute a new competitive force in the television medium.

The cable systems, which have 10,000 subscribers in New York, relay the programs of conventional TV stations from a central receiving point to individual homes. The system overcomes problems caused by tall structures and other above ground factors interfering with signals.

The cables can carry up to 20 programs, more than is required for relay purposes. The excess channels can be used for other services.

Motion picture theater owners, together with state legislators representing less affluent and minority group districts, had led the opposition to allowing cable TV to originate programing, contending it was "pay TV through the back door." They said they would carry their fight to the State Legislature when it convenes in January.

Morris Tarshis, the city's Director of Franchises, said he anticipated "no problem with travel and documentary films," but he declined to state — until he has had further meetings with the Mayor and members of the Board of Estimate — the city's criteria for determining what constitutes entertainment.

"I don't plan to be a censor, though," he said.

Charles F. Dolan, president of Manhattan Cable Television, said he would ot proceed wit plansfor a weekly classic film festival "until we have submitted every film on our list to the city for its ruling.

"We just don't know what it (the board's action) means, but we will co-operate," he said, "we don't think the city really wants to be a crusa...

The board's said. "They can adopted by a ...s been decided Controller Ma...y do try to pass (four votes) an... dent Abe St...ll go to Albany and Borough ...inst origination." T. Connor (tw...cable companies Staten Island ...unlimited rights

The measur...rogramming. Mr. cable-originate...had conferred on be broadcast ... Rosel H. Hyde, cost to cable ...e Federal Comrent cable ch...ommission, intromately $5 a mo...lution to exclude

The board's ...ment" films and last week's ...ional sports. Federal Comm...whose Manhattan mission to enc...ned by Sterling of cable TV wh... (55 per cent) ly protecting ... (45 per cent), ability of tod... go ahead with over-the-air tel... announced plan

In many esse... American Symproposals clos... and Columbia ommendations ...ball games advisory task ... which are held munity ante...nday afternoons headed by Fr...enings at Carnetelevision con...e games—which Foundation. ...on the sporting

The proposa...n because they tems be allow...—would begin programing wa...three weeks, Mr. by Manhattan ... Teleprompter ...ional sporting and CATV Em...represents an area has a franchis...controversy, Mr. dale section o... because the Aug. 15. Publi...on left in doubt held on Oct. 2...ssional football sons testifying. ...are blacked out

The Board o...ms are in New poned a decis...ing events that and yesterday'...ed out altogether as a slight s...sed-circuit broadsides. ...s theaters) would

"Santa Cla...ble TV broadcast. early this year...aid he was "inLeonard P. St...moment to feel Democrat who...uld qualify." tion. "It was ...m festival, Mr. for the Board ... to present "The have acted on...Jules and Jim," warned that ..." "Ivan the Terbills before th...I and II, "Rashture concerning...Gate of Hell," all nation." ...sed films, and the Mr. Proccac...less acclaimed after the vote...the Wind," effectiveness o...and "The Magnifilegislation. ...

"This lets the...

New York Times 12-20-68

11 Classical Stations Form Separate Assn.

WASHINGTON — The Concert Music Broadcasters Association—an organization devoted to furthering classical music radio—was formed here March 23 by 11 of the nation's major classical music radio stations. Sponsoring the association will be the Cleveland Orchestra Syndication Service and the Boston Symphony Transcription Trust. The Cleveland Orchestra records for Columbia Records and has product also on Epic and Angel; the Boston Symphony records for RCA Records.

The direction of the new organization will be similar to that of the Country Music Association in the country music field, according to Bob Conrad, vice-president of programming for WCLV-FM, Cleveland, and Tom Bird, manager of sales and programming at WNCN-FM, New York. "Members attending the first informal meeting felt both the National Association of Broadcasters and the National Association of FM Broadcasters were going off on different tangents," said Conrad.

Bird said the organization was "very eager" for the participation of record labels, recording artists, and composers. The organization will be open to any radio station which considers itself a classical station and, he said, air personalities or stations that have limited classical programming would also be allowed to join. Conrad, at WCLV-FM, Penthouse East, Terminal Tower, Cleveland 44113, will serve temporarily as a clearing house for the new association.

Broadcasters at the first meeting included Walter Neiman, vice-president and general manager of WQXR in New York; Bird of WNCN-FM, New York; Pat Patrick, president, and Conrad of WCLV-FM, Cleveland; Harry Ward, program director of WGMS, Washington; Dick Kaye, vice-president and general manager of WCRB, Boston; Ray Nordstrand, general manager of WFMT-FM, Chicago; Ed Stevens, general manager of KFAC, Los Angeles, Tim O'Connor, general manager of KFML, Denver; Ed Koepke, general manager of KDEN-FM, Denver; Ron Schmidt, general manager of KLEF-FM, Houston; Durwood Tucker, general manager of WRR-FM, Dallas. Herb Groskin, president of the radio representative firm of Herbert Groskin, also attended.

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000
APR 5 1969

MUSIC EDUCATORS JOURNAL
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MONTHLY
APR 1969

SCHULLER B.S.O. BROADCASTS. Since December 1968, Gunther Schuller, president of the New England Conservatory of Music, Boston, Massachusetts, has been giving ten-minute lectures on various musical subjects during the intermission of the live radio broadcasts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts. Tapes of these lectures have been given to the Boston Symphony Transcription Trust for distribution to over one hundred radio stations that carry the B.S.O. broadcasts.

T V Notes

Channel 12

NET FESTIVAL
Wednesday August 27 at 8:00 PM

"Leinsdorf Recreates" presents a rehersal session in the studios of WGBH-TV in Boston, between Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony, and members of the senior orchestra of the New England Conservatory of Music. The session was specially arranged for this telecast, but considered by the Conservatory as part of the training program for its students. Leinsdorf selected the third movement of the symphony No. 1 by Gustav Mahler to rehersea , feeling it would give the orchestra a full workout in ensemble as well as individual instrumental excellence.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300
AUG 27 1969
New England Newsclip

STONINGTON, MAINE
ISLAND ADVANTAGES
WEEKLY 1,035
047
AUG 22 1969
New England Newsclip

Wednesday's Television Highlights, Previews

7:00 p. m.—(9)—Special—"Indianapolis 500." Highlights of the annual Memorial Day Auto Racing Classic. (C)

7:30 p. m. — (9) — Special—"Heisman Trophy." College Football's most coveted award, the Heisman Trophy, is examined in this special along with the players who won it over the years. Lindsey Nelson is host and narrator. (C)

8:00 p. m.—(2)—NET Festival—"Leinsdorf Recreates." Maestro Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony, rehearses the young players of the senior orchestra of the New England Conservatory of Music in Mahler's Symphony No. 3 (third movement) and takes time to answer their questions.

Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 504,669 SUN. 935,458
JUN 8 1969

Stereo Corner

Last week's brief look at four-channel recordings as the possible next step in home music systems indicated some problems before the idea can take hold commercially.

Four-channel recording, being explored by the recording companies and Acoustic Research, Inc., of Cambridge, Mass., is part of the search for concert hall realism. Two-track stereo has gone a long way toward realism, but does not go all the way because of the nature of sound in a room. The listener hears sound from the instruments and hears it reflected from the walls and ceiling so that he is enveloped in that acoustical environment, not seated at the focus of two speakers, left and right. Four-channel is a way of developing that environment, the researchers say.

COULD MOVE NOW

The imminence of four-channel recordings leaves time to think about the project, however. Robert Berkovitz, engineer on AR's staff, says, "I know there is big interest in the industry but great reluctance at the management level to launch sales of four-track equipment.

"Unlike stereo, which had to await the means to make it possible, four-channel recordings nad playback are possible now. It could be marketed today.

CASSETTE POTENTIAL

"I think some musical considerations stand in the way. In the Austin book on Debussy he asks what do you do when you no longer have to write in a special way? Well, break down the barriers and send music at a listener from every angle and it's difficult to imagine what will evolve. I've heard a quartet with one instrument coming from a speaker in each corner, and it's not bad. It took a lot of getting used to.

"One tantalizing possibility for four-channel recording is the cassette. It is already a four-track arrangement and if you substituted an electrical speed control and some kind of equalization process, a simplified Dolby process, the cassette could be a fine four-channel means.

"The best records are still better than the best cassettes, but we've come up with only negative answers trying to develop a four-channel disc. It will have to be tape.

"I know that people are already saying, where are you going to put the loudspeakers? It was like that when stereo came out, but four-channel will happen. People will find a place for four speakers. Four-channel is simply a better way to hear music and a better way to produce it. I think it's the only way to match and possibly outdistance concert hall sound," he says.

RECORDING PROJECT

AR is going ahead with plans to place four-channel recordings with FM stations, although Berkovitz stresses that the firm is not going to produce tapes commercially in competition with any of the big companies. And, the firm will broadcast all the Boston Symphony Concerts next fall in Boston, using two FM stations. Listener with two receivers and four speakers will hear the four-channel experiment.

D. W.

...e of ...and sub- ...atic pressure ...were the signifi- ...ctors. West German ...nomic, cultural and technical aid to South Korea is exected to be resumed now after a suspension of more than a year and a half.

To end on a less serious note: A Cambridge reader proposes something new for the Boston Symphony's Table of ~~Organization~~. She writes that she has been watching the Channel 2 telecasts of Tuesday night Symphony concerts, and she has been distressed by the tight fit of the jacket on a player whose caloric intake is evidently too high, and even more by having noticed holes in the socks of two cellists. "Good Lord," she concludes, "what they need is a wardrobe mistress."

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905
MAR 23 1969
New England Newsclip

87.

CATV Authorized To Originate Shows

By ROBERT WINDELER

The Board of Estimate yesterday authorized the three cable television companies now operating in New York to originate their own public service and "social, cultural and artistic programs." At the same time, the board gave the city's Director of Franchises the power to decide what movies and other programs could be shown on subscribers' screens.

The board's action specifically excluded the right of the cable companies to broadcast "pure entertainment movie films" and professional sporting events now normally seen on commercial or educational TV.

It is believed to be the first time in the United States that a city or state government has empowered itself to pass judgment on what is entertainment or culture in tlevision programing.

Continued on Page 95, Column 2

CATV Authorized Shows

Continued From Page 1, Col. 8

Other types of programimg transmitted over the cable, however, would constitute a new competitive force in the television medium.

The cable systems, which have 10,000 subscribers in New York, relay the programs of conventional TV stations from a central receiving point to individual homes. The system overcomes problems caused by tall structures and other above-ground factors interfering with signals.

The cables can carry up to 20 programs, more than is required for relay purposes. The excess channels can be used for other services.

Motion picture theater owners, together with state legislators representing less affluent and minority group districts, had led the opposition to allowing cable TV to originate programing, contending it was "pay TV through the back door." They said they would carry their fight to the State Legislature when it convenes in January.

Morris Tarshis, the city's Director of Franchises, said he anticipated "no problem with travel and documentary films," but he declined to state — until he has had further meetings with the Mayor and members of the Board of Estimate — the city's criteria for determining what constitutes entertainment.

"I don't plan to be a censor, though," he said.

Charles F. Dolan, president of Manhattan Cable Television, said he would ot proceed wit plansfor a weekly classic film festival "until we have submitted every film on our list to the city for its ruling.

"We just don't know what it (the board's action) means, but we will co-operate," ..e said, "we don't think the city really wants to be a crusor."

The board's said. "They can adopted by a's been decided Controller Mar ey do try to pass (four votes) an ll go to Albany dent Abe Sta inst origination." and Borough T. Connor (tw cable companies Staten Island v unlimited rights

The measur programming. Mr. cable-originate had conferred on be broadcast Rosel H. Hyde, cost to cable he Federal Com without comm mmission, intro- rent cable ch lution to exclude mately $5 a mo nment" films and

The board's sional sports. last week's p whose Manhattan Federal Comm wned by Sterling mission to enc n (55 per cent) of cable TV wh (45 per cent), ly protecting go ahead with ability of toda announced plan over-the-air tel American Sym-

In many esse s and Columbia proposals close ball games. ommendations s, which are held advisory task unday afternoons munity ante venings at Carne- headed by Fr ue games—which television con om the sporting Foundation. on because they

The proposa tems be allow —would begin programing wa three weeks, Mr. by Manhattan Teleprompter ssional sporting and CATV Ent represents an area has a franchis controversy, Mr. dale section o because the Aug. 15. Publi tion left in doubt held on Oct. 2 essional football sons testifying are blacked out

The Board o ms are in New poned a decis xing events that and yesterday ted out altogether as a slight s sed-circuit broad- sides. e theaters) would

"Santa Cla ble TV broadcast. early this year said he was "in- Leonard P. St moment to feel Democrat who uld qualify." tion. "It was lm festival, Mr. for the Board to present "The have acted on Jules and Jim," warned that "Ivan the Ter- bills before th I and II, "Rash- ture concerning Gate of Hell," all nation." sed films, and

Mr. Proccac less acclaimed after the vote n the Wind," effectiveness o and "The Magnifi- legislation. "This lets thus."

New York Times 12-20-68

11 Classical Stations Form Separate Assn.

WASHINGTON — The Concert Music Broadcasters Association—an organization devoted to furthering classical music radio—was formed here March 23 by 11 of the nation's major classical music radio stations. Sponsoring the association will be the Cleveland Orchestra Syndication Service and the Boston Symphony Transcription Trust. The Cleveland Orchestra records for Columbia Records and has product also on Epic and Angel; the Boston Symphony records for RCA Records.

The direction of the new organization will be similar to that of the Country Music Association in the country music field, according to Bob Conrad, vice-president of programming for WCLV-FM, Cleveland, and Tom Bird, manager of sales and programming at WNCN-FM, New York. "Members attending the first informal meeting felt both the National Association of Broadcasters and the National Association of FM Broadcasters were going off on different tangents," said Conrad.

Bird said the organization was "very eager" for the participation of record labels, recording artists, and composers. The organization will be open to any radio station which considers itself a classical station and, he said, air personalities or stations that have limited classical programming would also be allowed to join. Conrad, at WCLV-FM, Penthouse East, Terminal Tower, Cleveland 44113, will serve temporarily as a clearing house for the new association.

Broadcasters at the first meeting included Walter Neiman, vice-president and general manager of WQXR in New York; Bird of WNCN-FM, New York; Pat Patrick, president, and Conrad of WCLV-FM, Cleveland; Harry Ward, program director of WGMS, Washington; Dick Kaye, vice-president and general manager of WCRB, Boston; Ray Nordstrand, general manager of WFMT-FM, Chicago; Ed Stevens, general manager of KFAC, Los Angeles, Tim O'Connor, general manager of KFML, Denver; Ed Koepke, general manager of KDEN-FM, Denver; Ron Schmidt, general manager of KLEF-FM, Houston; Durwood Tucker, general manager of WRR-FM, Dallas. Herb Groskin, president of the radio representative firm of Herbert Groskin, also attended.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300
AUG 27 1969
New England Newsclip

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000
APR 5 1969

MUSIC EDUCATORS JOURNAL
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MONTHLY 21,000
APR 1969

SCHULLER B.S.O. BROADCASTS. Since December 1968, Gunther Schuller, president of the New England Conservatory of Music, Boston, Massachusetts, has been giving ten-minute lectures on various musical subjects during the intermission of the live radio broadcasts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts. Tapes of these lectures have been given to the Boston Symphony Transcription Trust for distribution to over one hundred radio stations that carry the B.S.O. broadcasts.

T V Notes

Channel 12

NET FESTIVAL
Wednesday August 27 at 8:00 PM

"Leinsdorf Recreates" presents a rehersal session in the studios of WGBH-TV in Boston, between Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony, and members of the senior orchestra of the New England Conservatory of Music. The session was specially arranged for this telecast, but considered by the Conservatory as part of the training program for its students. Leinsdorf selected the third movement of the symphony No. 1 by Gustav Mahler to rehersea , feeling it would give the orchestra a full workout in ensemble as well as individual instrumental excellence.

STONINGTON, MAINE
ISLAND ADVANTAGES
WEEKLY 1,035
047
AUG 22 1969
New England Newsclip

Wednesday's Television Highlights, Previews

7:00 p. m.—(9)—Special—"Indianapolis 500." Highlights of the annual Memorial Day Auto Racing Classic. (C)

7:30 p. m. — (9) — Special—"Heisman Trophy." College Football's most coveted award, the Heisman Trophy, is examined in this special along with the players who won it over the years. Lindsey Nelson is host and narrator. (C)

8:00 p. m.—(2)—NET Festival—"Leinsdorf Recreates." Maestro Erich Leinsdorf, music director of the Boston Symphony, rehearses the young players of the senior orchestra of the New England Conservatory of Music in Mahler's Symphony No. 3 (third movement) and takes time to answer their questions.

Philadelphia Inquirer
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 504,669 SUN. 935,458
JUN 8 1969

Stereo Corner

Last week's brief look at four-channel recordings as the possible next step in home music systems indicated some problems before the idea can take hold commercially.

Four-channel recording, being explored by the recording companies and Acoustic Research, Inc.* of Cambridge, Mass., is part of the search for concert hall realism. Two-track stereo has gone a long way toward realism, but does not go all the way because of the nature of sound in a room. The listener hears sound from the instruments and hears it reflected from the walls and ceiling so that he is enveloped in that acoustical environment, not seated at the focus of two speakers, left and right. Four-channel is a way of developing that environment, the researchers say.

COULD MOVE NOW

The imminence of four-channel recordings leaves time to think about the project, however. Robert Berkovitz, engineer on AR's staff, says, "I know there is big interest in the industry but great reluctance at the management level to launch sales of four-track equipment.

"Unlike stereo, which had to await the means to make it possible, four-channel recordings nad playback are possible now. It could be marketed today.

CASSETTE POTENTIAL

"I think some musical considerations stand in the way. In the Austin book on Debussy he asks what do you do when you no longer have to write in a special way? Well, break down the barriers and send music at a listener from every angle and it's difficult to imagine what will evolve. I've heard a quartet with one instrument coming from a speaker in each corner, and it's not bad. It took a lot of getting used to.

"One tantalizing possibility for four-channel recording is the cassette. It is already a four-track arrangement and if you substituted an electrical speed control and some kind of equalization process, a simplified Dolby process, the cassette could be a fine four-channel means.

"The best records are still better than the best cassettes, but we've come up with only negative answers trying to develop a four-channel disc. It will have to be tape.

"I know that people are already saying, where are you going to put the loudspeakers? It was like that when stereo came out, but four-channel will happen. People will find a place for four speakers. Four-channel is simply a better way to hear music and a better way to produce it. I think it's the only way to match and possibly outdistance concert hall sound," he says.

RECORDING PROJECT

AR is going ahead with plans to place four-channel recordings with FM stations, although Berkovitz stresses that the firm is not going to produce tapes commercially in competition with any of the big companies. And, the firm will broadcast all the Boston Symphony Concerts next fall in Boston, using two FM stations. Listener with two receivers and four speakers will hear the four-channel experiment.

D. W.

SUNDAY GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
CIRC. 555,905
MAR 23 1969
New England Newsclip

87

...e of ...and sub... ...atic pressure ...were the signifi... ...ctors. West German ...nomic, cultural and technical aid to South Korea is exected to be resumed now after a suspension of more than a year and a half.

To end on a less serious note: A Cambridge reader proposes something new for the Boston Symphony's Table of Organizations. She writes that she has been watching the Channel 2 telecasts of Tuesday night Symphony concerts, and she has been distressed by the tight fit of the jacket on a player whose caloric intake is evidently too high, and even more by having noticed holes in the socks of two cellists. "Good Lord," she concludes, "what they need is a wardrobe mistress."

CATV Authorized To Originate Shows

By ROBERT WINDELER

The Board of Estimate yesterday authorized the three cable television companies now operating in New York to originate their own public service and "social, cultural and artistic programs." At the same time, the board gave the city's Director of Franchises the power to decide what movies and other programs could be shown on subscribers' screens.

The board's action specifically excluded the right of the cable companies to broadcast "pure entertainment movie films" and professional sporting events now normally seen on commercial or educational TV.

It is believed to be the first time in the United States that a city or state government has empowered itself to pass judgment on wha... or culture ... graming.

Continued on Page 95, Column 2

CATV to Originate Shows

Continued Fro

Other type... transmitted ... however, wo... new competi... television me...

The cable... have 10,000 ... York, relay ... conventional... a central rec... dividual ho... overcomes p... tall structure... ground facto... signals.

The cable... 20 programs... quired for r... excess chan... for other s...

Motion pi... ers, togethe... lators repres... and minori... had led the ... ing cable T... graming, c... "pay TV ... door." They... carry their ... Legislature ... in January.

Morris T... Director of ... anticipated ... travel and ... but he dec... until he has... ings with th... members ... Estimate — ... for determi... tutes enter...

"I don't p... though," he...

Charles F... of Manhatta... said he wo... plansfor a ... festival "un... mitted ever... to the city...

"We just... it (the boar... but we wi... said, "we d... really want... resolution was ... 14-8 vote, with ...io A. Proccacino ...d Borough Presi... ...rk of Brooklyn ... President Robert ...o votes each) of ...oting against.

...e provides that ...d programs must ...at no additional ... subscribers and ...ercials. The cur... ...arge is approxi... ...nth.

... action followed ...roposals by the ...unications Com... ...ourage expansion ...ile simultaneous... ...he economic bi... ...y's conventional ...evision.

...entials, the F.C.C. ...ly followed rec... ... of the Mayor's ... force on com... ...na television, ...ed W. Friendly, ...sultant to the For...

... that cable sys... ...ed to originate ...s first submitted ... Cable TV and ...Manhattan CATV ...terprises, which ...e in the River... ...f the Bronx, on ...c hearings were ...24, with 58 per...

...f Estimate post... ...ion three times ...s decision came ...urprise to both ...

...us has come ...," Assemblyman ...visky, a Queens ... led the opposi... ... unconscionable ... of Estimate to ... Dec. 19, fore... ...there would be ...e State Legisla... ...cable TV origi...

...no, interviewed ... dismissed the ...f possible state ...e legislators off the hook," he said. "They can say 'look, it's been decided already.' If they do try to pass anything I will go to Albany and speak against origination."

The three cable companies had asked for unlimited rights to originate programming. Mr. Lindsay, who had conferred on Tuesday with Rosel H. Hyde, chairman of the Federal Communications Commission, introduced the resolution to exclude "pure entertainment" films and certain professional sports.

Mr. Delon, whose Manhattan cable TV is owned by Sterling Communication (55 per cent) and Time Inc. (45 per cent), said he would go ahead with its previously announced plan to televise live American Symphony concerts and Columbia College basketball games.

The concerts, which are held on alternate Sunday afternoons and Monday evenings at Carnegie Hall, and the games—which are exempt from the sporting events provision because they are "amateur"—would begin within two to three weeks, Mr. Dolan said.

The professional sporting events clause represents an area of potential controversy, Mr. Tarshis said, because the board's resolution left in doubt whether professional football games that are blacked out when the teams are in New York, and boxing events that are often blacked out altogether (except for closed-circuit broadcasts in movie theaters) would qualify for cable TV broadcast. Mr. Tarshis said he was "inclined at the moment to feel that they would qualify."

For his film festival, Mr. Dolan plans to present "The 400 Blows," "Jules and Jim," "Citizen Kane," "Ivan the Terrible," parts I and II, "Rashomon," and "Gate of Hell," all critically praised films, and the somewhat less acclaimed "Whistle Down the Wind," "Gunga Din" and "The Magnificent Ambersons."

New York Times 12-20-68

CONGRATULATIONS and BEST WISHES to THE AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE

May, 1969

from the Editor

THIS BIG ISSUE is our way of celebrating the 35th anniversary of The American Record Guide, formerly The American Music Lover. If you wonder why Volume 35, No. 9 (instead of No. 1) marks the occasion, the answer is simply that our so-called "volume year" was changed two or three times somewhere back along the line. But Volume 1, No. 1 was a May issue (its front cover is reproduced on the adjoining page), and you are now reading our 35th consecutive one.

Strictly speaking the ARG may be said to go back even further because our beloved P.H.R., whom I succeeded in 1957, previously had been Editor of The Music Lover's Guide. The latter began publication in 1932 and appeared regularly until just before the ARG was founded. But why argue about a couple of years?

Moreover, the ARG was not the first American periodical in this field anyhow. That distinction belongs to our esteemed prototype The Phonograph Monthly Review, which Axel B. Johnson established in 1926 and published until it gave way to The Music Lover's Guide a half-dozen years later. (Inasmuch as the latter in turn gave way to the ARG, then known as the AML, obviously it is at least defensible to argue that the link has been more or less direct since 1926.)

One thing you must say for the ARG no matter what: it has long since earned the endurance prize. No other recordings magazine in the United States has stayed alive for thirty-five years — or thirty-eight or forty-three, depending on your arithmetic. I am willing to settle for the minimum mileage because it beats every other American publication in any case. Besides, the palm really belongs to our English counterpart — The Gramophone — which has been published uninterruptedly since 1923.

In planning for this 35th anniversary issue I tinkered with the idea of getting a little memoir from as many of our erstwhile contributors as are still extant. But there was no coaxing an article out of P.H.R., and the only other charter member of the staff — dear Phil Miller — said his piece on the "good old days" in the 30th anniversary number five years ago. Then I got to thinking what an alumni call might have elicited, and it could have been enough prose to fill an issue more than twice this size.

Flicking through back volumes I have encountered reviews and articles by, just to name a few and in no particular order of eminence, Jacques Barzun, Nathan Broder, Richard Angell, Hans T. David, Paul Nettl, Nicolas Slonimsky, H. C. Robbins-Landon, Marion Bauer, Neville Cardus, Winthrop Sargeant, Francis Robinson, Klaus Pringsheim (a friend and pupil of Gustav Mahler), John K. Sherman, Edward Sackville-West, Arthur Berger, F. F. Clough and G. J. Cuming, Roland Gelatt, David Hal ing, Igor Kipnis (and h ander), Allen Hughes, Ra Harold C. Schonberg, V Alan Rich, Cecil Gray, Robert Sabin, Moses Smit heimer, Alfred Franken Sprague Smith, John T Walter Legge, Beniamin Hempel, Joseph Szigeti, N (Faubion?) Bowers, God Lawrence Gilman, Carl Abraham Veinus, Maria I R. Marek, and none less raja of Mysore!

And that, mind you, is complete list. A few of no longer among the liv others had responded we out of space for sure.

No matter. Our chr phonographic art is all th volumes, month by mon historians. They will ha to our unique archives so cause no other publicati in this issue has to do with the Mozart Divertimento No. 17, K. 334. We take this heavenly piece for granted, as if it had been around constantly for a couple of centuries. But in May of 1935 the situation was otherwise. To wit:

"Until a few months ago, this work was unknown to concert programs. It was due to Sir Hamilton Harty, who performs the work in the present recording [with the London Philharmonic: Columbia set No. 207], that it came into the concert repertoire, where assuredly it belongs." And where, assuredly, it has been ever since.

The nine-sided Also Sprach Zarathustra performed by th [redacted] under the incomparable [redacted] (Victor set M-257) occupies a special place in the history of recorded sound quite aside from its musical values. Our appraisal of it in Volume 1, No. 1: "the most realistic reproduction of a modern symphony orchestra we have ever heard." And indeed, no one would hear any better sonics for quite a while after that.

Another historical note of special inter with a Tartar exhilaration, run the movements with throbbing and thus lose sight of one impor namely, a change in the tone o ous moods.

"Now, fire and enthusiasm tion are superlative qualities because the possession of th dynamic and vibrant temper in order to achieve a requ between the manifold mood nuances, it would seem w one's enthusiasm and strive passionate rendition. For tranquility in the Nocturn come to us. For to have ter of animation prevai other three movements much as Pope felt wh master-passion in the b serpent, swallows all th

"This may be an ficiency when one con playing of the ensem truth, the deficiency ment, of feeling, rat exp wit ser

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF, Music Director
THOMAS D. PERRY, Jr., Manager
SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS 02115
Telephone (617) COmmonwealth 6-1492

June 19, 1967

Mr. W. Schwann
Schwann Record Catalog
137 Newbury Street
Boston, Massachusetts 02116

Dear Mr. Schwann

It is a rare event when any product of the human mind has been accepted as a singular achievement. While there is constant debate and dispute over which encyclopedia, which of the dictionaries, which of the anthologies of various kinds is superior, there is very little dissent (at least I have heard none) over your accomplishment in creating for the United States recording world the unchallenged, authoritative guide, both for the producer/performer and for the listener/buyer. With all the many companies and activities I do not quite see how you keep up to date, but however you do it, it is certainly worthy of a big thank-you from all. Since I cannot speak for everyone, of course, let me at least say bravo and thank you for myself.

With all good wishes,

Sincerely yours,

Erich Leinsdorf

Erich Leinsdorf

Thank you, Mr. Leinsdorf,

for your kind words. It means a lot to us to know our work on Schwann Catalogs is helpful to musicians and all concerned with the making, selling and buying of long playing records.

sustained melody sung on the vowel sounds. If the Tone resembles operatic recitative, the Alleluia is the beginning of coloratura. These Alleluias and the Gradual which follows belong to that form of chant called the Respond, in which the Priest alternates with the choir.

"That the recording comes from Nashdom Abbey, the headquarters of the Plainsong and Mediaeval Music Society, ensures its authenticity. This organization is doing for ancient music in England what the Benedictines of Solesmes have accomplished in France. Dom Anselm Hughes, who directs the singing on this record, became secretary of the Society in 1926, and is known as one of the world's foremost authorities on Gregorian music. He has lately been lecturing in this country. . . ."

The ARG policy of making room for dissent was evident from the beginning, [redacted] For example, after noting that the [redacted] London Philharmonic recording of Beethoven's Fifth "offended our aesthetic sense for the disproportionateness of its tempi", P.H.R. went out of his way to cite a contrary view by the English critic and subsequent ARG contributor Sidney Grew:

"[redacted] does a thing that is rare in performances of the Fifth Symphony: he elevates the slow movement to the heights of the other movements. It is customary with the critics to say that this movement is relatively weak. And, certainly, in the hands of most conductors, it is that. Actually, of course, it is as noble, as strong, and as 'dynamic' as its companions.

"His tempo is slow. But though this has a good deal to do with the matter, it is only a part of the influences at work. Also his vision into the depths and distances of the instrumental sounds is exceptionally sharp and true, so that the elements are discovered and revealed to the listener which as a rule are not noticed. But even this is but a portion of these influences in intensif [redacted] The full explanation is, tha [redacted] alizes the symphony as a whole. He has it as an integer in his imagination, and so infuses the andante, its second theme, and its variations of the first theme, wit common vitality of the whole work."

To which P.H.R. adds: "Althoug do not concur with this opinion, we it because it illustrates how difficult to establish a standard of interpret . . . ."

The relatively small number of re c. 1935 left plenty of room for artic

Volume 1, No. 1 had no fewer tha such pieces. One was the first "Bach and Handel: Divergent P ities" by Compton Pakenham. was "The Symphony in the Parlor Girard. A re-reading of this re how important radio was in th and in retrospect the concluding has not only a certain piquancy wistful thought for our own t tuting "television" and "tele appropriate):

"The 'symphony in the of the great miracles of mar it should be considered an Some day the high officia going to realize that thi serves bigger and better t has been given to date all going to be able to t symphony orchestra on d the week. There isn't r why we shouldn't have a broadcast nightly. We enough symphony orchest dreds of thousands of people in on more broadcasts of th

Third and best of the artic 1, No. 1 was a charmer en Mechanical Music Has E Neville d'Esterre, an English was to contribute many more p are some of the better paragrap

"Those who lament the decay tive skill in music and technical of the art in this country, cause development of mechanical repr bear a family resemblance to th breed of laudatores temporis acti — who make a habit of regretting wh call 'the good old times.'

"Most periods of human history been pretty mouldy, in a general for most people, though fairly propi for a few fortunate or thick-skinned

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF
Music Director

CONGRATULATIONS
and BEST WISHES to
THE AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE

May, 1969

from the Editor

THIS BIG ISSUE is our way of celebrating the 35th anniversary of The American Record Guide, formerly The American Music Lover. If you wonder why Volume 35, No. 9 (instead of No. 1) marks the occasion, the answer is simply that our so-called "volume year" was changed two or three times somewhere back along the line. But Volume 1, No. 1 was a May issue (its front cover is reproduced on the adjoining page), and you are now reading our 35th consecutive one.

Strictly speaking the ARG may be said to go back even further because our beloved P.H.R., whom I succeeded in 1957, previously had been Editor of The Music Lover's Guide. The latter began publication in 1932 and appeared regularly until just before the ARG was founded. But why argue about a couple of years?

Moreover, the ARG was not the first American periodical in this field anyhow. That distinction belongs to our esteemed prototype The Phonograph Monthly Review, which Axel B. Johnson established in 1926 and published until it gave way to The Music Lover's Guide a half-dozen years later. (Inasmuch as the latter in turn gave way to the ARG, then known as the AML, obviously it is at least defensible to argue that the link has been more or less direct since 1926.)

One thing you must say for the ARG no matter what: it has long since earned the endurance prize. No other recordings magazine in the United States has stayed alive for thirty-five years — or thirty-eight or forty-three, depending on your arithmetic. I am willing to settle for the minimum mileage because it beats every other American publication in any case. Besides, the palm really belongs to our English counterpart — The Gramophone — which has been published uninterruptedly since 1923.

In planning for this 35th anniversary issue I tinkered with the idea of getting a little memoir from as many of our erstwhile contributors as are still extant. But there was no coaxing an article out of P.H.R., and the only other charter member of the staff — dear Phil Miller — said his piece on the "good old days" in the 30th anniversary number five years ago. Then I got to thinking what an alumni call might have elicited, and it could have been enough prose to fill an issue more than twice this size.

Flicking through back volumes I have encountered reviews and articles by, just to name a few and in no particular order of eminence, Jacques Barzun, Nathan Broder, Richard Angell, Hans T. David, Paul Nettl, Nicolas Slonimsky, H. C. Robbins-Landon, Marion Bauer, Neville Cardus, Winthrop Sargeant, Francis Robinson, Klaus Pringsheim (a friend and pupil of Gustav Mahler), John K. Sherman, Edward Sackville-West, Arthur Berger, F. F. Clough and G. J. Cuming, Roland Gelatt, David Ha ing, Igor Kipnis (and h ander), Allen Hughes, Ra
Harold C. Schonberg, V
Alan Rich, Cecil Gray,
Robert Sabin, Moses Smit
heimer, Alfred Franken
Sprague Smith, John T
Walter Legge, Beniamin
Hempel, Joseph Szigeti, N
(Faubion?) Bowers, God
Lawrence Gilman, Carl
Abraham Veinus, Maria I
R. Marek, and none less raja of Mysore!

And that, mind you, is complete list. A few of no longer among the liv others had responded we out of space for sure.

No matter. Our chr
phonographic art is all th volumes, month by mon historians. They will ha to our unique archives so cause no other publicati

in this issue has to do with the Mozart Divertimento No. 17, K. 334. We take this heavenly piece for granted, as if it had been around constantly for a couple of centuries. But in May of 1935 the situation was otherwise. To wit:

"Until a few months ago, this work was unknown to concert programs. It was due to Sir Hamilton Harty, who performs the work in the present recording [with the London Philharmonic: Columbia set No. 207], that it came into the concert repertoire, where assuredly it belongs." And where, assuredly, it has been ever since.

The nine-sided Also Sprach Zarathustra performed by th [redacted] under the incomparable [redacted] (Victor set M-257) occupies a special place in the history of recorded sound quite aside from its musical values. Our appraisal of it in Volume 1, No. 1: "the most realistic reproduction of a modern symphony orchestra we have ever heard." And indeed, no one would hear any better sonics for quite a while after that.

Another historical note of special inter-

with a Tartar exhilaration, run the movements with throbbing and thus lose sight of one impor namely, a change in the tone o ous moods.

"Now, fire and enthusiasm
tion are superlative qualities because the possession of th dynamic and vibrant temper in order to achieve a requ between the manifold mood nuances, it would seem w one's enthusiasm and strive passionate rendition. For tranquility in the Nocturn come to us. For to have ter of animation prevai other three movements much as Pope felt wh master-passion in the b serpent, swallows all th

"This may be an ficiency when one con playing of the ensem
truth, the deficiency ment, of feeling, rat exp wit
ser

sustained melody sung on the vowel sounds. If the Tone resembles operatic recitative, the Alleluia is the beginning of coloratura. These Alleluias and the Gradual which follows belong to that form of chant called the Respond, in which the Priest alternates with the choir.

"That the recording comes from Nashdom Abbey, the headquarters of the Plainsong and Mediaeval Music Society, ensures its authenticity. This organization is doing for ancient music in England what the Benedictines of Solesmes have accomplished in France. Dom Anselm Hughes, who directs the singing on this record, became secretary of the Society in 1926, and is known as one of the world's foremost authorities on Gregorian music. He has lately been lecturing in this country. . . ."

The ARG policy of making room for dissent was evident from the beginning, too. For example, after noting that the [redacted] London Philharmonic recording of Beethoven's Fifth "offended our aesthetic sense for the disproportionateness of its tempi", P.H.R. went out of his way to cite a contrary view by the English critic and subsequent ARG contributor Sidney Grew:

"[redacted] does a thing that is rare in performances of the Fifth Symphony: he elevates the slow movement to the heights of the other movements. It is customary with the critics to say that this movement is relatively weak. And, certainly, in the hands of most conductors, it is that. Actually, of course, it is as noble, as strong, and as 'dynamic' as its companions.

"His tempo is slow. But though this has a good deal to do with the matter, it is only a part of the influences at work. Also his vision into the depths and distances of the instrumental sounds is exceptionally sharp and true, so that the elements are discovered and revealed to the listener which as a rule are not noticed. But even this is but a portion of these influences in intensif[redacted] music. The full explanation is, tha[redacted] evitzky realizes the symphony as a whole. He has it as an integer in his imagination, and so infuses the andante, its second theme, and its variations of the first theme, wit common vitality of the whole work.'

To which P.H.R. adds: "Althoug do not concur with this opinion, we it because it illustrates how difficult to establish a standard of interpret
. . . ."

The relatively small number of re
c. 1935 left plenty of room for artic

Volume 1, No. 1 had no fewer tha such pieces. One was the first
"Bach and Handel: Divergent P ities" by Compton Pakenham. was "The Symphony in the Parlor
Girard. A re-reading of this re how important radio was in th and in retrospect the concluding has not only a certain piquanc wistful thought for our own t tuting "television" and "tele appropriate):

"The 'symphony in the
of the great miracles of ma it should be considered an
Some day the high officia going to realize that thi serves bigger and better t has been given to date — all going to be able to t symphony orchestra on d
the week. There isn't r why we shouldn't have a n broadcast nightly. We enough symphony orchest dreds of thousands of people in on more broadcasts of th

Third and best of the artic
1, No. 1 was a charmer en
Mechanical Music Has E
Neville d'Esterre, an English was to contribute many more p are some of the better paragrap

"Those who lament the decay tive skill in music and technical k of the art in this country, cause development of mechanical repr bear a family resemblance to th breed of laudatores temporis acti — who make a habit of regretting wh call 'the good old times.'

"Most periods of human history been pretty mouldy, in a general for most people, though fairly propi for a few fortunate or thick-skinne

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ERICH LEINSDORF, Music Director
THOMAS D. PERRY, Jr., Manager
SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS 02115
Telephone (617) COmmonwealth 6-1492

June 19, 1967

Mr. W. Schwann
Schwann Record Catalog
137 Newbury Street
Boston, Massachusetts 02116

Dear Mr. Schwann

It is a rare event when any product of the human mind has been accepted as a singular achievement. While there is constant debate and dispute over which encyclopedia, which of the dictionaries, which of the anthologies of various kinds is superior, there is very little dissent (at least I have heard none) over your accomplishment in creating for the United States recording world the unchallenged, authoritative guide, both for the producer/performer and for the listener/buyer. With all the many companies and activities I do not quite see how you keep up to date, but however you do it, it is certainly worthy of a big thank-you from all. Since I cannot speak for everyone, of course, let me at least say bravo and thank you for myself.

With all good wishes,

Sincerely yours,

Erich Leinsdorf

Erich Leinsdorf

Thank you, Mr. Leinsdorf,

for your kind words. It means a lot to us to know our work on Schwann Catalogs is helpful to musicians and all concerned with the making, selling and buying of long playing records.

RECORDINGS of REVIEWS

Boston symphony displays its talent

By FRANK B. STEPHENSON

RECORD REVIEWS

Versatile is a tired and very overworked adjective to apply to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its associated groups. But what other adjective can so succinctly describe this almost miraculously perfect instrument?

Its current recorded endeavors shows just how wide-ranging its abilities are. The first of three Boston discs presents the orchestra under Leinsdorf in Beethoven, the Second Symphony and Selections from the ballet, "Creatures of Prometheus." To be sure, the playing throughout is superlative, the attention to detail almost unbelievable, and the recording brilliant and immaculate. The performance itself is straightforward in both instances, impressive though hardly of the type to overtake a number of others still holding forth honorably in the catalogs (RCA Victor Stereo LSC 3032).

Haydn occupies the Bostonians' attentions on a second disc which couples the Symphony No. 93 with the Symphony No. 96 ("Miracle"). The rich tone of the orchestra to these ears seems somewhat weighty for the fragile Haydn works, though once again the playing is as impressive as one could possibly want. A lighter touch is what is required; Leinsdorf is altogether too serious (RCA Victor Stereo LSC 3030).

Contrast

Far more persuasive, and the best of the three LPs, is the pairing of the Prokofieff Piano Concertos, Nos. 3 and 4, powerfully realized by soloist John Browning with Leinsdorf and the magnificent Bostonians providing breathtaking orchestral support. These showy but wholly worthwhile works find all the participants at their best, and all are particularly well-served by the Victor engineers. These are now the recommended versions in a field hardly devoid of competition (RCA Victor Stereo LSC 3019).

Two of the orchestra's offshoot groups offer the widest degree of contrast: the Boston Symphony Chamber Players and the Boston Pops. Both are currently represented on the latest lists.

Ambitious

The Chamber Players are made up of the Boston's first desk men and are, of course, musicians of the first order. Their second recorded undertaking is an ambitious one that comes in the form of a three disc album (RCA Victor Stereo LSC 6184, also mono). Included in the contents are Mozart's Piano Quartet in G Minor and his Quintet in E Flat for Piano and Winds (Claude Frank is the admirable pianist); Brahms' Trio in E Flat for Horn, Violin, and Piano; Schubert's String Trio No. 1; Poulenc's Trio for Oboe, Bassoon, and Piano; Haieff's Three Bagatelles for Oboe and Bassoon; Villa-Lobos' "Bachianas Brasilieras No. 6 for Flute and Bassoon;" and Colgrass' Variations for Four Drums and Viola. The diversity of the repertoire has only to be listed to be recognized. As an extra, Victor offers a recorded discussion of chamber music by Peter Ustinov, aptly described as witty and urbane.

Movie Tunes

The Pops disc could hardly be different; from the title song, "Up, Up and Away" through its batch of movie tunes ("Lara's Theme," "Theme from Valley of the Dolls," "A Man and a Woman"), Fiedler and his men are having their perennial field day. Just in case you might think that everything is froth, there is a commendable performance of the Andante from Mozart's Piano Concerto No. 21 (billed as the "Theme from Elvira Madigan") with Newton Wayland as the efficient keyboard soloist (RCA Victor Stereo LSC 3041).

Arthur Fiedler is also a knowing, serious musician. With organist Carl Weinrich and the Fiedler Sinfonietta, he offers Handel's Six Organ Concertos which make up Op. 7. Like the previously released Opus 4 Organ Concertos, the collaboration leaves little to be desired either from a musical or technical viewpoint (RCA Victor Stereo LSC 7052, also mono).

Among the purveyors of the big band sound of today, you can hardly do better than Henry Mancini who offers some very striking aural fare in The Big Latin Band (RCA Victor Stereo LSP 4049). Easily one of the best pop discs in months, this collection contains some marvelous performances of really good songs: Touch of Evil, Patricia, The Good, the Bad and the Ugly, Mission Impossible Theme, and Hang 'Em High.

The Mission Impossible Theme turns up once again in Class of '68, Floyd Cramer's piano tribute to the year's choice thus far (RCA Victor Stereo LSP 4025, also mono). Among the others that made it: A Man and a Woman, Valley of the Dolls Theme, never My Love, Love Is Blue and Goin' Out of My Head.

And just for fun, we recommend W. C. Fields Is Alive and Drunk at Your Father's Mustache (MGM Stereo SE 4555). Your Father's Mustache is the New York night spot that specializes in banjo renditions with sing-along chorus of old chestnuts played tongue-in-cheek. I'm looking over a Four Leaf Clover, It's a Sin to Tell a Lie, Heart of My Heart should give you an idea.

CLASSICAL

BEETHOVEN: SYMPHONY NO. 2/THE CREATURE OF PROMETHEUS—Boston SYMPHONY (Leinsdorf). RCA Victor Red Seal LCC 3032 (S)

Beethoven's moving second symphony is given a superb performance by the Boston Symphony, but then one has learned to expect nothing but the best from conductor Erich Leinsdorf. An added bonus is the beautiful and melodic ballet music from the composer's "Creature of Prometheus." Should prove an immediate success.

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000

AUG 31 1968

BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 2 in D, Op. 36; The Creatures of Prometheus, Op. 43—Overture, Excerpts; Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Stereo LSC-3032, $5.98.

®AS it turns out, this Op. 36 interests me neither as Beethoven nor as Leinsdorf. Karajan, Klemperer, Monteux, Szell, Walter—these conductors lead distinguished performances. They have something to say and they get it said naturally. Leinsdorf is fussy. Efficiency in music should not mean mere unity of ensemble, I think, but also the ability to be gracefully subtle. The Boston Symphony has a superb big-German-orchestra sound after years under Leinsdorf, and with more energy from the conductor the fast tempi would not seem rushed and the slow would not drag. There would be more care with the volume in the slow movement. Beginning at letter B, Beethoven ranges from ff to pp in a space of eight measures (two each, in this order, of ff, f, p, and pp). The Prometheus excerpts feature Boston Symphony first-chair players. The most gorgeous performance comes from cellist Jules Eskin. It is always a delight to hear Prometheus, even if these are only snippets. The finale is a treasure trove. It contains not only the Eroica theme, but snatches of Haydn and Mozart past and Rossini and Schumann (D minor Symphony, coda) to come. Leinsdorf's performance is strong, and disappointing only in that so much of the ballet is not performed. (It is available complete, conducted by Maurice Abravanel, on Vanguard ®VSD-71124.) —M.N.K.

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100

MAR 1969

The Sunday Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
SUN. 358,738

NOV 10 1968

Herald American
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
S. 133,303

SEP 8 1968

ERICH LEINSDORF

RECORDS

Little Distinction In Leinsdorf Disc

By ROBERT BENSON

Erich Leinsdorf continues his series of the Beethoven symphonies on the RCA Victor label with a disc containing the "Symphony No. 6 in F, Op. 68," the "Pastorale" symphony (RCA LSC 3074, $5.79).

As was the case with previous releases in this series, there is little here of particular distinction, with a brisk interpretation, well played but not outstandingly well recorded. There are many other recordings of this idyllic symphony that are superior in both performance and sound, and cost less.

The News American
BALTIMORE, MD.
D. 219,580 SUN. 318,425

JUN 22 1969

ERICH LEINSDORF and the Boston Symphony have added their version of Beethoven's sixth symphony to the more than a dozen already on the active list. A collector, looking for a copy of the sixth, cannot hope to hear all the recordings available before making a decision. However, a number of them range from more than adequate to excellent, including those by Ansermet, Bernstein, Paray and Steinberg, among others. Leinsdorf is a worthy addition to this list, his reading being both lucid and fluent, with full appreciation of the programmatic content of the so-called "Pastoral" work. RCA, LSC-3074.

Oregon Journal
PORTLAND, ORE.
D. 139,332 SAT. 131,534

JUN 23 1969

THE CINCINNATI ENQUIRER
D. 189,425 SUN. 302,445

JUN 22 1969

BEETHOVEN: "Symphony No. 6" ("Pastoral"): Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony: RCA Stereo LSC-3074:—Another top-notch Boston-Leinsdorf interpretation. The woodwinds in this LP reach a new height of artistry—naturalezza fused with the subtle "Austrian" folk-spirit which is found in Beethoven only when he chooses to be sentimental and a dreamer.

In the Ninth With Leinsdorf, Power and Joy

RECORD CHANGER

For his farewell concerts as Boston Symphony Erich Leinsdorf programmed Arnold Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw" and Beethoven's Symphony No. 9. The program heard last April is now available on record with the addition of the Beethoven Fifth Symphony.

Sherrill Milnes, heard in Houston last season in the "Barber of Seville," is the narrator. Michael Steinberg wrote in the Boston Globe that the baritone turned out "one of the gratest vocal performances I have ever heard." This is evident on the recording.

The music and spoken word recount the last moments of a group of Warsaw Jews before their transportation to a death camp. Milnes broadcasts the feeling of the moment without artificiality, leading the listener to a finale of the men's chorus of the New England Conservatory Chorus singing out the "Shema Yisroel" a humn of praise.

This is powerful stuff devoid of sentimentality. It is honest, based on the terror of that moment and presented with understanding.

Little more can be said about Leinsdorf's conducting of the Beethoven Ninth except that it is stunning. Experience has taught that this is a pivotal piece of music, influencing in its subtle way composers ever since.

The reason is clear in this lucid building of the thematic material to that immense choral finale, the same device Schoenberg uses in "Survivor." Complete control is exhibited over the orchestral sound.

Four young soloists, Jane Marsh, soprano; Josephine Veasey, mezzo; Placido Domingo, tenor and Sherrill Milnes with the New England Conservatory Chorus make Schiller's "Ode to Joy," resound with all of the drama of "singing something more pleasant, full of gladness."

Leinsdorf opens the Fifth Symphony with a horizontal emphasis on the final notes of the two opening statements. He then continues the progression through the "most played" Beethoven with positive attention to the structure.

There is a crispness in this recording and the architecture of the work is made evident.

In all, it is as much an ode to joy as is the Ninth. (RCA, Stereo, LSC-7055).

* * *

BUFFALO COURIER EXPRESS
Sunday, July 13, 1969

Gustav Leonhardt. They are presented as Handel himself might have heard them.

Also in the classical field is an LP on the same label (LSC 3074) featuring the Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf in Beethoven's detailed symphonic picture of rural life, the Symphony No. 6, or "Pastoral."

Some Beethoven

Erich Leinsdorf, soon to retire as music director of the Boston Symphony, is leaving a legacy of Beethoven in addition to other fare. Like most of Leinsdorf's music, his Beethoven has bite, a certain squareness, the securely-anchored feeling, toughness of fiber, strength.

It is all there in his Beethoven's Second, plus selections from The Creatures of Prometheus Ballet (RCA Victor LSC-3032). It is heard again in his Beethoven's Fourth and Leonore Overture No. 2 (RCA Victor LSC-3006). It is a nonsense approach, seldom relaxed, but full of the granitic beauty of a perfectly precisioned orchestra.

If Leinsdorf keeps his orchestra under tight rein, old Hans Schmidt-Isserstedt allows the Vienna Philharmonic to ebb and flow with all the poetic undulations requisite for a Beethoven Pastoral Symphony fulfilling its program (London CS 6556). It breathes in the good country air, sings with the joy of living and unhurriedly paints a landscape of the brightest tints. Also the Egmont Overture.

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Sunday, June 16, 1968

In a typically Leinsdorf touch, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has included the "Leonore" Overture No. 2 on its RCA Victor recording of Beethoven's Symphony No. 4. Lightweight compared to the neighboring third and fifth symphonies, the Fourth is pleasant, intriguing and beautiully performed by the BSO.

HOUSTON CHRONICLE
D. 290,584 SUN. 333,794

SEP 10 1969

CONSUMER BULLETIN
WASHINGTON, N. J.
MONTHLY 110,000

AUG 1968

Beethoven: Symphony No. 4 and Leonore Overture No. 2. Boston Symphony under Leinsdorf. RCA Victor LSC 3006 [LM 3006]. $5.79. Leinsdorf conducts these staples with appropriate vigor, nuance, and warmth. Big sound, excellent recording. AA AA

Boston symphony displays its talent

By FRANK B. STEPHENSON

RECORD REVIEWS

Versatile is a tired and very overworked adjective to apply to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its associated groups. But what other adjective can so succinctly describe this almost miraculously perfect instrument?

Its current recorded endeavors shows just how wide-ranging its abilities are. The first of three Boston discs presents the orchestra under Leinsdorf in Beethoven, the Second Symphony and Selections from the ballet, "Creatures of Prometheus." To be sure, the playing throughout is superlative, the attention to detail almost unbelievable, and the recording brilliant and immaculate. The performance itself is straightforward in both instances, impressive though hardly of the type to overtake a number of others still holding forth honorably in the catalogs (RCA Victor Stereo LSC 3032).

Haydn occupies the Bostonians' attentions on a second disc which couples the Symphony No. 93 with the Symphony No. 96 ("Miracle"). The rich tone of the orchestra to these ears seems somewhat weighty for the fragile Haydn works, though once again the playing is as impressive as one could possibly want. A lighter touch is what is required; Leinsdorf is altogether too serious (RCA Victor Stereo LSC 3030).

Contrast

Far more persuasive, and the best of the three LPs, is the pairing of the Prokofieff Piano Concertos, Nos. 3 and 4,powerfully realized by soloist John Browning with Leinsdorf and the magnificent Bostonians providing breathtaking orchestral support. These showy but wholly worthwhile works find all the participants at their best, and all are particularly well-served by the Victor engineers. These are now the recommended versions in a field hardly devoid of competition (RCA Victor Stereo LSC 3019).

Two of the orchestra's offshoot groups offer the widest degree of contrast: the Boston Symphony Chamber Players and the Boston Pops. Both are currently represented on the latest lists.

Ambitious

The Chamber Players are made up of the Boston's first desk men and are, of course, musicians of the first order. Their second recorded undertaking is an ambitious one that comes in the form of a three disc album (RCA Victor Stereo LSC 6184, also mono). Included in the contents are Mozart's Piano Quartet in G Minor and his Quintet in E Flat for Piano and Winds (Claude Frank is the admirable pianist); Brahms' Trio in E Flat for Horn, Violin, and Piano; Schubert's String Trio No. 1; Poulenc's Trio for Oboe, Bassoon, and Piano; Haieff's Three Bagatelles for Oboe and Bassoon; Villa-Lobos' "Bachianas Brasilieras No. 6 for Flute and Bassoon;" and Colgrass' Variations for Four Drums and Viola. The diversity of the repertoire has only to be listed to be recognized. As an extra, Victor offers a recorded discussion of chamber music by Peter Ustinov, aptly described as witty and urbane.

Movie Tunes

The Pops disc could hardly be different; from the title song, "Up, Up and Away" through its batch of movie tunes ("Lara's Theme," "Theme from Valley of the Dolls," "A Man and a Woman"), Fiedler and his men are having their perennial field day. Just in case you might think that everything is froth, there is a commendable performance of the Andante from Mozart's Piano Concerto No. 21 (billed as the "Theme from Elvira Madigan") with Newton Wayland as the efficient keyboard soloist (RCA Victor Stereo LSC 3041).

Arthur Fiedler is also a knowing, serious musician. With organist Carl Weinrich and the Fiedler Sinfonietta, he offers Handel's Six Organ Concertos which make up Op. 7. Like the previously released Opus 4 Organ Concertos, the collaboration leaves little to be desired either from a musical or technical viewpoint (RCA Victor Stereo LSC 7052, also mono).

Among the purveyors of the big band sound of today, you can hardly do better than Henry Mancini who offers some very striking aural fare in The Big Latin Band (RCA Victor Stereo LSP 4049). Easily one of the best pop discs in months, this collection contains some marvelous performances of really good songs: Touch of Evil, Patricia, The Good, the Bad and the Ugly, Mission Impossible Theme, and Hang 'Em High.

The Mission Impossible Theme turns up once again in Class of '68, Floyd Cramer's piano tribute to the year's choice thus far (RCA Victor Stereo LSP 4025, also mono). Among the others that made it: A Man and a Woman, Valley of the Dolls Theme, never My Love, Love Is Blue and Goin' Out of My Head.

And just for fun, we recommend W. C. Fields Is Alive and Drunk at Your Father's Mustache (MGM Stereo SE 4555). Your Father's Mustache is the New York night spot that specializes in banjo renditions with sing-along chorus of old chestnuts played tongue-in-cheek. I'm looking over a Four Leaf Clover, It's a Sin to Tell a Lie, Heart of My Heart should give you an idea.

CLASSICAL

BEETHOVEN: SYMPHONY NO. 2/THE CREATURE OF PROMETHEUS—Boston SYMPHONY (Leinsdorf). RCA Victor Red Seal LCC 3032 (S)

Beethoven's moving second symphony is given a superb performance by the Boston Symphony, but then one has learned to expect nothing but the best from conductor Erich Leinsdorf. An added bonus is the beautiful and melodic ballet music from the composer's "Creature of Prometheus." Should prove an immediate success.

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
W. 24,000

AUG 31 1968

BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 2 in D, Op. 36; The Creatures of Prometheus, Op. 43—Overture, Excerpts; Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA Stereo LSC-3032, $5.98.

Ⓢ AS it turns out, this Op. 36 interests me neither as Beethoven nor as Leinsdorf. Karajan, Klemperer, Monteux, Szell, Walter—these conductors lead distinguished performances. They have something to say and they get it said naturally. Leinsdorf is fussy. Efficiency in music should not mean mere unity of ensemble, I think, but also the ability to be gracefully subtle. The Boston Symphony has a superb big-German-orchestra sound after years under Leinsdorf, and with more energy from the conductor the fast tempi would not seem rushed and the slow would not drag. There would be more care with the volume in the slow movement. Beginning at letter B, Beethoven ranges from ff to pp in a space of eight measures (two each, in this order, of ff, f, p, and pp). The Prometheus excerpts feature Boston Symphony first-chair players. The most gorgeous performance comes from cellist Jules Eskin. It is always a delight to hear Prometheus, even if these are only snippets. The finale is a treasure trove. It contains not only the Eroica theme, but snatches of Haydn and Mozart past and Rossini and Schumann (D minor Symphony, coda) to come. Leinsdorf's performance is strong, and disappointing only in that so much of the ballet is not performed. (It is available complete, conducted by Maurice Abravanel, on Vanguard Ⓢ VSD-71124.) —M.N.K.

AMERICAN RECORD GUIDE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 21,100

MAR 1969

The Sunday Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
SUN. 358,738

NOV 10 1968

Herald American
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
S. 133,303

SEP 8 1968

ERICH LEINSDORF

RECORDS

Little Distinction In Leinsdorf Disc

By ROBERT BENSON

Erich Leinsdorf continues his series of the Beethoven symphonies on the RCA Victor label with a disc containing the "Symphony No. 6 in F, Op. 68," the "Pastorale" symphony (RCA LSC 3074, $5.79).

As was the case with previous releases in this series, there is little here of particular distinction, with a brisk interpretation, well played but not outstandingly well recorded. There are many other recordings of this idyllic symphony that are superior in both performance and sound, and cost less.

The News American
BALTIMORE, MD.
D. 219,580 SUN. 318,425

JUN 22 1969

ERICH LEINSDORF and the Boston Symphony have added their version of Beethoven's sixth symphony to the more than a dozen already on the active list. A collector, looking for a copy of the sixth, cannot hope to hear all the recordings available before making a decision. However, a number of them range from more than adequate to excellent, including those by Ansermet, Bernstein, Paray and Steinberg, among others. Leinsdorf is a worthy addition to this list, his reading being both lucid and fluent, with full appreciation of the programmatic content of the so-called "Pastoral" work. RCA, LSC-3074.

Oregon Journal
PORTLAND, ORE.
D. 139,332 SAT. 131,534

JUN 23 1969

THE CINCINNATI ENQUIRER
D. 189,425 SUN. 302,445

JUN 22 1969

BEETHOVEN: "Symphony No. 6" ("Pastoral"): Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony: RCA Stereo LSC-3074:—Another top-notch Boston-Leinsdorf interpretation. The woodwinds in this LP reach a new height of artistry—naturalezza fused with the subtle "Austrian" folk-spirit which is found in Beethoven only when he chooses to be sentimental and a dreamer.

BUFFALO COURIER EXPRESS
Sunday, July 13, 1969

Gustav Leonhardt. They are presented as Handel himself might have heard them.

Also in the classical field is an LP on the same label (LSC 3074) featuring the Boston Symphony under Erich Leinsdorf in Beethoven's detailed symphonic picture of rural life, the Symphony No. 6, or "Pastoral."

Some Beethoven

Erich Leinsdorf, soon to retire as music director of the Boston Symphony, is leaving a legacy of Beethoven in addition to other fare. Like most of Leinsdorf's music, his Beethoven has bite, a certain squareness, the securely-anchored feeling, toughness of fiber, strength.

It is all there in his Beethoven's Second, plus selections from The Creatures of Prometheus Ballet (RCA Victor LSC-3032). It is heard again in his Beethoven's Fourth and Leonore Overture No. 2 (RCA Victor LSC-3006). It is a nononsense approach, seldom relaxed, but full of the granitic beauty of a perfectly precisioned orchestra.

If Leinsdorf keeps his orchestra under tight rein, old Hans Schmidt-Isserstedt allows the Vienna Philharmonic to ebb and flow with all the poetic undulations requisite for a Beethoven Pastoral Symphony fulfilling its program (London CS 6556). It breathes in the good country air, sings with the joy of living and unhurriedly paints a landscape of the brightest tints. Also the Egmont Overture.

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Sunday, June 16, 1968

In a typically Leinsdorf touch, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has included the "Leonore" Overture No. 2 on its RCA Victor recording of Beethoven's Symphony No. 4. Lightweight compared to the neighboring third and fifth symphonies, the Fourth is pleasant, intriguing and beautiully performed by the BSO

In the Ninth With Leinsdorf, Power and Joy

RECORD CHANGER

For his farewell concerts as director of the Boston Symphony Erich Leinsdorf programmed Arnold Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw" and Beethoven's Symphony No. 9. The program heard last April is now available on record with the addition of the Beethoven Fifth Symphony.

Sherrill Milnes, heard in Houston last season in the "Barber of Seville," is the narrator. Michael Steinberg wrote in the Boston Globe that the baritone turned out "one of the gratest vocal performances I have ever heard." This is evident on the recording.

The music and spoken word recount the last moments of a group of Warsaw Jews before their transportation to a death camp. Milnes broadcasts the feeling of the moment without artificiality, leading the listeneer to a finale of the men's chorus of the New England Conservatory Chorus singing out the "Shema Yisroel" a humn of praise.

This is powerful stuff devoid of sentimentality. It is honest, based on the terror of that moment and presented with understanding.

Little more can be said about Leinsdorf's conducting of the Beethoven Ninth except that it is stunning. Experience has taught that this is a pivotal piece of music, influencing in its subtle way composers ever since.

The reason is clear in this lucid building of the thematic material to that immense choral finale, the same device Schoenberg uses in "Survivor." Complete control is exhibited over the orchestral sound.

Four young soloists, Jane Marsh, soprano; Josephine Veasey, mezzo; Placido Domingo, tenor and Sherrill Milnes with the New England Conservatory Chorus make Schiller's "Ode to Joy," resound with all of the drama of "singing something more pleasant, full of gladdness."

Leinsdorf opens the Fifth Symphony with a horizontal emphasis on the final notes of the two opening statements. He then continues the progression through the "most played" Beethoven with positive attention to the structure.

There is a crispness in this recording and the architecture of the work is made evident.

In all, it is as much an ode to joy as is the Ninth. (RCA, Stereo, LSC-7055).

* * *

HOUSTON CHRONICLE
D. 290,584 SUN. 333,794

SEP 10 1969

CONSUMER BULLETIN
WASHINGTON, N. J.
MONTHLY [illegible]

AUG 1968

Beethoven: Symphony No. 4 and Leonore Overture No. 2. Boston Symphony under Leinsdorf. RCA Victor LSC 3006 [LM 3006]. $5.79. Leinsdorf conducts these staples with appropriate vigor, nuance, and warmth. Big sound, excellent recording. AA AA 90.

Recordings

Beethoven a la Leinsdorf

By ALLEN HUGHES

If those old stories about Boston's resistance to change ever had any validity in regard to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, they can scarcely be said to apply now. This month, Erich Leinsdorf becomes the second music director to move on since Serge Koussevitsky ended his 25-year tenure with it in 1949. The pressures of economics and extended seasons are such that the Boston Symphony will probably never again reflect the artistic character and will of a single conducting personality.

Just this month, too, we have learned that the orchestra is to leave RCA Records exclusively for Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft. No reasons for the switch have been given, but it can be assumed that Deutsche Grammophon has made a better financial offer than the Boston Symphony got, or thought it could get, from RCA. We won't know for a long time what the artistic result of the move from RCA to D.G.G. might be, but it is of interest to consider the results of BSO-Leinsdorf-RCA combine during Mr. Leinsdorf's Boston stay of seven years. RCA's August releases tell, by implication, a good bit.

*

We can begin with a two-disk package containing the last program Mr. Leinsdorf conducted at Symphony Hall in Boston in April as music director of the orchestra. It contains Beethoven's Symphony No. 5 and Symphony No. 9 and Schoenberg's "A Survivor from Warsaw" (RCA LSC 7055). The New England Conservatory Chorus, the Chorus Pro Musica, Jane Marsh, soprano, Josephine Veasey, mezzo-soprano, Placido Domingo, tenor, and Sherrill Milnes, baritone and (in "Survivor") narrator, assist in the performances.

Bob Greene

Erich Leinsdorf
"Catholicity of taste"

Here we are reminded that Mr. Leinsdorf and the BSO have recorded all of the Beethoven symphonies and are the only conductor-orchestra pairing to have done so for RCA since the days of the Toscanini-NBC Symphony combination.

*

In a sense, Mr. Leinsdorf's Beethoven tells about his way with all music. He is not the sort of conductor who feels impelled to affix his own personal stamp conspicuously on everything he does. It is there, all right, but it does not take precedence over the work at hand. It does not shout "This is Leinsdorf's Beethoven" but says calmly "This is Beethoven as Leinsdorf thinks it should go."

Mr. Leinsdorf's ego does not demand the creation of a highly personalized product as in the case of, say, a Karajan, or a rigid, over-controlled one of the kind that can come from a Szell. Some listeners find that Mr. Leinsdorf occasionally sacrifices a bit too much passion for the sake of clarity and form, but generally speaking, it is only the superficial excitements that he underplays. He does not shy away from works that demand enormous investments of significant emotional involvement. He is willing, for example, to commit his energy, art and feeling to "A Survivor from Warsaw" and to do it unstintingly.

He reveals remarkable catholicity of taste and stylistic adaptation in his recorded repertory with the BSO. Referring only to the August releases, we find Brahms's A German Requiem coupled with the Four Serious Songs (RCA LSC 7054) standing side by side, so to speak, with Scharwenka's Piano Concerto in B-flat minor (RCA LSC 3080). Monserrat Caballé, Sheriff Milnes and the New England Conservatory Chorus sing the Requiem, and Mr. Milnes sings the songs with Mr. Leinsdorf at the piano. Earl Wild plays the Concerto and fills out the disk with solo piano pieces by Balakireff, Medtner and D'Albert.

Then, there is a disk that combines Prokofiev's Piano Concerto No. 5 in G with excerpts from Weill's The Threepenny Opera (RCA LSC 3121). John Browning is the concerto soloist.

It is not clear from the performance just why Mr. Leinsdorf wanted to do the Weill suite, for he does not quite get at the hard-edged, bitter quality inherent in the music. It is, however, handsomely played by 19 members of the BSO.

The Prokofiev, which comes off superbly in every way, completes the Leinsdorf-BSO-Browning recorded series of all five Prokofiev concertos. A package of the complete set, which is sure to be forthcoming, will be welcome indeed.

The August list also includes Mozart, the Symphony No. 36 in C and Symphony No. 39 in E flat (RCA LSC 3097). Mr. Leinsdorf's Mozart, vibrant, and—when appropriate—dramatic, is infused with a charm and grace that keep it from becoming too self-conscious, didactic or solemn at any time.

Among other composers who have been served well on records by Mr. Leinsdorf during his Boston period are Mahler, Bruckner and Richard Strauss. It is not that the quantity of works by these composers that he has recorded is impressive, but that the quality and character of the interpretations makes them distinctive and representative of some of the finest and most satisfying symphonic music-making of this decade.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507
AUG 17 1969

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY, ERICH LEINSDORF CONDUCTING

RECORDS

Boston Symphony Completes Beethoven; a Major Disappointment

By ROBERT E. BENSON

Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra have now completed their recording of the complete Beethoven symphonies with a new two-record set that contains the "Symphony No. 5 in C Minor, Op. 67" and the "Symphony No. 9 in D Minor, Op. 125," the "Choral" symphony (RCA stereo LSC 7055, $11.96).

The soloists are Jane Marsh, soprano, Joseph Veasey, contralto; Placido Domingo, tenor; and Sherrill Milnes, baritone; with the Chorus Pro Musica and the New England Conservatory Chorus. As an added bonus, the set also contains Arnold Schonberg's "A Survivor From Warsaw, Op. 46."

I find this recording to be a major disappointment. Leinsdorf favors brisk tempi, but there is still no sense of urgency or tension. This is definitely not big-scale Beethoven, and there are many other recordings of this music that are superior to this.

One of the major weaknesses of the album is the quality of reproduction. RCA has provided a distant pickup that lacks solidity and clarity, with the bass particularly undefined.

The soloists are too far away, and the woodwinds are weak, particularly the piccolo, which can barely be heard in the last movement.

Schonberg's brief "Survivor from Warsaw" written in 1947, based on an episode in 1943 in the Warsaw ghetto, as a survivor tells the story of a group of Jews who burst into singing "Shema Yisroel" at the moment of their deportation to the death camp.

It is the last orchestral work completed by Schonberg, with the narrator's story climaxed by a men's chorus singing the prayer.

This is a powerful piece of writing, magnificently performed on this record, and the reproduction is sufficient to convey the interpretation. This is the major attraction of this two-record set.

The News American
BALTIMORE, MD.
D. 219,580 SUN. 318,425
SEP 7 1969

Leinsdorf directs inspired Beethoven

By FRANK B. STEPHENSON

RECORD REVIEWS

Erich Leinsdorf's way with Beethoven isn't to everyone's liking, but even his most active detractors would have to concede that his recording of the "Pastoral Symphony" (RCA Red Seal Stereo LSC 3074) has been to admire.

Not the least of the merits is the majestic playing of the magnificent Boston Symphony. Precision, sharpness of attack, and unity of purpose are the components that make for a technical triumph. Coupled with these is a performance of serenity and poetic imagry rarely encountered previously. And the storm is a powerful affair, dynamic and forceful.

Herald American
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
S. 251,094
JUL 6 1969

RECORDS: Leinsdorf Leaves Boston

By HERMAN SCHADEN
Record Critic of The Star

Any notion that Erich Leinsdorf will not be missed in Boston has been dispelled by a spate of recent recordings with the orchestra he is leaving after seven years.

William Steinberg is of proven merit and will be a definite asset to the orchestra. Yet Leinsdorf has left a mark that will assure his place in the pantheon of Boston baton-wielders.

This reviewer has not always felt so positive about Leinsdorf's worth. There were times when he sounded too four-square, cold and even pedantic while his men played like the precisionists they are.

Lately something has changed, either our ears or Leinsdorf's style. It dawned quite suddenly the other day in a radio broadcast from Tanglewood. Leinsdorf did an unusual thing. He repeated the scherzo of Mozart's Haffner Symphony and lifted it so excitingly that the spontaneous cheers were foreordained.

That sent us back to the phono listening more intently. And the stuff of greatness began shining through. First there were two Mozart symphonies, the No. 36 in C (Linz) and No. 39 in E-flat (RCA LSC-3097). They were not bubbling over with effervesence, but neither were they draggy or wooden. They were just right to give Mozart the degree of profundity to which he is entitled.

And then the recording of Leinsdorf's final Boston program as music director. Every Leinsdorf-Boston buff will want this (RCA LSC-7055; two records). It is inspired in every way.

For the first eight and a half minutes we hear something as marvelously wrought as it is emotionally moving. It is Arnold Schoenberg's final orchestral piece: A Survivor from Warsaw, the story of the indomitable Jews who endured every infamy and in the end, en route to their death, burst into singing the Shema Yisroel prayer.

This is great not only for music and message, but for the absolutely chillingly beautiful way baritone Sherrill Milnes narrates (speech-sings) the text. The New England Conservatory Chorus sings the prayer with conviction.

An instant later, the orchestra launches into Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with his brotherhood of man message. There are many Ninths. None, we venture, clarifies more satisfactorily the often muddled opening movement.

And all the way through, the thinking is equally clear, into the choral movement where Milnes joins Jane Marsh. Josephine Veasey and Placido Domingo and the New England Chorus. Topping it all off, what more appropriate than the immortal Fifth Symphony with its triumphant credo?

In rounding out the Beethoven cycle, Leinsdorf brings the same degree of intellectual honesty to the pairing of the First and Eighth Symphonies (RCA LSC-3098). They are notable for their well thought-out patterns of dynamic shifts and climactic build-ups.

One of Leinsdorf's most notable recording achievements has been his Prokofief series. Those who have the first four piano concertos with John Browning will want the Fifth also (RCA LSC-3121). It is paired with Music from The Three Penny Opera which is not so strange when one considers the satirical propensities of Prokofief and Kurt Weill.

The piano concerto sounds about as perfect as one is likely to hear it done and it is Prokofief out from under the foot of his Soviet masters. The Three Penny music may be played too well for those who know it from the stage show's dowdy orchestra pit. But it is fun, nevertheless.

Leinsdorf's Wagner deserves special mention, too. Not all Wagner is sublime, but Leinsdorf somehow imparts nobility to such things as the Flying Dutchman and Tannhaeuser Overtures, the Meistersinger First Act Prelude and, naturally enough, the Tristan and Isolde Act One Prelude (RCA LSC-3011).

Can it be that the very thought of getting out from under enforced routine will lift a man's spirit to new heights?

The Sunday Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
SUN. 362,408
SEP 7 1969

ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH
D. 387,180 SUN. 610,016
AUG 17 1969

New Recordings

Victor has coupled Beethoven's Fifth and Ninth Symphonies with Schoenberg's "A Survivor From Warsaw" (RCA Red Seal LSC-7055, two records) in a sort of homage to Erich Leinsdorf on his retirement from the permanent conductorship of the Boston Symphony. The Fifth is a good one, with brisk, springy tempos that keep the music moving along without obliterating its expressive contours. The Ninth is a peculiar case. Like the Ninth of St. Louis's Eleazar De Carvalho, it polarizes around the last movement, and this is one of the finest performances of the choral movement to be had. In fact, the presence of Sherrill Milnes and Placido Domingo in the business end of the quartet lends it a unique eminence for no other baritone and tenor have such power, such ease in the upper range. They sing their difficult parts with complete musicality, and it is most gratifying to hear Milnes launch into his opening phrases with a soaring bel canto voice, instead of the pompous, pitchless bellowing that has come to be accepted. The choirs are the Chorus Pro Musica and the New England Conservatory Chorus. Elsewhere in the Ninth, Leinsdorf follows up a solid performance of the first movement with a slow Scherzo and a fast Adagio. The retarding and speeding are so pronounced, in fact, that the Scherzo comes out almost as long in duration as the Adagio; it is quite a testimony to the flexibility of music that Leinsdorf can prolong to more than 13 minutes the movement that Walter and Furtwaengler get through in 10. I find Leinsdorf's treatment of these inner movements unpleasant. Technically the recording is only so-so. "Survivor" is a late (1947), short example of Schoenberg's religious composition. Never has the twelve-tone technique had such expressive power in Schoenberg's hands; it is a beautiful orchestra score and the Boston Symphony's performance of it is crystalline. Baritone Milnes is there with a superb reading of the "sprechstimme" part, and the Conservatory Chorus does the closing hymn. With all due respect to survivors from Warsaw, the textual part of this Schoenberg work is lugubrious, and there is even the micky-mouse effect of percussion wallops when the victim intones ". . . beat me over the head." As with "Erwartung," one wishes that Schoenberg had left the emotion in the capable hands of his orchestra; Alban Berg remains the only real vocal composer of the Vienna school.

91

★ ★ ★

BEETHOVEN: Piano Concerto No. 1. Artur Rubinstein, pianist, with Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Erich Leinsdorf. RCA-Victor LSC-3013

Rubinstein and the Boston Symphony, under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf, give a great performance of Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 1 in C, Op. 15.

It is difficult to define the source of Rubinstein's magic, but there is a compelling power in his playing which is undeniable. The recorded sound of both piano and orchestra is superb.

★ ★ ★

St. Louis Globe-Democrat
D. 327,594 SUN. 356,929
JUL 6 1968

BEETHOVEN: Piano Concertos: No. 1, in C Major, Op. 15; No. 3, in C Minor, Op. 37. Artur Rubinstein (piano); Boston Symphony Orchestra, Erich Leinsdorf cond. RCA ⓢ TR3 5038 $10.95.

Performance: Fluent
Recording: Solid
Stereo Quality: Good
Speed and Playing Time: 3¾ ips; 71'56"

Only the Second Concerto is now needed to complete Artur Rubinstein's four-track tape traversal of the five Beethoven piano concertos with Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony. Unless the Harrison catalog of stereo tapes has misprinted the information, Leon Fleisher and George Szell with the Cleveland Orchestra offer all five on two 3¾-ips reels at $17.39. Otherwise, Mr. Rubinstein has no other 3¾-ips tape competition, though performances of Nos. 1 and 3 by such renowned Beethovenists as Backhaus and Serkin can be had in 7½-ips format.

Rubinstein's way with Beethoven is that of the intensely musical and thoroughly seasoned non-specialist. He does not linger over the slow movements, and he tends to favor slightly slower pacing of the opening movements, chiefly in the interest of lyrical detail. Piano-orchestra balance is excellent throughout both sequences of the RCA tape, with the microphoning tending to be from the vantage point of the conductor's podium rather than that of, say, a first-row balcony seat. D. H.

STEREO REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY 163,400
MAR 1969

CLASSICAL

BEETHOVEN: PIANO CONCERTO No. 1—Rubinstein/Boston Symphony (Leinsdorf, RCA Victor Red Seal LP 3013 (M); LSC 3013 (S)

Artur Rubinstein's recordings with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra have attracted lots of attention as will this team-up on Beethoven's first concerto. Rubinstein's piano work is masterful and Leinsdorf adds to the excitement by leading the orchestra through some stirring moments.

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 443,000
JUL 27 1968

SUNDAY OKLAHOMAN
OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLAH
Circ. 274,576
10-6-63

Preview List Recommended For Symphony

By John Acord III

Final part of sampling the Oklahoma City Symphony's 32nd season, under Guy [illegible] Harrison, music [illegible] recordings.

although [illegible] contains some [illegible] features gorgeous singing on re[illegible] Mi- and Bruno Walter conducts.

James Oliver Buswell IV, violinist, has not yet announced his selection. But the orchestra portion of the twelfth concerto is the exciting Bartok "Concerto for Orchestra." My personal preference on the Bartok is a splendid recording on RCA featuring Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony.

London Record Praised

The final concert of the [illegible] features one of my [illegible] pianists — [illegible]

New York Post
D. 628,146 SAT. 354,497
JUL 5 1968

Camera Talk

BY DON LANGER

[illegible] tapes, [illegible] versity Sound [illegible] mitted to both [illegible] and its world-famous [illegible] speakers. United Audio turntables, rated last year as the finest, will keep its lead with a new turntable joining its four excellent models.

The Week's Tapes

RCA has released four new 8-track tape cartridges. "The Wonderful Latin-American Sound of Brazil" (P8S-1341); "Beethoven Piano No. 1, Arthur Rubenstein"; Boston Symphony Erich Leinsdorf (R8S-1096); "The Pops Goes West" Boston Pops (R8S-1095; and, "Living Marimbas, Love is Blue" (C8S-1038).

Recordings Reports I

Orchestral LPs

Data /	Report
Beethoven: Concerto No. 1. Artur Rubinstein, piano; with Erich Leinsdorf conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. RCA Victor stereo, LSC 3013; mono, LM 3013; $5.79.	It is hardly a fulsome compliment to declare that everything is neat, tidy, and beautifully dovetailed in this collaboration. Since "Rubinstein" and "Boston Symphony" are brand names of guaranteed excellence, such is the outcome to expect when they meet, on the common ground of Beethoven. It is the above and beyond the neat, tidy, and beautifully dovetailed to which one's attention is directed, but too often left unfulfilled. Rubinstein plays the elaborations of the Largo with surpassing breadth and fine singing sound, but it doesn't strike me that he responds to either the first or the last movement with the kind of spirit that animated Christoph Eschenbach in his recent collaboration with Karajan. One may retort that the decades between them preclude such a result. However, if one is inclined to praise Rubinstein for the plusses that have accrued over the years, then a fair sum demands that the minuses be noted also. He plays a long (unidentified) cadenza whose only cachet can be that it was by Beethoven himself. Fine sound, and admirably balanced, too. —IRVING KOLODIN.

COMMONWEAL
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 46,000
AUG 9 1968

tura[illegible]
the detailed [illegible]
